D kind of aſhes in the church, came to themſelues again, and ſo recouered; and that it was a wonderfull thing to ſee, how much they were changed by the efficacie of that remedie, that they ſeemed not to be the ſame men: meaning indeed the diſordered manners of the Chriſtians at Shrouetide, and the ceremonies vſed on Aſhwedneſday: which thing they to whom it was told, ſo much the more maruelled at, for that the Turks haue many medicines which cauſe madneſſe, but few or none which preſently eaſeth the ſame. And they vpon thoſe dayes that goe before their great faſts, change nothing of their wonted manner of life to the worſe: but rather contrariwiſe prepare themſelues to abſtinence, by taking ſomewhat from their vſuall fare, the better to endure the ſudden change of their faſt: which they ſo preciſely obſerue, that vpon their faſting dayes they will not ſo much as taſt a cup of water, or waſh their mouthes with water all the day
E long, before the ſtarres appeare in the skie: which maketh their faſts, eſpecially in Summer when the dayes be long and hot, to be vnto them very tedious.

The opinion the Turkes haue of them that die in their warres.

The ſpare diet of the Ianizaries.

The preciſe māner of the Turkes in their faſts.

Whiles I thus lay in the campe, there came vnto me one Albertus a learned man with certaine preſents from the emperour to Solyman, which were, certaine gilt plate, and a moſt curious clocke, which was carried vpon an Eliphant like a caſtle; and ſome crownes to be diſperſed among the Baſſaes: which Solyman would needs haue preſented vnto him in the campe in the ſight of the whole armie, to make it the better knowne what friendſhip was betweene him and the emperour, and that he needed not to feare any danger from the Chriſtian princes.

Preſents ſent frō the emperour Ferdinand to Solyman.

But to returne againe to Baiazet, from whom we haue a while digreſſed: he after the battell at ICONIVM had retired himſelfe to AMASIA, the place of his gouernment, as though he would F haue now there quietly liued, if his father would ſo giue him leaue. He had now ſatisfied his youthfull deſires and greefe, and ſeemed willing from thenceforth to ſatisfie his fathers better expectation: and therefore ceaſed not by letters and fit men to proue his fathers mind. Neither did Solyman ſhew himſelfe ſtrange from ſuch a reconciliation: at firſt he eaſily gaue the meſſengers audience, read his ſons letters, and courteouſly returned anſwere; ſo that it was commonly reported reported in the campe, that the father and the ſonne would agree, and that the old man would pardon the youthfull pranke alreadie paſt, ſo that he would from thenceforth remaine dutifull. G

Solyman diſſembleth with Baiazet.

But all this was by the counſell of the Baſſaes nothing but deepe diſſimulation in the craftie old ſire, vntill he had ſhut vp Baiazet, and ſo got him aliue into his hand: for it was feared, leaſt he deſpairing of pardon, ſhould with ſuch a power breake into the borders of PERSIA (now the onely place left for his refuge) as might preuent the watchfull diligence of his lieutenants vpon thoſe frontiers: whom Solyman charged by continual letters ſo to ſtop all the paſſages into PERSIA, as that there ſhould not be any crany for Baiazet to flie out by. In the mean time, if any came within his reach that were ſuſpected to haue taken part with Baiazet, or fauored his prceedings, thoſe he cauſed to be tortured and ſecretly made away, and amongſt them ſome whom Baiazet had of purpoſe ſent to excuſe themſelues. For Solyman fearing leaſt Tamas the Perſian king H (more mindful of his old quarels than of the late inforced peace) ſhould hardly with much ado ſuffer his ſonne to be got out of his hands if he ſhould flie thither, and ſo againe raiſe a long and dangerous warre; did therefore what he poſſibly might to oppreſſe him before he ſhould come thither. Which his purpoſe although it was couered with all ſecrecy, yet was it not hidden from ſome of Baiazet his friends, by whom he was oftentimes warned not to truſt his father, but to beware of treaſon, and in any caſe ſpeedily to prouide for his own ſafetie. But Solyman thinking he had now ſo prouided as that he could by no meanes eſcape, and happily the more to deceiue his ſonne, appointed to returne with his army to CONSTANTINOPLE the day after their Eaſter day. But Baiazet vpon the verie feaſt day hauing performed the ſolemnities thereof, commaunded all his things to be truſſed vp at AMASIA, and ſo ſet forward vpon his vnfortunat iour- I ney towards PERSIA, knowing right well, that he went to the auncient enemie of the Othoman family, but yet fully reſolued to make proofe of any mans mercie, rather then to fall into the hands of his angry father. Now were they all ſet forward, except ſuch weake ſoules as were not thought able to endure the labour of ſo long a iourney, amongſt whom was left Solyman, Baiazet his youngeſt ſonne, but then newly borne: which guiltleſſe babe, with his mother, Baiazet thought better to leaue vnto the mercie of his grandfather, than to take him with him, a poore companion of his wofull and miſerable flight: whom Solyman as yet vncertaine of his fathers fortune, commaunded to be nurſed at PRVSA. Baiazet ſo gone from AMASIA, vſed ſuch celeritie in his trauell, that almoſt in euery place hee preuented the fame of his comming, and light vpon many that were appointed to haue ſtaied his paſſage, before they were ready or aware of K

his comming. The Baſſa of SEBASTIA he thus deceiued: There was two wayes, whereof the one of them being intercepted, would greatly hinder his iourney, and that the Baſſa had already taken: wherfore he ſent certaine, as if they had been fugitiues, to tell the Baſſa that he was already gone the other way. Which the Baſſa beleeuing, left the place he had before taken, and riſing with all his power to purſue him the other way, vvhereby it was told him he was gone, left that way free and open for him to paſſe by.

The Baſſa of Erzirum deceiued by Baiazet.

The Baſſa of ERZIRVM he deceiued alſo by another not much vnlike ſhift: from whom when he was not farre diſtant, and knowing that in paſſing through his countrey, he was to endure great danger, he ſet vpon him with a wile, ſending vnto him certaine of his followers with commendations: who afterwards lamentably complaining of the yong princes calamitie, to moue L the Baſſa to pitie, at laſt requeſted that hee vvould giue him leaue to ſhoo his horſes in his territorie, telling him, That he came vnprouided of all things, and therefore deſirous in that fruitfull countrey to refreſh his horſes a day or two, and to new ſhoo them. Whereunto the Baſſa courteouſly anſwered, That he would not let him to take whatſoeuer he needed. But vvhether it vvas for the compaſſion that he had vpon the ſtate of Baiazet, or for the ſecret loue he bare him, or that he thought by that means the eaſilier to entrap him, is doubtfull, & happily preuented by Baiazet his quick ſpeed, had not as yet ſufficient time to draw together his ſouldiors. He ſent alſo vnto Baiazet certaine ſmall preſents, ſeeming to be glad of his welfare and comming: who neuertheleſſe kept on his way, reſting no part of the day, and but a little of the night. The Baſſa of ERZIRVM vnderſtanding that Baiazet came ſtill on, made what haſt he could alſo, and ioyned M his power to the reſt of the Baſſaes which followed after: for many Baſſaes and Sanzackes hearing that Baiazet was fled from AMASIA, purſued faſt after him, being charged by Solyman vpon paine of their heads to bring him backe either aliue or dead: but all in vaine, by reaſon of his ſpeedy departure, and for that he made more haſt to flie than they did to follow. Yet it coſt no

A man deerer then this Baſſa of ERZIRVM, of whom we haue now ſpoken, whom Solyman for this cauſe diſplaced: and Selymus afterwards ſlew with two of his ſonnes, young ſtriplings whom hee had before in deſpight ſhamefully abuſed againſt nature. Yea Selymus himſelf and Mehemet the great Baſſa, with the Berglerbeg of GRECIA, followed alſo after Baiazet, though it were a farre off. This his departure grieued Solyman aboue meaſure, aſſuring himſelf (as the truth was) that hee was fled into PERSIA: wherewith he was ſo much moued, that hee could ſcarcely containe himſelfe, but would needs haue gone with all his power in al haſt againſt the Perſian, to haue terrified him at hand from relieuing his rebellious ſonne. But theſe his raging fits his graue counſellors moderated, by declaring vnto him what danger he ſhould aduenture himſelfe vnto, by reaſon of the doubtfull faith of his beſt ſouldiors. And what if Baiazet (as he was a deſ-

B perat and ſudden man, ſhould in the meane time turne about aboue PONTVS and the fens of Mœotis, and ſo fetching a compaſſe come to CONSTANTINOPLE, and proclaiming a generall libertie in his abſence, poſſeſſe himſelfe of the Empire. By which wholſome perſwaſion Solyman ſtaied his ſo haſtie a iourney: but Baiazet all the way as hee went, writ vpon the gates and doores, That he would giue double pay to al ſuch as ſhould follow him: which cauſed Solymans captaines to haue their owne ſouldiors in diſtruſt, and the more for that they might oftentimes heare amongſt them, ſpeeches of great good will and loue towards Baiazet.

The eager purſuit of the Baſſaes and Sanzacks.

After long flying, hee was at length come to the Riuer Araxis, which ſeparated the Turkes kingdome from the Perſian; which hauing paſſed ouer, and yet not ſo in ſafetie, he left certaine

C of his followers vpon the banke of the riuer to keep the Sanzacks, who ſtill eagerly purſued him from paſſing ouer: whom the Sanzacks eaſily repulſed, & ſo paſſing the riuer, entred a great way into the Perſian kingdome, vntill ſuch time as that they were met withall by certaine of the nobilitie of PERSIA with great troupes of horſemen; who demanding of them what they meant, and what they ſought for in another mans kingdome, were anſwered by the Turkes, That they purſued their kings fugitiue ſonne. To whom the Perſians replied, That they did not well, contrarie to the league with their Lord and Maſter, to come in armes beyond the bounds of their owne kingdome; and that there was a ſtrong league betweene King Tamas and Solyman, which it behoued them to regard: as for Baiazet, their king would conſider what was conuenient for him to doe, and not in that point forget himſelfe: in the meane time they ſhould doe well to get

D them out of that countrey wherein they had nothing to doe. Whereupon the Turks forthwith left this purſuit and retired.

But by and by came meſſengers from the Perſian King to Baiazet to ſalute him, and to demaund the cauſe of his comming, and alſo to ſee what ſtrength he brought with him; which as ſome account was about twentie thouſand. To whom Baiazet declared, That hee by his brothers iniuries and fathers hard dealing driuen out of his countrey, was fled vnto the ſacred maieſtie of the Perſian king, as his moſt aſſured refuge; who as he well hoped, in compaſſion of mans inſtabilitie, would not reiect him ſo diſtreſſed, and otherwiſe deſtitute of all helpe, Whereunto the Perſian replied, That he had done very vnvviſely to come vnto him that vvas in league and amity with his father, vvhereof one condition was, That they ſhould account the enemies of the one the enemies of the other, and the friends of the one the friends of the other. Which lavv to Baiazet wel entertained by the Perſian king.

E breake, he accounted a thing vtterly vnlawfull: neuertheleſſe ſeeing the matter vvas ſo fallen out, he vvas vvelcome as vnto his friend, who in his behalfe would leaue nothing vnattempted to reconcile him to his father, vvhich he deſpaired not to bring to paſſe. So Baiazet meeteth with the Perſian king, but in an euill houre, although at their firſt meeting there vvas great vvelcome, friendly countenance, cheerfull lookes, mutuall kindneſſe, often conference, and great feaſting one of another; things whereby the ſecret thoughts of hollovv hearts are beſt concealed: there vvas alſo a motion made of a ſtraighter bond of alliance, and one of the Perſian kings daughters promiſed to Orchanes one of Bazaiet his ſonnes; and he put in hope that the Perſian king vvould neuer reſt in quiet, vntill Solyman had made him Gouernour either of MESOPOTAMIA, BABY-

F LON, or ERZIRVM (which Gouernements vvere by the Perſians greatly extolled) and that hee might there liue vvithout feare of his brother, farre from him and his father alſo; vvhere if any thing ſhould fall out othervviſe than vvell, hee might haue his brother the Perſian king a ſure refuge to retire vnto, and ſo ſafe from all danger. Which ſpeeches vvere happily giuen out, of purpoſe to auert Baiazet his thought from the feeling of the preſent danger; who ſeemed vnto himſelfe ſo aſſured of the loue and friendſhip of Tamas the Perſian King, that at ſuch time as he ſent

his embaſſadours to CONSTANTINOPLE, for a reconciliation to be made betweene Solyman and him (as was commonly ſuppoſed) he willed the ſame embaſſadour to tell his father, that he had loſt a father at CONSTANTINOPLE, and found another in PERSIA. But whether the Perſian delt ſincerely in this behalfe for Baiazet by his embaſſadours, which were many, may well be doubted. Like it is, that there was more faigned ſhew of double diligence, than of true meaning therein; and rather to feele the mind of Solyman, than to doe any good to the poore diſtreſſed prince: and the rather, for that in the meane time all things were ſeriouſly plotted that might tend to his deſtruction. Which were no ſooner growne to their full ripeneſſe, but there was of purpoſe a motion made, That ſuch a multitude as followed this yong prince lay too cloſe togither, that there was not in one place victuall ſufficient for them, and that it was therefore more conuenient to haue them billeted in the countrey thereabouts; which would be more commodious, as well for the better victualing of them, as for diuers other purpoſes alſo. Truth was, that Tamas the Perſian king, farre vnlike his noble father Iſmaell, ſtood in doubt leaſt hee brought vp a Serpent in his boſome. Yet there were many which thought, that it was not the Perſians mind at firſt to haue deſtroied Baiazet, but to haue beene thereunto enforced by the practiſe of ſome of his familiars and followers; who not regarding the courteſie of the Perſian king, nor the lawes of hoſpitalitie, perſuaded Baiazet to thruſt him out of his kingdome: whereof there was many euident tokens. And among other things it was told king Tamas, that one of Baiazets chiefe captaines ſhould ſay, What meane we? why ſtay we to kill this hereticall king, and to poſſeſſe his kingdome? for we ſhall no doubt by his treacherie all come to deſtruction. And that vpon ſuch occaſion the king was conſtrained to condiſcend to a deuiſe more neceſſarie than honourable. Baiazet had no great power, but moſt of them were valiant men, and ſouldiors of great experience, readie to aduenture vpon any thing: of whom the Perſian not without cauſe ſtood in ſome feare. He knew his kingdome to be neither auntient nor yet well aſſured, as gotten by his father by the counterfeit ſhow of a reformed religion: And who could aſſure him, but that amongſt ſo many nations ouer whom he lorded, but that there were many wearie of the preſent ſtate, and ſo deſirous of noueltie? vnto whom nothing could chance more fitting, than the comming of Baiazet, a noble and valiant yong gentleman; and that more was, deſperatly ſet: that as yet he himſelfe might of right rather ſeeme in the power of his gueſt, than he in his: And that therefore he was to alter the matter, and not longer to entertaine him as his gueſt, but to coupe him vp as a moſt dangerous wild beaſt. Which to doe, the eaſieſt way was to diſperſe his power, and ſo to take him vnawares: for that he could not without much bloudſhed be openly taken in the middeſt of his ſtrength, eſpecially by the daintie Perſian of long time not vſed to warre, and as yet not come togither; againſt Baiazets ſouldiors, men of great actiuitie and experience. So was the matter cunningly imparted vnto him for the diſperſing of his forces, and all the commodities to enſue thereof alleadged: which Baiazet might not well gainſay, although many of his wiſe followers (men of great reach) did ſhrewdly ſuſpect the ſequell. But what could he refuſe, vpon whom neceſſitie lay ſo heauie? where no other hope was left? where he liued as it pleaſed another man? and that againe to, where once to doubt of the fidelitie of his hoaſt, might be imputed to him for the greateſt treacherie? So theſe moſt valiant ſouldiors, the poore princes faithfull followers, neuer again to ſee one another, are diſperſed into diuers countrey villages, and beſtowed where the Perſians thought good. Not many daies after, at a time pickt out for the purpoſe, they in number few, and diſperſed in a ſtrange countrey, were incloſed by many and ſlaine: their horſes, armour, apparell, and whatſoeuer elſe, became a prey vnto the murtherers. At the ſame inſtant was Baiazet and his ſonnes caſt in bonds alſo, and that to his greater griefe as many report, taken as he was ſitting merrily at dinner at the kings table. The Perſian king ſeemed to haue foreſeene much in this his hard dealing with Baiazet: as if that he, being a valiant and couragious yong prince, and much better ſouldior than his brother, ſhould haue ſucceeded his father in his empire, much trouble and perill might haue growen thereby, both to himſelfe and his kingdome: And that it ſtood farre better with the ſafetie of his eſtate, that Selymus (a man wholy giuen to voluptuouſneſſe and eaſe) ſhould raigne ouer the Turkes; in whoſe time he might as it were promiſe vnto himſelfe all peace and ſecuritie: and therefore it was thought that he would neuer let Baiazet goe aliue out of his hand, but rather make him away in priſon, as if he had there died for melancholy and griefe. Well he was aſſured, that after he had ſlaine his followers, and impriſoned himſelfe and his ſonnes, hee would neuer be friends

Tamas the Perſia king in feare of Baiazet.

Baiazet his followers diſperſed and ſlaine.

Baiazet impriſoned.

A friends with him that had ſo notably wronged him.

Baiazet thus ſhamefully impriſoned, meſſengers ran continually too and fro betwixt the two old princes, Solyman and Tamas. Amongſt the reſt, the Perſian king ſent a ſolemne embaſſadour vnto the Turke with preſents, namely curious tents, coſtly carpets, an Alcaron containing the myſteries of their ſuperſtition, and certaine ſtrange beaſts. The cauſe of his comming was pretended to be, for a reconciliation to be made betweene Solyman and his ſonne; which embaſſadour was honourably entertained and feaſted by the great Baſſaes. Now vvas poore Baiazet in ſmall hope of life, his cruell father ſtill craving to haue him deliuered into his hands to be ſlaine: and the Perſian yet denying to deliuer him, and ſeeming to defend him, but not (as was thought) altogither faithfully. Solyman left no meanes vnattempted to haue wrung him from
B the Perſian; ſometimes he ſpake him faire, putting him in mind of his league, wherein it vvas agreed, That they ſhould both haue the ſame friends and the ſame enemies: otherwhile he terrified him with great words, and denouncing of vvar, except he would deliuer him his ſonne: he furniſhed with ſtrong garriſons all the frontiers of his dominion towards PERSIA: he filled all MESOPOTAMIA and the banks of the riuer Euphrates with ſouldiors, eſpecially vvith them of his owne guard, and ſuch as he had before vſed in the battell againſt Baiazet; ouer vvhom commanded Mehemet Baſſa the third of the Viſier Baſſaes, and the Beglerbeg of GRECE (for Selymus vvas ſoone wearie of the field, and ſo betime returned home:) he alſo incited the Georgian people to take vp armes againſt the Perſians, vvho vviſely anſwered, That they had not ſuch
C confidence in their own ſtrength, as to prouoke king Tamas; but let Solyman himſelfe come with his armie, and when they ſaw him preſent in the field, then they knew vvhat they had to doe, and that he ſhould then well ſee, that they vvanted neither diſcretion nor valour. And becauſe he vvould leaue nothing vnproued, he made ſhew as if he vvould in perſon himſelfe haue gone to ALEPPO in SYRIA, and ſo haue on that ſide inuaded the Perſian: neither vvas the Perſian king altogither out of feare, hauing to his coſt many times proued what Solyman was able to do. But the vnwillingneſſe of the ſouldiors, and their minds altogither eſtranged from that vvarre, eaſily ſtaied the raging Turke: they deteſted that war and forſooke their enſignes, a great number of vvhom (eſpecially horſemen) without leaue of their captaines returned to CONSTANTI-
D NOPLE; and being commaunded againe to the campe, went indeed, but with ſuch countenance and cheere, as well declared how they were affected, and what they would do if occaſion ſerued for them to reuolt.

The Perſian king ſendeth embaſſadors with preſents to Solyman.

For vvhich cauſe, after that Solyman perceiued that Baiazet could not aliue be got from the Perſian (excuſing himſelfe by feare of reuenge by him whom he had ſo grieuouſly offended, if he ſhould by any meanes eſcape:) he thought it beſt to follow that which was next, and to haue him there ſlaine, which he was in good hope to compaſſe; and the rather, for that the Perſian had but lately written vnto him, That he could not but much maruel, to ſee him deale ſo ſlenderly in a matter of ſo great importance; That he on his part had ſent him diuers embaſſadors, and that he on the other ſide had ſent him nothing but common meſſengers with papers, vvhich cauſed him to thinke that he made no great account of the matter: wherefore he ſhould doe well, to ſend vnto him men of account and place, vvith whom he might conferre and conclude alſo ac-E cording to the waightineſſe and exigence of the cauſe: beſides that (he was as he ſaid) not a little in his debt, for that Baiazet and his followers had beene vnto him no ſmall charge, before hee could get him into his power: all which it vvere good reaſon that he ſhould haue conſideration of. Whereby Solyman perceiued, that money was the thing the Perſian king ſought after: and therefore rather than he would in an vnfit time of his life intangle himſelfe in a dangerous and vnneceſſarie warre, he determined by the councell of his Baſſaes, rather with mony than with the ſword to fight with the Perſian king. Hereupon was Haſſan Aga (one of the chiefe gentlemen of his chamber) appointed embaſſador into PERSIA, with whom was ioined the Baſſa of MARAS, a man both for his age and place, reuerend: who departing with a large commiſſi-
F on almoſt in the depth of Winter, with great ſpeed and wonderfull toile, by thoſe long and difficult waies, arriued at laſt at CASBIN the ſeat of the Perſian king, hauing by the way loſt diuers of their ſeruants and followers. Being come to the court, the firſt thing they deſired, was to ſee Baiazet, whom they found ſhut vp in a cloſe priſon, pale and wan as a man forlorne, with his haire and beard ſo long and ouergrowne, as that he was not to be knowne before he was new trimmed; which done, then appeared the liuely reſemblance of his wonted countenance & fa-uour, ſo that Haſſan verily knew it to be him: for he had been brought vp with him of a child in the court, and for that cauſe eſpecially had Solyman ſent him thither to be aſſured that it was he. G

The agreement betweene the Perſian king & Solyman for the deſtruction of Baiazet.

At length after long diſcourſe and conference betweene the king and the embaſſadours, it was agreed vpon, that the king ſhould receiue from Solyman, full recompence of all the charges he had been at, and of the harmes by him ſuſtained ſince the comming of Baiazet into PERSIA, with ſuch farther reward as ſo great a good turne deſerued: which things performed, that then it ſhould be in Solymans power to haue Baiazet made away. With this newes Haſſan poſteth to his maſter at CONSTANTINOPLE, who forthwith cauſed the promiſed reward, togither with ſuch charges as the Perſian king demaunded, to be made readie, and with a ſafe conuoy to be ſent vnto the borders of PERSIA, where they were of the Perſians receiued. Preſently after, returneth Haſſan the appointed executioner of the vnfortunat Baiazet: for ſo Solyman had ſtraightly charged him, to ſtrangle him with his owne hands. Which thing this new made hangman accordingly performed, and with a bowſtring ſtrangled the vnfortunat prince; who is reported to haue requeſted of the executioner, but that he might ſee his children before he died, & take of them his laſt farewell: vvhich poore requeſt could not be granted, but he forthwith commanded to die. This was the wofull end of the vnluckie attempts of Baiazet, a prince of far more worth than was Selymus his brother, who in ſeeking to ſhun the death he feared, haſted the ſame before his time. Such as was the fathers end, was alſo the end of his foure ſonnes, Omer, Amurat, Selym, and Muhamet: of whom the three eldeſt were ſtrangled at CASBIN vvith their father, vvhoſe dead bodies togither vvith his, vvere ſolemnly brought to SEBASTIA and there buried. The youngeſt but new borne left at AMASIA, and ſent by his grandfather to PRVSA (as is before ſaid) to be there nurſed; vvas novv vpon the death of his father, commaunded by his ſaid grandfather to be ſtrangled alſo. The eunuch ſent by Solyman to haue done the deed, and loth to do it himſelfe, tooke with him one of the porters of the court, a deſperat, and otherwiſe a hard hearted ruffian, a man thought fit to haue performed any villanie: he comming into the chamber where the child lay, and fitting the bowſtring to the childs necke to haue ſtrangled it, the innocent babe ſmiled vpon him, & lifting it ſelfe vp as well as it could, with open armes offered to haue embraced the villaine about the necke and kiſſed him. Which guiltleſſe ſimplicitie ſo vvounded the ſtonie hearted man, that he vvas not able to performe the intended butcherie of the poore and ſimple child, but fell downe in a ſwoune, and there lay for dead. The eunuch ſtanding vvithout the doore, maruelling at his long, ſtay, goes in, and finding the ruffian lying along vpon the ground, vvith cruell hand performed that the other could not find in his heart to do; & ſo ſtrangled the guiltleſſe child as had been giuen him in charge. Whereby it euidently appeared, that it was not the mercie or compaſſion of Solyman, that ſo long cauſed the guiltleſſe infant to be ſpared; but rather the opinion generally receiued amongſt the Turks, who meaſuring all things by the good or bad ſucceſſe, referre all things that fall out well vnto God as the author thereof, be they neuer ſo vngratiouſly begun: and therefore ſo long as it was yet vncertaine vvhat ſucceſſe the attempts of Baiazet would haue, Solyman ſpared the infant, leaſt vpon his fathers good hap, he might ſeeme to haue ſtriuen againſt the will of God. But now that his father was dead, and his quarrell by the euill ſucceſſe thereof condemned as it were by the ſentence of the Almightie, he thought it not good longer to ſuffer him to liue, leaſt of an euill bird might come an euill chicke. I had ſometime (ſaith the reporter of this hiſtorie) great reaſoning with my Chiaus about this matter: for falling into talke with him of Baiazet, he began bitterly to inuay againſt him for taking vp armes againſt his brother. Whereunto (ſaith this authour) I replied, That in mine opinion he was worthie both to be pitied & pardoned, foraſmuch as he vvas of neceſſitie enforced either to take vp armes, or elſe ſhortly after to yeeld himſelfe to the ſlaughter. But he ſtill exclaiming againſt him, I ſaid vnto him, You blame poore Baiazet of great vvickedneſſe, for bearing armes againſt his brother: but Selymus Solymans father you blame not, who vpon like occaſion tooke vp armes both againſt his father and his brethren; yet he therein did nothing amiſſe, nor in your judgement blame worthie. And rightly, ſaith the Chiaus, for the euent of the matter ſhevveth ſufficiently, that that which he did, vvas done by the appointment of God, and that he was from heauen predeſtinate thereunto: whereas in Baiazet the euent ſheweth the cleane contrarie. So that which falleth out well, be it by neuer ſo wicked meanes compaſſed or brought to paſſe, they take it as done according to the will of God; but if it fall out othervviſe, they iudge it as a thing condemned by God himſelfe: depending wholy vpon the good or bad

Baiazet and his foure ſonnes ſtrangled.

A euent of things, and therefore iudging them to be well done or otherwise.

This yeare 1558 Charles the fift that noble emperour (of whom we haue in the course of this historie so often spoken) who wearie of the world had two yeares before deliuered all his hereditarie kingdomes and principalities to his sonne Philip, did now the 24 of Februarie, on which day he was borne, by his embassadours solemnly sent for that purpose, resigne that empire with all the honours and titles therof vnto his brother king Ferdinand, requesting the princes electors to confirme the same vnto him, which they did the 13 of March next following. So liuing as a priuat gentleman in that solitarie life wherunto he had to the wonder of the world certain yeres before retired himselfe from all worldly affaires, the 21 day of September following died of a feauer, when he had liued 58 years, and thereof raigned 39: a man no doubt to be worthily ac-
B counted amongst the greatest Christian emperours that liued before him. About which time also died his two sisters, Marie the queene of Hvngarie, and Elenor the French queene, both ladies of great honour. 1558 Charles the emperor resigneth the empire to his brother Ferdinand, & shortly after dyeth.

The knights of Malta, who of long had beene suters to the great Bishop and the king of Spaine for the recouerie of Tripolis in Barbarie, about nine yeares before taken from them by the Turkes; at which time they also surprised the Island of Zerbi, vpon the coast of Barbarie betwixt Tripolis and Tvnes, from whence they much troubled the Christians, trauelling by those seas: had now at length so much preuailed, that the king commaunded a great fleet to be now forthwith made readie in September in the yeare 1559 to meet togither in Sicilia, and from thence to go directly against the enemie by Malta: Vnto which fleet, the C great bishop, the duke of Florence, and the knights of Malta, with many other valiant men out of diuers parts of Christendome, ioined their forces also; so that at length there was a hundred gallies and ships met togither vnder the conduct of Andreas Gonzaga the Generall.
But whilest this fleet from diuers places was long in comming thither, the duke of Medina Cœli, came before with part of the fleet to Malta, and in the hauen of Marza Moxet expected the comming of the rest, who about the end of the yeare came thither. But whilest they were wintered, expecting the Spring, many of the souldiors fell sicke and died. At length the time of the yeare fit for their setting forward, being come, the captaines consulted among themselues, Whether they should first set vpon Tripolis, or the Island of Zerbi, otherwise called Mening. The knights of Malta being of opinion, That it were better first to besiege D Tripolis, and that with all speed, before Dragut should come thither to furnish it with souldiors and prouision. Others thought it better first to inuade the Island of Zerbi, where the armie might be relieued with plentie of all things necessarie, and from whence they might at all times 1560 of danger in safetie retire; and from thence afterwards as time should serue to go to Tripolis, Which vnfortunat counsell was by the greater part agreed vpon. Wherefore in Februarie the yeare following they departed from Malta, and sailed directly to Zerbi. In the meane time Dragut the most famous pyrat of that time amongst the Turkes, and Gouernour of Tripolis, was come thither with eight hundred of the Turks Ianizaries, & had notably strengthened the citie with men, victual, and new fortifications; and presently sent messengers to Solyman at Con-E stantinople, to certifie him of the arriuall of the Christian fleet in Affricke. But the Christians comming to the Island of Zerbi, were at the first landing encountered by the Moores, whom they repulsed, and so at pleasure landed. This Island is not farre from the maine, here and there full of bogs and marishes, other riuer hath it none, and in the middest is somewhat hillie.
It was inhabited with about thirtie thousand men, which dwelt in low cottages, simply apparrelled: yet is the island reasonable fertile, yeelding dates, oliues, barley, mill, and such like. When the Christians were there landed, they sent for Caramanus, a poore king amongst the Moores (from whom Dragut had before taken that Island) to vse his counsell for their better proceeding in that war. In the meane time they agreed, with eight thousand men to besiege the strongest castle in the Island: in going whereunto the Spaniards went formost, the Germans next, & last of all the Italians. By the way as they went they light vpon ten thousand Moores, which lay in F ambush in a wood to haue vpon the sudden set vpon them vnawars; but being discouered, and seuen hundred of them slaine in skirmish by the Spaniards, the rest fled. So comming to the castle, they planted their batterie, and laid hard siege vnto it. The captain of the castle finding himselfe too weake long to hold out, fled secretly with his Turks, leauing the castle for the Moores to defend; who vpon condition that they might in safetie depart, yeelded the castle to the Spaniards: for keeping whereof, Varona and Cerda, two Spaniſh captaines, were there left with their companies. Whileſt theſe things were in doing, Carauanus the Moore king came to the campe of the Chriſtians and there talked with the Generall, in whoſe hoarie countenance reſted a reuered maieſtie, his apparrell was after the Moores faſhion of white linnen, with him came alſo the king of TVNES his ſonne. In talking with the Generall, his manner was to ſit flat vpon the ground, and wiſely diſcourſed how the Turks were to be remooued out of AFFRICKE. But in the middeſt of theſe diſcourſes, when ſuch a thing vvas leaſt feared, ſuddenly a pinnace brought newes from ſea, That Piall Baſſa the Turkes great Admirall was comming thither with a great fleet of 85 gallies, and that moe were dayly repairing vnto him on euery ſide, which was indeed true. For Solyman vnderſtanding from Dragut the arch pyrat, that Iſland to be by the Chriſtians now poſſeſſed and fortified, thought it not (in his ſo great power and flouriſhing eſtate) to ſtand with his honour to ſuffer, but rather to giue aid vnto the Moores of that Iſland, a people agreeing in religion with himſelfe: and therfore commanded Piall Baſſa his Admirall to take in hand that expedition. Who thereupon rigged vp a great fleet well appointed and ſtrongly manned, with a number of the Turks beſt and moſt approued ſouldiors, aſwel Ianizaries as others: yet all both doubtfull and fearefull of the long iourney, as alſo of the fame of the enemies with whom they were to encounter: for why the Turkes had conceiued a great opinion of the valour of the Spaniards, as knowing great vvarres both of auncient and latter times to haue been by that nation (to the immortall praiſe therof) moſt happilie performed: they remembred well Charles the fift, and dayly heard much of king Philip, the heire both of his fathers vertues & kingdomes; which made them ſo carefull, that many of them before their ſetting forth (as in times of greateſt danger) made their wils, & ſo departed from CONSTANTINOPLE, taking their leaue of their friends, as if they ſhould neuer haue thither returned againe. So that all the citie was in a confuſed feare: neither was there any man whether he went or ſtaied, that hung not in ſuſpence with the doubtfull expectation of the euent of that war. Howbeit, Piall vvith this great fleet vvith long ſayling and a proſperous wind was at length come well neere as farre as MALTA, and knowledge thereof (as is aforeſaid) giuen vnto the Chriſtian fleet at ZERBI. With which vnexpected newes the Chriſtians there were not a little troubled: neuertheleſſe they fortified the caſtle with new fortifications and bulwarkes, and fell to agreement with the principall man amongſt the Moores of the Iſland (who commaunded the reſt, and had before pluckt down the enſignes of Dragut, and ſet vp the king of SPAINES) That he would yearely pay vnto the king of SPAINE (as he had before vnto Dragut) ſix thouſand crowns, one cammel, foure oſtriches, foure ſparrow haukes, and foure blew faulcons: a tribute fit for ſuch an Iſland.

Piall Baſſa Solymans Admirall ſent to remoue the Chriſtians out of Zerbi.

But ſhortly after, viz. the ninth of May, the Great maſter of MALTA by another pinnace gaue the Chriſtians at ZERBI againe to vnderſtand, That the Turks fleet vvas euen now at hand, and alreadie departed from the Iſland of GOZO, vvell appointed & ſtrongly manned: and that therfore he aduiſed them with ſpeed to hoiſe ſaile, and to get them to ſome place of more ſaftie, or els to come to him to MALTA, for feare of being by ſo great a power of the Turkes ſuddenly oppreſſed. Whereupon Iohn Andreas Auria the the Admirall ſent vnto the Generall, requeſting him preſently to come aboord, that ſo they might before the comming of the Turks fleet retire themſelues to ſome place of more aſſurance. But he for all that ſtaied ſtill at the caſtle, where the Chriſtians had built foure ſtrong bulwarks: whereof they had named one Auriaes, another Gonzagaes, the third the Viceroyes, and the fourth the Knights, not yet all perfectly finiſhed: as for the caſtle it ſelfe, they called it Philip-Alcazer, by the name of the King. But whileſt the Generall is thus buſie, and vainly hopeth to keepe both the caſtle and his ſhips, he the next day deſcrying from farre the comming of the Turks great fleet, haſted with the Admirall to be gone: and putting twice to ſea, was both times by a contrarie wind driuen again into the hauen, ſo that he and the Admirall had much adoe in time to get themſelues into the caſtle: for the wind was ſo fauourable for the Turks, and brought them ſo faſt on, that the Chriſtians diſmaied with their ſudden comming, knew not now well what to doe or which way to turne themſelues. But by good hap the greater part of the ſhips and foureteen gallies were got out and gone the night before, and the Great maſter had in Aprill called home his gallies, wherewith and ten others of his owne he afterwards defended the frontiers of his Iſland. As for the reſt of the fleet that ſtaied for the Generall and the Admirall, ſome few gallies eſcaped by flight, other ſome ran themſelues aground, ten of which were preſently taken by the Turkes, as were the reſt alſo that vvere left, although

A although they for a while did what they might to haue ſaued themſelues. The night following the Viceroy and the Admirall ſecertly ſtole out of the caſtle, and ſo by good fortune in two ſmal frigots fled to MALTA. Caramanus alſo the Moore king, with the prince of TVNIS, got them away into the maine. Gonzaga the Viceroy departing from MALTA in SICILIA, prouided as he might for the ſafetie of that countrie. Auria in the meane time gathered togither the remainder of the diſperſed fleet, hauing loſt in this vnfortunat expedition ſeuenteene gallies, with a great part of the ſhips.

Now in the caſtle was left as Generall Don Aluarus de Sandes, a valiant gentleman of great ſpirit and long experience, with fiue thouſand footmen, ſome Germanes, ſome Italians, but for the moſt part Spaniards: beſides a thouſand other that vvere no ſoldiors. So that the Turks be- The caſtle of Zerbi beſieged by the Turks.
B ginning to beſiege the ſame the ſeuenteenth of May, were by them many times notably encountered, and in their aſſaults repulſed. Vnto this ſiege at length came Dragut the pyrat, who with fifteene great pieces which he brought with him from TRIPOLIS, encreaſed the furie of the Turks batterie. Neither were the Chriſtians in the meane time wanting vnto themſelues, hauing in the caſtle fortie great pieces of artillerie, wherewith they ſlew a number of the Turkes and Moores: and ſometimes ſallying out, fought with them hand to hand; and hauing ſlaine and wounded many, retired againe into the caſtle. In this manner the ſiege continued three months with many an hot and deſperat skirmiſh: during which time, nothing more troubled the defendants than thirſt in that hot and drie climat and intemperat time of the yere: for why in the caſtle there was but one great ceſtrene, which although it yeelded ſome good ſtore of water, yet
C was it not ynough to ſuffice ſo great a multitude, but was by meaſure ſtil ſparingly giuen out vnto the ſouldiors ſo far as it would ſerue, no man hauing more allowed him than would ſuffice to keepe him aliue: the quantitie whereof ſome augmented by diſtilling of the ſea water, and mingling it with their allowance, and ſo wel eaſed their thirſt, vntil ſuch time as hauing ſpent all their wood, they wanted that poore help alſo. There might a man haue ſeen many poore ſoules lying vpon the ground halfe dead, gaping and ſtill crying out nothing but vvater, vvater; into whoſe drie mouths, if any man vpon compaſſion vouchſafed to poure a little water, they as men reuiued therewith would preſently ſit vp, vntill that for thirſt they fell downe againe, and ſo at length as men roſted gaue vp the ghoſt. Thus many died daily, beſide them whom the chance of warre and other diſeaſes without helpe conſumed in ſo great a diſtreſſe. Don Aluarus the gouer- Don Aluarus with the reſt of the cheefe commaunders taken priſoners.
D nour conſidering the great extremitie they were now brought vnto, attempted with Don Sanchius de Leyua Admirall of the Neapolitane gallies, Bellingerius de Requeſenes Admirall of the Sicilian gallies, & ſome others by night to haue eſpcaped away into a gallie which lay vnder the caſtle, but in doing therof were perceiued by the Turks, and ſo all all taken. Wherupon ſuch ſoldiors as ſickneſſe and the enemies ſword had yet left aliue, pinched with extreme neceſſitie, forſaken of their beſt captaines, and out of all hope of reliefe alſo, couenanting their liues only with the enemie, yeelded themſelues into moſt miſerable captiuitie. riſhed about eighteene thouſand Chriſtians, ſome with ſickneſſe, ſome drowned, but moſt ſlain, beſide the loſſe of a great part of the fleet alſo.

Of this victorie Piall ſent newes by one of his gallies to CONSTANTINOPLE, which for the
E more manifeſting thereof, dragged at the poupe thereof a great enſigne of the Chriſtians, with the picture of Chriſt crucified therein. Which was no ſooner come into the hauen, but that the rumour of the ouerthrow of the Chriſtians was forthwith blowne thorough the whole citie, the Turks exceedingly reioicing one vvith another for the news of ſo great a victorie: yea many of them not ſo contented, came by heaps to the gate of the houſe vvhere the emperor Ferdinands embaſſador lay, and there meeting with his ſeruants, by way of diriſion asked them, if they had any brethren, kinſmen, or friends in the Spaniſh fleet at ZERBI, for if you haue (ſaid they) you ſhall ſhortly ſee them here. Beſides that, they with many vvords moſt inſolently bragged of their owne valour, and ſcorned the cowardiſe of the Chriſtians, asking vvho vvere able to withſtand them, now that the Spaniards was alſo ouercome. All vvhich vvith much more the embaſſadors
F men with great griefe vvere enforced to heare, but there vvas no remedie, ſeeing God had ſo appointed it. Shortly after, in September the victorious fleet returned to CONSTANTINOPLE, The Turks with victorie returne to Conſtantinople.
dragging vvith it the priſoners, ſpoiles, and gallies of the Chriſtians, a ſight no leſſe pleaſant vnto the Turks, than heauie vnto the Chriſtians: and that night it lay at anker neere vnto the rocks in the face of the citie, vvith the greater pompe and glorie to come the next day into the hauen. At which time Solyman himselfe was come downe into a gallerie neere vnto the hauens mouth, adioining vnto his garden, the better to see the comming in of the fleet, and the Christian captains set there to shew vpon the poupe of the Admirall gallie, namely, Don Aluarus de Sandes, Don Sanchius de Leyua, and Don Bellingerus de Requesenes, all of late great commaunders: as for the Christian gallies all disarmed and vnrigged, so to seeme the more contemptible in comparison of the Turks, they were towed at the taile of the Turkes gallies. They which then saw Solymans countenance, perceiued not in him any signe at all of any insolent ioy. I my selfe (saith * Busbequius, then the emperour Ferdinands embassadour there) saw him two daies after going to the church with the same countenance he had alwaies, with the same seueritie and grauitie, as if this victorie had nothing concerned him, nor any thing chanced strange or vnexpected: so capable was the great heart of that old sire of any fortune, were it neuer so great, and his mind so setled, as to receiue so great applause & reioicing vvithout mouing. Within a few daies after the Christian captiues (before almost starued with hunger) were brought to the court: many of vvhom could scarce stand vpon their legs, some others for weaknes fell downe and fainted, and other-some died outright: they were all scornfully led in triumph, vvith their Armes disordered and scornfully put vpon them: the Turks in the meane time insulting round about them, promising vnto themselues the empire of the whole vvorld: and vainly asking, What enemie they were to feare, now that the Spaniard was ouercome. Aluarus Sandes, as chiefe of all the prisoners, being brought into the Diuano before the Visier Bassaes, and demaunded by Rustan Bassa, What his master meant, being not able to defend his own, to inuade other mens? answered, That it beseemed not him to iudge thereon; and himselfe to haue done but his dutie, vvith such faithfulnes as vvas meet to put in execution what he vvas commaunded by his lord, although he had no good fortune therin. After that, be besought the Bassaes vpon his knee, to speak for him vnto Solyman, for that he had at home a poore wife, vvith certaine small children, for vvhom he requested him to spare him. Whereunto Rustan Bassa (contrarie to his manner) courteously answered, his soueraigne to be of a mild and gentle nature, and that he vvas in good hope his pardon might bee of him obtained: so vvas he commaunded away vnto Caradines his castle, towards the blacke sea. But he vvas not gone farre, but that he was called backe againe; for that the great Chamberlain, a man in great credit with Solyman, had not as yet seene him: for which cause he was sent for backe againe; vvherewith he was not a little troubled, fearing least the Bassaes hauing changed their minds, would haue put him to death. The rest of the captiues of the better sort vvere committed to the castle of PERA, and amongst them Don Sanchius de Leyua, with his two base sonnes, and also Don Bellingerus Requesenes: which two great men, with Don Aluarus de Sandes, vvere neuertheless afterwards with much adoe and almost beyond all hope, at the request of the emperour, and by the dexteritie of his embassadour, by Solyman set at libertie; although he had before denied them vnto Saluiat the French kings embassadour, who had beene an earnest intercessour for them. Yet before they were deliuered out of prison, the Muphti or Turkes great priest vvas asked his opinion, Whether it were lawfull for a greater number of Turkes to exchange a few Christian captiues (for the embassadour beside the rewards he had promised vnto the Bassaes, to further the matter, had also vndertaken, that fortie common prisoners of the Turkes should be set at libertie for them) whereunto the Muphti answered, That the doctors of their law vvere of diuers opinions concerning that question, some saying that it was lawfull, and some not; howbeit as then it was by him resolued vpon vnto the more fauourable part, and the exchange allowed.

The miserie of the Christian captiues.

There were among the prisoners taken at ZERBI, besides these noblemen of whom we haue before spoken, two other noble gentlemen right honourably borne, Don Iohn of CARDONA Don Bellinger his sonne in law, and Don Gasto the duke of MEDINA his sonne, to whom yet but a youth his father neuertheless had giuen an honourable place in the armie. Of these two Don Iohn had wisely taken order for a great summe of mony to be left in the Island of CHIO, by the way as the Turkes fleet went to CONSTANTINOPLE, from whence he afterwards in safetie got into SPAINE. But Gasto was by Piall Bassa (vpon hope of a great ransome) purposely hid out of the way, which had like to haue wrought his destruction: for Solyman hauing gotten an inckling thereof by the instigation of Rustan, laboured for nothing more than to haue Gasto found out, so to haue a more iust occasion for the putting of Piall to death, being taken tardie in so manifest a fault. But all that labour was spent in vaine, Gasto being by death taken away, but whether

A ther by the plague(as ſome reported)or by Piall his meanes (as it was more like) leaſt the truth ſhould be found out,is vncertaine. But certaine it was,that being with great care ſought for by the duke his fathers ſeruants,he could neuer be heard of more: So that it was thought Piall for the ſafegard of his owne life,not to haue ſpared Gaſto his priſoners life. Who neuertheleſſe for a long time liued in great feare,and not daring to come to CONSTANTINOPLE, tooke occaſion with a few gallies to wander about amongſt the iſlands of ÆGEVM,as if he had there ſomething to doe: but indeed ſo ſhunning the ſight of his angrie lord,for feare he ſhould haue bene compelled in bonds to haue anſwered the matter. Vntill at length he appeaſed at the requeſt of Suleiman Baſſa (the eunuch and Solymans great chamberlain)and of Selymus, Solymans ſon, granted him his pardon in theſe words well worth the marking,out of the mouth of an infidell prince:

Piall in diſgrace with Solyman, ſhunneth to come to Conſtantinople.

B Well haue hee from mee pardon and forgiueneſſe for ſo great an offence: but let God the moſt iuſt reuenger of all villanies take of him due puniſhment after this life. So fully hee ſeemed to bee perſuaded that no euill deed ought to remaine without puniſhment, either in this life or in the life to come.

There was in this expedition a Colonell of the Turkes well acquainted with Busbequius the emperours embaſſador, then lying at CONSTANTINOPLE: into whoſe hands(in that diſcomfiture of the Chriſtians) by chance was come the Imperiall enſigne of the gallies of NAPLES; wherein within the compaſſe of an Eagle,were contained the armes of all the prouinces belonging to the kingdome of SPAINE. Which faire enſigne the embaſſadour vnderſtanding him to purpoſe to giue for a preſent vnto Solyman, thought good to preuent the matter,and to

C get it from him: which he eaſily obtained,by ſending him two ſutes of ſilke (ſuch as the Turks make reckoning of) for it: ſo prouiding that one of the Imperiall enſignes of Charles the fift, ſhould not to the eternall remembrance of that ouerthrow,remaine ſtill with the enemies of the Chriſtian religion. This ſo miſerable a calamitie receiued by the Chriſtians at ZERBI,made that iſland,before little or nothing ſpoken of,to be euer ſince famous.

About this time to end this vnfortunat yeare withall,the fiue and twentith day of Nouember died Andreas Auria,(that ſecond Neptune)being ninetie foure yeres old: a man in his time of great fame,and of the greateſt princes of that age had in no ſmall reputation, but eſpecially of Charles the fift, in whoſe ſeruice hee did much for the benefit of the Chriſtian common weale, being for moſt part imploied in his greateſt warres againſt the Turks and Moores. D all the notable things done to his immortall glory,the kindneſſe by him ſhewed vnto his natiue countrey was greateſt; which oppreſſed by the French, hee ſet at libertie: and when he might haue taken vpon him the ſole gouernment therof(as had diuers others before him) moderating his deſires,and reſpecting the only good thereof,appeaſed the great diſſention that had of long raigned therein;and eſtabliſhed ſuch a forme of gouerment, confirmed with ſo good and wholſome lawes and orders(no mans liberty infringed)as that it hath euer ſince to his eternal praiſe in great wealth,ſtate,and libertie,thereby flouriſhed. Vnto whoſe remembrance (for that wee haue before of him much ſpoken in the courſe of this hiſtorie) I thought it not amiſſe to ioyne the liuely counterfeit of his reuerend aged countenance, by nature framed anſwerable vnto his noble vertues.

A lyman, and being now well ſtricken in yeares, and carefull both of the ſtate of the empire and of the aduauncement of his poſteritie, began to deale with the princes Electors for a choice to bee made of a king of the Romans; who after his death might without the trouble of GERMANIE, ſucceed him in the empire: commending vnto them his ſonne Maximillian, a prince of great hope, then king of BOHEMIA. Whereupon an aſſembly of the princes Electours was appointed to bee holden at FRANKFORD: who there meeting at the appointed time, with generall conſent the 24. day of Nouember in the yeare 1562, choſe Maximilian the emperours ſonne king of the Romans, and with all the accuſtomed ſolemnities crowned him: who alſo the yeare after was at PRESBVRG the eight of September with much ſolemnitie crowned king of HVNGARIE. hoſtilitie or friendſhip with king Iohns ſonne, for as much as belongeth to his hereditarie countreyes, whether they bee in the hither part of HVNGARIE, or on the further ſide of TEISSE: all which for all that, by law of armes belong vnto vs. And the ſame king Iohns ſonne in time of this eight yeares league ſhall bee alſo bound in ſuch ſort to performe vnto vs his obedience, as that from henceforth it ſhall not bee lawfull for him to vſe any warre or hoſtilitie againſt you, neither to trouble your ſubiects with fire or ſword, nor to ſurpriſe your cities, caſtles, or townes, or by violence to take away or exact of your people or ſubiects, their ſheepe, their cattell, their goods, money, or reuenewes. We alſo our ſelues ſhall haue no right, nor take occaſion to driue away your people, to burne your countreyes, or carrie away any captiues: but rather in this eight yeares ſpace religiouſly keepe peace and concord with you. And vnder theſe conditions of peace ſhall alſo bee comprehended Michaell Balaſchus, Nicholas Bathor, with all their goods and territories, and diuers other ſuch like, which ſhall bee ſubiect vnto you and king Iohns ſonne. To bee briefe, if happily any of yours or king Iohns ſonnes ſubiects ſhall haue now before in time of warre thruſt one another out of his goods, lands, or poſſeſſions, whereof new quarrells or diſcord may ariſe; wee will and decree, That all ſuch controuerſies, quarrels and claimes, ſhall bee deferred vntill this definite time of the league expired. Beſide, if by chance any diſſention ſhall hereafter ariſe betwixt vs about our iuriſdiction, which can by no meanes bee compoſed and ordered; we will that yours ſhall in the meane time remaine as yours, and ours as ours, all contention and enmitie ſet apart: alſo many townes ſituat heere and there by Danubius and Tatta, ſhall be ſuffered to vſe the ſame law which they did in former time; ſo that the ſouldiors which are yet in garriſon in the caſtle of Tatta, ſhall haue no right to infeſt or vexe thoſe townes ſituate neere vnto Danubius. Furthermore, if after this peace concluded, any of your noblemen or gentlemen ſhall fortune to haue any of our noblemen by reuolt or other occaſion whatſoeuer, captiues, they ſhall diſmiſſe them and ſet them at libertie, to returne vnto their friends freely without hurt or ranſome; that ſo the concord and peace begun betwixt vs, may bee the more firmely kept, and our ſubiects liue in more ſecuritie. All and euery one of theſe things wee graunt and promiſe to bee of vs from henceforth vntill the end of the aforeſaid eight yeares, without all fraud or guile religiouſly obſerued and kept: and for that purpoſe haue cauſed theſe our letters of this peace and confederation to be publiſhed from our royall pallace: and moreouer, haue not onely prouided, that the copie of the ſame ſhould together with our edict bee proclaimed to all and euery the generalls, captaines, lieutenants of our armies both by ſea and land, in all the parts of our empire, and to all our mercinarie ſouldiers, but haue alſo ſtraightly commaunded, that it ſhall bee firmely and ſincerely kept. We will alſo, that this agreement of peace and amitie ſhall comprehend and concerne our two chiefe Gouernours or Vayuods of WALLACHIA and MOLDAVIA, ſo that none of your people of HVNGARIE, CRABATIA, SCLAVONIA, or other your countries or iſlands whatſoeuer, ſhall in any ſort bee moleſted or grieued by our ſubiects. And if it ſhall fortune that ſome ſhall on your part out of their caſtles ſet vpon our ſubiects, or by force take away their goods, the ſame men ſhall in any caſe bee bound to make thereof reſtitution. Alſo if any ſhall flie from vs, and carry away with them the money or goods of their maſters whom they ſerued, or if the like ſhall bee done by any of yours flying to vs, then the ſame goods on both parts are to be of right demaunded and recouered againe, and the fugitiues to the example of others to be corrected and puniſhed: foraſmuch as fugitiues goods of right appertaine vnto their lords and maſters. Furthermore it ſhall bee lawfull for your captaines and commaunders to fortifie or build caſtles, cities, or townes in the borders of HVNGARIE, and to put into the ſame victuall, armor, and ſuch like, but ſo that they doe none of theſe things out of their owne limits. And during the time of this league, it ſhall not bee lawfull to take or carrie away any of your ſubiects priſoners either in HVNGARIE or in other place of your iuriſdiction: which for all that, if it ſhall by any chance happen, that then ſuch captiues without delay bee ſuffered ſafely to returne home againe. Furthermore, whatſoeuer Chriſtian ſhall haue any buſineſſe to doe in our magnificent court or any part of our dominions, as are embaſſadours, officers, ſeruants, and ſuch others: vnto all theſe wee not onely graunt and permit, that they may come and goe about their buſineſſe, and ſo againe depart from our court or prouinces; but alſo haue willed and commaunded, them to bee well and courteouſly entreated by our ſubiects, and furthered with the interpretation of our language. And if it ſhall fortune any contention or diſcord to ariſe betwixt our ſubiects on either ſide, about the bounds and limitts of lands, or other ſuch like cauſes: ſuch controuerſies wee will to bee decided and determined by diſcreet and indifferent men on both parts; and the authors of ſuch diſcord and variance, to bee puniſhed as ſuſpected perſons and breakers of the league. Wee alſo prohibite thoſe skirmiſhes or combats, which were wont to bee ſometimes on both ſides made vpon the borders. And deſire, that the forme of this league and peace, and euery article thereof, may bee publickely

A publikely read and ſet vp in ſundrie places of your dominions; and commaundement giuen, that they may with due obedience and reuerence be obſerued and kept. Which wee likewiſe haue now before promiſed faithfully, and aſſuredly to performe: and your embaſſadour whom a few moneths agone you ſent vnto vs, in your name requeſted the ſame thing of vs, and hath with earneſt praiers moued vs by imperiall oath and theſe letters of credence, to witneſſe, that we did ratifie and confirme the ſame; as if wee our ſelues ſhould ſpeake to you in preſence. Wherefore we haue giuen to him theſe our letters of pacification to you directed, that your generals, ſouldiors, and ſubiects, may be bound alſo to obſerue and keepe all theſe things: wherefore, ſo long as nothing contrarie to this league ſhall be done on your part; ſo long in like manner, all theſe articles of peace ſhall be of me accepted and aſſured. For witneſſe and confirmation whereof, I ſweare this oath: By the true and liuing creator of heauen and earth, by the
B true ſignes of our great and reuerend prophet, by my imperiall power, and by my true faith; that nothing contrarie or repugning vnto the aforeſaid articles, conditions, and promiſes of the eight yeares league agreed vpon betwixt vs, ſhall be attempted or done by any our Gouernours, Generals, Vayuods, &c. Commaunding moreouer, all our ſworne gouernours of our moſt mightie empire, in WALACHIA, and MOLDAVIA, and king Stephen himſelfe, and others which haue the gouernment of our empire confining vpon you, That they all and euerie of them as well as our ſelues, ſhall iuſtly, faithfully, and religiouſly, accept, reuerence, and keepe theſe conditions of peace, towards your ſubiects, cities, caſtles, townes, and other things appertaining to you; and in the leaſt thing, not to hurt, iniurie, or wrong any your ſubiects. In briefe, we ſhall as farre as our part concerneth vs, giue vnto this moſt mightie and great new made loue and friendſhip, ſo great honour, reuerence, and authoritie, that that
C which may euen in the leaſt things be had, ſhall not on our part be wanting. In token whereof, wee haue ſuffered certaine Chriſtian captiues, whom by your embaſſadour you requeſted to haue ſet at libertie, franckly to returne vnto you without raunſome; out of which captiuitie they could neuer haue beene redeemed, if in regard of this our amitie and friendſhip we had not granted them libertie: truſting that you will in like ſort ſet at libertie ſuch of ours as you haue captiues. Giuen at our imperiall pallace and ſeat in the moſt mightie citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, the firſt day of September, in the yeare of our great and reuerend prophet 969.

Preſents from Solyman to the emperour Ferdinand.

D The ſame embaſſadour, after he had deliuered theſe letters, preſented vnto the emperour the gifts he had brought from his Great maſter: which was two great cups of naturall chriſtall, curiouſly wrought, and ſet with ſtones of great price: a couragious Turkie horſe, with a ſaddle and trappings wrought with gold, and ſet with pretious ſtones, and garniſhed with chaines of pure gold: and foure of the faireſt camels that were to be got in all CONSTANTINOPLE. In deliuering of which preſents, the Baſſa made his excuſe, that the horſe and camels had loſt their beautie, being with foure moneths trauell from CONSTANTINOPLE, growne ſomewhat leane and wearie.

The death of the emperour Ferdinand.

1564. This peace thus concluded betwixt the emperour Ferdinand and Solyman, held firme vntill the death of Ferdinand, who about two yeares after in the yeare 1564 vpon S. Iames his day died, being ſixtie yeares old: whereof hee raigned as emperour not full ſeauen yeares. In whoſe place ſucceeded Maximilian his ſonne, before choſen king of the Romans. But immediatly af-

New troubles in Hungarie.

E ter the death of Ferdinand, the captaines on the frontiers of that part of HVNGARIE which was holden for the emperour on the one ſide, and the Turkes captaines with the Vayuod of TRANSILVANIA on the other ſide, wearie of their eaſe, began contrarie to the forme of the league to ſurpriſe ſtrong holds and townes one in anothers confines, wherof enſued much trouble: The authour whereof was Melchior Balas, the emperours lieutenant in that part of HVNGARIE which bordereth vpon TRANSILVANIA, who firſt ſurpriſed certaine townes vpon the frontiers thereabouts: in reuenge whereof, the Vayuod ſuddenly ſet vpon SACKMAR, a town in the emperours territorie which he tooke, and therein Balas his wife and children. In deſpight whereof, Balas ranſacked and burnt DEBREZIN, a great towne of the Vayuods. But not long after, the Vayuod Solymans vaſſall, and aided by him with foure thouſand Turkes and three
F thouſand Moldauians, did much harme vpon the frontiers of that part of HVNGARIE which belonged to the emperour, and firſt tooke HADAD, and afterwards beſieged VNGAR. In requitall whereof, Maximilian the emperour ſent Lazarus Suendi, a valiant captaine, who with an armie of eight thouſand, beſieged the ſtrong caſtle of TOKAY, which he tooke the fift of Februarie, in the yeare 1565; and after that, tooke the rich towne of ERDEN. In the meane time Solyman, 1565

lyman,who had in himſelfe fully purpoſed to be reuenged of all theſe iniuries(as well appeared by that he did the yeare following) to ſtay the emperour from proceeding farther, vntill ſuch time as he were at better leiſure to be reuenged(for as then he was making great preparation for MALTA) ſent Marcus Lilineſius a renegat Tranſiluanian of CIBINIVM, his embaſſadour to Maximilian,to put him in remembrance of the league made with his father, and to wiſh him to haue regard how hee further proceeded to the breach thereof. Whereupon the emperour, becauſe he would not ſeeme vnwilling to hearken to peace, commanded his lieutenants and captaines no more to inuade TRANSILVANIA, or that part of HVNGARIE which the Turks held. Howbeit that,whileſt this embaſſadour was thus intreating of peace at VIENNA, the Baſſa of TEMESVVAR in the borders of TRANSILVANIA, made diuers incurſions into the borders of HVNGARIE,and with ſix thouſand ſouldiers beſieged the ſtrong caſtle of IVLA, and the Turkes in great number came daily into TRANSILVANIA. At which time alſo Suendi Generall of Maximilian his forces vpon the frontiers, by meſſengers ſent for that purpoſe, wiſhed him not to giue any credit vnto the Turks embaſſadour,who meaning nothing but warre, vnder the colour of peace,ſought nothing elſe but to take him vpon the ſudden vnprouided. Neither ceaſed theſe troubles thus,but daily grew from euill to worſe: for in Iune the Tranſiluanians beſieged ERDEN, before taken by the Imperials, and after two moneths ſiege had it yeelded vnto them. In the meane time, Chernouich the emperours embaſſadour to Solyman returned from CONSTANTINOPLE,aſſuring him,that the great Turke for all his faire ſhewes of peace, meant in deed nothing but warrs, for which he was(as he ſaid)making great preparation both by ſea and land. Wherupon the emperour began to raiſe new forces: which thing diuers noble men,both of GERMANIE and other places hearing of, came vnto him with their followers; and amongſt others, Romerus one of the knights of MALTA,and diuers others of his brethren, with fiue companies of ſouldiors well appointed,ſent thither by George Hochenheime,graund prior of that Order in GERMANIE, and then confirmed one of the princes of the empire. At the ſame time alſo,the Turkes being buſie vpon the borders of STIRIA, and the places thereabouts,were many times cut off by Charles the archduke; who taking them at an aduantage, ſlew at one time three thouſand of them. Yet for all this,the Turkes embaſſadour was ſtill at VIENNA, intreating for peace,and ſo cunningly handled the matter, that wheras Eccius Salma, a noble and valiant captaine,had corrupted the chiefe judge with certaine others of ALBA REGALIS, to haue betraied the citie vnto him; for performance wherof, they had deliuered their wiues and children as hoſtages,and he was now vpon his way from RAB, which is but eight miles off, in an aſſured hope to haue ſurpriſed the citie: hee was ſuddenly by letters in poſt from the emperour called backe again,for corrupting the hope conceiued of peace: & ſo was that notable deſignment vnfortunatly diſappointed;of which practiſe the Turks hauing knowledge,afterwards moſt cruelly executed fortie of the conſpirators,impaling ſome of them vpon ſharp ſtakes,and hanging others vpon yron hooks by the iawes vntill they were dead. Shortly after the Turks tooke NEOSTAT, which was not long after againe recouered by the emperour.

The Turks purpoſing warre, craftily ſue for peace.

At the ſame time one of the Turkes ſpies was taken at ZIGETH, who but thirteene dayes before was ſent from CONSATNTINOPLE,of purpoſe to view the ſtrength and ſituation of that place: hee being brought before Charles the archduke,and examined, ſaid, That Solyman would aſſuredly the next Spring come in perſon himſelfe into HVNGARIE,to beſiege the ſtrong caſtles of ZIGETH and IVLA. At which time alſo, countie Serinus tooke certaine other of the Turkes ſpies,by whom he was certainly aduertiſed of Solymans comming the next yeare; and amongſt others Scaphir Vayda,the Baſſa of BVDA his chiefe counſellor. Beſide this, the countrey men(contributors both to the Imperials and the Turks)were now ſtraightly commanded by the Turks,to pay no more contribution money vnto the Imperials: whereupon it was eaſily gathered, that all that talke of peace,was as Suendi had oftentimes written, nothing elſe but to delay the time,and to put them in ſecuritie. Beſide that,the Turkes made incurſions daily into one place or other of the emperors territories,ſhewing their auncient hate, and ſowing by thoſe light skirmiſhes,as it were,the ſeed of a greater war againſt the next Spring: which the emperour now out of doubt of(being alſo warned therof by many letters from his friends) put ſtrong garriſons into his frontier towns, eſpecially into RAB & ZIGETH. But knowing that to bee but a poore helpe againſt ſo puiſſant an enemie, hee reſolued as his father and vncle had done before,to reſt vpon the ſtrength of the empire, and againſt the next yeare to call a generall

A assemblie of the princes of the empire at AVGVSTA, for the better withstanding of the common enemie. The wars thus beginning againe in HVNGARIE, Solyman at the same time in reuenge of the manifold harmes done vnto his subiects by the knights of MALTA, whose hand he found euer against him in all his dealings with the other Christian princes, made great preparation both by sea and land: purposing (as seemed by the manner thereof) to haue rased the memoriall of those worthie men from off the earth. Whereunto, beside the naturall hatred which he bare against all Christians in generall, and them aboue the rest in particular, he was much incited by Cassanes, Barbarussa his sonne king of ALGIERS, and Dragut gouernour of TRIPOLIS: by whose persuasions he caused a strong fleet to be be rigged vp, commanding the lieutenants and gouernours of his ports and hauens all alongst the sea coast, to put to their helping hands, and to B be readie against the next Spring. And not long after, vnderstanding partly of his own certaine knowledge, and partly by the relation of others, in what good forwardnes things were: he calling togither a great assemblie of his greatest princes and men of war, deliuered vnto them his mind as followeth.

What thing I haue this fortie yeares alwaies wished, which was to haue so much leisure from other warres, as to plucke out of their nests and vtterly to root out these Crossed pirats, which vaunt themselues to be the bulwarke of Christendome: that same, me thinke I haue by the fauour of God and Muhamed his prophet, at this time obtained. For wee haue so repressed the attempts of the Persians,
C that they cannot let vs: and in HVNGARIE, from whence certaine dreadfull motions were reported, wee our selues will shortly doe those things which shall enforce our enemies to hide their heads in the heart of GERMANIE, and to sue to vs for peace. You your selues daily heare the pitifull complaints of our subiects and merchants, whom these Maltases, I say not soldiors, but pirats, if they but looke into those seas, spoile and make prize of: whose iniuries to reuenge, all lawes both of God and man require. Neither can any thing happen vnto me more pleasing, or more honourable, than if I may before I die, accomplish those things, that is, to win MALTA, and to leaue all things in order in HVNGARIE and POLONIA: except perhaps some man thinke it a harder matter for vs to thrust these Crossed companions from the rocks of MALTA, than for our auncestors to haue driuen them from IERVSALEM, and so quite out of SYRIA, and for our selues to haue forced them out of the strong iland
D of the RHODES. But this some will say, is neerer vnto ITALIE from whence aid may easily be sent, and the place defended by a fleet. Beleeue me, they will neuer aduenture to fight with vs at sea, who remember themselues to haue been there so often by vs ouerthrowne: beside that, so little a place cannot containe any great garrison; neither if it could, could it long feed them. Wherefore vnto this expedition, we haue determined with the first of the Spring, to send a most strong fleet: and euen now we haue alreadie commaunded all our sea captaines and aduenturers which acknowledge our commaund, to be there present with their Ships. The king of ALGIERS will be there, the garrisons of ALEXANDRIA are in readinesse, so is also Dragut with his appointed fleet; as for our owne, it is by mine owne direction rigged vp: vnto which fleet I doubt not, but that all the strength of the West will giue
E place: Which thing (worthie captaines) wee speake, trusting vpon the helpe of Almightie God, and Muhamed his great prophet, with your knowne and approued Valour. Now remaineth onely, that euerie one of you thinke with vs, how this warre may best be managed, and so to referre your deuises vnto vs: which that you may the better doe, Loe, I heere deliuer vnto you the situation of the whole iland, and proiect of all their fortifications, which wee haue receiued of most expert and skilfull men.

Solymans oration to his captaines for the inuasion of Malta.

Solymans purpose thus made knowne, and the matter well considered, after that they which best knew the strong places and manners of the Maltese, had declared their opinions what they thought to be most expedient, it was decreed, that they should with all speed set forward: wherfore victuall, and other things necessarie for such an expedition, being with wonderfull celeritie prepared, they expected but wind. Of these things, Io. Valetta a Frenchman, Graund master of F MALTA and of the knights of the Order; being both by letters and messengers aduertised (for he had alwaies fit men his intelligencers at CONSTANTINOPLE, who warily noted the purposes and actions of Solyman) was not afraid, but knowing that of God depended the victorie, and that men were to watch, labour, and foresee: he assembled a counsell of his knights, and in few words spake vnto them in this sort.

Valetta the Grand master aduertised of Solymans purpose.

What Solyman prepareth (most noble and valiant knights) and what a great warre he prouideth against vs, you with me of late right well vnderstand, wherefore it is needlesse for me to vse any long speech with you concerning that matter. The enemie is knowne, his insatiable ambition is knowne, his strength is knowne, and his mortall hate against vs and the Christian name, is sufficiently knowne. Wherefore let vs all as one first reconcile our selues to God, and then prouide all such things as shall be needfull for the warre. In breefe noble knights, to reconcile our selues vnto God, and to appease his displeasure, two things are of vs to be performed: whereof the one consisteth in amendment of life, with a holy conuersation: the other in the religious worshipping of him, with a firme and constant trust in his helpe, with prayer, which is called godlinesse. By these meanes our auncestors obtained many victories against the Infidels in the East. Neither is it to be doubted, but if wee shall in these things ioyne together, wee shall also frustrat all the force and furie of this proud tyrant. But for as much as God vsually helpeth them which labour and take paines, and not the negligent and slouthfull, wee must of necessitie ioyne vnto them those helpes, which both our profession and the course of warre requireth: which partly consisteth in our selues, and partly in the other Christian princes. For victuall, armour, money, and other such things as in warres are requisit, wee will so prouide, that no man shall iustly complaine, that wee spared either cost or paines. I will poure out all my store, neither will I for desire of life refuse any danger. As for the Christian princes, I cannot perswade my selfe, that they will lie still in so fit an oportunitie, and in so great a danger, not of our estate onely, but much more of their owne. Verely I will not spare to exhort euery one of them both by letters and by messengers, which in part wee haue alreadie done: and I doubt not but wee shall haue aid ynough from the Pope, the Emperour, and the king of Spaine (such is their Christian zeale) and they I hope shall moue the rest. As for you, the princes and very light of this sacred Order, and the rest of our brethren, most valiant knights, I am well assured you will so fight for the most holy Christian religion, for your liues and goods, and for the glorie of the Latine name, against a most cruell tyrant, the rooter out of all true religion, of all ciuilitie and good learning, the plague of the world, hated of God and man; as that hee shall feele the sting of the crosse which he so much contemneth, euen in the citie of Constantinople, yea in his houses of pleasure. For wee shall not haue now to doe with him in the Island of the Rhodes, farre from the helpe of our friends, from Asia, from Evrope, from Ægipt, inclosed with our enemies both by sea and land; but in the eyes of Italie and Spaine, in places strongly fortified, from whence the enemie may easily be circumuented: which that it may so fall out, let vs not cease to pray vnto Almightie God, and to craue his readie helpe.

When the Graund Master had thus said, all that were present promised with one assent rather to lose their liues, than in any part to faile the common cause, or to come into the power of Solyman. After that, publicke prayer and supplication was made in euerie church through the Ile, and three colonels chosen out of all the knights: one an Italian surnamed Imperator, another Borneas a Frenchman, and Quatrius a Spaniard the third, all aduised men and most expert souldiors, who should with all diligence prouide all things necessarie for the war. By whose appointment the suburbs and trees which might any way be hurtfull to the fortified places, vvere ouerthrown, the fortifications were thorowly viewed, the garrisons strengthened, and all maner of prouision most plentifully distributed: and letters from the Great master sent vnto the Great Bishop and other Christian princes, requesting their aid against the common enemie. Messengers were also dismissed into diuers places, to certifie both the knights of the Order and others, of the Turkes preparation.

Solymans fleet departeth from Constantinople.

Solymans fleet departing from Constantinople the two and twentieth day of March in the yeare 1565 kept a direct course towards Peloponesvs, and so came to Methon: where Mustapha Bassa one of the Turkes greatest captaines, a man of 75 yeares, and Generall of the land forces, mustered the armie, wherin were numbred seuen thousand horsmen of them which are of the Turkes called Spahi: out of the lesser Asia, conducted by the Gouernor of that countrie, and two lieutenants of Cilicia, fiue hundred: and of the Island of Lesbos, now called Metylene, four hundred: he had of the Ianizaries foure thousand and fiue hundred led by two colonels, appointed by Solyman; for that the chiefe captaine of the Ianizaries which they call the Aga, neuer departeth from the citie but when the Sultan goeth himselfe. Besides these, was a certaine kind of men amongst the Turkes, who liue of the reuenues of the church; of them there was in the armie thirteene thousand, who had at Constantinople vowed their

A their liues for their ſuperſtition. Out of THRACIA and PELOPONESVS were come two colonels and one lieutenant, with twelue hundred horſemen, & three thouſand fiue hundred voluntaries out of diuers countries. There alſo Piall Baſſa, Solymans Admirall, tooke view of the fleet, wherein were found a hundred and thirtie gallies, two and twentie ſhips for burthen, ſome greater, ſome leſſer; beſides one that was caſt away neere vnto METHONE, wherein was loſt ſix thouſand barrels of pouder, thirteene thouſand great ſhot, and foure hundred Spahi: beſides theſe, there were ten gallies from the RHODES commaunded by Halyport, a man of ſeuentie yeares; two gallies of MITYLENE, and about ſeuenteene galliots, and other ſmall pyrats ſhips. With this ſtrong fleet the Turks departing from METHONE the thirteenth of May, arriued at MALTA the eighteene of the ſame moneth, and put into a hauen in the Northeaſt part of the B iſle, which the inhabitants call MARZASIROC: but perceiuing themſelues not to be there in ſafetie, they remoued to another port called MAIOR. The Turks fleet arriueth at Malta.

The iſland of MALTA lying betwixt AFFRICA and SICILIA, might be doubted whether it were to be accounted in AFFRICKE or EVROPE, but that the auntient Coſmographers, and the Moores language, which the Maltaſes haue alwaies vſed, challenge it for AFFRICKE. It is in length from the Northeaſt to the Southweſt twentie miles; and in the broadeſt place twelue. It regardeth AFFRICKE Southward, oueragainſt LEPTIS PARVA; and SICILIA towards the North, but more towards PACHINVM than LILYBEVM: and is in circuit about threeſcore miles. It ſeemeth to haue taken the name of MELITA of Mel or honey, wherof it yeeldeth plentie. The trees there beare fruit twice a yeare, and they haue oftentimes twice harueſt eſpeC cially of barley and cotten wooll; yet is the iſle in ſome places ſtonie, grauellie, and bare of wood: neuertheleſſe it beareth figs, apples, almonds, grapes, and other fruit trees, planted by the induſtrie of man, date trees alſo, but not fruitfull; it beareth thiſtles of ſuch bigneſſe, that the inhabitants vſe them for wood: freſh water is there wonderfull ſcarce, and ſuch wels as they haue are filled with raine in Winter, for in Summer they are either cleane drie, or elſe the water becommeth brachie. The inhabitants are ſo burnt with the Sunne, that they differ little in colour from the Æthyopians: they are of a wholeſome conſtitution of bodie, ſpare of diet, induſtrious, rather painefull than warlike, dying more for age than of ſickneſſe: their buildings, except it bee in the citie, which is in the middeſt of the iſland, and in the ſuburbes, are long and low (like vnto the Moores) couered with turfe or reed. It is commonly ſuppoſed, that S. Paule was by ſhipD wracke caſt vpon this iſland: but it is with greater reaſon to be thought, that it was the other MELITA in the Adriaticke betwixt CORCYRA and ILLYRIA, and better agreeth with that which Luke writeth of the Apoſtles trouble and ſhipwracke in the Adriaticke, out of which ſea it is not to be gathered of the text, that Paule with the reſt were driuen. But againe to our purpoſe. That ſide of MALTA which reſpecteth SICILIA, hath in it many good harbours and commodious hauens, fit for ſhipping; where beſide the port MARZASIROC towards the Eaſt, where the Turkes fleet firſt landed, and the port of S. THOMAS, with another called SCALA, not farre off, it hath two other notable hauens, the one called MAIOR, and the other MARZAMOXET, deuided the one from the other by a narrow peece of ground: which with a ridge runneth in length from the South to the North, almoſt in manner of an iſland, hauing the hauen E MAIOR on the Eaſt, and MARZA MOXET on the Weſt. Vpon the head of this high ridge ſtandeth the caſtle of S. ELMO, of great ſtrength both by nature and art. As a man entreth into the hauen MAIOR, vpon the left hand are foure promontories, pointing farre into the hauen on that ſide, almoſt in manner of iſlands, making ſo many bayes: Vpon the firſt ſtandeth the gallowes, whereof alſo it taketh name: vpon the very point of the ſecond, on a rough and high rocke ſtandeth a moſt ſtrong caſtle, called the caſtle of S. ANGELO, whereunto adioyneth the towne, ſeperated from the caſtle onely with a wall and a ditch, & is placed in a hollowneſſe cut out of the maine rocke, ſtrengthened alſo with the ſea and the induſtrie of man; and is of ſome called the Burg, of others the new citie (in this caſtle reſideth the Grand maſter, and the ſouldiers in the Burg:) vpon the third promontorie ſtandeth another ſtrong caſtle, which they call alſo F the Burg of S. MICHAEL: the fourth promontorie is not inhabited, from whence the ſea runneth alongſt the winding bankes almoſt into the midſt of the iſland, vnto a place called AQVA MARSIA. Againe, after the port MARZA MOXET, Weſtward is the harbour S. GEORGE; and after that another called BENNORRAT: then followeth the port of S. PAVLE, no leſſe than the port MARZASIROC: after which commeth the port called SALINARVM SINVS: but on Iſland of MALTA lie certaine other little Iſlands, as GAVLOSO now GOZA: two other called CVMINIA, and another called PIPER, all ſubiect to the Maltaſes.

Thus much I haue thought good to ſet downe concerning the Turkes fleet, and for the deſcription of thoſe places wherein this great action was performed, the brute whereof then filled the world. Now ſhall it not be amiſſe, in like manner to declare vpon what ſtrength, next vnto God, Valetta the Graund maſter ſtood againſt ſo mightie and puiſſant an enemie. Firſt there was in the Iſland thirteene hundred mercinaries, ſome Spaniards, ſome French, ſome Florentines, and the reſt of NAPLES: there was alſo a thouſand ſeamen of the knights fleet, and fiue hundred in the towne of S. Angelo: and of the countrie people which were fled into the ſtrong places, fiue thouſand, men not altogither vnskilfull of the warres: there was alſo fiue hundred H knights of the Order, beſides prieſts and ſquires; for of theſe three ſorts of men, are they which are called brethren of the Order. This was the number of them which defended the caſtles and townes of S. Elmo, S. Angelo, and S. Michael, wherunto they were proportionably diuided: & in the citie it ſelfe, which is called MELITA, being in the middle of the Iſland, was two hundred ſouldiors, and as many citiſens, with three hundred of the countrie people all horſmen, commanded by Io. Vagno a valiant captaine. Beſides this, euery place was furniſhed with plentie of victuall, armour, weapons, artillerie, and whatſoeuer elſe was needfull for the enduring of a long ſiege, and a war that ſhould want many things: and that which paſſed all the reſt, minds armed with inuincible courage againſt whatſoeuer ſhould chance, which oftentimes maketh of the vanquiſhed, victors. All theſe things being in readineſſe, and orderly diſpoſed, as ſoone as they vnder- I ſtood that ſeuen and twentie of the Turks gallies had put into the hauen MARZASIROCK, and were there landing their men: Gyon, Admirall for the Order, a valiant and couragious knight, marched thither with fiue hundred harquebuſiers, to haue skirmiſhed with them; but as ſoone as the Turkes ſaw them comming, they retired againe to their gallies. On the other part where the other fleet lay, two hundred of the Turkes going on ſhoare, met by chance with Rinerius a Frenchman, and eight knights moe; who hauing his horſe killed vnder him, and one of his companions ſlaine, fell with the reſt into the hands of the enemie. Whileſt theſe things were in doing, a certaine Chriſtian mariner fled out from the Turkes to the citie of MELITA, who diſcouered the enemies purpoſe, telling them, That the Turkes by the appointment of Muſtapha, had K determined to haue landed the greateſt part of their forces, preſently to haue beſieged ſome ſtrong place, had not Piall Baſſa the Admirall exclaimed againſt it, doubting to be left too weak at ſea: ſaying plainly, That he would attempt nothing before the comming of Dragut, who was euerie houre expected. For Solyman had expreſſely commaunded, that they ſhonld do nothing without his counſell; ſo great an opinion had he of his policie and valour. But whether this his report was true or otherwiſe, the Turks for all that, returning with their fleet to the port of MARZASIROCK, landed twentie thouſand ſouldiours, and fiue field pieces, and ſo intrenched themſelues. This done, Piall Baſſa with ſeuen thouſand, went to view the caſtle of S. Michaell; but for feare of the great ſhot, durſt not to come nie it. Neuertheleſſe, they of the towne ſallying out, couragiouſly skirmiſhed with the Turkes; in which conflict, Curſelinus ſurnamed Parda, accom- L panied but with one Spaniard, ſo furiouſly aſſailed the enemie, that he tooke from him one enſigne, and ſlew one of the Sanzacks a great commaunder, with diuers others. When Piall was come againe into the campe, the Generall began to conſult with the other captaines, whether it were better to lay ſiege to the caſtle of S. Elmo, or to the towne of S. Michaell: in concluſion it was agreed vpon, that they ſhould with all their forces beſiege the caſtle of S. Elmo. And going vp the hill to view the caſtle, they were encountred by the garriſon ſouldiours; in which fight ſome few vvere loſt on both ſides. Thus by degrees, things growing hoater and hoater, the Graund maſter thought it good to certifie Garzias of TOLEDO, viceroy of SICILIE, how things ſtood, that he might the ſooner rig vp his fleet to come to their reſcue. Wherefore he commaunded one gallie to put out of the hauen by night, and to paſſe ouer into SICILIE with Saluagus one of the knights ſent thither on meſſage. In the meane time, The Turks caſt vp a M mount to haue battered the caſtle of S. Elmo, and beaten the gallies in the hauen MAIOR, and ſo to haue opened a way for their fleet to haue entred: but they were not able long to keepe that mount, for they had ſcarcely well ended the worke, but it was forthwith by the continuall thundring ſhot out of the caſtle, beaten downe againe, which thing greatly abated the Turkes courage,

A rage. About that time, Ochial came to the fleet with ſix ſhips, drawne out of them which were left for the defence of ALEXANDRIA, and in them nine hundred ſouldiors. The Turks beaten from their firſt mount, caſt vp another on a higher ground, whereon they placed three great pieces of ordinance, wherevvhith they annoied not only the hauen vvherein the fleet of MALTA, rid but the caſtle of S. Angelo alſo, the Great maſters ſeat, and with a rowling trench drew neerer and neerer vnto the caſtle of S. Elmo: which although they had at firſt in vaine attempted, hindred by them which were in the caſtle, yet at laſt with much labour and trauell they brought it to perfection (for the Turks in that kind of worke, ſtill performed by their multitude, are accounted to excel others:) wherfore in ſhort time, they planted their great ordinance in ſuch ſort, as that they might batter both the caſtles of S. Elmo and S. Michaell. There was in the Turkes
B campe a gentleman of SPAINE, but then a ſlaue vnto a Turke, who vnderſtanding the enemies purpoſe for the beſieging of the caſtle of S. Elmo, by a Chriſtian fugitiue aduertiſed the Great maſter thereof: whereupon he forthwith ſent Cerda and Miranda, with two companies of Spaniards into the caſtle, who were afterwards a great ſtrength vnto the caſtle, and hinderance vnto the enemie. At length came Dragut Gouernour of LEPTIS, long looked for of the Turkes, with thirteene gallies, and in them 1600 ſouldiours: after whom followed ten galliots from BONA, and in them two companies. In the meane time, Saluagus the worthie knight (ſent before into SICILIA) came to MESSANA, and hauing certified the viceroy, of the ſtate of MALTA; was by him commaunded to returne to MALTA in a galliot, conducted by two gallies of the C Great maſters; vvhich hauing brought him neere vnto the Iſland, returned againe into SICILIA: but he with his galliot (not without moſt manifeſt danger) in the third watch of the night brake into the towne thorow the middeſt of the enemies fleet, with the loſſe of but one of his followers. Where hauing deliuered vnto the Great maſter, what he had in charge from the viceroy, he was the ſame night ſent backe againe by the Great maſter into SICILIA, to certifie the viceroy, That he had need of more aid, requeſting him with all ſpeed to ſend him ſome ſupply, whereby he might the better hold out againſt the force of ſo great an enemie. Saluagus diſcouraged neither with the labour nor the danger, preſently committed himſelfe againe to ſea, and in ſhort time arriued in the port of SIRACVSA, where finding the two gallies we before ſpake of, he ſent them to MALTA, as he had in charge with foure hundred ſouldiors, amongſt whom were diuers of the knights of the Order, and certain skilfull canoniers: willing them to ſhun the D Weſt part of the Iſland, where as they muſt needs come into the enemies ſight, and to paſſe by the Eaſt end thereof, which vvas farther about, but ſafer; and turning Southward, to land in the port MILIARE, and from thence by the low places of the iſland to conuay the ſouldiours by night to the citie MELITA, which vvas but foure miles off; from whence they might eaſily paſſe vnto the caſtle of S. Michael. This order taken, he went to MESSANA, and there declared to the viceroy the danger of the vvar, vvith the ſmall number of the defendants, requeſting of him a thouſand footmen, vvhich vvith thoſe alreadie ſent, he thought would ſuffice to hold out the ſiege, vntill he vvith his whole fleet might come to relieue them. But whileſt theſe things vvere ſlowly prouided, which with much difficulties and delay could hardly be brought to paſſe, the E Chriſtian princes as it were ſleeping in ſo great a danger: the Turks vpon the ſudden the third of Iune, aſſaulted the caſtle of S. Elmo, in hope with ſhort ſcaling ladders to get ouer that part of the rampiers which was neereſt vnto the bulwarke of the caſtle. But the defendants, in the ditch which before had no flanker to ſcoure the ſame, had of earth & fagots made a large ſtrong flanker, from whence the caſtle alſo helping them, they valiantly reſiſted the enemie, and filled the ditches with the dead bodies of the Turkes. Who for all that, truſting to their multitude (wherewith rather than vvith true valour they obtaine ſo many victories) thruſt ſtill on, vntill they had by obſtinat force (although long firſt) gained the flanker: whereby they commaunded all that part of the ditch, towards the port MARZA MOXET. In which place they with wonderful celeritie ſo fortified themſelues, that they could not be hurt by the defendants: wherein they were much holpen by their own great ordinance, planted on the other ſide the hauen MAR-
F ZA; for with it they draue the defendants from the place, beat down the corner of the rampire, and battered the front of the bulwarke, whoſe hight and greatnes troubled the enemie, but was not ſo commodious for the defendants, for that it was made without flankers. But night comming on, fiue thouſand of the nine thouſand Turks which gaue the aſſault, tarried there: wherfore the Chriſtians conſtrained to forſake the place, retired themſelues into the caſtle. The

Turks in the meane time couered with the darkeneſſe of the night, with ſackes filled vvith tow and earth, filled vp the ditch vvhich was vnder the bulwarke, but neither of any great wideneſſe or depth: vvhich done, they gaue a freſh aſſault, vvherein aboue eight hundred of them were ſlaine, part Ianizaries, and part Spachi, and beſides them many wounded, of whom the moſt part remained halfe dead in the ditch, vvhere they periſhed, and could not be relieued. Of the Chriſtians vvas loſt fiue and fortie: amongſt whom vvere fiue knights of the order, Guardampes an Auergnois, Maſius a colonell of NARBONA, Contilia a Spaniard, Somaia a Florentine, and Neinec a Germane. The ſame night the Great maſter thinking, as reaſon was, that they in the caſtle of S. Elmo might want helpe, ſent two hundred of his knights and as many other ſouldiours into the caſtle; who if they had bin moe, togither with the foure hundred which were before in the caſtle, might happily haue driuen the Turks both from the rampiers and the flanker, and alſo kept the place longer. But for as much as the Great maſter wanted ſouldiours, and had therefore ſent Saluagus into SICILIA for new ſupplies, as we haue before ſaid, hee in the meane time couragiouſly expected their comming, refuſing no labour or paine: yet bewailing ſometime with himſelfe the vnfortunateneſſe of the Chriſtian princes, by whoſe negligence ſo fit an occaſion for the ouerthrow of the barbarous enemie was let ſlip: But aboue all things he maruelled exceedingly that no helpe yet came, eſpecially thoſe two gallies which (as we haue ſaid) were in all haſt ſent by Saluagus: but they by the maſters default kept not the appointed courſe; for firſt whereas they ſhould haue ſhunned the Weſt part of the Iſle, and haue turned towards the Eaſt, they ſhaped their courſe Weſtward to the Iſland of GAVLOS, the maſter vainely affirming, that he ſaw certaine of the Turks galliots lying before port MILERIA: which was afterwards well knowne not to haue bin ſo; for the trueth was, that he for feare (whereby notable deſignes are many times fruſtrated) durſt not go forward. Whereby it came to paſſe, that the Great maſter was diſappointed of ſo neceſſarie a ſupplie: which thing much grieued both the viceroy and others, but eſpecially Saluagus. For he ſaw it would come to paſſe, that if the Turkes ſhould take the caſtle of S. Elmo, the moſt aſſured bulwarke and defence of the Iſland of MALTA, the other places muſt of neceſſitie be brought into extreame danger, all the way to relieue them being thereby ſhut vp. And that it might be taken, ſeemed not to him impoſſible, the enemie hauing alreadie taken one fort, and laying hard ſiege almoſt on euery ſide of that little pile. The due conſideration of theſe and ſuch like things grieued the minds of skilfull men, eſpecially ſeeing ſuch ſlacke preparation in a caſe requiring ſuch preſent relieſe. Yet in the meane time ſouldiors were taken vp at ROME by the commaundement of Pius Quartus then Biſhop, to be ſent to MALTA: and by his example to ſtir vp other princes to ſend aid vnto this ſacred war, he gaue a hundred pound of gold to Cambianus legat for the Order, and commanded gunpouder and other neceſſaries for that warre to be taken out of his caſtle S. Angelo, that ſo he might ſeeme to be wanting in nothing that was in him to performe. Ouer theſe ſouldiors, in number ſix hundred, he appointed Pompeius Columna Generall, and commaunded Camillus Medices his legate to accompanie him. With theſe went many voluntarie men, of purpoſe to lay downe their liues for the eterniſing of their names in ſo religious a warre, and that with ſuch an ardent deſire, as that euerie little delay ſeemed vnto them a yeare. Wherefore comming to NAPLES, they there found Iohn Andreas Auria with eleuen ſhips, the prince of POPVLONIA with nine, Lanicius with three, and three others, ſet forth by other priuate gentlemen. In theſe ſhips were imbarked all thoſe footmen which came from ROME, and ſo tranſported to MESSANA, where the kings fleet was prouiding. But whileſt the Chriſtians make ſlow preparation, conſidering the greatneſſe of the danger, the Turkes not ignorant thereof, reſolued to proue the vttermoſt before the ſtrength of the Chriſtians were readie or drawne togither. For the caſtle of S. Elmo once taken, they aſſured themſelues with more eaſe to carrie the reſt: for that therby they ſhould firſt haue the hauen MARZA MOXET in their power, where their fleet might in ſafetie ride ſo long as they pleaſed: and the riſing ridge betwixt the two hauens was commodious for them both to batter the towne of S. MICHAEL, and to keepe the hauen MAIOR, ſo that none could without their leaue paſſe in or out thereat. Wherfore vpon theſe and other ſuch like conſiderations they began againe to batter the caſtle of S. Elmo, as if it had bin with thunder: which furious batterie they continued for the ſpace of foure daies togither without intermiſſion. The night following they ſuddenly with great force gaue an aſſault, and with their ſcaling ladders had almoſt gained the top of the wall, when the Chriſtians deſirous of

A nothing more than to come to handie blowes, draue them downe againe with ſuch violence, that neuer after they durſt ſet ladder to the wall, vntill the very laſt conflict. Whileſt things were thus hot at the caſtle of S. Elmo, Dragut his ſouldiors vpon a brauerie, as if they had been the only men, went to a place called MARTIA SCALA, which is betwixt the gallowes and S. Thomas roade, as if they would haue done more than the reſt: Which the Chriſtians beholding out of the towne of S. Angelo, to repreſſe their inſolencie, ſallied forth vpon them, and ſo welcommed them, that they were glad after they had receiued a great loſſe foorthwith to retire to the place from whence they came. Of the Chriſtians was ſlain Bonnemius a Frenchman, one of the knights and ſeuen others. The Turkes repulſed.

The ſame time Monſerratus was by the great maſter ſent into the caſtle of S. Elmo, to com-B maund there as Gouernour in ſtead of Brolia: for that he with watching and paines taken in defence thereof, was fallen ſicke. The ſame Brolia had many times before written to the Great maſter, That the caſtle was ſo well fortified and furniſhed of all things needfull, as that he thought it impoſſible to be woon by the enemy: and had with cheerfull ſpeech and braue behauior, ſo encouraged the knights, and other the defendants, that they fought againſt their enemies with more than mens ſtrength, and greater courage than is to be beleeued. Neither were the Turkes for that diſcouraged, although they were with great loſſe ſtill repulſed: but for certain daies battered the caſtle with greater fury than before, and immediatly gaue an aſſault; for they had made a bridge ouer the ditch, of maſts and ſaile yards, of ſuch a breadth, that ten men might go theron in ranke: and had placed about the ditch foure thouſand harquebuſiers, and brought all their The Turks make a bridge ouer the caſtle ditch.
C fleet vnto S. Georges ſhoare, not far from the caſtle. And when they had by the ſpace of eighteen daies ſore ſhaken it, and torne the wals with thirteen thouſand great ſhot, and were now in hope euen preſently to win the caſtle: ſee, Beragamus a Biſcane, one of the knights, and Medranus a Spaniſh captaine, with certaine other valiant men, ran to the bridge, and to the great admiration of the beholders, oppoſed themſelues againſt the multitude of the miſcreants. The fight hand to hand was on both ſides both fierce and terrible: and now one of the Turks had aduanced a Turkiſh enſigne vpon the bulwarke, which whileſt Medranus layeth hand vpon, and the Turke on the other ſide ſtruggleth to cleare himſelfe from him, in ſtriuing together, they fell downe both dead, ſhot thorow with one bullet by one of the Turks. At which time the foure hundred which we ſaid were but a little before ſent thither by the Grand maſter, ſtood in good ſteed: for A horrible battery. Medranus a valiant captaine
D ſeeing all brought to ſo great a danger, ſome of them (whileſt other ſome fought with the enemie) thruſt barrels of gunpouder vnder the bridge, ſome caſt downe wild fire, ſtones, and whatſoeuer elſe came to hand vpon the enemie, and others farther off with their harquebuſiers ſore galled the Turkes; ſo in ſhort time the bridge was burnt and blowne vp, which in the fall therof, ouerwhelmed eight hundred Turkes: the reſt (as they might) retired, few whole, but moſt part wounded. In this conflict the Chriſtians pluckt downe two enſignes, the one Muſtaphaes, the other Draguts, which the Turkes had ſet vp vpon the verie battlements of the wals. On the other part toward the Southweſt, a band of the Turks had got to the top of the higheſt rampier; which as ſoone as they in the caſtle of S. Angelo perceiued, thinking to haue beaten them off with a great ſhot, ſlew by miſchance ſeauen of the defendants vpon the ſame rampier, as they Eight hundred Turks ſlaine with the fall of the bridge.
E were going to and fro: but to recompence that errour, at the next ſhot they rent in ſunder foure of the Turks captaines, with twelue other of their moſt forward ſouldiors. Whileſt they were here fighting, other Turkes in the meane time had caſt vp a trench on that ſide of the caſtle toward S. Angelo; out of which they were quickly driuen with fire, ſtones, and other ſuch like things throwne downe vpon them by the defendants. The Turks valiantly on euery ſide repulſed, retired into the campe, when they had in this aſſault loſt two thouſand of their beſt ſouldiors, and of the Chriſtians ſlaine almoſt a hundred, and wounded as many moe. The ſame day, Valetta the Grand maſter, perceiuing the port MARZA MOXET not to bee very ſtraightly kept by the Turkes, commaunded a light Brigandine to bee carried out of the hauen, ouerland to the place called MARTIA SCALA, that from thence he might ſend into SICILIA: for he (as reaſon The Turkes retire
F was) conſidering in what danger the caſtle of S. Elmo ſtood, by letters certified the Viceroy and the biſhop of ROME thereof, and of ſuch things as were there done; requeſting them of ſpeedie relieſe. The copie of the letters ſent to the Viceroy, I haue here ſet downe: as for thoſe which were ſent to the great Biſhop, becauſe they were almoſt of the ſame purport, I haue purpoſely omitted.

To

To Garzias of Toledo, Viceroy of Sicilia, and Admirall of the fleet, greeting. G

The Great maſter writes to Garzias Viceroy of Sicilia.

Since the time that I ſent Saluagus, I haue ſent vnto you two letters, which I cauſed to bee ſent by MELITA into GAVLOS; which I pray God bee come to your hands. After that, when as neither meſſengers nor letters came vnto vs from you, I commaunded a man with inſtructions to haſte to MESSANA, who when hee had certaine nights attempted to goe out, and was at laſt got out, hee was ſcarcely gone two miles, but hee ſaw the Turkes with might and maine making after him; whom to eſcape, he was glad to runne his pinace on ground: And caſting his letters into the ſea, to forſake his boat, and by flight to ſaue himſelfe. Now the Turkes hauing remooued their fleet out of the port VVLTVRNVS, H I conſidering how much it concerneth to certifie you of thoſe things which are heere done, commaunded a Brigandine to bee carried to MARTIA SCALA; for ſeeing that the Turkes fleet is gone to another part of the Iſland, I hope my letters will without let in ſhort time come vnto you. And the things I would haue you to know, are theſe: The fifteenth of this moneth, all the enemies fleet (a little before night) paſſed by this port; the comming on of the night letted, that wee could not well perceiue the weakeneſſe thereof; whileſt the gallies almoſt vnarmed, were with much difficultie towed forth: want of water cauſed them chiefly to depart out of the port VVLTVRNVS, and peraduenture feare of your fleet. For, as I haue heard, they haue intelligence, that an hundred and fiftie ſaile lie at road in the port of MESSANA; for which cauſe alſo, they haue not put themſelues into the port of S. Paul, but haue placed their fleet aboue the port MARZA MOXET; yet a good part of their gallies lie at the I port S. George, ſo to bee neerer vnto their land forces: yet is not the neereneſſe ſuch, but that if your fleet come vpon the ſudden, they will with the ſame feare retire to their fleete, that they would if they were further off. No man is now to bee ſeene at VULTVRNVS, for they haue left their firſt campe at Saint Katherins and Saint Iohns, hauing burnt all the countrey villages, and now lie with their fleet as I haue ſaid: and with their armie at the caſtle Saint Elmo, which God hath as yet kept, and as I hope will: which thing is euen for this to bee hoped for, which was but yeſterday done; when as our moſt valiant ſouldiours (by the helpe of God) for the ſpace of foure houres couragiouſly endured a moſt terrible aſſault. The Turkes hauing alſo made a bridge Weſtward toward the port MARZA MOXET, wee haue foure times repulſed them to their great loſſe; yet not without ſome loſſe alſo on our part, amongſt whom Medranus, a worthie captaine was to my great griefe ſlaine. With K this victorie our men are ſo encouraged, that I am in hope the caſtle may bee defended vntill your comming, eſpecially the enemies batterie not ſo furiouſly now as before maintained. If I were relieued with certaine companies of freſh ſouldiors, or at leaſt with thoſe our two gallies, I would neuer thinke that this caſtle could bee taken from vs: in defence whereof, whileſt wee euery houre looke for helpe, wee haue ſpent both our men, and whatſoeuer warlike prouiſion wee had elſe. Wee are reſolued although it coſt vs all our liues, to goe thither, relying vpon you: who as wee hope for your deuotion and noble courage, will not bee vnmindfull of our health and welfare; but knowing the daunger whereinto wee muſt needes fall, if you ſhall deferre to ayd vs, will ſend vs out of hand certaine bands of men, eſpecially when they may ſo eaſily bee ſent: for now that the Turkes are departed from the Eaſt part of the iſland, our ſouldiors may bee landed at the BLACKE ROCKS. Our liues lie in your handes, on L whom (next vnto God) reſteth all our hope: wherefore wee moſt inſtantly requeſt you not to forſake vs: committing our ſelues, and all that ours is, to your compaſſion and protection. Fare you well from MALTA the 17 of Iune.

Theſe letters receiued, and the diſtreſſe of the beſieged caſtle perceiued, the Viceroy was (as of right hee ought) greatly mooued, and made ſemblance as if he had been deſirous to haue brought foorth his whole fleet againſt the Turkes. But foraſmuch as the ſupply of ſhips from GENVA and SPAINE was not yet come, and that without them hee thought it not good to aduenture the fortune of a battell; he foorthwith ſent Ioh. Cardona with foure gallies, whereof two were of MALTA: and with Cardona ioyned one Robles campe-maſter, with a ſelect company of M Spaniards; with whom went alſo about eightie knights of MALTA, vvho ſtayed at MESSANA, awaiting ſome fit occaſion to paſſe ouer: Amongſt whom were theſe chiefe men of the Order, Pariſot the Great maſters nephew, Vincentius Caraffa, Boninſcana and Maldonatus, both Spaniards, Centius of AQVITANIA, and ſome others: who although letted by tempeſt and other occaſions,

A casions, they came too late to MALTA, as shall bee hereafter declared, yet serued they in great stead; and had they come in time, before the castle S. Elmo was lost, happily it might haue beene still kept.

The Turkes making no more account of so great a slaughter of their men, than of so many sheepe, desperatly renewed the fight, as men resolued to endure all extremities. And first they most horribly thundred day & night with their great ordinance vpon the castle: afterwards they assaulted the breaches with such a multitude and force, that if true valour and hope of immortalitie had not excluded all feare out of the hearts of the defendants, the terrour of the assault had enforced them either to haue fled or yeelded. Dreadfull was the fight, and had they not beene obstinately set down on both sides, the one to win the castle, the other to defend it, that day had
B ended the quarrell. Fiue houres endured that most terrible assault, at length the Turkes repulsed by the valour of the Christians, retired: yet did they not for all that passe the night following in quiet, but with their great ordinance did so beat the defendants, that they had much adoe to keepe the Turks from scaling the wals: which, that they should not then dare to attempt, was with exceeding endeuour prouided for by the Christians: of whom in this assault was lost two hundred, and of the Turks an infinit number. And Dragut himselfe, whilest he there performed the dutie both of a Generall, and most valiant souldior, got a blow on the head with a stone, whereof he in two dayes after died: his dead bodie was afterwards carried to TRIPOLIS, and there honourably buried.

A most terrible assault.

Dragut slaine

The commaunders of the Turkes armie, still more and more enraged with this valour of the C Christians, and the slaughter of their men, gathering all their fleet together, commanded them to compasse about the castle, of purpose to giue thereunto their last assault, with all their forces both by sea and land; and to send new supplies of fresh souldiors one after another, vntill they had taken the castle. And therefore, they with great industry prepared bridges, ladders, engins, armour, weapons, shot, and whatsoeuer things else was needfull for the assault. Which Valetta perceiuing out of his castle S. Angelo, and fearing (as meet was) least they in the castle should not be able longer to endure so great a fury; called together in counsell his knights, two daies before the Turkes gaue their last assault: and told them, That they all as well as he, saw in what danger they which defended the castle S. Elmo were; and that he doubted not, but that euerie one of them (vpon a godly zeale and compassion) was no lesse mooued with the slaughter and D danger of their fellowes and other their Christian souldiors, than with their owne: Wherefore he requested them, to declare what they thought best to be done for their safetie; yet so, as that they should not hastily determine any thing, that agreed not with the ancient valour and honor of their sacred militarie profession. Which motion once made, and their opinions in briefe deliuered, a decree was made, That forasmuch as the castle could not longer be holden, regard should be had for the safegard of them that were therein: for which purpose it was agreed, that twelue pinnaces should be sent to fetch them away. But before, three knights were chosen, who should in hast the night following go thither, and tell them what was in the counsell agreed vpon, and carefully to consider in what state the castle was: which if the defendants thought was to be abandoned, they should poison the water, & cloy the great ordinance, that it might not afterwards stand the Turks in stead. The three knights
E sent thither, was Medina a Spaniard, Rocca a Frenchman, and Constantinus Castriot an Italian; who not with out danger of their liues (being oftentimes shot at by the Turkes) got into the castle, and declared vnto them that were there in garrison, how carefull the Great master and the rest were of them. And they on their side, first of all gaue thanks to the Grand master and the rest, for the regard they had of them: and afterward concerning the castle, said, That if they considered the straightnesse of the place, the small number of the defendants, and multitude of the enemie, they should well perceiue in what danger they were, if the Turkes should often with such obstinacie renew the assault: yet forasmuch as they had euer hitherto felt the helpe of God so present, who had still mercifully defended them against the rage of the enemie, & wanted nothing needfull for the defence of the place; the F keeping wherof they had requested of the Grand master as an honor, although they knew right well it could not without most manifest danger of their liues be holden: yet they would for all that, keep it to the last man. For that perhaps the like honorable occasion for them to shew themselues in, should neuer againe be offered: wherfore they had (as they said) resolued in that place, to spend their liues for the glory of God and the Christian religion. The course of this life (they said)

Three knights sent to view the state of the castle S. Elmo.

The resolute answere of them in the castle to the knights.

ſaid) was but ſhort, but that honor and fame was for euer: and whereas death is to all men pre- G fined, it were to be wiſhed, that the life which is to nature due, ſhould rather ſeeme to be by vs franckely giuen to God and our countrey, then reſerued as natures debt: Which if it ſhould ſo happen, they would ſo vſe the matter, as that the barbarous enemy ſhould haue neither pleaſure nor ioy, which ſhould not coſt him much bloud euen of his beſt ſouldiors. This they willed the knights to tell the Great maſter, and to requeſt him not to be too carefull of them, but to promiſe vnto himſelfe thoſe things of them which beſt beſeemed reſolute men, eſpecially of them who had vowed themſelues to that ſacred warre. This anſwere of greater reſolution than fortune, receiued; the three knightes, when they had diligently viewed the caſtle, returned to the Grand maſter: who calling to counſell his knights, and hauing heard the anſwere of the beſieged, would needs heare alſo what opinion the three knights themſelues were of concerning the H keeping of the caſtle: of whom Caſtriot was of opinion, That the place was ſtill to be defended, and that if he were there to commaund, he would vndertake to performe it; and there rather to loſe his life than to forſake it, after he had once taken vpon him the charge thereof. But Rocca the French knight was farre of another mind, and ſaid plainly, that the place could not poſsibly be holden againſt ſo ſtrong an enemie; and that if Iulius Cæſar himſelfe were aliue, & ſaw to what ſtraight the place was brought (eſpecially al the rampiers being either beaten down or ſore ſhaken, & ſuch a power of obſtinate enemies lying round about it) he would neuer ſuffer ſo many valiant ſoldiors to be loſt but quit the place, & reſerue his men to further ſeruice: for why it was the part of valiant men to performe ſo much as was of men to be performed; but to ſtriue to do more, was no manhood at all: Wherefore he thought it beſt to doe that which men vſe with I members mortified, whoſe recouerie is deſperat; in which caſe we doubt not to make a ſeperati-on, ſo to ſaue the reſt of the bodie with life. The Spaniſh knight in moſt part agreeing with Ca- ſtriot, ſaid, That he thought it not good, that the place ſhould ſo eaſily be forſaken; firſt, for that the ditches and bulwarkes were yet defencible; and then, becauſe he ſaw ſo great a conſent amongſt the defendants, and ſuch a cheerefullneſſe to withſtand the enemie, which thing (as he ſaid) preſaged victorie.

The three knights of diuers opinions concerning the keeping of the caſtle S. Elmo.

Theſe opinions of the knights thorowly in counſell debated, and euery particular wel way-ed, it ſeemed good to the greater part, that they which were in the caſtle ſhould for certain daies yet hold it out; eſpecially becauſe it was not the manner of the knights of the Order eaſily to abandon their ſtrong holds, but rather to keepe them to the laſt, that euen therein the barbarous K enemie might perceiue with whom he had to doe, and ſo ſee his pride abated. For if they ſhould haue forſaken the place, they might haue beene thought to haue done it for feare: whereby the enemies inſolencie might haue beene encreaſed, and the honourable Order of thoſe ſacred knights diſgraced.

But the Turkes intentiue to that they had before determined, the three and twentith day of Iune aſſembling all their forces both by ſea and land round about the caſtle, in the dead time of the night on euery ſide ſet vp ſcaling ladders, made bridges, wrought mines, and with two and thirtie great pieces of artillerie battered the reſt of the wals yet ſtanding, and preſently gaue a moſt terrible aſſault. The defendants on the other ſide beat downe ſome, repulſed other, ſlew many, euer more carfull how to wound the enemie, than to ſaue themſelues: and where he L preſſed faſteſt on, there to ſhew their greateſt valour. Great were the outcries made on both ſides mixt with exhortation, mirth, and mourning; the face of the whole fight was diuers, vncertaine, cruell, and dreadfull: and now it was the third houre of the day, when ſtill the victorie ſtood doubtfull; and had not the furie of the great ordinance beene ſo tirrible, that it now had beaten downe all the wals vnto the very rocke wheron the caſtle ſtood, the defendants might for ſome longer time haue endured the enemies force. But the very rocke bared both of wals and defendants, and more than foure hundred ſlain, a man could ſcarcely now ſhew himſelfe, but he was preſently ſtrucke in pieces. Monſerratus Gouernour of the caſtle, and Garas of E V B Œ A, men of equall valour, integretie, and honour, were both ſlaine with one ſhot; for a ſhort and tranſitorie life made partakers of immortalitie together. Yet the reſt which ſtood in defence of the caſtle, M nothing terrified with ſo great a loſſe and ſlaughter of their fellowes, but augmented rather as it were with new courage from aboue, fought with greater force then before, ouerthrew the Turks enſigns now ſet vp in the caſtle, ſlew the enſign-bearers, captaines, and colonels; now reſpecting nothing more, but honourably to lay downe their liues for their religion and the obtaining

The Turkes furiouſly aſſault the citie.

A ning of immortall fame. By this time the ſunne was mounted to the middle of heauen, great was the heat, and men exceeding vvearie; the murdering ſhot neuer ceaſed, and ſuch vvas the multitude of the enemie, that hee ſent in freſh men in ſtead of them that were wearied or vvounded. On the other ſide, the ſmall number of the Chriſtians, and thoſe weakened vvith labor, watching, thirſt, and wounds, did what men might; yet at length were ouercome by a greater force, and ſo the caſtle by the Turks woon, but with ſuch ſlaughter of their men, that it was a wonder that ſo many ſhould be ſlaine of ſo few. The defendants were all ſlaine, euery man, in valiant fight. The caſtle of S. Elmo taken by the Turke.

Here may I not in ſilence paſſe ouer the inhumane and more than barbarous crueltie of the Turks againſt the dead bodies of the ſlaine knights, that therby may appeare, that cruelty neuer B wanteth wheron to ſhew it ſelfe mercileſſe, yea euen after death. The Turks after they had taken the caſtle, finding certaine of the knights yet breathing, and but halfe dead, firſt cut their hearts out of their breaſts, and then their heads from their bodies; after that they hanged them vp by the heeles in their red clokes with white croſſes, (which manner of attire they after an auncient cuſtome vſe in time war, as they doe blacke in time of peace) in the ſight of the caſtles S. Angelo and S. Michaell. And yet Muſtapha the Turkes Generall not ſo contented, commaunded them afterwards to be faſt bound together, & ſo caſt into the ſea, whoſe dead bodies were in few daies after by the ſurge of the ſea caſt vp in the hauen MAIOR, and knowne by their friends, were by the commandement of the ſorrowful Great maſter honourably buried. With which the enemies moſt barbarous crueltie he was ſo moued, that he commanded that no Turke ſhould from that C time be taken priſoner, but to be preſently ſlaine. And therupon all that were before taken, were foorthwith put to the ſword, and their heads caſt ouer the wals on that ſide towards the enemie. From the beginning of the ſiege to the taking of the caſtle, of the Chriſtians were ſlaine a thouſand three hundred, amongſt whom were a hundred and thirtie of the ſacred knights of the Order, all worthy to be regiſtred in the booke of euer laſting fame. Barbarous crueltie exerciſed by the Turkes vpon the dead bodies of the knights.

The caſtle S. Elmo thus loſt, Valetta although his mind (as hee had good cauſe) was inwardly attainted with exceeding griefe, yet made ſemblant otherwiſe, becauſe hee would not daunt the minds of his ſouldiors: telling them, that nothing was happened vnprouided for or vnforeſeen. This was (as hee ſaid) the will of God, and the chance of warre, that ſometimes one, ſometimes another ſhould be ouercome: and that cowardiſe, not ſuch valour as was in them that were gone, gaue occaſion to D liuing friends to lament: yet that the enemy was not for that to be feared, who had alſo receiued ſuch a loſſe, as he might therby rather ſeeme conquered, than a victorious conquerour: wheras the loſſe of his knights was recompenced with honor and immortalitie, things of themſelues ſufficient to enflame all noble minds to behaue themſelues valiantly. As for himſelfe (hee ſaid) that truſting not in his owne ſtrength, but in the helpe of Almightie God, he had not yet caſt off the hope of victorie ouer the reliques of the diſcomfited enemy; and that he well hoped, they were all of the ſame mind, wherein he moſt earneſtly requeſted them to perſiſt vnto the end. When he had thus ſaid, hee being a man armed againſt all fortunes, withdrew himſelfe a little aſide: where caſting many things in his troubled mind, he determined to ſend letters to Petrus Meſquita, Gouernor of the citie of MELITA, to certifie him and the knights of the Order that were at MESSANA, and the Viceroy, of the loſſe of S. Elmo: the copie wherof, E becauſe that in them euidently appeareth the Chriſtian minde of him the Great maſter, I haue thought good here to ſet downe as followeth: Valetta encourageth his ſouldiors after the loſſe of the caſtle S. Elmo.

Whileſt theſe knights are ſetting forward, in the meane time chaunced the miſerable misfortune of the caſtle S. Elmo: which although it brought vnto vs that griefe you may eaſily imagine, wee for all that, as if it had happened by ſome ſecret appointment of God, haue taken it in that part, that he as a moſt mercifull father purpoſeth thereby to warne vs, but not vtterly to deſtroy vs. Neither do I thinke it lawfull to doubt of his mercie and power. Yet for all that, I may neuertheleſſe complaine, that wee are of them forſaken of whom it leaſt beſeemed. So that in the ſpace of ſeuen and thirtie daies, wherein our moſt valiant ſouldiours endured all the force of the enemie (which truely was done rather F by the power of God than of man) we were holpen of our owne (which owe ſo much vnto vs) not ſo much as with the leaſt helpe, which they might oftentimes haue ſent vs. But I liſt to aſcribe it whatſoeuer it is, to God, of whom alone as wee haue hitherto receiued ſo many good things, ſo reſt we in hope hereafter to receiue alſo. For, for any thing that I can ſee, wee muſt not now truſt to mans helpe: for as much as we could by no letters, no diligence, no prayers, no admonitions, and to bee briefe, by no commaunds Valetta his letters to the Gouernor of Melita.

moue them, who of all others ought moſt to haue obeyed it. The ſhortneſſe of the time ſuffereth vs not to G write to the Viceroy of theſe things, it ſhall bee your part to certifie both him and other our friendes thereof: who if they had obeyed our commaund, or aided vs with neuer ſo ſmall a ſupplie of ſouldiers, happily

Wherefore except the Viceroy make haſt to deliuer vs from this ſiege, I feare that he cannot in time come:
but eſpecially if wee bee heere beſieged before the comming of thoſe our ſmall helpes which wee as in a wee doe not diſtruſt of God his loue and prouidence: by whoſe diuine inſpiration the rare courage of the Viceroy being in ſhort time ſtirred vp, will haſten hither to relieue vs. For all our welfare conſiſteth in ce-

June, 1565.

Meſquita hauing receiued theſe letters, commanded a galliot foorthwith to be launched, and therein imbarked Maſius Codonellus, one of the knights; to whom he deliuered both the letters of the Grand maſter to him, and others of his owne, almoſt of the ſame purport, directed to the knights of the order which lay at Messana, requeſting him with all ſpeed poſſible to paſſe ouer with them into Sicilia. Muſtapha Baſſa ſendeth meſſengers to the great maſter.

In the meane time Muſtapha the Turkes Generall ſent a meſſenger to Valetta, and with him an old Spaniſh captiue, with promiſe of libertie if he would goe with his meſſenger to the towne, to talke with Valetta concerning the yeelding vp thereof, and to trie if he would by any meanes come to agreement: who comming to the towne, the Turke ſtill waiting at the gate, the Chriſtian was let in, and brought to the Great maſter, to whom he declared what he had in charge from the Baſſa. But as ſoone as Valetta heard of the name of compoſition and yeelding, he was ſo filled with indignation, that had he not been a Chriſtian, he would preſently haue commaunded him to haue been hanged. Wherefore he gaue him choice either to tarry ſtill in the towne, if he thought ſo good, or els forthwith to returne and tell his companion, that if he got him not packing quickly, he would ſend him farther off with a great ſhot. With this ſhort anſwere the K Turke ſuddenly returned into the campe. Whereupon Muſtapha fell into ſuch a rage, that hee openly proteſted, neuer from that to forbeare any kind of crueltie againſt the Chriſtians.

Philip Laſcaris fleeth from the Turks to the caſtle S. Michaell.

There was then with Muſtapha one Philip of the moſt noble Græcian familie of Laſcaris, who of a boy taken priſoner by the Chriſtians in Patras, a citie of Achaia, and by them honeſtly and courteouſly vſed, was therefore euer after well affected toward the Chriſtians: He priuie to many of Muſtaphaes deſignes, by a certaine diuine motion thought he ſhould not a litle profit the Chriſtians by reuolting vnto them: wherefore he reſolued to flie vnto the caſtle of S. Michaell. Which thing when he had oftentimes attempted, at length the firſt of Iuly hee caſt himſelfe into the ſea (for by land he could no way eſcape) and ſwum to the caſtle, not without danger of his life: for diſcouered by the Turks, he was many times ſhot at both with their arrowes and L ſmall ſhot. He, brought to the Great maſter, reuealed vnto him many of the enemies ſecrets, and alſo aduiſed him what was to be done at the point of S. Michaels, to fruſtrate the enemies purpoſe for the aſſailing of that place; with many other things, which were vnto the defendants no ſmall helpe: and afterwards as often as need was, during the ſiege, fought valiantly againſt the Turkes.

Whileſt theſe things were in doing, Codonellus ſent as wee haue before ſaid into Sicilia, came in ſafetie to Messana, where he found the Chriſtian fleet not yet ready to relieue the diſtreſſed Maltæſes; for the Spaniſh ſhips were not yet come, and Iohn Andreas Auria with eight and twentie ſhips was ready to returne to take in foure thouſand footmen, taken vp in Etruria by Capinus Vitellius. Which backewardneſſe the knights of the Order conſidering, and what M danger was in delay, after they had well debated the matter amongſt themſelues, they reſolued by the power of God by all meanes poſſible to helpe their brethren. And for this expedition choſe two moſt fit Generals of their owne fellowes, the Commandors of Messana and Baroli, who forthwith went to Garzias the Viceroy, declaring vnto him what things the ſacred knights knights of their Order had done, not for the king of SPAINE only, but for the Christian commonweale, and also what great charge they had bin at the yeare before in the Pinionian expedition, wherein they had neither spared ships, victuall, nor munition, neither their owne liues, to profit the king and the Christian commonweale. Besides this, they besought him well to consider, that the losse of MALTA concerned not the sacred knights only, but all ITALIE, and especially SICILIA, for the neerenesse of so troublesome and puissant an enemie. For these and other like reasons, which the shortnes of the time suffered them not to rehearse, they requested of him foure thousand footmen, with whom all the knights of the order which were there, and many other noble and voluntarie men would make all possible speed to relieue the besieged, which they had before in vaine attempted; with which strength they were in good hope, if not to repulse the enemie, or to recouer that was alreadie lost, yet at last to stop & stay his farther proceeding, vntill such time as he hauing rigged vp and brought forth all his fleet, might set vpon the Turks, and (as was to be hoped) vanquish & disperse them. But whileſt the viceroy hauing heard their request, considereth what answere to make, a messenger came vnto him from SPAINE, but vvith vvhat command from the king (although men ghessed diuersly) could not be known. But vpon his comming, the viceroy gaue the knights this cold answere, That he could not graunt what they requested, for that in so doing he should disfurnish his fleet, & not be able afterwards to relieue them as he desired: but if it pleased them to transport the knights with part of the bishops souldiors into the Iſland, they might so doe with their owne two gallies they had alreadie, vvherunto he vvould also ioyne another of his owne. The knights when they could obtain no more, accepted of that vvhich vvas offered.

The knights of Malta craue aid of the Viceroy.

The cold answer of the Viceroy to the knights.

Whileſt these gallies are setting forward, those foure gallies (vvherof we haue before spoken) wherin vvere embarked foureſcore knights and six hundred other souldiors, hauing at sea suffered many troubles by the space of twentie daies, could not as yet arriue at MALTA: and because the Viceroy had commaunded, That they should not land, except they first knew vvhether the castle S. ELMO were still holden by the Christians, they sent out a frigot to land, promising that day and the next to tarrie in the sea for her returne. In the meane time a great tempest suddenly arising, it so fell out, that the frigot could not at the appointed time returne; vvherefore the gallies which expected her comming, fearing least she had been either by tempest lost, or by the enemie intercepted, retired to POZALO, a port vpon the coast of SICILIA neereſt to MALTA, there to expect some good newes: vvhere as soone as they had put in, they vnderstood that S. ELMO vvas yet defended: wherupon they put to sea againe, vvith purpose to haue arriued at MALTA. But when they were within two leagues of the place where they thought to haue landed, they saw a fire there, which caused them to mistrust that the place was possessed of the enemie, and that he lay therabout to intercept them: wherefore they returned again to POZALO; where now vnderstanding of the French knight, come from MALTA, that that fire was made by his commaundment, as a signe, that they might without feare haue come forward; they with all speed made again for the same place, and at the length the nine and twentieth day of Iune about midnight landed at the Black Rocks on the South side of the Iſland toward APPRYCKE, and vnseene of any, got in hast to the citie MALTA, vvhere they were ioyfully receiued, and there stayed to expect what the Great master should commaud. In the meane time it fortuned, a great foggie mist (which seldome times there chanceth) to arise so thicke, that a man could hardly see for it: at vvhich time a boy of about twelue yeares old looking by chance out of a window in the castle of MELITA, suddenly as one afraid, cried out, That he saw a Turke going from the citie to the castle of S. MICHAEL. Which thing some of the knights hearing, ran presently out that way, and found a Greeke of the citie of MELITA, who brought backe and examined (for that without the Gouernours passe it was not lawfull for any man to go out of the citie) confessed, That his purpose vvas to haue aduertised the Turks of the comming of those souldiors, that so they might haue intercepted them as they should haue come from MELITA to the Grand master: for vvhich treason he vvas as he had well deserued cut in foure pieces. Three daies after, this new supplie come from SICILIA, in the first watch of the night came all in safetie from MELITA to the Great master, except two or three boies, who charged with armour and other baggage, were not able to keepe way with the rest. It is not to be told how much the besieged reioyced at the comming of these their friends, and especially Valetta, who seeing the floure of his knights and other souldiors, as it were by diuine prouidence come vnto him;

A traitor taken and executed at Melita.

The souldiors new come out of Sicilia, come to the Great Master.

with teares trickling downe his cheekes, and his eies caſt vp to heauen, ſaid: G

The praier of Valetta. I thanke thee (O heauenly Father) which heareſt my prayers, and forſakeſt not this thy little flocke, beſet round with moſt rauening Wolues: Theſe are the workes of thine euerlaſting goodneſſe, mercie and prouidence.

Theſe new come ſouldiors, requeſted of the Great maſter as a reward of their paines, that they might bee put in garriſon into the towne S. Michael, a place now moſt laied vnto by the Turks: which thing (he commending their forwardneſſe) eaſily granted: yet for all that remoued not the old garriſon. Theſe freſh and couragious ſouldiors, deſirous of nothing more than to fight with the enemie, the next day ſallied out, and hauing ſlaine two hundred of the Turkes, and wounded as many more, without loſſe of a man returned, euery mans ſword imbrued vvith the bloud of his enemie. Which thing Muſtapha the Turkes Generall hearing, knew it vvas H they vvhich lately came into the towne; and therupon fell in rage with his captains, as that they had by their negligence entred. But the ſuſpition grew moſt vpon them which vvere appointed for the keeping of the vttermoſt part of the Iſland: vvhich was the more increaſed, for that three galliots of ALGIERS had withdrawne themſelues away; ſo that he neither truſted them nor the renegate Chriſtians, vvho as occaſion ſerued, fled daily from him. For vvhich cauſe, he gaue out proclamation, That none of them ſhould lie by night out of the gallies, & that ſuch as did otherwiſe, ſhould therfore be burnt or impaled vpon ſtakes: and ſo changing his warders, appointed Salec with his galliots, whom he thought to be more faithfull for the keeping of the iſland. And that neither they nor the Chriſtians ſhould be able to attempt any thing, he chained togither diuers gallies in the entrance of the hauen MARZA MOXET, and cauſed the reſt of the fleet to ride I neerer togither than before. But becauſe exceeding many vvere at that time ſicke in the Turkes campe, of the flix and other diſeaſes, three places vvere aſſigned for them; one for the wounded men neere vnto AQVA MARTIA, guarded vvith two thouſand Turkes; another in the poupes of their ſhips and gallies for the Turks voluntaries; and the third amongſt the banks, where the enforced Chriſtians were cured. At the ſame time, Muſtapha appointed Ochiall Baſſa Gouernour of TRIPOLIS, in ſtead of Dragut before ſlaine: who going thither vvith fiue gallies, and hauing ſet all things in order there, returned againe vnto the campe. With him the Baſſa had ſent two ſhips loaded vvith corne to TRIPOLIS, there to make bread, vvhereof they began to feele ſome vvant in the campe. He alſo ſent Zaloch, one of his Colonels to Solyman, to certifie him of the vvinning of the caſtle S. Elmo, and to deliuer vnto him the diſcription of the iſle of MALTA, as K they found it at their arriual: and farther, to declare vnto him, That he found the Malteſes ſtronger, and better prouided, than vvas at his ſetting forth ſuppoſed: Wherefore if it vvere his pleaſure longer to continue the ſiege, he ſhould ſend a new ſupplie of men, victuall, and other vvarlike prouiſion; vvhich if he did, he would then be in hope to take the other ſtrong places of the iſland alſo, though not ſo ſoone as vvas at the firſt ſuppoſed: and that in the meane time, vvhileſt he expected anſwere, he would not faile to doe vvhat he poſſibly might. And becauſe he vvould not ſeeme to haue vvritten an vntruth, he began his batterie in fourteene places, with ſeauentie great pieces of artillerie, amongſt which vvas three moſt huge baſilisks: for from the Gallowes promontorie to AQVA MARTIA, and from thence to the caſtle S. Elmo, wherein he had placed three hundred Ianizaries, the Turkes had incloſed all that compaſſe vvith ſundrie bul- L warks, trenches, and mounts, from whence they with their thundring ſhot, day and night inceſſantly battered the towns and caſtles of S. Michael and S. Angelo, ouerthrew the vvals, beat down the bulwarks, & brake down the houſes in ſuch terrible manner, that ſcarce any could be ſafe therein: which of all others moſt troubled the fearfull women and children. But the Turks in their trenches reſted in far more ſafetie: yet ſo, that they durſt not ſtray far out of the campe, but truſting vpon their multitude; and not that manys time vvithout their loſſe, being cut off by the horſemen of the garriſon of MALTA, vvho were euer readie at their heeles.

When the loſſe of the caſtle S. Elmo was knowne at ROME, the citie was filled with mourning and heauineſſe; ſome were ſorie for the diſhonour, otherſome feared leaſt the calamities of the Malteſes ſhould redound vnto themſelues. There was alſo amongſt others, a certaine en- M uious and foule mouthed kind of men, altogither ignorant and vnacquainted with martiall affaires, who ſhamed not to lay the blame of the loſſe of S. Elmo vpon the Grand maſter: whom both his owne vallour, with the worthie teſtimonie of ſo many famous and valiant men as were there preſent with him; as alſo this hiſtorie, gathered out of the true light of things then done,

But to returne againe to our purpoſe: we ſaid before, that three gallies were made readie at MESSANA; in ſetting forth whereof, they which had the charge vſed ſuch diligence, that the ſeauenth of Iuly, they departed out of harbour. In them (beſides the knights of the order) was embarked ſix hundred Spaniards, and three hundred of the great biſhops ſouldiors, conducted by Pompeius Columna; the mariners were part hired, part ſlaues, to whom libertie was promiſed if they would luſtily doe their endeuour to get into the hauen, and to be accounted of as the reſt of the ſouldiors were. And becauſe they would relieue the beſieged, not with men onely, but B with victuall alſo, they put into the ſame gallies fiue hundred buſhels of wheat, beſide gunpowder, ſaltpeter, and lead for ſhot. And although it was thought a moſt hard matter, by the hauen it ſelfe to enter the iſland, the Turks poſſeſſing both it and all the places thereabouts; neuertheleſſe, there was in the knights ſuch an earneſt deſire to relieue their brethren, that they promiſed both to themſelues and others, all things eaſie and ſafe: but when they began to approach the iſland, they ſent a ſcout before to vnderſtand by ſignes from the caſtle of S. Angelo, whether they were to proceed forward or not: who comming ſo farre that they might diſcouer the ſigne, perceiued thereby that they ſhould retire. Which thing the Turks perceiuing alſo, preſently with the ſmoake of their great ordinance and other things, they ſo obſcured the aire as with a thicke cloud, in ſuch ſort, as that thoſe ſignes were no more to be diſcerned; but all in vaine, for C why, our men had alreadie deſcried them: ſo thoſe three gallies returned againe into SICILIA. For Valetta that good prince, thought it not meet to bring ſo many of the ſacred knights, ſo many noble gentlemen & valiant ſoldiors, into a moſt manifeſt danger: for he ſaw certaine of the Turks gallies to lie by night in the mouth of the hauen MARZA MOXET, at a place called the Little ſands, to impeach the going in or out of the hauen MAIOR. About the ſame time, they which lay in garriſon in the citie MELITA, hearing of the notable ſallie made by the ſouldiors lately come; and taking heart thereupon, at ſuch time as the Turks were fetching in a certaine bootie of cattell, the horſemen purſued them; and hauing ſlain diuers of them, recouered the prey: and yet not ſo contented, chaſed them euen to their camp. But the other Turks ſeeing their fellowes flying in ſuch haſt towards them, raiſed an alarum, ran to the Generals tent, and for that time D ceaſed their batterie.

The Great maſter probably coniecturing, that the Turkes would in ſhort time aſſault both the towne and caſtle of S. Michaell, thought good by his preſence to encourage and ſtrengthen the garriſon; and therfore was about to haue gone thither by a bridge made of boats from the one point of the land to the other, between S. Michaels and S. Angelo: but quickely vnderſtanding the certaintie thereof, returned againe into his caſtle. Some there be that thinke, For him to haue ſo done, had bin a venturous part and full of danger, and therfore to haue bin diſcommended: for that great things are performed, not ſo much by ſtrength of bodie as of mind, by pollitike counſell and direction, wherwith a Generall (although abſent) may yet with his forces be alwaies preſent: but the Generall once loſt (which may eaſily happen, if he will preſent his E perſon to the danger) we ſee moſt commonly all fall togither with him, no otherwiſe than doth all parts of the bodie when the ſoule departeth: But otherſome are of contrarie opinion, That the Generals preſence, eſpecially in great dangers, is both praiſe worthy and moſt neceſſary; for that he as the ſoule, cannot prouide for or rule the bodie, except it be preſent, yea placed therin: and that Valetta in ſo doing, followed the examples of the greateſt kings and moſt famous Generals; as of Alexander the great, Iulius Cæſar, Themiſtocles, Marius, and others: whoſe words vnto their ſouldiors vvere theſe, I my ſelfe will be your conducter in the field, in the battell partaker of the danger with you, you ſhalbe in all things as my ſelfe. Beſides that, who knoweth not, that as in other things, ſo moſt of all in martiall affaires, all things are better, more orderly and more eaſily done when the maſter is preſent; neither was the learned Poet his meaning any thing elſe, when in the F wars betwixt the Latines and the Rutilians, he ſaith, Vrget præſentia Turni? wherupon they concluded, that the Great maſter in going, had done both valiantly, wiſely, and according to his dutie. But this we leaue for martiall men to determine.

At the ſame time the king of ALGIERS came to aid the Turkes with ſeuen gallies and ten galliots, and in them 2200 ſoldiors: who ſorie that he was not there at the beginning, and deſirous to do ſome notable act, and withall to make proofe of the valour of his ſouldiors, requeſted the great Baſſa to beſtow vpon him the firſt place in the beſieging the caſtle S. Michaell: which he not onely graunted, but ioyned vnto his forces two thouſand of his owne beſt ſouldiors. Theſe things obtained, he commaunded ninetie ſmall veſſels by deuices to be carried ouer land out of the port MARZA MOXET to AQVA MARTIA, for that he purpoſed on that ſide to beſiege the caſtle by water. But Valetta perceiuing the enemies purpoſe, both by ſeeing that was done, and alſo aduertiſed therof before by a Chriſtian fugitiue; preſently called vnto him two faithfull and skilfull ſhipmaſters of MALTA, and imparting the matter vnto them, demanded what they thought beſt to be done to keep the Turks from landing, as it ſeemed they purpoſed at the wals foot. They quickly conceiuing the matter, anſwered, That in their opinion, if a chaine were made of maſts and ſaile-yards as ſparres ioyned togither with yron rings, and ſo drawne all alongſt from the corner of the caſtle of S. Angelo to that place where the enemie thought to land, their purpoſe might be ſo defeated. This their deuice ſo pleaſed the Great maſter, that the night following ſuch a chaine was made, and faſt mored in the appointed place. The Turks ſo ſoone as it was day perceiuing this barre, ſtood as men doubfull, not knowing how by any meanes to land their men, as they had before purpoſed. Whileſt they ſtood ſo abaſhed, a Chriſtian fugitiue, a moſt deſperat villaine (in which kind of men fooliſh hardneſſe is accounted a vertue, and deſperation conſtancie) came to the king, and promiſed him to break the chaine, and ſo with a hatchet in his hand caſt himſelfe into the ſea, after whom followed two or three moe to helpe him: who ſwimming to the chaine, got vp vpon it, and began to hew apace with their hatchets. Which the Chriſtians beholding, ſuddenly fiue or ſix of the Malteſes ſwam thither with their drawne ſwords in their hands; & hauing ſlaine two of them, cauſed the other to flie: after which time none of the Turks was ſo hardie as to attempt the ſame. The barbarous king for all that gaue not ouer his purpoſe ſo, but with wonderfull diligence prepared for the ſiege, which the fifteenth day of Iuly began both by ſea and land. But the defendants turning their great ordinance vpon that place from whence the galliots came, with the furie thereof (in the ſpace of three houres, which the aſſault endured) ſlew two thouſand Turks and ſunke twelue of the galliots: the reſt comming as far as the chaine, when they could get no farther nor land their men, turned their prows vpon the corner of the caſtle, but were glad at laſt to retire and leaue that they came for vndone. The aſſault by land alſo endured fiue houres, wherein many of the Turks were ſlaine, and of the defendants two hundred: amongſt whom was Federicus the Viceroy of SICILIA his ſonne, ſtruck in ſunder with a great ſhot, Gordius a Frenchman, Franciſcus Sanoghera, and his nephew Iohn, Spaniards; all knights of the Order. Medina was alſo wounded, whereof he afterward died. But Valetta conſidering into what danger the ſtate of MALTA was like to fall, if he ſhould be conſtrained to fight many ſuch fights, where his ſoldiors wearied day and night without reſt, were ſtill to incounter with freſh men, & heard nothing of any aid or new ſupplie: the ſeuenteenth day of Iuly he ſent a meſſenger into SICILIA, who ſwam from the caſtle to the fartheſt part of the bay to AQVA MARTIA, and from thence eſcaped vnknowne thorow the middeſt of the enemies vnto the citie of MELITA, and ſo in a little frigot came to MESSANA; by him the Great maſter ſent letters to the Viceroy, requeſting him to ſend him his owne two gallies, with thoſe knights which were at MESSANA, and ſuch other ſouldiors as might in them be tranſported: willing them, that as ſoon as they came to the Iſland, they ſhould houer off aloofe before the hauen, readie vpon a ſigne giuen to thruſt in. The ſame time that this meſſenger arriued at MESSANA, came thither alſo the fleet from SPAINE, wherein were many of the knights of the Order from diuers nations. The Viceroy deſirous to ſend thoſe two gallies to Valetta, ſent letters before vnto him in ſecret caracters by two frigots wherein he certified him that he would ſend the gallies, requiring to haue from him ſome ſigne, whereby they might at their comming know whether they ſhould enter or retire: which frigots taking diuers courſes, one of them laded with medicines, as was afterwards known, was intercepted by the enemie: the other although ſhe came in ſafetie to MELITA, yet for as much as all the paſſages betwixt the caſtle of S. Michaell and the citie of MELITA were certaine daies before by the diligence of the enemie ſhut vp, and three which had vſed to paſſe too and fro, intercepted and moſt cruelly executed, and beſides that the hauen ſtraightly kept; the knights of MESSANA could haue no further direction from the Great maſter for the ſafe ſending of the two gallies: yet neuertheleſſe, becauſe he had requeſted them, and they themſelues were of the ſame opinion (as he

A he had before written) that where all is in queſtion, the aduenture of a little part is leſſe to be feared; they thought it good to aduenture them: yet with this regard, not to expoſe all thoſe knights to ſo great a danger, but of them all to ſend onely fortie, with a conuenient number of other ſouldiors, and with them Salazar a Spaniſh captain was ſent by the Viceroy to be landed in the Iſland of GAVLOS, who ſhould afterwards from thence in a boat (for that purpoſe towed along by the gallies) paſſe ouer into the Iſland of MALTA as a ſpie, to take view both of the citie and enemies campe.

In the meane time the Turks mindfull of the loſſe receiued in the aſſault of the caſtle S. Michael, and deſirous of reuenge, did ſo violently batter the caſtle with their great ordinance, that what the defendants repaired by night, that they ſtill beat downe againe by day: and in time of B the batterie made a bridge, which the twentieth day of Iuly before the Sun riſing they laid ouer the ditch, that they might as if it had bin vpon euen ground come to fight hand to hand with the Chriſtians. Which ſeene and quickly perceiued what danger it might bring, by and by Pariſot the Great maſters nephew, and Agleria, both knights, with certaine mercinarie ſouldiours ſallied out to haue burnt the bridge, but were ſo receiued of the Turkes, that they were almoſt all ſlaine togither with Pariſot and Agleria, and yet the exploit vnperformed. The Turkes without ceaſing continued their furious batterie vntill the eight and twentie of Iuly, which day in the afternoone they in diuers places aſſaulted the caſtle, thrice they with freſh and new ſupplies relieued their repulſed and wearied ſouldiors, and ſo fiercely maintained the aſſault, that they made no doubt but that day to win the caſtle. But the defendants with no leſſe reſolution withſtood
C them, repulſing them with their weapons, with ſhot, fire, and force, and at length enforced them with no ſmall loſſe of their men to retire from their wals. This victorie ſo encouraged the beſieged, that now they made ſmall reckoning of the enemie: but for as much as our men alwaies ſpared their great ordinance but in time to fight, & ſallied not out as they were wont, the Turkes thought that the garriſon was but weake, and that ſhot and pouder grew ſcarce in the caſtle. Yet deceiued in both, for that it was rather of purpoſe than for want ſo commaunded by the Great maſter: who hearing nothing of the comming of any aid, and ſeeing the enemie to giue dayly more fierce aſſaults, would not vainely ſpend his moſt neceſſarie helpes. The Turkes perceiuing what little good they had done with their often aſſaults, determined now to proone what might be done by vndermining the caſtle; and had almoſt brought one of their mines to perfection, be-D fore it was by the Chriſtians diſcouered: and to the intent they ſhould the leſſe marke it, they cauſed two gallies to come as neere as they could to the wals, and to batter that place, in hope that whileſt our men gazed vpon that was done openly, they ſhould the leſſe regard what they were working in ſecret, that ſo they might in the meane time more eaſily get into the caſtle. But the beſieged carefull of all that was to be cared for, perceiuing their purpoſe, with a counter-mine defeated their mine, & by the couragiouſnes of certain of their ſouldiors, but eſpecially of one ancient, draue out the enemie, who hauing caſt certaine pots of wild fire before him into the mine, and following preſently after with a piece of fireworke in his hand, forced them out. For which good ſeruice he was by the Great maſter rewarded with a chaine of gold of fiue pound weight: and becauſe of vertue ſpringeth vertue, which ſtill reſteth vpon difficulties, the next day,
E which was the firſt of Auguſt, the bridge which we ſaid the enemie had made ouer the ditch, was by a ſallie made by the defendants burnt downe with fire and gunpouder caſt vpon it: which was in good time done, for the next day, the Sunne now declining, the Turks againe aſſaying that part of the caſtle where Carolus Rufus had the charge, were by our men valiantly repulſed. This aſſault endured three houres, in which time three hundred of the Turks were there ſlaine; and of the knights Rufus himſelfe and Bareſus with certaine mercinarie ſouldiors. At this time the Chriſtians were by the enemie ſo ſhut in with the multitude of great ordinance, that they could not ſo much as look into the ditch or ſhew themſelues, much leſſe ſallie out, but they were by and by ſet off. Yet did they not for all that make ſpare of their liues, when occaſion was giuen them to performe any notable exploit: as appeared by Calderonius a Spaniard, who ſeeing ſome
F viewing that part of the wall, which the enemie had moſt battered and ſhaken at the caſtle bulwarke, doubted not to ſallie out, but was preſently taken with a bullet and ſlaine: which miſchance when it might ſeeme of right to haue terrified the reſt from attempting the like, did indeed the more incenſe them; ſo that when they ſaw the enemie exceeding buſie in filling the ditch, they, reſolutly ſet downe to offer themſelues to moſt aſſured death rather than to fall into the hands of the mercileſſe enemie, agreed to ſallie out by night, and to meet with his deſignes. G Whereupon an hundred, part knights, part other ſouldiours, ſallyng forth, cauſed the enemie to forſake the ditch and betake himſelfe to flight, of whom they ſlew about foureſcore, and loſt of their own ten men: amongſt whom were Ioannes and Manicrinus, two knights, whoſe heads the Turkes the next day ſet vp vpon two ſpeares vpon their trenches, that they might be ſeene by the Chriſtians.

The ſame day they of the citie of MELITA at night made at one inſtant a number of fires; and as if it were in triumph diſcharged great vollies of ſmall ſhot, with many other tokens of ioy: which as wel the beſieged as the Turks thought verily to haue bin done vpon the diſcouery of the Chriſtian fleet, or els the landing of ſuch forces as were come to remoue the ſiege; whereas indeed it was neither, but done onely to ſhew their cheerefulnes, and to keepe the Turkes in H ſuſpence with the noueltie of the matter: who for all that were not ſlacke in their buſines, but with earth filled vp the ditch at the caſtle bulwarke: whereby it came to paſſe, that they could not be hurt by the flankers, made in that place to ſcoure the ditch, but might therby as vpon plaine ground, without ſtay paſſe vnto the wall, now opened and ouerthrown with their continuall batterie, and vvith two great pieces (vvhich they had planted vpon a high mount, vvhich they had newly caſt vp on the right hand the bulwarke SAVOIA) they begun to play vpon the caſtle, and at the firſt ſhot, ſhot into the loupe where Franciſcus Caſtilia commaunded. Ioannes Bernardus Godinetius, a Spaniſh knight, was there ſlaine with a ſmall ſhot. The ſame day Franciſcus Aquilates, a Spaniard, one of the garriſon ſouldiors, perſuaded by feare & hope (in dangers I two euill counſellors) fled out of the towne S. Michael to the enemie; perſuading the Turks colonels to giue a freſh aſſault, aſſuring them that they ſhould without doubt win the towne, becauſe there was but foure hundred ſoldiors left aliue in it, and they (as he ſaid) almoſt ſpent with labour and wounds, all the reſt being dead. Which the Turks hearing, and ſeeing faire breaches both in the wals of the new citie and of the caſtle of S. Michael, vvide ynough for carts to go thorow, they determined vvith all their forces to aſſault both places at once, and to proue if there vvere yet ſo much ſtrength left in thoſe holds, as againe to repulſe them: ſo the ſeuenth day of Auguſt at one inſtant they aſſaulted the new citie at the caſtle bulwarke, and the caſtle S. Michael at the breach, vvith ſuch a multitude, that all the earth ſeemed to be couered with men round about. The thundering of the great ordinance, the noiſe of the ſmall ſhot, vvith the clattering of K armour, and noiſe of trumpets, drums, and other vvarlike inſtruments, vvith the crie of men on both ſides, vvas ſo confuſed and great, as if heauen and earth ſhould haue been confounded together. Which when the knights in the citie MELITA heard, and ſaw the heauens obſcured with ſmoake, fearing that the Turks (as at the caſtle S. Elmo) would neuer giue ouer the aſſault, vntil they had woon both the town and the caſtle; preſently all the garriſon horſmen iſſued out of the citie, and to auert the Turks from the aſſault, ſet vpon thoſe Turks which lay at AQVA MARTIA: who all ſurpriſed with a ſudden feare, fled, the Chriſtian horſemen hardly purſuing them vvith bloudie execution, and they in their fight piteouſly crying vpon their fellowes for help. Wherby it came to paſſe, that they which vvere aſſauling the citie & caſtle, to reſcue their diſcomfited fellowes, vvere glad to giue ouer the aſſault: ſo with great ſlaughter foiled on both L ſides by the Chriſtians, they returned to their trenches, when they had loſt about fifteene hundred at the aſſault, beſide them which vvere ſlain in the chaſe by by the horſemen of MELITA. Of the defendants of both places were loſt aboue a hundred, and almoſt as many wounded. This fight endured aboue fiue houres. Valetta deliuered of ſo great a danger, that day and certaine others cauſed publick prayers to be made, and went himſelfe with the multitude of the citizens to the church, to giue thanks to Almightie God for that victorie.

Whileſt theſe things were in doing, Garzias the Viceroy was aduertiſed from CALABRIA, that certain ſhips laded with men, victual, and other prouiſion neceſſarie for the wars, were comming from CONSTANTINOPLE to MALTA, wherfore he forthwith ſent Altamira and Gildandrada, two noblemen, with fiue gallies to meet them: who being come within thirtie miles of MALTA, met with no ſuch ſhips, but only one frigot and a galliot; the frigot they tooke, but the galliot eſcaped to the enemies fleet at MALTA. Muſtapha the Turkes Generall now thinking no man ſo ſtrong which might not vvith continuall labour and watching be wearied and ouercome, reſolued not to giue vnto the beſieged any time of reſt, but commaunded his ſouldiors againe to aſſault the breach at the caſtle of ſaint

He alſo ſent a galliot in haſt with letters to Solyman; wherein he ſhewed him the ſtate of the fleet, with what difficulties the armie was diſtreſſed, what ſmall hope there was of winning the places beſieged, how well the Chriſtians were prouided, with many other ſuch things. Muſtapha ſendeth a meſſenger to Solyman.

In the meane time thoſe two gallies of MALTA (which we haue before ſpoken of) departing from MESSANA, came to SYRACVSA, where they ſtayed a day. The next day after, in going out of the hauen, they met with one of MALTA in a ſmall boat comming from POZALO
B ſore wounded: he being demaunded how he vvas ſo hurt, told them, That landing by night with his boat and one companion, he was requeſted by two Sicilians which dwelt there, to reſt there that night, which they doing, about midnight fiue Turks brake into the houſe vpon them, killed his companion, carried away the Sicilians, and he wounded as he was, hardly eſcaped by the benefit of the night: moreouer he ſaid, That the Sicilians had told the Turkes, that two gallies were come into that port, vvith ſouldiours and other warlike prouiſion bound for MALTA. Whereby the knights perceiued, that their comming would be diſcouered vnto the enemie, and that it was a moſt dangerous thing, or rather impoſſible to get into the hauen of MALTA, as they had before purpoſed: neuertheleſſe, to conduct Salazar vvith his little boat, they kept on their courſe. But as they were ſailing, they deſcried two gallies and one galliot going before
C them, who ſeeing the gallies comming after them, made with all ſpeed to MALTA: and were no doubt thoſe gallies, from whence thoſe fiue Turks came, which had done thoſe things which the vvounded Malteſe reported. For all that, theſe gallies kept on their courſe as farre as POZALO, from whence they certified the Viceroy by letters, all that had happened: and not daring to put to ſea, the South vvind blowing vvith a ſtiffe gale againſt them, they returned backe againe to SYRACVSA, expecting there farther direction from the Viceroy. For vvhich cauſe, they forthwith ſent one of the knights to him to MESSANA; by whom they receiued anſwere, That they ſhould go no farther, but to ſtay for the comming of the whole fleet, ready in ſhort time to paſſe ouer to MALTA. But Salazar brought by the gallies to POZALO, reſolued with his little boat to go on: and although the day he departed thence, the aire was troubled with great wind, thun-
D der and raine, yet the dayes following prouing more calme, he in ſhort time arriued in the iſland of MALTA, and came in ſafetie to the citie MELITA; and there diſguiſed himſelfe in Turkiſh apparell, and taking vvith him one companion, who could alſo ſpeake the Turkiſh language, by night got into the enemies camp: where diligently marking all things, they perceiued that there was in all the Turks army of land ſoldiors ſcarce fourteen thouſand, and of them many wounded and ſick; and that the reſt was but an vnſeruiceable and feeble multitude, for that the courſe of wars had (as commonly it doth) conſumed their beſt ſouldiors. When they had thus vievved the campe, they returned againe to the citie; from whence Salazar with one Petrus Paccius a Spaniard, a venturous and valiant man, went to a certaine place neere vnto the vvatch towre of MALECA: vvhich when they had curiouſly viewed, Paccius was there left, that obſeruing the E ſignes from the Iſland of GAVLOS and the citie of MELITA; he might giue knowledge of all things to the Viceroy at his approach, as he was by Salazar inſtructed. As for Salazar himſelfe, he in his little boat (vvhich at his comming into the Iſle hee had there left) happily returned to MESSANA, and there declared vnto the Viceroy all that hee had ſeene: conſtantly affirming amongſt other things, That the Turks fleet was but weake, lame, and diſfurniſhed both of men and munition, farre vnable to encounter with 10000. Chriſtians. About which time alſo, one of the two frigots which were before ſent to MALTA, returned with another Spaniard, and a fugitiue from the Turkes campe: and foure gallies before gone from MESSANA, were alſo come in with foureteene Turks, taken about the iſland of MALTA, vvho all confirmed the ſame that was by Salazar reported: vvhich was, That the Turkes armie was with often aſſaults wonderfully
F weakened, both in number and ſtrength; ſo that they could not with ſtripes be enforced to the aſſault, for which the Baſſa had with his own hands ſlaine diuers of them: and that which more increaſed their feare, they ſaw none of their men wounded, but that they died thereof: Beſides that, they ſaw the Chriſtians with inuincible courage to defend their ſtrong places, and not to ſpend one ſhot in vaine: wherefore they were ſorie, and repented that they euer tooke in hand Salazar a Spaniſh captaine doth a ſpie entreth the Turkes campe.

The Turks mines defeated by the Chriſtians. two nights was bonght to perfection, and was afterwards a great helpe to the beſieged. The enemy in the meane time began a mine vnder the corner of the towne ditch, where Boninſegna
a Spaniard and a moſt valiant knight had the charge: which the beſieged perceiuing, by a countermine defeated the ſame. It happened in the meane time, that as a fugitiue was ſwimming to the towne, hee was taken by the enemy; which much grieued the beſieged, deſirous to haue vn-derſtood ſomething of the ſtate of the enemies campe, and of their purpoſes. Now when the former mine had taken ſo euill ſucceſſe, part of the Turkes aſſailed the caſtle S. Michael, and part with gunpowder thought to haue blowne vp the caſtle bulwarke: but by the carefulneſſe and courage of the defendants, all their attempts were diſappointed; for many of the Turks were in both places ſlaine, and certaine bags of pouder taken from them in the mine. With theſe and I other ſuch difficulties, Muſtapha and Piall the Turkes Generals diſappointed of their hope, conſulted with the other great captaines of the armie, Whether they ſhould there ſtill continue that deſperat ſiege, or depart? where moſt were cleere of opinion, That it was beſt betime to depart.
Yet for all that, the old Baſſa ſaid, He would there ſtay, vntill the galliot (which he had before ſent to CONSTANTINOPLE) were returned with anſwere from Solyman, and in the meane time both by force and pollicie to ſeeke after victorie: which thing he oftner did, than ſtood with the broken eſtate of his armie, or of the beſieged; neither reſting himſelfe nor ſuffering others to take reſt: for one while he battered the wals, another while he wrought mines or elſe made bridges; ſometime he caſt vp mounts, and then again filled the ditches; and euer and anon gaue one aſſault or another. In all which doing he vſed ſuch induſtry, that whatſoeuer he tooke K in hand, was in ſhort time brought to ſuch perfection as might haue carried a ſtronger place, had not the valour of the defendants far exceeded all his ſtrong and pollitike deuiſes.

Robles gouernor of the caſtle of S. Michael, ſlaine. It fortuned, that as Robles the camp-maſter, and Gouernour of the caſtle S. Michael, was by night viewing the ruines of the wall, he was ſtrucke in the head with a ſmall ſhot, and ſlaine; leauing behind him to his fellowes, the great deſire of himſelfe: for why, hee was a man for many his good parts (wherewith he had many times ſtood the defendants in great ſtead) worthily be-loued. In whoſe ſtead the Great maſter ſent one of the Colonels that was with himſelfe, a moſt expert and reſolute captaine, to take charge of S. Michaels caſtle; who by his vigilant care and prouidence ſo well diſcharged the charge committed vnto him, that as often as the Turkes at- L tempted the place, ſo often they were with loſſe repulſed.

The two gallies with the galliot, deſcried by the gallies of MALTA (as we haue before ſaid) told Piall Baſſa the Admirall, that the Chriſtian fleet was ready to come foorth: wherefore hee fearing the ſudden comming thereof, cauſed ſeuentie gallies to be in readineſſe; beſides which, fortie others lay in the hauen MARZA MOXET vnſeruiceable, as wanting both men and other equipage, for that was ſpent in making bridges, mines, and other ſuch things neceſſarie for the ſiege: as for the men, they were part with ſickneſſe, and part with often aſſaults conſumed.
Wherefore Piall for certaine dayes kept himſelfe by day in the port MAIOR neere the ſhoare, and by night put forth to ſea, expecting the comming of the fleet. But after long looking, when he ſaw no man appeare, he againe landed his ſouldiors: and becauſe at land the Baſſa began to want pouder, of euery thirtie barrels of pouder in euery gally, hee tooke out twentie, and of M ſome twentie fiue, or according to that proportion. After which time, the Turkes began with greater furie than at any time before, to batter the walls of both townes, eſpecially with thoſe great pieces which they call baſiliskes, whoſe ſhot of two hundred pound waight was ſeauen hands about; whereby the wals of the caſtle of S. Michael were beaten flat. And at the ſame time,

A time,the Baſſa at the caſtle S. Angelo,had with continuall batterie ſo ſhaken the caſtle bulwarke, that it was almoſt fallen quite downe. Theſe breaches thus made, when the Turkes ſaw both townes bared of wals and other defendants,and laid ſo open, that nothing ſeemed now to let them to looke vpon their enemies,they made no longer ſtay, but the eighteenth day of Auguſt (the ſunne being now at the higheſt) with all their power fiercely aſſaulted both the townes. Thriſe they were repulſed,and ſtill came on a freſh; yet at length beaten downe on euery ſide with greater ſlaughter, they were glad ſhamefully to giue ouer the aſſault,and againe to retire to their trenches. In this moſt cruell fight (which endured fiue houres) the inuincible courage of the Great maſter notably appeared,who armed with a pike in his hand,and dreadful to behold, was ſtill valiantly fighting in the face of the breach,whoſe preſence encouraged not the ſoldiors
B only, but euen boies and women to fight: For ſo it is,that men are more mooued with example than with words. Yet of the great number of the Turks,part ſtood ſtill in the towne ditch; and to ſaue themſelues from the ſhot of the caſtle bulwarke,had with wonderfull celeritie caſt vp a defence of earth,fagots,and other like matter, which they did of purpoſe to approach and to vndermine the wals,and had therefore incloſed the ſpace of fifteene elnes: which when the beſieged perceiued,they bent certain pieces of artillerie vpon it,and ſlew many of them,and with fire conſumed what was left. The next day the aſſault was at the ſame places by the enemie renewed,who by reaſon of his number of ſouldiors might eaſily ſend freſh men in ſtead of them which vvere vvounded or vveary: and firſt, after their vvonted manner they battered both the C townes all that day vntill night; afterwards,the moone ariſing,about midnight vvith a horrible crie they began a moſt terrible aſſault,which at the firſt much troubled the Chriſtians, who yet ſtill mindfull of their wonted valour,did ſo much with their weapons and fire-workes, that the enemie euill intreated,was glad after three houres fight to retire to his trenches. The ſame day a mine was by the defendants perceiued,at the caſtle bulwarke,wherein a hundred Turkes there found,were almoſt all ſlaine,and the mine deſtroyed. Yet for all this did not the enemie reſt at all,but the next day ſeauen times aſſaulted the ſame breaches,vſing now not weapons only,but fire-works alſo; wherewith Boſninſegna had his face ſo burnt,that he loſt one of his eyes. At the ſame time alſo,the Turks at a place called the Spvr, laboured mightily to haue gotten into the caſtle: where Centius a knight of an inuincible courage, got vp vpon the rampier, and with a D pike couragiouſly thruſt them downe that were climing vp, and thruſting thorow one,diſcouraged the reſt; but was himſelfe wounded in the arme with a ſmall ſhot: Yet when he had a little vvithdrawn himſelfe to haue his wound bound vp,he came againe to the rampier,and neuer departed from the fight,vntill he had(as a valiant conquerour)preſerued the place. So the Turks with great ſlaughter on euery ſide repulſed, left the victorie to the Chriſtians, of whom vvere ſlaine almoſt an hundred,and moſt of them (as at other times)with ſhot: amongſt whom vvere theſe moſt valiant knights at the caſtle Angelo, Fragus,at the caſtle of S. Michael, Scipio Piatus, Ioh. Baptiſta Soderinus, Paulus Bomportus, Marius Fagianus, Ruffinus,and certaine others,men worthie of longer life. The Turks had alſo at the ſame time wrought a mine at the caſtle S. Michael,which vvas at once both diſcouered and deſtroied.

The Turkes at once aſſaile the townes S. Angelo and S. Michael, and are at both places repulſed.

Another aſſault.

E With theſe ſo many and ſo great aſſaults,certain of the knights(and thoſe not of the meaneſt ſort) fearing leſt that which was ſo often attempted by the enemie, ſhould at length be effected; told the Great maſter, That they thought it conuenient and neceſſarie, to remooue all the records,all the pictures and reliques of the Saints, and other their religious things into the caſtle S. Angelo, there to be kept as in a place of more ſtrength and aſſurance. The Great maſter, although he well knew that they which thus ſaid,ſpake it of a good mind, was for all that vvith that ſpeech exceedingly moued: wherfore he ſhortly anſwered them, That ſo to doe,were nothing elſe but to applauſe and diſcourage the minds,not of the Malteſes onely,who had hitherto valiantly behaued themſelues,and done more than any man could haue hoped for; but alſo of the mercenarie ſouldiors,if they ſhould perceiue it: wherefore he was reſolued, either together to keep all,or loſe all;and becauſe none ſhould from thenceforth repoſe any hope in the ſtrength
F of the caſtle S. Angelo, he ſaid he would bring all the garriſon out of the caſtle into the towne, that there they might together with others withſtand the enemie; and that he would leaue in the caſtle none but gunners,who ſhould as need required ſhoot at the enemie. An anſwer truly wel beſeeming a man of his place,and to be to all poſteritie commended: for how can the ſouldior hope,which ſeeth his captain deſpaire? or aduenture,where the chieftain ſeemeth to be ſtrucken with feare? Whileſt the Graund maſter with this anſwere doth both aſhame them and alſo encourage their quailing minds; the Turks (that this day as the other three before ſhould not paſſe without aſſault) with the dawning of the day aſſailed the very ſame places with the greateſt furie poſſible, eſpecially at the ruines of the caſtle: where San Romanus an Auergnois, which had the charge of that place, loſt this ſhort and tranſitorie life, winning thereby immortall fame: and at S. Michaels, Adurnius one of the knights, and Fagio, with certaine others, were grieuouſly wounded: for the enemy ſuddenly retiring from the aſſault, preſently ſo thundred into the breaches vvith their great and ſmall ſhot, that all the iſland ſeemed to tremble, the heauens to burne, and the aire to be darkened vvith ſmoke. In the meane time Valetta thorowly wearied with the mornings fight, had withdrawne himſelfe a little to breath himſelfe: vvhen ſuddenly a Spaniſh prieſt, vvith his hands caſt vp to heauen, came running to him, roaring and crying out, That all vvas loſt and forlorne, and that three or foure enſignes of the enemies were by the caſtle breach broken into the towne. Which the Great maſter hearing, ſuddenly clapt his helmet vpon his head, and vvith a pike in his hand, ſaid vnto them that vvere about him: Loe fellow ſouldiors, the houre is come wherein you may ſhew your ſelues the moſt valiant champions of the Chriſtian religion, if it be ſo, that you now alſo retaine the ſame valour which you haue in other battels ſhewed. There is no cauſe wherefore you ſhould doubt of this laſt, for the enemie is the ſame; and the ſame God which hath hitherto preſerued vs, will not now forſake vs: wherefore follow me valiant hearts. This ſaid, he haſted to the place where moſt danger was, and with him all the ſouldiors, all the citiſens, men and vvomen, old and yong, yea the very children, all againſt the common enemy. There was fought a moſt dreadful & dangerous battell: ſome kept the enemy from entring, ſome ſet vpon thē that were already entred, whom they wounded, chaſed, and ſlew, although they notably reſiſted. Within, without, all was couered with darts, weapons, dead bodies, & blood. The great maſter was carefull of all, and in euery place preſent, commending, exhorting, directing, as occaſion required, performing at once all the duties of a moſt valiant ſouldior and worthy Generall. At length the Turks with the ſetting of the ſunne retired, and ſo the aſſault ceaſed. Thus was the Great maſter the vndoubted victor, but not without much bloud of his people, conſidering his ſmal number: for in this fight he loſt aboue 200 men, wheras of the enemies, beſide them which vvere entred, whereof not one eſcaped, were ſlaine aboue 2000. Theſe are thoſe foure terrible aſſaults, preſently giuen one after another vnto the beſieged.

Garzias the Viceroy in the meane tarried for nothing elſe to tranſport his armie to MALTA, but for the comming of Io. Cardona, who vvith twelue gallies vvas gone to PANORMO, to conduct thence foure ſhips laded with prouiſion: but vvhen he ſaw him ſtay long, he ſent to him in poſt, That if he could not with ſuch ſpeed as was required tow forth thoſe ſhips, he ſhould ſpend no longer time, but take out the prouiſion into his gallies, and with ſpeed to come away. So the Viceroy with a fleet of threeſcore & twelue gallies the twentith day of Auguſt ſet forward from MESSANA to SIRACVSA, wherein he carried ten thouſand ſelect ſouldiors, amongſt whom vvere aboue two hundred knights of the Order of S. Iohn, and about fortie of the Order of S. Stephen, which is an Order of knights inſtituted by Coſmos Medices, duke of FLORENCE, to the imitation of the knights of MALTA in the yeare 1561, and haue their reſidence at COSMOPOLIS, an new built citie in the iſland of ELBA in the Tuſcane ſea, ouer againſt PIOMBINO. Beſides theſe knights in this fleet vvere diuers noble and valiant gentlemen of ITALIE, SICILIE, and other countries. The fleet being arriued at SIRACVSA, the Viceroy ſent Auria with one gallie and a boat to MALTA, to land a man, to know of Paccius (left, as we haue before ſaid, for a watch in the iſland at MALECA) what newes, or what he had ſeene. By whom it was vnderſtood, That no ſhip was ſeene at ſea, but one galliot, which the one and twentith day of Auguſt in the morning made towards GAVLOS, and the ſame day towards night as he was informed by the watchmen of MALECA, ſixteene gallies came to water at SALINE, but what became of them afterwards, by reaſon of the comming on of the night could not be deſcried.

In this vvhile the beſieged had notably repaired the breach at the caſtle bulwarke, and had in ſundry places aptly placed certaine great pieces to flanker the ditches, & to beat the mount caſt vp by the enemy at the bulwarke of BONINSEGNA, that they might from thence annoy all the plaine of the caſtle with their ſmall ſhot. But the Turks hauing determined with all their forces at once to aſſault both the townes as before, brought an engine made of ſpars and boords, able to couer thirtie men, vnder the breach at S. Michaels: whereby it came to paſſe, that none of the defen-

A defendants could without danger ſhew themſelues in the breach: which when they could by no meanes endure, they ſuddenly ſallied out, and putting them to flight which were there couered, ſet fire on the engine and burnt it. In like manner, they which beſieged the new citie, were repulſed at the caſtle breach, and another like engine burnt. The next night certaine of the watch of the caſtle iſſued out, and hauing deſtroyed the Turkes engines prepared for the aſſayling of that place, and ſlaine them that were ſet for the keeping therof, returned in ſafetie into the caſtle. But vvhen the enemies both that day and others following reſted not, but repairing their mines, mounts, and engines, laboured in both places to haue beaten the Chriſtians from the wals; all their endeuour and labour was by the induſtry and valor of the defendants made fruſtrate. The beſieged had at the caſtle breach made a mine, and laid in it eight barrels of pouder, that if the B enemy ſhould againe aſſault that place, he might there be blown vp: but whileſt the Turks were for like purpoſe working a mine in the ſame place, they chaunced vpon the mine before made, which they ſpoiled, and carried away all the pouder. Thus whileſt they labour both on the one ſide and the other, Muſtapha the Generall, a moſt expert and famous commaunder, conſidering that Summer now ſo farre ſpent, he was not to vſe longer delay; and withall, that reſolute perſeuerance oftentimes in vvarre findeth out a way to victory; determined with all his power once againe to aſſault the caſtle S. Michael. Wherefore diſplaying the ſtately ſtanderd of the Turkiſh emperour, vpon the point whereof was faſtened a globe of gold, he commanded his ſouldiors to enter the breach; vvho now like deſperat men attempted to haue performed his command, and were by the Chriſtians valiantly encountred: ſo that in the breach was made a moſt terrible and C doubtfull fight. But when the Turkes had now been twice reiected and beaten downe, Muſtapha perceiuing his ſouldiors as men halfe diſcouraged but faintly to maintaine the aſſault, came himſelfe to the places, praying and exhorting them not to be diſcouraged, but that day to confirme their former labours and victories, and not to ſuffer their vanquiſhed enemies to triumph ouer them: he told them that the enemy had now no defence left wherewith to couer himſelfe, that all was beaten downe flat, and that there remained onely a few wearie and maimed bodies, which were not able long to endure the edge of their ſwords; that with ſuch reſolution they had before woon the caſtle S. Elmo: laſt of all he by promiſing to ſome money, to ſome honour, and preferment, threatning ſome, and requeſting others, encouraged ſome one way, ſome another, euery one according to his qualitie and diſpoſition: who mooued either with their Gene- D rals preſence, promiſes, or threats, gaue a freſh and fierce aſſault. The fight was on both ſides terrible, yet at length the Turkes vvere againe enforced to retire: for the defendants had caſt vp a rampier, vvhereon they had fitly placed two field pieces, wherewith they ſore troubled the enemie, and at the firſt ſhot ſtrucke in ſunder one of thoſe wooden engines, which the enemie had made ſtronger than the reſt, couered with raw hides to keepe it from burning, and rent in pieces fortie ſoldiors which were vnder it: and the ſame night they which were in the other town & the caſtle bulwark, ſallying couragiouſly out, deſtroied all the enemies defences, & draue them from a mount, which they had made vpon the fortifications of the Chriſtians: wherby they perceiued plainly, what ſmall courage the Turks had to fight, for vpon that mount they were almoſt three hundred, wheras of our men was but fiue & twentie; with which ſmall number for all that they E had no mind to deale. The defendants had for like purpoſe as before made another mine at the caſtle bulwarke, but perceiuing that it was in danger to be found by the enemy in repairing his fortifications without, they ſuddenly put fire vnto it, by force wherof threeſcore Turkes which were within the danger of the place, were blowne vp and ſlaine.

Garzias the Viceroy, in the meane while that theſe things were in doing, departing with his fleet from SYRACVSA, with a proſperous wind kept on his courſe toward PACHYNVM, vvhere they deſcried a tall ſhip at ſea, driuen thither (as was afterward knowne) by tempeſt: ſhe out of the iſland MENING was carrying a great ſupply of ſhot and pouder vnto the Turkes campe at MALTA; but now ouertaken by the Chriſtian fleet, eaſily yeelded, and was by the Viceroy ſent by other marriners to SYRACVSA. And now the Chriſtian fleet caried with a faire gale towards F MALTA, ſuddenly aroſe ſuch a tempeſt from the Eaſt, that they were driuen to the iſland ÆGVSA, two hundred and twentie miles Weſt of MALTA, from whence the firſt of September letters were brought from the Viceroy to the Great maſter, certifying him, That he would in ſhort time come with his fleet and relieue him. The ſame day alſo a Chriſtian fled out of the Turkes gallies, wherein he was captiue, to the citie S. Angelo; vvho reported, That in the Turkes campe vvere were few men able to fight, moſt of the armie being with wounds, famine, ſickeneſſe, and other miſeries brought to extreme weakeneſſe: and beſides that, that infinite numbers of them died daily: yet for all that he ſaid moreouer, that they were determined to beſiege the citie of MELITA, and had already for that purpoſe mounted fiue great pieces of artillery for batterie; and that they had but a few dayes before taken twelue, & the laſt day of all fourteen horſmen of the garriſon ſoldiors of that citie. In the meane while the fleet which was driuen (as we ſaid) to ÆOVSA, the rage of the ſea being now well appeaſed, came to DREPANVM, and from thence toward GAVLOS, as was before intended: where by the way the two gallies of MALTA light vpon two of the Turkes galliots, and tooke them. G

The fift day of September the Chriſtian fleet came to GAVLOS, where the Viceroy perceiuing not the appointed ſignes from MALTA, whereby he might ſafely land, returned forthwith backe againe to POZALO, whether Auria immediatly following him, told him, That he had ſeen the ſignes, and aſſured him of ſafe landing in the iſland of MALTA: wherewith the Viceroy encouraged, the next day towards night returned againe to GAVLOS. H

A fugitiue diſcouereth the enemies purpoſes to the Great maſter.

The ſame day a Chriſtian captiue fled from the Turks to S. Angelo, and told the Great maſter, That he was come to bring him good newes, how that the Turkes had determined to prooue their laſt fortune in aſſaulting the caſtle S. Michael, which they would doe the next day: where if the ſucceſſe were anſwerable to their deſire, they would then tarrie, but if not, then forthwith be gone: and that Muſtapha the more to encourage his ſouldiors, had promiſed fiue talents of gold to the enſignebearers, that ſhould firſt aduance their enſignes vpon the wals, and farther to promote them to greater places of honor; as for the reſt, he would reward euery one of them according to their deſert, either with money or preferment. Valetta thinking all theſe things to be by Gods appointment diſcouered vnto him by ſuch men, as they had from time to time bene: firſt gaue thankes vnto Almightie God, and after that with all diligence prepared ſuch things as he thought moſt neceſſary for the repulſing of the enemy. But the Turks all that day with their great ordinance battered the new city, and the ſhipping in the hauen, in ſuch ſort that one of the great ſhips was there ſunke. I

In the morning Garzias the Viceroy with his fleet arriued at the iſland of MALTA, and there quickly and quietly landed his forces, and whileſt his gallies watered at GAVLOS, went forward with the armie about halfe a mile, inſtructing the Generals and Colonels what he thought needfull to be done, commaunding all proclamations and commaunds to bee made in the name of the king of SPAINE, vntill they came to the Great maſter, and then in all things to obey him as their ſoueraign: and charged Aſcanius Cornia the Generall in all his actions to follow the counſell of the greater part. So in few words exhorting them to play the men, he left them marching towards MELITA. About noone he retired to his gallies, and ſayling Eaſtward, came with all his fleet within the ſight of the citie of MELITA, about three miles diſtant from the South ſhore. They of the citie vpon ſight of the fleet, in token of joy diſcharged all the great artillerie, which was anſwered from the fleet, by diſcharging all their great ordinance twice. After that he returned as he had before determined into SICILIA, to take into his gallies the duke of VRBINS companies, which were come to MESSANA, and certaine bands of Spaniards at SYRACVSA, and ſo forthwith to returne to MALTA, to attend the departing of the Turks fleet, being now euill appointed, and already as good as halfe ouerthrowne. K L

The Turks, who (as is before ſaid) had purpoſed to proue their laſt fortune vpon the towne of S. Michael, had now certaine dayes before the comming of the fleet, begun to truſſe vp their baggage: but as ſoon as they heard that the fleet was come, and the army landed, there ſuddenly aroſe a wonderfull tumultuous confuſion amongſt them, ſome cried arme, arme, and otherſome as faſt to be gone: and being generally all afraid, euery one according to his diſpoſition, betooke himſelfe to his weapons or to his heeles; the greateſt number thruſt together into their trenches, as neere as they could vnto the great ordinance: and ſo burning the engines and fortifications, with all the ſpeed they could embarked their great ordinance and baggage. Which they in the town of S. Angelo perceiuing, not expecting the commandement of the Great maſter in ſo ſudden an opportunitie couragiouſly ſallied out to BVRMOLA, where certaine Turkes kept a huge great peece of ordinance; who now hauing no mind to fight, betooke themſelues to flight, and forſooke the peece, which they of the town preſently drew within their walls. And if the newcome forces had that day charged the enemy as they diſordery ran to their gallies, happily M

A pily they had either found an occasion of victorie, or at leastwise taken from thē the greatest part of their artillerie. But it may be, that they followed the old militarie saying, That vnto the flying enemie a man should make a bridge of siluer. Besides that, they thinking it not conuenient to depart from the prouision and things which they had brought for the relieſe of the beſieged; which for the roughneſſe of the way and want of horſes were hardly caried, would not prouoke the enemie with any skirmiſh: whereby it came to paſſe, that the Turks without let imbarked their great ordinance, their baggage, and moſt part of their armie. The eleuenth of September, whileſt the Turks fleet was brought out of the hauen MARZA MOXET, a fugitiue of GENOVA came in haſt to the Great maſter, and told him that ten thouſand Turks were marching towards MELITA, to meet with the Chriſtians vpon the way. Which thing the Great maſter hearing, pre-
B ſently ſent a ſufficient number of good ſouldiors to the caſtle S. Elmo, there to ſet vp one of the enſignes of the ſacred Order: who comming thither, found there foure and twentie great pieces, ſome for batterie, ſome for the field, which they could not in ſo great haſt remoue thence.

The Turkes fleet departing out of the hauen MARZA MOXET to the port S. Paule, there landed ſeuen thouſand men, with Muſtapha their Generall, who was falſely informed, That the Chriſtians were not aboue three thouſand ſtrong: and from thence, encouraged with the ſmall number of the enemie (as they ſuppoſed) they marched directly toward MELITA. The Chriſtians alſo marching orderly and readie to giue battell, held on their way to meet them: and at the riſing of an hill both armies meeting together, they gaue a great ſhout, and withall the formoſt began the battell, where ſome few were at the firſt ſlaine on both ſides. But the Chriſtians ſtill
C growing vpon them both in number and ſtrength, the Turkes finding themſelues ouercharged, fled, the Chriſtians purſuing them and killing them vntill they came to their gallies; where in ſtriuing who ſhould get in firſt, about foure hundred of them were drowned in the ſea, beſides eighteene hundred ſlaine in the battell at land: and had the Chriſtian ſouldiors well knowne the countrie, they had ſlaine them euery mothers ſonne. The Turkes thus driuen to their gallies, lay there in the hauen all the next day, and moſt part of the night following: but a little before day vpon the ſhooting off of a great piece, the ſigne of their departure, they all hoiſed ſaile for GRECIA, leauing the iſland of MALTA ſore impoueriſhed and waſted. In this ſiege the Turkes loſt about foure and twentie thouſand, whereof moſt part were of their beſt ſouldiors: and of the Chriſtians were ſlaine about fiue thouſand, beſides two hundred and fortie knights of the Order,
D men of diuers nations, but all worthie eternall fame, whoſe dead bodies the Great maſter cauſed to be honourably buried. The Turkes in their batterie during the ſiege, ſpent as is accounted threeſcore and eighteene thouſand great ſhot.

The Turkes ouerthrowen by the Chriſtians, flie to their gallies.

If a man do well conſider the difficulties and dangers the beſieged paſſed thorow in this fiue months ſiege, the manifold labours and perils they endured in ſo many and ſo terrible aſſaults, the ſmall reliefe to them ſent in ſo great diſtreſſe, with the deſperat obſtinacie of ſo puiſſant an enemie; he ſhall hardly find any place theſe many yeres more mightily impugned, or with greater valour and reſolution defended. The late beſieged, and now victorious prince, honourably acquitted of ſo great an enemie, firſt commanded publike prayers with thankſgiuing to be made vnto the giuer of all victorie: after that, he rewarded the valiant, commended the reſt, and gaue
E thanks to all; he charitably relieued the ſick and wounded, bewailed the ſpoile of the iſland, and carefully prouided for the repairing of the breaches and places battered: and yet in all this doing, diligently enquired after the enemies courſe and purpoſe, and was not in any thing remiſſe or ſecure, as in victorie moſt men are. But becauſe ſo great harms could not without great helps in ſhort time be repaired, and the returne of the proud enemie, not without cauſe the next yere feared: he by letters to diuers great princes, and eſpecially to the grand priors of the Order, in diuers countries, requeſted helpe; amongſt whom George, grand prior of GERMANIE, and founder of the caſtle of S. Elmo, was one of the chiefeſt. The coppie of which letters, becauſe they briefly containe what we haue before in this hiſtorie at large written, I haue thought good here to ſet downe, that the ſame may in ſuch order be read, as it was by the Great maſter himſele re-

Brother Valetta, Maſter of the hoſpitall of Ieruſalem, to the reuerend and religious our welbeloued brother in Chriſt, George of Hohenheim, called Bombaſt, prior of our priorie in Almainie, greeting. G

The letters of the great maſter to the grand prior of Almaine, concerning the manner of the Turks proceedings in the ſiege of Malta.

Although we doubt not but that by the letters and relation of many, you alreadie vnderſtand of the comming of the Turkes to inuade theſe Iſlands, or rather vtterly to ſubuert our ſocietie: and the happily and heauenly victorie by vs obtained of it. Yet if the ſame things ſhall by our letters alſo bee brought vnto you, wee haue thought the ſame will bee vnto you a thing much more pleaſing. For ſeeing that wee are certainely perſuaded, that you in this no leſſe happie than wholeſome ſucceſſe will giue H moſt heartie thankes to Almightie God, and that the fruit of this good ſhall moſt of all redound vnto you, for the honour which you beare in our Order; wee haue willingly determined to participate this our ioy with you, and plainely and openly to proteſt, That we attribute this ſo notable and wonderfull a victorie to our Lord Chriſt Ieſus, the greateſt king of all kings, and author of all good things. Which that you may the more worthely and willingly doe, wee will declare the whole matter, not at large (for that were to write an hiſtorie) but briefely and in few words. Sultan Solyman the moſt mortall enemie of the Chriſtian name, and eſpecially of our ſocietie, not contented to haue ſpoiled vs of the moſt famous Iſland of the Rhodes, the caſtle of Tripolis, and almoſt whatſoeuer we had els; commaunded a great and ſtrong fleet to be made readie againſt vs, which departing from Constantinople the one and twentieth I day of March, arriued here the eighteenth day of May: which fleet conſiſted of almoſt two hundred and fiftie galleis, galliots and other ſhips. The number of the enemie that bare armes according to the trueth, was about fortie thouſand, more or leſſe: Generall of the land forces, was Muſtapha Baſſa; and of the fleet Piall Baſſa was Admirall: who hauing ſpent a few daies in landing their forces, viewing the places, pitching their tents, and ſetting things in order (as the manner of warre is) they began firſt to aſſaile the caſtle of S. Elmo (ſituat in the mouth of the hauen) with great force, and a moſt furious batterie. Which when they had many daies done without intermiſsion, and had opened a great part of the wall, and with all kind of weapons aſſaulted the breach: yet was it by the valour and proweſſe of our knights and other worthie ſouldiours kept and defended by the ſpace of thirtie fiue daies, with the great loſſe and ſlaughter of the enemie: although the caſtle it ſelfe, in the iudgement of many, ſeemed not poſsible to bee K but a few daies defended againſt ſo great a force. At length the foure and twentieth day of June, when our men could no longer endure the multitude and furie of the enemie, enuironed and ſhut vp both by ſea and land, and deſtitute of all helpe, the caſtle was taken by the Turkes; thoſe few of our men which were left, being all ſlaine. Of which victorie they being proud, began to beſiege the caſtle and towne of S. Michaell, and this new citie, eſpecially at the caſtle and Portingall bulwarke: and (as their manner is) with great diligence and greater force and number of great artillerie and warlike engines, the began in diuers places at once to batter and beate downe the wals. Which ſiege the dreadfull armie of the Turks, by ſea and land, made to be moſt fearefull and terrible, with ſuch huge great ordinance as the like for bigneſſe and force was in no place to bee ſeene; day and night thundring out their yron and ſtone ſhot, fiue, and ſeuen hands about; wherewith not the thickeſt wals, but euen the verie mountaines themſelues might haue beene beaten downe and ouerthrowne: by furie whereof, the wals in many places were L ſo battered, that a man might eaſily haue entered as on plaine ground. Where, when the barbarous enemies had with wonderfull force and hideous outcries oftentimes attempted to enter, ſo often were they with great ſlaughter and diſhonour repulſed and beaten backe, many of their men ſlaine or wounded. Their Generals, as well at ſea as land, after that they had in ſo many places, with all their forces in almoſt foure moneths ſiege and aſſault, with exceeding furie in vaine attempted the breaches, and loſt the greateſt part of their old ſouldiours, eſpecially Winter now comming on, wherein all wars by law of nations ought to ceaſe; thought of nothing elſe but of departure, or rather of flight: which the comming of Garzias of Toledo, Viceroy of Sicilia, and Admirall of the king of Spaine his fleet, with ten thouſand ſelect ſouldiours (amongſt whom was at the leaſt two hundred and foureteene of our knights, and many other noble and valiant gentlemen; which onely with a Chriſtian zeale, vo- M luntarily met together from diuers parts of the World to helpe and relieue vs) cauſed them to haſten. So haue you ſummarily and in few words, the proceedings and flight of the Turkes fleet, and the victorie by vs (by the power of God) thereof obtained. It ſhall bee your part to conſider and coniecture, in what

A ſtate our Order and this iſland now ſtandeth, into what poore eſtate we are brought, how many things we want; wherein except we be relieued by the helpe and aid of our brethren, eſpecially ſuch as you are, as we well hope and aſſuredly beliene we ſhall, our ſtate will quickly take end. Fare you well from MALTA the ninth of October 1565.

The Great maſter thus deliuered of ſo great a ſiege, and bountifully relieued by the Chriſtian princes, and the great commenders of his Order; ſpeedily repaired the breaches and places battered, and with new fortifications ſtrengthened ſuch places as he had by the late paſſed dangers perceiued to be moſt ſubiect to the enemies force.

After the returne of the Turks fleet to CONSTANTINOPLE, Solyman being exceeding an- 1566
B grie with the Gouernor of the Iſland of CHIOS his tributarie, as well for that he had during the late ſiege of MALTA, had intelligence with the Great maſter, and reuealed vnto him many of the Turks deſignes; as alſo for detaining of two years tribute, which vvas yearely ten thouſand duckats; and had alſo neglected to ſend his wonted preſents to the great Baſſaes, who therefore the more incenſed, the tyrant commanded Piall Baſſa his Admirall to make readie his fleet, and by force or policie, to take that fruitfull and pleaſant Iſland wholly into his owne hand. Who without delay, with a fleet of eightie gallies, the fifteenth day of Aprill in the yeare 1566, being then Eaſterday, arriued at CHIOS. The chiefe men of the Iſland, vpon ſight of the fleet, forthwith ſent embaſſadours to the Baſſa with preſents, courteouſly offering vnto him the hauen, and whatſoeuer elſe he ſhould require. Piall with great kindneſſe accepted their offer, and preſently
C poſſeſſed himſelfe of the hauen in three places: and afterward landing, ſent for the Gouernor of the citie, and twelue of the chief citiſens to come vnto him, as if he had had ſome ſpeciall matter to confer with him about from the great Sultan, before his departure thence for MALTA or ITALIE. Who hauing a little conferred togither, went to him vvith great feare; and that not vvithout cauſe, for as ſoone as they were come before him, he commanded them to be laid hold vpon and caſt faſt into yrons: which done, the ſouldiors forthwith tooke the town hall, and vvithout reſiſtance pulling downe the townsenſigne (vvherin was the picture of S. George vvith a red croſſe) in ſtead therof ſet vp one of the Turks: the like vvherof vvas done with the great reioicing of the Turks, thorow the vvhole Iſland. After that, they riſled the Churches, and againe conſecrated them after their Mahometane manner. The Gouernour of the citie and the Sena-
D tours with their families, the Baſſa ſent in fiue ſhips to CONSTANTINOPLE: as for the vulgar people, they were at choice, either there to tarrie ſtill, or depart, as beſt ſtood vvith their liking. And ſo the Baſſa, when he had there placed a new Gouernour, one of the Turks, with a ſtrong garriſon, and ſet vp the Mahometane ſuperſtion in that moſt fertile Iſland, departed thence for ITALIE: vvhere ſayling alongſt the coaſt of APVLIA, he did exceeding much harme in burning and deſtroying the countrie villages, and carrying away of the poore people into captiuitie; and ſo returned.

At this time, the kingdome of HVNGARIE was moſt miſerably rent in pieces by the lieutenants and captaines of Solyman, and Maximilian the emperour, and Iohn the Vayuod of TRANSILVANIA, Solymans vaſſall: who grieued with the harmes done vnto him by the emperours
E captaines, whereof himſelfe was the cauſe, and vainely hoping to haue obtained at Solymans hands the greateſt part of the kindome of HVNGARIE, as had ſometime king Iohn; ceaſed not continually to ſolicite him to come himſelfe in perſon to make a full conqueſt of the reliques of HVNGARIE, yet holden by the emperour, and ſome of the Hungarian nobilitie: And flattering himſelfe in that vaine hope, called himſelfe the king of HVNGARIE, and increaſing his ſtrength by letters vnto the nobilitie and burgeſſes of the cities of HVNGARIE, ſummoned them, as if it had bin by the appointment of Solyman his great patron, that they ſhould all the ninth of March meet together at THORDA, to determine with him of matters concerning their common good. Which thing, as ſoone as Lazarus Suendi the emperours lieutenant vnderſtood, he foorthwith by other letters countermanded thoſe of the Vayuods; perſuading the Hungarians, not to liſten
F to the charmes of the Vayuod and the Turke, tending to their deſtruction, but rather to yeeld their obedience to Maximilian the Chriſtian emperour, whoſe purpoſe was by the aid of the Chriſtian princes, to protect and preſerue them in peace. And hereby it came to paſſe, that the remainders of this ſore ſhaken kingdom, deuided into factions, and diuerſly carried, according to their affection, ſome to the one ſide, ſome to the other, began afreſh to worke one anothers confusion, which fitly serued the Turkes to incroach more and more vpon them: Who at the same time surprised the towne of AINATSCH (the captaine thereof with certaine of the garrison souldiors being gone about their businesse to AGRIA) and put to the sword all them that they found in the towne. They thought also to haue taken the strong towne of SIGETH, but were by the valiant countie Nicholaus Serinus Gouernour thereof, couragiously encountred; and after foure houres hard fight, ouerthrowne and put to flight. Not long after, they ranged vp and downe the countrie, and set in booties as far as IVLA and RAB, and did the countrie people much harme. For which cause, Maximilian the emperour about the latter end of May brake vp the assemblie of the empire then holden at AVGVSTA, and began carefully to prouide things needfull for the warre: appointing his captaines for the raising of such forces in GERMANIE, as were but a little before granted vnto him by the princes and states of the empire, in their late assemblie; but went himselfe to VIENNA. For it was told him (as the truth was) That Solyman now in his extreame age, was with a mightie armie set forward from CONSTANTINOPLE, and marching thorow BVLGARIA and SERVIA, was come directly to BELGRADE: where Iohn the Vayuod of TRANSILVANIA met him, and kissing his hand, had commended himselfe and all his state vnto his protection. At which time, Suendi the emperours lieutenant, laid hard siege to the towne of HYSTH in the borders of TRANSILVANIA. The Bassa of BVDA at the same time on the other side, by commaundment of Solyman, with eight thousand Turks and fiue and twentie pieces of great ordinance besieging PALOTTA, a strong towne about eight miles from RAB, had with continuall batterie by the space of eight daies, brought the same into great danger, although it was valiantly defended by George Thuriger. But hearing of the approach of George countie of Helffenstein, sent by the emperour with certaine companies of Germans to relieue the same, he rose in such hast from the siege, that he left certain of his great ordinance and a great part of his baggage behind him, and retired towards ALBA REGALIS. The countie hauing relieued the towne, caused the breaches to be forthwith repaired, and with a new supplie strengthened the old garrison. Thus was a most lamentable warre at once begun in diuers places of HVNGARIE. After that, the countie of Helffenstein, strengthened by the comming of countie Salma with certaine companies from RAB, departed from PALOTTA, and came to VESPRINIVM, a citie about two miles off, then holden by the Turks: which citie he tooke by force the last of Iune, and left not a Turke aliue therin, because that they a few daies before, had cruelly slaine certaine Christians whom they had taken prisoners: so leauing strong garrisons both in VESPRINIVM and PALOTTA, they returned to RAB. Shortly after, the countie Salma laied siege to TATTA a strong towne, otherwise called DOTIS, betwixt RAB and COMARA, which at length he tooke by assault the eight and twentieth day of Iuly, and slew all the Turks, except fiftie, which flying into one of the towers of the castle, yeelded vpon composition; amongst whom was the late Gouernour of VESPRINIVM, and the Gouernour of this place, with the Bassa of BVDA his nigh kinsman, who were all presently sent prisoners to VIENNA. So the countie following the course of his victorie (the terror of his former good fortune running before him into the Turkes strongest holds) was on his way to haue besieged GESTES, a town neere to PALOTTA; when the Turkes there in garrison, vpon the first sight of his armie, left all, and fled out at the farther side of the town to STRIGONIVM. After whose example, other of the Turks garrisons in Witha, Tschokiku, & Sambok, castles therabouts, set fire on that they could not carrie, and followed their fellowes to STRIGONIVM also. The emperor vnderstanding of the good successe of his captaines, caused publike praiers with thanksgiuing to Almightie God to be made thorow all the churches thereabouts.

The Turkes surprise townes in Hungarie.

Great troubles in Hungarie.

The good successe of the emperors captaines

Countie Serinus, Gouernour of the strong towne of SIGETH, and the countrey thereabout, certainly aduertised of the comming of Solyman, sent Casparus Alapianus, and Nicholas Cobach, two of his captaines, with a thousand foot, and fiue hundred horse, to lie in wait for the forerunners of the Turkes armie: who drawing neere vnto the place where these Turkes lay, not farre from QVINQVE ECCLESIE, suddenly in the shutting in of the next day, set vpon them, doubting no such matter, and put them in such feare, that they disorderedly fled some one way, some another, and were most of them slaine or wounded by the Hungarians in their flight. Halibeg, one of the Turkes great Sanzackes, and leader of that companie, sore wounded, and seeking to saue himselfe by flight in the mariishes, there perished: his sonne, and many other notable men amongst the Turkes, were there [illegible]en, and carried prisoners to Sigeth. The spoyle

A the Hungarians there tooke, was exceeding great: for beſide plate and coine, wherof they found good ſtore, they tooke eight camels, threeſcore horſes, fiue mules, and ſix carts laden with all maner of ſpoile, and many garments of great price; wherin the gentlemen attired, returned to SIGETH in great braueric, with two faire red enſignes of the enemies. A great preye.

Maximilian the emperour, long before aduertiſed of Solymans purpoſe for the conqueſt of the remainder of HVNGARIE; to withſtand ſo mightie an enemie, had beſide the forces raiſed in his owne dominions, procured great aid both of the ſtates of the empire and other Chriſtian princes, which about this time met togither at RAB. Firſt there repaired thither foure legions of German footmen, and vpwards of twentie thouſand horſemen, with foure thouſand Hungarians: The duke of SAVOY ſent thither foure hundred Argoleteirs: and many noble gen-
B tlemen out of diuers parts of EVROPE reſorted thither, to ſerue the emperour in thoſe wars of their owne charge, eſpecially the knights of MALTA: and out of ITALIE, Proſper Columna, and Angelus Cæſius: out of FRANCE, Guiſe the graund prior, Briſſack and Lanſack; who but a little before were going to MALTA, of purpoſe to haue ſerued there if the Turks fleet had come thither againe, as it was reported it would; but vnderſtanding that it came not, returned directly into HVNGARIE, with certaine other knights of the Order. Many alſo of the princes and free cities of ITALIE, declared their good will toward the emperour in this war; ſome ſending him men, as did Coſmus Medices duke of FLORENCE, who ſent thither of his owne charge three thouſand footmen; ſome mony, as MANTVA, GENVA, and LVCA. Thither came alſo Alphonſus duke
C of FERARA, with a gallant companie of noble gentlemen, and others his followers. Beſide which land forces, the emperor had alſo prouided vpon the riuer of Danubius twelue gallies, and thirtie other ſhips for burthen, ſo made, as that the men could not be hurt with the Turks arrowes: wherein was imbarked three thouſand ſouldiors, moſt part Italians, vnder the conduct of Philippus Flachius a German, and one of the knights of MALTA, who was afterward receiued into the number of the princes of the empire.

Solyman comming to the riuer Drauus, commaunded a bridge to be made ouer that great riuer, and the deepe fens on the farther ſide of the riuer towards SIGETH, for the tranſporting of his great armie; a worke of ſuch difficultie, that being thrice vnfortunatly begun, it was againe giuen ouer, as a thing almoſt impoſſible: wherwith Solyman was ſo moued, that in his rage he ſwore to hang vp the great Baſſa that had the charge of that worke, if he did not with as much
D ſpeed as were poſſible, bring it to perfection. Whereupon the worke was againe begun, all the boats that were to be found in the riuer taken vp, and timber for the purpoſe brought from farre, for the making of that bridge. In this worke were imploied, not the vulgar people onely of the countrie which was tributarie to the Turks, but the gentlemen themſelues alſo, were by the imperious Turke (now commanding for his life) enforced to lay their fingers to worke day and night without ceaſing, vntill the bridge (which before was thought ſcarce poſſible to haue bin made) was by the reſtleſſe induſtrie and labour of ſuch a multitude of men, in the ſpace of ten daies brought to perfection. Wherein the ſeueritie the barbarous tyrant vſeth towards his ſubiects, is worth the noting, wherby he extorteth from them, more than is almoſt poſſible for men to performe: ſo that it is not to be maruelled, that he hath ſo good ſucceſſe in whatſoeuer
E he taketh in hand. Ouer this bridge (a mile in length) paſſed Solyman, and encamped at a place called MVHATCHZ, where he ſtaied certaine daies, vntill his hugie armie was all come ouer. The laſt of Iuly, ninetie thouſand Turks (the vauntguard of Solymans armie) came before SIGETH; and encamped within a mile of the town: after whom ſhortly after followed an hundred thouſand mo out of Solymans campe, of whom many in approching the towne, were ſlaine with great ſhot out of the caſtle; the reſt for all that encamped themſelues as neere vnto the town as they could, and began the ſiege. The Turkes encampe before Sigeth.

The Turks with much labour make a bridge ouer the greet riuer of Drauus.

The towne of SIGETH is ſtrongly ſcituat in a Mariſh, on the North ſide of Drauus vpon the frontiers of DALMATIA, commaunding all the countrie round about it, which of it taketh name; and was at that time a ſtrong bulwarke againſt the Turkes, for entring farther into the
F countrie that way toward STIRIA. In this towne was Gouernour Nicholaus Serinus, commonly called the Countie, a valiant man, and a mortall enemie of the Turkes, with a garriſon of 2300 good ſoldiors: who ſeeing the hugie armie of the Turks, called togither into the caſtle the captaines of the garriſon and the chiefe of the citiſens; where ſtanding in the midſt of them, hee ſpake vnto them as followeth.

confuſion, which fitly ſerued the Turkes to incroach more and more vpon them: Who at the ſame time ſurpriſed the towne of AINATSCH (the captaine thereof with certaine of the garriſon ſouldiors being gone about their buſineſſe to AGRIA) and put to the ſword all them that they found in the towne. They thought alſo to haue taken the ſtrong towne of SIGETH, but were by the valiant countie Nicholaus Serinus Gouernour thereof, couragiouſly encountred; and after foure houres hard fight, ouerthrowne and put to flight. Not long after, they ranged vp and downe the countrie, and ſet in booties as far as IVLA and RAB, and did the countrie people much harme. At which time, Suendi the emperours lieutenant, laid hard ſiege to the towne of HYSTH in the borders of TRANSILVANIA. The Baſſa of BVDA at the ſame time on the other ſide, by commaundment of Solyman, with eight thouſand Turks and fiue and twentie pieces of great ordinance beſieging PALOTTA, a ſtrong towne about eight miles from RAB, had with continuall batterie by the ſpace of eight daies, brought the ſame into great danger, although it was valiantly defended by George Thuriger. The towne of SIGETH is ſtrongly ſcituat in a Mariſh, on the North ſide of Drauus vpon the frontiers of DALMATIA, commaunding all the countrie round about it, which of it taketh name; and was at that time a ſtrong bulwarke againſt the Turkes, for entring farther into the
F countrie that way toward STIRIA. In this towne was Gouernour Nicholaus Serinus, commonly called the Countie, a valiant man, and a mortall enemie of the Turkes, with a garriſon of 2300 good ſoldiors: who ſeeing the hugie armie of the Turks, called togither into the caſtle the captaines of the garriſon and the chiefe of the citiſens; where ſtanding in the midſt of them, hee ſpake vnto them as followeth.

You see (said he) how wee are on euery side beset with the multitude of our enemies, wherein resteth G their chiefe hope: But let not vs be therof afraid or discouraged; for that victorie dependeth not of a confused multitude of heartlesse men, but of the power of our God, who hath by a few at his pleasure many times ouerthrowne the mightie armies of the proud; and will not in the middest of these dangers now forsake vs, if wee putting our trust and confidence in him, doe what beseemeth valiant and courragious men. Besides that our iust cause, with the strength of the place we hold, our owne valour, and the helpe of our friends, who I assure my selfe will not faile vs at our need, counteruaileth their confused multitude, forced togither by their imperious commaunders out of far countries, and whatsoeuer els the proud tyrant hath brought with him into the field. Wherefore let vs all as becommeth valiant men, for the truth of our religion, and for the honour of our prince and countrie, liue and die together, knowing whatsoeuer befall, That to a life so lost, beside neuer dying fame, belongeth a most assured hope of endlesse H ioy and felicitie. As for my selfe, I am resolued, and so (I hope) are you also, that as I am a Christian, and free borne, so will I (by the grace of God) in the same faith and freedome end my daies. Neither shall the proud Turke, so long as I am able to hold vp this hand, haue euer power to commaund ouer mee or the ground whereon I stand. This said, he first tooke himselfe a solemne oath, to performe what he had promised, and persuaded the rest, to take the like: which done, euery man returned to the place of his charge.

Solyman commeth into the camp at Sigeth.

The fift of Auguſt Solyman encamped within a mile of the towne, and the next day after came himselfe into the campe, at whose comming the great ordinance and small shot so thundered out of the Turks campe, as if heauen and earth should haue gone togither, the Turks after their wonted manner crying aloud their Alla, Alla, Alla, and the Christians answering them I with the name of Iesus. The seuenth of Auguſt the Turkes cast vp a great mount, and thereon planted certaine great pieces of ordinance. The next day following they began most terribly to batter the new towne in three places, and with incredible labour cast vp a mount in the middest of the marrish, as it were in the towne ditch, from whence they the next day with certain pieces of great artillerie day and night battered the inner castle of the town without any intermission, and did great harme both to the castle and the defendants. The countie perceiuing the new citie to be now so laid open with the furie of the Turks batterie, as that it was not possible to be defended; caused his soldiors to set it all on fire, and to retire into the old. The tenth of Auguſt the Turks furiously battered the old town in three places, & brought their ordinance into the new town: and with timber, earth, and rubbidge, made a bridge, the more commodiously to go ouer K the marrish. For the speedier accomplishment whereof, all the Turkes were compelled to lay to their hands, and to carrie wood, fagots, earth, and such like things without ceasing. There might a man haue seene all the fields full of cammels, horses, and of the Turks themselues, like emmets, carrying wood, earth, stones, or one thing or other to fill vp the marrish: so was there with wonderfull labour two plaine waies made thorow the deepe fenne, from the towne to the castle: where the Ianizaries, defended from the great shot with sacks of wooll and such like things, did with the multitude of their smal shot so ouerwhelme the defendants, that they could not against those places without most manifest danger shew themselues vpon the wals. So that what by their vigilant industrie, and the furie of the great artillerie, the Turks (though not without great losse) by force entred the old rown the nineteenth of Auguſt, vsing in their victorie such celeritie, L that they slew many of the most valiant defendants before they were able to recouer the safegard of the castle. Both the towns thus lost, & so many worthie men slaine, not without cause brought great heauines vpon the rest which were in the castle with the countie. The Turks possessed of the old town, the next day planted their batterie against the castle in foure places, and with fagots, rubbidge, & earth, made two plain waies vnto it, still filling vp the marrish: & hauing with continuall batterie made it saultable, the nine and twentie day of Auguſt they began fiercely to assaile the breaches: but when they had lost many of their men, and done what they could, they were enforced with shame to retire. In this assault amongst many other of their best souldiors was lost one of their great Bassaes also.

Solyman dyeth of the bloudie flix.

Whilest these things were in doing, Solyman far spent with yeares, and distempered with his M long trauell, fell sicke of a loosenes of his bellie, and for the better recouerie of his health retired himselfe (the siege yet continuing) to QVINQVE ECCLESIÆ, a citie neere to SIGET, where shortly after he died of the bloudie flix, the fourth day of September, in the yeare of our Lord 1566, when he had liued 76 yeares, and raigned thereof 46. He was of stature tall, of feature slender,

A slender, long necked, his colour pale and wan, his nose long & hooked, of nature ambitious and bountiful, more faithfull of his word and promise than were for most part the Mahomitan kings his progenitors; wanting nothing worthy of so great an empire, but that wherin all happinesse is contained, faith in Christ Iesus. Muhamet the Visier Bassa (who all commanded in Solymans absence) fearing the insolencie of the Ianizaries, and lest some tumult should arise in the camp, if his death should be knowne, concealed it by all meanes: and to be sure of them that were of all others best able to make certaine report thereof, caused his physitions and Apothecaries to bee secretly strangled, and by a trusty messenger, sent in post, certified Selymus (Solymans only sonne, and his father in law, then lying in MAGNESIA) of the death of his father, willing him in hast to repaire to CONSTANTINOPLE, to take possession of the empire; and that done, foorthwith to B come to the armie in HVNGARIE. But this could not be so secretly done, but that the Ianizaries began to mistrust the matter: Which Muhamet Bassa quickly perceiuing, caused the dead bodie of Solyman in his wonted apparell to be brought into his tent sitting vpright in his horselitter, as if he had been sicke of the gout, his wonted disease; and so shewing him to the Ianizaries, both deceiued and contented them, and so went forward with the siege.

Muhamet Bassa concealeth the death of Solyman.

The Ianizaries hauing in the last assault lost many of their fellowes, began now to vndermine the greatest bulwarke of the castle, from which the defendants with their great ordinance did most annoy them: wherein they vsed such diligence, that the fifth of September they with gunpouder and other light matter prouided for that purpose, had set all the bulwarke on a light fire; and by that meanes possessed therof, with all their force assailed the bulwarke next vnto the C castle gate, from whence they were with great slaughter twice repulsed by the countie. But the raging fire stil increasing, he was inforced with those which were yet left aliue, to retire into the inner castle, wherin was but two great pieces, and fourteene others of small force. Thus the Turks still preuailing, and taking one place after another, the seuenth of September the furiously assaulted the little castle, whereinto they cast such abundance of fire, that in short time it caught hold on the buildings, and set all on fire. The countie thus assailed by the enemie without, and worse distressed with the fire within, which still increasing, left no place for him in safetie to retire vnto, went into his chamber, where putting on a rich new sute of apparell, came presently out againe with his sword and targuet in his hand; and finding his souldiors with cheerfull countenance and their weapons in their hands, attending his comming, spake vnto them these few his D last wordes. The hard fortune of this sinfull kingdome hath together with our owne ouertaken vs: but let vs (noble hearts) with patience endure what is to vs by God assigned. You know what we haue before promised, which hitherto God be thanked we haue accordingly performed, and now let vs with like resolution performe this last. The place you see is not longer to bee kept, the deuouring fire groweth so still vpon vs, and we in number are but few: Wherefore let vs as becommeth valiant men breake out into the viter castle, there to die in the middest of our enemies, to liue afterwards with God for euer, I will bee the first that will goe out, follow you me like men. This said, with his sword and targuet in his hand, without any other armour, calling thrice vpon the name of Iesus, he issued out at the castle gate, with the rest following him: where valiantly fighting with the Ianizaries vpon the bridge; and hauing slaine some of them, he was first wounded in two places of his bodie with small shot, and at last E strucke in the head with an vnluckie shot, fell downe dead; the Turkes for ioy crying out their wonted word Alla. The rest of the souldiors in flying backe againe into the castle, were all slaine by the Turks, except some few, whom some of the Ianizaries in regard of their valor, by putting their caps vpon their heads, saued from the fury of the rest. In this siege, the Turks (as they themselues reported) lost seauen thousand Ianizaries, and twentie eight thousand other soudiors, beside many voluntarie men not enrolled in their muster-bookes, and three of their great Bassaes. Serinus his head was presently cut off, and the next day (with the heads of the other slaine Christians) set vpon a pole, for all the armie to gaze vpon. After that, it was taken downe, and by Muhamet the great Bassa sent to Mustapha the Bassa of BVDA his kinseman; who by two countrey men, sent it wrapped in a red scarfe couered with a faire linnen cloth, to county Salma in the emF perours campe at RAB, with this taunting letter thus directed.

The Bassaes quipping letter to county Salma

In token of my loue, behold, heere I send thee the head of a most resolute and valiant captaine thy friend friend, the remainder of his bodie I haue honestly buried, as became such a man. SIGETH biddeth thee farewell for euer. G

The death of this noble and valiant captaine was much lamented of all the Christian armie, and his head with many teares by his sonne Balthasar honourably buried amongst his ancestors in TSCHACATVRNA, his owne castle. Solyman at his comming with this mightie armie into HVNGARIE, had purposed before his returne, if he had not been by death preuented, to haue conquered both the remainder of the kingdome of HVNGARIE, and to haue againe attempted the winning of VIENNA. For the accomplishing of which his designes, he at his first comming sent Parthauus Bassa with fortie thousand Turkes to helpe the Bassa of TEMESVVARE and the Tartars, in the behalfe of the Vayuod, to besiege the strong towne of GYVLA, situate vpon the H lake ZARKAD in the confines of TRANSILVANIA, not farre from whence Suendi had but in August before ouerthrowne the Tartars, called in by Solyman for the ayd of the Vayuod, and slaine of them ten thousand. And at the same time he sent Mustapha Bassa of BOSNA, and Carambeius, with a great power to ALBA REGALIS; who ioyning with the Bassa of BVDA, should keepe the emperour Maximilian busie, whilest hee in the meane time besieged SIGETH, as is before declared. Parthauus Bassa comming to GYVLA, and laying hard siege to the towne, was still notably repulsed by Nicholas Keretschen, Gouernour of the towne: insomuch, that in a sallie hee had certain pieces of his great ordinance taken from him by the defendants, and the rest cloied. But this braue captaine, not to haue been constrained by all that the Bassa could doe, was at last per- I suaded by his kinsman George Bebicus (from whō Suendi had a little before taken certain castles, for reuolting from the emperour to the Vayuod) for a great summe of money to deliuer vp the town to the Bassa: which he did, couenanting beside his reward, That the souldiors should with bag and baggage in safetie depart; all which was franckly graunted: who were not gone past a mile out of the town, but they were set vpon by the Turks, and all slaine, except some few which crept into the reeds growing in the marrish fast by, & so escaped. The traitor himselfe expecting his reward, vvas carried in bonds to CONSATNTINOPLE: where afterward, vpon complaint made how hardly he had vsed certaine Turkes, whom he had sometime taken prisoners, he was by the commaundement of Selymus, who succeeded Solyman, thrust into a hogshead struck full of nailes with the points inward, with this inscription vpon it: Here receiue the reward of thy auarice and treason, GYVLA thou soldest for gold: if thou be not faithfull to Maximilian thy lord, neither K wilt thou be to me: and so the hogshead closed fast vp, he was therein rolled vp and downe vntill he therein miserably died.

Nicholaus Keretschen corrupted for money, betrayeth Gyula to the Turks.

A traitor well rewarded.

The emperours campe then lying at RAB, and the Bassa of BVDA and BOSNA with thirtie thousand Turkes not farre off at ALBA REGALIS, and many hot skirmishes passing betweene them: it fortuned that the fift of September the Turks in hope to haue done some great piece of seruice vpon the Christians, came forth of the campe in great number, and by chance light vpon a few forragers of the army, of whome they slewe some, the rest flying, raised an alarum in the campe: wherupon the Hungarians and Burgundians with some others issuing out, pursuing the Turks, slew diuers of them: in which pursute George Thuriger, descrying the Gouernor of ALBA REGALIS, a man in great account, and very inward with Solyman whilest he liued, fiercely pur- L sued him in the middest of the flying enemies, and neuer left him vntill he had taken him prisoner: and at his returne presenting him to the emperour, was for that good seruice knighted, and rewarded with a chaine of gold. There was by chance then present a Spaniard, who had heard him say openly at CONSTANTINOPLE, That hee alone with his owne power was able to vanquish the Germane king (by which name the Turkes commonly tearme the emperour:) With which wordes when that the Spaniard hardly charged him in the presence of the emperour, still vrging him as it were to say something for himselfe, the Turke answered him in these few words following: Such is the chance of warre, thou seest mee now a prisoner, and able to doe nothing.

The Gouernor of Alba Regalis taken.

The Turks sharp answere to the Spaniard.

All these troubles, with many moe like in short time to haue ensued, were by the death of M Solyman vvithin a while after well appeased. Muhamet Bassa after hee had repaired the breaches, and placed a Turke Gouernour of SIGETH, with a strong garrison for the defence of the place and commaunding of the countrey, called backe the dispersed forces; and rising with the armie, retired toward BELGRADE, carrying Solymans dead bodie all the way sitting vp-

THE LIFE OF SELYMVS, THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, FIFT EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKES.

Elymus, the only ſonne of Solyman then left aliue, by letters from Muhamet Baſſa vnderſtanding of the death of his father, haſted from CVTAI, a citie of GALATIA not farre from ANCYRA, towards CONSTANTINOPLE; and comming to SCVTARIE, was from thence by Boſtanges Baſſa of the court, conducted ouer the ſtrait to CONSTANTINOPLE: where, by him and Scander Baſſa (Selymus his ſonne in law, and then Solymans Vicegerent) he was conuaied into the imperiall palace the three and twentith of September, in the yeare 1566, and there poſſeſſed of his fathers ſeat, was by the Ianizaries there preſent, ſaluted emperour. He was about the age of fortie two yeares when hee began to raigne, a man of an vnconſtant and haſtie diſpoſition, wholy giuen to wantonneſſe and exceſſe: ſo that he neuer went to warres himſelfe, but performed them altogether by his lieutenants, contrarie to the charge of Selymus his grandfather, giuen by him to his father Solyman, wherof he was neuer vnmindfull. The next day he came abroad, and ſhewed himſelfe in his maieſtie; and in the temple of SOPHIA, after the manner of the Türkiſh ſuperſtition, cauſed ſolemne praiers and ſacrifices to be made for his father: which done, he gaue vnto the Ianizaries a largious of 100000 Sultanines, with promiſe to augment their wages. And all things being now in readineſſe for his intended iourney, he with a goodly retinue ſet forward from CONSTANTINOPLE the ſeuen and twentith of September: and the twentith of October a little from BELORADE met the armie comming from SIGETH, gallantly marching vnder their enſignes, with the dead bodie of Solyman, whom the ſouldiors generally ſuppoſed to haue been yet liuing, but troubled with the gout, to haue kept his horſe-litter as his manner was to trauell. Selymus alighting, came in his mourning attire to the horſe-litter, looked vpon the dead bodie of his father, kiſſed it, and wept ouer it, as did all the other great Baſſaes alſo. And that the death of Selyman might then be made known to all men, the enſigns were preſently let fall, and trailed vpon the ground, a dead march ſounded, and heauy ſilence commaunded to be kept through all the campe. Shortly after, Selymus was with the great applauſe of the whole armie proclaimed emperour, his enſignes aduanced, and euery one of the great commaunders of the armie, in their degree admitted to kiſſe his hand. So marching forward, he returned againe to CONSTANTINOPLE, the two and twentieth of Nouember: but thinking to haue entred his palace (which they commonly call the SERAGLIO) he was by the diſcontented Ianizaries but now come from the wars, prohibited ſo to doe; they with great inſolencie demanding of him a greater donatiue, together with the confirmation both of their auncient and new priuiledges, before they would ſuffer him to enter. Againſt which their great preſumption, the Viſier Baſſaes, together with the Aga, oppoſing themſelues, and ſeeking by all meanes to appeaſe them, were by them fowly intreated, & well rapped about the pates with the ſtocks of their calliuars; but eſpecially the two great Baſſaes, Muhamet and Partau, as the chiefe authors that their lord had dealt no more liberally with them. With which ſo ſudden and vnexpected a mutinie of his beſt ſouldiors, Selymus not a little troubled, and calling ling vnto him the Aga(or captaine of the Ianizaries)demanded of him the cauſe thereof: who G with teares trickling downe his cheekes for griefe,told him,That it was for money. Which by Selymus now promiſed vnto them,together with the confirmation of their liberties;and the Aga with faire words and heauy countenance moſt earneſtly entreating them,not to blemiſh the antient reputation of their wonted loyaltie with ſo foule a diſorder, nor to oppoſe the life of him their louing captaine, vnto the heauie diſpleaſure of their angrie Sultan; and farther aſſuring them,that he would not faile them in the leaſt of his promiſes, but content them to the full of their deſires; the mutinie was at length appeaſed, the inſolent Ianizaries againe quieted, and Selymus into the SERAGLIO receiued. Howbeit Muhamet,chiefe of the Viſier Baſſaes, for certaine dayes after went not out of his pallace,neither came (as hee was wont)into the DIVANO, but kept himſelfe cloſe,for feare of ſome greater miſchiefe from them.This tumult thus ouerpaſ- H Soliman buried ſed, and all againe well quieted,Selymus with all royall ſolemntie buried his father in a chappel which he after the manner of the Mahometane kings, had in his life time moſt ſtately built,with a colledge and an hoſpitall. Where faſt by his ſide is to be ſeene the tombe of Roxolana his beſt beloued wife,and of certaine others his murthered children: and by him hangeth his ſcimitar,in token that he died in wars; an honour not otherwiſe granted to the Mahometane princes. The reuenues ariſing of the countrey about SIGETH, of late woon from the Chriſtians, at the time of his death,were giuen to the maintenance of the houſes by him built of deuotion; which for the magnificence thereof, exceed all the reſt before built by the Mahometane kings and emperours, except thoſe which were the buildings of Mahomet the great,and Baiazet the ſecond. It was by many thought, that Solyman was in good time by death cut off, as purpoſing that yeare I to haue wintered in HVNGARIE,and the yeare following to haue done great matters againſt the Chriſtians,both by ſea and land.

The great armie of the Turks thus drawne out of HVNGARIE by the death of Solyman,in 1567 ſome part aſſwaged,but altogether appeaſed not the endleſſe troubles of that vnfortunat kingdome. Maximilian the emperour on the one ſide, and Iohn the Vayuod of TRANSILVANIA Troubles in Hungarie. with the Turks captaines on the other,renting it in pieces, as if they had ſworne the deſtruction thereof. The Vayuod deſiring to recouer the ſtrong caſtle of TOCKAY,in the frontiers of his countrey,but lately taken from him by Suendi the emperours lieutenant, laid hard ſiege vnto it, and had brought it to great extremitie, although it was notably defended by Iames Ramınger the captaine therof: when ſuddenly newes was brought vnto him,That the Tartars (whom he K had called into his countrey to haue aided him againſt the emperour)did with all hoſtilitie after their barbarous manner,burne and deſtroy his countrey before them, making hauocke of all things; ſo that the countrey people were glad in defence of themſelues,to take vp armes againſt them. Whereupon he forthwith left the ſiege,and went to aid his diſtreſſed ſubiects againſt the Tartars,with whom he had many an hot skirmiſh; and after much bloudſhed, at laſt ouercame them,and with much adoe rid himſelfe of ſuch bad gueſts. Now in the meane time, Suendi ſtrengthened with new ſupplies ſent vnto him from the emperor,had taken the caſtle of ZACKMAR in the borders of TRANSILVANIA, and with like good fortune had the caſtle of MVNCATZ yeelded vnto him,and after that beſieged the towne of HVSTH: ſo that the Vayuod was L glad to craue aid of the Turkiſh emperour Selymus,vnder whoſe protection hee was: who preſently commaunded Partaw one of his chiefe Baſſaes,& then his great lieuenant in ROMANIA, to goe with his forces into TRANSILVANIA,to relieue them. But hearing that embaſſadors were comming from Maximilian the emperour,he called him backe againe,vntill he had heard The Baſſa of Buda deſirous to further the peace. the effect of that embaſſage. At which time alſo the Baſſa of BVDA enclining vnto peace, ſent preſents to the emperour,requeſting him to remoue certaine Hungarian captaines from off the frontiers, leaſt happily they ſhould interrupt the treatie of peace, then on both ſides purpoſed; promiſing for his part to puniſh with death all ſuch Turks as ſhould make any further inuaſion, or raiſe any new troubles.He writ letters alſo to county Salma,That he could not but maruel,to what end Maximilian the emperor was about to entreat with his lord & maſter of peace,whileſt Suendi in the meane time was raging in TRANSILVANIA,then vnder the Turkes protection; M which if he proceeded ſtill to doe,Selymus would thereof take occaſion (as hee ſaid)to turne all his forces that way: wherefore he requeſted him to perſwade the emperour to take ſome more eaſie courſe in that behalfe,promiſing alſo,that he would for his part effectually trauell with his maſter,to haue better liking of peace than of warres, wiſhing him alſo to doe the like. Which

A thing as ſoone as the emperour vnderſtood, he commaunded Suendi to giue ouer the ſiege of HVSTH, and to keepe himſelfe quiet, vntill he might by his embaſſadours vnderſtand what the great Turke purpoſed, and how he was affected towards peace.

Now in deed theſe two great princes, Maximilian and Selymus (although they notably diſſembled the matter) were both of them in heart deſirous of peace, and that for diuers great and vrgent conſiderations. Maximilian for want of money, ſaw it not poſſible for him to ſend into the field ſuch an armie the next yeare, as he had the yeare before. And Selimus, beſide his other troubles, was to take order for the appeaſing of a great and dangerous rebellion, in the fartheſt part of his dominions in ARABIA FŒLIX; where the people riſing vp in armes, and hauing ſlaine the Baſſaes and Sanzacks their Gouernours, were readie to haue caſt off the Turkiſh obe-
B dience: neither was he out of feare of the Perſians, readie (as was reported) to make war vpon him. For which cauſes he wiſhed rather for peace with the emperour Maximilian, than wars: and ſo much the more, for that it was impoſſible for him to ſend an armie of any puiſſance into HVNGARIE, for want of many neceſſarie prouiſions for the maintenance there of, in a countrie ſo much impouериſhed by reaſon of his late wars; wherein no victuals were to be found for the reliefe of ſuch a multitude of men as he was to ſend, if he would doe any good there. And truth it was (as the Turks themſelues afterward reported) that Maximilian with halfe the power he had in field the laſt yeare, might haue eaſily recouered the greateſt part of that kingdome before loſt: but well knowing his owne wants, and ignorant of theirs, he altogether inclining to peace; and by countie Salma aduertiſed from the Baſſa of BVDA, That if he would ſend embaſſadors to C CONSTANTINOPLE with the tribute woont to be there paid for HVNGARIE, a peace vpon reaſonable conditions might be eaſily obtained; he reſolued vpon that point. And ſo certaine meſſengers being ſent vp and downe to CONSTANTINOPLE to the ſame effect, it was concluded, That if the emperour would ſend embaſſadors to CONSTANTINOPLE with the tribute yet behind, and a large commiſſion for the treatie of peace, Selymus ſhould giue them his ſafe conduct, with libertie at their pleaſure to return in caſe either of peace or war. Which agreed vpon, and faithfully promiſed on both ſides, Selymus ſet at libertie the lord Albert de Vuis, who ſix yeares Lieger in CONSTANTINOPLE, firſt for the emperor Ferdinand, & after for Maximilian, had now bin ſtraightly impriſoned in his own houſe by the ſpace of two and twentie mo-D neths, in ſuch ſort that neither he nor any of his houſhold could go abroad, watch and ward being kept both night and day about his houſe, and his windowes alſo borded vp, to the end he ſhould not ſo much as looke out into the citie or any whither elſe more than the court of his houſe onely. So the emperour Maximilian now reſolued to ſend embaſſadours to CONSTANTINOPLE with the tribute money, and diuers other rich gifts and preſents, as well to the great Turke himſelfe as the Viſier Baſſaes his counſellors: and conſidering with himſelfe, whom to be moſt fit with wiſedome and honour to bring this ſo waightie a matter about, hauing to doe with ſo barbarous, couetous, and mightie a people; made choice of the lord Anthonius Verantius of AGRIA (of his counſell for the kingdome of HVNGARIE) a prelat of great eſtimation, who being a man of threeſcore and three yeares old, beſide his great learning, had the experi-
E ence of ſeuen and twentie embaſſages; wherein he alwaies ſo diſcreetly bare himſelfe, as well contented his prince, and purchaſed vnto himſelfe the reputation of a moſt graue and wiſe man: and about ten yeares before this embaſſage, being by the emperour Ferdinand ſent embaſſadour to Solyman, and now by Maximilian to Selymus at CONSTANTINOPLE, returning thence with good ſucceſſe, was by the emperour created a prince of the empire, and biſhop of AGRIA. Vnto which ſo honourable a perſonage, hauing the charge of this ſo waightie a matter, the emperour the more to ennoble this embaſſage, as alſo to purchaſe the greater credit to his embaſſadour, ioyned vnto him a moſt honourable Baron, called the lord Chriſtopher Teufenbatch of STIRIA, one of his counſellors alſo for the wars; who with full inſtructions both taking their leaue of the emperour (then holding a parliament at PRESBVRG) departed: and being attended vpon with a great and honorable retinue, ſet forward the firſt of Iuly 1567, and ſo came to CO-
F MARA a ſtrong towne in HVNGARIE, not paſt a league from the Turkes frontires. In which place the embaſſadours ſtaying vntill the ſeuenth of Iuly; in the meane time gaue knowledge of their comming vnto the Gouernor of STRIGONIVM, demanding for their ſecuritie in the enemies countrie, to be met and receiued by ſome of his garriſon: which granted, they tooke their barkes brought from VIENNA and POSSONIVM, ſufficient for their greatneſſe to haue carryed them downe the riuer to BELGRADE, with horſe and wagon and their whole furniture: and ſo entring vpon the Turkes dominion about a league or a little more from COMARA, being ſo far G wafted by the ſouldiors and gallies of COMARA, they were met by an Aga of the Turks with a Chiaus called Becram (ſent by the Baſſa of BVDA) in certaine gallies armed with Turkiſh ſoldiors. To whom the embaſſador at his landing deliuered his mind, and afterward his perſon, giuing them to vnderſtand, that they were with all ſafetie to conduct both him and all his to the Baſſa of BVDA; which they anſwered, they were readie to accompliſh: and ſo courteouſly inuited by the embaſſadors, they came aboord their barke, and there dined altogither. Here they that were ſent with them, leauing them in the hands of the Turks (hauing licence to depart) returned to COMARA: and they that day after fiue leagues ſayling arriued at STRIGONIVM, where they were by the Gouernour of the citie denied landing: for which ſo diſhonourable a H part, he was afterward ſharply rebuked by the Baſſa of BVDA. Yet as they lay that night vpon the water, certain Turkiſh minſtrels, to do them honour & to get a largeſſe, with their barbarous bawling inſtruments plaied them vp many a homely fit of mirth: and diuers others with ſundrie ſorts of vauting and tumbling, ſometime leaping one vpon anothers ſhoulders, and ſometime doing their tricks on the earth, all the euening ſhewed them great ſport and paſtime. From

STRIGONIVM they with fiue leagues ſayling came to BVDA, leauing behind them the caſtle of VICEGRADE, two leagues diſtant from STRIGONIVM. In this citie of BVDA lieth the great Baſſa, by whom all HVNGARIE, with the prouinces thereto belonging (in the Turkes power) is gouerned. This citie, ſometime the regall ſeat of the Hungarian kings, is ſituat vpon a little hill on the Southſide of Danubius, hauing in the South point thereof a caſtle, much I higher than the citie, and of a moſt braue proſpect: in which caſtle lyeth a captaine with a garriſon of fiue hundred ſouldiors (as the Turks ſay) howbeit it is thought that they are not altogither ſo many: it is the loſſe of his head to ſtir out of his charge; and beſide, he hath commiſſion to denie the Baſſa himſelfe entrance, vnleſſe he come verie ſleightly accompanied: ſo iealous are the Turkes of that caſtle, as if the ſtate of HVNGARIE depended thereon. Herein ſtandeth the king pallace, which taketh vp moſt part of the place, greatly beautified by king Mathias, and ſhewing outwardly to haue bin a verie ſtately thing: for there are in it both large hals and faire galleries, and chambers built in moſt royall manner; where amongſt other roomes, the embaſſadours found a decaied librarie full of pictures and Latine titles of bookes: all which things, when they preſent themſelues vnto the eies of the Chriſtian beholders, offer a iuſt conſideration K of noble and reuerend antiquitie, and withall, ſtrike into their hearts a certaine compaſſion ioyned with horror, to ſee the renowmed glorie of ſo many great kings, all waſted and brought to nothing. The next morning, the embaſſadours went to ſpeake with the Baſſa: whoſe houſe was reaſonable faire (conſidering their guiſe and cuſtome, not much delighting in the beautie of their priuat buildings) ſituat vpon the riuers ſide, at the bottome of the hill whereon the citie ſtandeth. Vnto this Baſſa the embaſſadors preſented two great gilt cups, a clocke all curiouſly wrought in gold, and a thouſand dollars: which preſent the Baſſa receiued in his Diuano (being a large hall) where he ſat with his counſellours, officers, and other Turks in their places and order; ſome on his right hand, & others on his left, all richly attired in garments of ſilke of diuers colours and faſhions, reaching downe to their ancles after their manner: their heads couered L with their paſſing white and well made Turbants: in which aſſemblie, nothing being to be ſeen but goodly order and graue ſilence, they ſeemed to the ſtrange beholders, ſo many counſellours of exceeding grauitie and reputation. Round about the hall wherein the embaſſadours had audience, were many ſeats couered with Turkie carpets; the reſt of the room being all vacant. The Baſſa in a place more apparant than the reſt, ſitting in great maieſtie: before whom were ſet two little chaires, on which (after he had ſtood vp a while and embraced the embaſſadors) he cauſed them both to ſit downe. Whoſe ſpeech deliuered in the Italian tongue (after they had diſcharged themſelues of the emperors letters and greetings) was to effect this, viz. That his imperiall maieſtie (for the common benefit of their ſubiects in HVNGARIE) requeſted him to continue in his good purpoſe and dealing for peace: and further, to giue ſafe conduct vnto them his embaſ- M ſadours with their retinue, vntill they were come vnto the Turks court, where they were to entreat and conclude a peace, to the ending of all troubles, and the publike benefit of their ſubiects in generall. Which ſpeech, with cheerefull and friendly countenance ended, many of the embaſſadors followers were admitted to kiſſe the Baſſaes hand, accounted no ſmal fauour amongſt

A thoſe Barbarians. The interpretour of theſe things was a Iew of PADVA, who declared all that was ſpoken, in the Turkiſh language vnto the Baſſa, & in the Italian vnto the embaſſadors. And although (if it had bin their pleaſure) they might haue told their mind each to other in the Sclauonian tongue, without an interpretour: yet the Baſſa ſtanding more vpon his reputation, and for ſome other reſpects beſide, would haue the matter propounded, and likewiſe anſwered in the Turkiſh. In which ſort they alſo conferred continually afterward with the Baſſaes at CONSTANTINOPLE, vnleſſe it were in ſome particular and priuat talke of ſmall importance, or els in ſome point beſide the matter; for then the interpretours ſpake in the Crouatian or Sclauonian tongue, which is familiar to moſt of the Turks, but eſpecially to the men of war. Before this hall where the embaſſadors were entertained by the Baſſa; in the baſe court ſtood all the Iani-
B zaries in goodly array, and his ſlaues with their red zarcull on their heads, and other ſouldiours with high and long plumes of feathers ſtanding vpright: all which made a beautifull ſhew, and gaue all great grace to the Baſſaes court: theſe men ſtirre not one foot in their ſtandings, and if the conſultation do laſt foure houres long, ſo long are they to continue ſtanding without mooving. The embaſſadours hauing ſtaied two daies at BVDA, were by the Baſſa diſmiſſed, ſending with them his Checai (the Steward or gouernour of his houſe) a man of great reputation, and Becram the Chiaus (the ſame that came to meet them at COMARA) with a ſufficient guard, and certaine Ianizaries, ſent for their more ſafe trauelling, and to prouide for them from place to place of all things neceſſarie for their diet, as alſo for their horſes, at the Turks charges. And thus accompanied, they embarked the tenth day of the aforeſaid moneth, towed vp the Turks gal-
C lies, which holpen by the ſwiftneſſe of the riuer, caried them down in eight daies to BELGRADE, where they arriued the eighteenth of Iuly. So hauing ſtaied at BELGRADE, and there leauing their boats, and taking their coaches, they ſet forward by land the twentieth of the ſaid month, and with great paines trauelling through RASCIA, BVLGARIA, and THRACIA, and paſſing a part of the great mountaine SCARDVS, and after that the mountaine RHODOPE, ſo by the way of PHILIPPOPOLIS, and HADRIANOPLE, the two and twentieth of Auguſt gathered faſt vpon CONSTANTINOPLE: where many of the Spahies and Chiauſais of the court, with a number of the Ianizaries and other ſouldiours, for their greater honour came to meet them a great way without the citie. By whom the embaſſadours honourably mounted on horſebacke, were The emperors embaſſadors honourably receiued by the Turks at Conſtantinople.
by them conducted to their lodging appointed for them about the middeſt of the citie: where D the lord Albert de Vuis the emperours embaſſadour Lieger (not long before enlarged) hauing long looked for their comming, now moſt ioyfully receiued them. It was then Friday the Turks Sabaoth, and a day of them aboue all other daies in the weeke regarded, and about ten of the clocke two houres before noone; at which time the embaſſadors were no ſooner alighted, but that Selymus going to heare the ceremonies of his religion, in the Moſchie of his father Solyman (as his manner was ſometime to doe) paſſed along before the gate where the embaſſadours lay, with the whole traine of his court; and peraduenture ſomewhat more than ordinarie, to ſhew the magnificence of his power and ſtate, to the end that the embaſſadors (aboue the former opinion by them conceiued) might holde him in the reputation of a moſt puiſſant and mighty monarch. He paſſing by, vouchſafed not once to giue them a regard, or ſo much as to caſt his eie E aſide vpon them, although they were ſtrangers, and but euen then arriued: but with a countenance, as if he had knowne not ſo much as nothing of their comming, held on his way as it lay. But Muhamet the chiefe Viſier Baſſa, with the other Baſſaes and great courtiers, in moſt gratious manner as they paſſed by, caſt their eies vpon them; all the courteſie they could then ſhew them. Six daies after, being the eight and twentieth of Auguſt, the embaſſadours all three Preſents giuen by the emperors embaſſadors to to the Great Baſſaes.
went to viſit and ſalute Muhamet (or as the Turkes call him Mehemet) the chiefe Viſier Baſſa, as the manner was; preſenting him from the emperour with foure cups of ſiluer all guilt, of moſt faire and curious workmanſhip; of which, two of them being greater than the other, were three ſpans high, the other two being not ſo high by a ſpan, but hauing in them two thouſand duckats of gold: beſide which, they gaue him alſo a clocke, being a moſt curious piece of worke, and all F ouer double guilt. After which greetings and preſents deliuered, beſide the contents of his maieſties letters, they declared vnto him in generall points, the cauſe of their comming, and the mind of the emperour well diſpoſed to a peace; and what great benefit would ariſe thereby to both parties: and laſtly turning ouer the blame of the late warres, and laying the fault thereof to the charge of others, ſweetned thereby the ſower of their former dealings. Neither was the Baſſa likewise for his part to seeke of good words, but answered them in Turkish by the mouth of Hibraim the cheefe Dragoman, who deliuered his mind to them in Latin or Italian, accordingly as the embassadours had before vttered theirs: which parle so ended, certaine of the cheefe of the embassadours followers were admitted into the Diuano to kisse the proud Bassaes hand. The same day the embassadours also saluted Partau the second Bassa, and Ferat the third in order and authoritie. To Partau they presented two cups of siluer all guilt, beside a clock of the same making with the abouenamed, and two thousand dollers: and the like to Ferat. The next day they went to visit the other three Bassaes, Acomat, Piall, and Muhamet, presenting euery one of them with two faire cups, and a thousand dollars: These were the six Visier Bassaes to Selymus, then lying at Court with him, men that for wealth and authoritie went before all other in the Turkish empire, as in the course of this historie may appeare. And so hauing visited them in generall, the embassadours to set their affaires on foot, the fourth of September closed with Muhamet, to whom the ordering of state-matters was especially committed. Yet after this first conference, because it was necessarie before so weightie affaires were broached, first to doe the Great Turke reuerence, and to deliuer the presents, with the emperours letters to him written; for some few dayes there was not any point at all of the embassadours businesse handled.

Selymus not long after the embassadours were arriued, went out for his disport & pleasure on hunting: so that in the meane time (after the presents were giuen to the Bassaes) matters stood stil altogether vnaduanced, vntill the one and twentieth of September: and that day (Selymus being now returned from his disport) it was appointed that the embassadors should haue audience at the Court. Whereupon they made choice out of their followers of those that should attend vpon them, which were not in all aboue twelue persons: For they to whom this charge was committed, said it was neither the manner nor yet meet that any great train should come before so great a prince, and that they might not bring with them aboue that number: whereupon they appointed but six a peece to attend them: and of fifteene cups all of siluer and guilt, being most curiously and cunningly engrauen, one of the faireſt among the rest was giuen to each of those twelue to carrie, and they ordered to go by two and two before the rest that came after in order with the rest of the present: which was two exceeding pretious Clockes, like in bignesse to them before giuen to the Bassaes, but far aboue them in value; and fiue and fortie thousand Dollars for the tribute behind and yet vnpayed. The greatest of those cups was six spans and an halfe, and the least two spans in height: some of them being double cups after the high Dutch manner.

Presents sent vnto Selymus by the emperour.

The embassadours (whose comming a great multitude of the Ianizaries attended below at the gate of their lodging: beside many of the Spahies and Chiausis, and others of good sort, which were come to honour them with their presence to the pallace) putting themselues in readinesse betimes in the morning, and taking horse, set forward toward the Court. The formost were they that did beare the present in their hands, the people of the citie in euery street flocking together in exceeding multitudes to behold them as they passed: and verily there had been seldome times seene the like embassage in those parts. For besides the fame that was blowne abroad in euery quarter, That they were men sent from one of the greatest princes of Christendome; the diuersitie of their attire (so few as they were) more than any thing beside, did represent the maiestie of the Christian emperour to them that gased vpon his embassadours and their traine, the people conceiuing thereby that he was lord and ruler of many prouinces and countries. For they that were Hungarians belonging to the bishop of Agria (the cheefe embassadour) being attired in long & sober garments of very fine purple cloth, hauing their shooes pieced ouer the soles with yron plates, and halfe of their heads shauen, seemed to differ from them but little. But on the other side the high Dutch attired in blacke, with their veluet caps, and short cloakes layed with siluer lace, and long breeches little lesse than Rutter wise, and chaines of gold about their neckes, appeared very strange and vncouth to the Turkish people: and so accompanied in this honourable wise, the embassadours entred the first gate of the Great Turks pallace. This gate is built of marble in most sumptuous manner, and of a stately height, with certaine words of their language in the front thereof engrauen and guilt in marble. So passing through the base Court, which hath on the right side very faire gardens, & on the left side diuers buildings seruing for other offices, with a little Moschie; they came to the second gate, where al such as come in riding, must of necessitie alight. Here so soon as they were entred in at this second gate, they came into a very large square Court, with buildings and galleries round about it, the kitchins standing on the right hand, with

A other lodgings for ſuch as belonged to the court, and on the left hand likewiſe roomes deputed to like ſeruices. There are moreouer many hals and other roomes for reſort, where they ſit in counſell handling and executing the publike affaires either of the Court or of the Empire, with other matters, where the Baſſaes and other officers aſſemble together. Entring in at this ſecond gate, in one part of the Court, which ſeemed rather ſome large ſtreet, they ſaw the whole companie of the Solaches ſet in a goodly ranke, which are archers keeping alwaies neere vnto the perſon of the Great Turke, and ſeruing as his footmen when he rideth: they vſe high plumes of feathers, which are ſet bolt vpright ouer their foreheads. In another place there ſtood the Capitzi in like array, with blacke ſtaues of Indian canes in their hands: they are the porters and warders at the gates of the pallace, not much differing in their attire from the Ianizaries; who
B ſtood in ranke likewiſe in another quarter. And beſide all thoſe, with many more that were out of order, as well of the Court as of the common people, thoſe knights of the Court which accompanied the embaſſadors thither, with other great ones alſo of like degree, were marſhalled all in their ſeuerall companies. And among the reſt, the Mutfarachas, men of all nations and all religions (for their valour the onely freemen which liue at their owne libertie in the Turkiſh empire) ſtood there apparrelled in damaske, veluet, and cloth of gold, and garments of ſilke of ſundrie kinds and colours: their pompe was great, and the greater, for the turbants that they wore vpon their heads, being as white as whiteneſſe it ſelfe, made a moſt braue and goodly ſhew well worth the beholding. In briefe, whether they were to be conſidered all at once, or in particular,
C as well for the order that they kept, as for their ſumptuous preſence, altogither without noiſe or rumour; they made the embaſſadors and the reſt of their followers there preſent, eye witneſſes both of their obedience, and of the great eſtate and royaltie of the Othoman Court. Paſſing through them, the embaſſadours were led into the hall, where the Baſſaes and other great men of the Court were all readie to giue them intertainment: they of their traine being at the ſame time brought into a roome that ſtood a part vnder one of the aforeſaid lodgings all hung with Turkie carpets. Soone after (as their vſe and manner is) they brought in their dinner, couering the ground with table cloths of a great length, ſpred vpon carpets; and afterward ſcattering vpon them a maruelous number of woodden ſpoons, with ſo great ſtore of bread, as if they had been to feed three hundred perſons: then they ſet on meat in order; which was ſerued in two D and fortie great platters of earth, full of rice pottage of three or foure kinds, differing one from another; ſome of them ſeaſoned with hony, and of the colour of hony; ſome with ſoure milk, and white of colour; & ſome with ſugar: they had fritters alſo which were made of like batter; and mutten beſide, or rather a daintie and toothſome morſell of an old ſodden Ewe. The table (if there had any ſuch beene) thus furniſhed, the gueſts without any cerimonie of waſhing ſat downe on the ground (for ſtooles there were none) and fell to their victuall, and dranke out of great earthen diſhes, water prepared with ſugar, which kind of drink they call Zerbet. But ſo hauing made a ſhort repaſt, they were no ſooner riſen, but certain young men whom they call Giamoglans, with others that ſtood round about them, ſnatcht it haſtily vp as their fees, and like greedie Harpies rauened it downe in a moment. The embaſſadors in the meane time dined in the hall with the Baſſaes. And after dinner certain of the Capitzies were ſent for the twelue of E the embaſſadors followers, before appointed to do the great Sultan reuerence: by whom (their preſents being alreadie conuaied away) they were remooued out of the place where they dined, and brought on into an vnder roome, from whence there was an aſcent into the hall, where the Baſſaes were ſtaying for the embaſſadours: who ſoone after came forth, and for their eaſe ſat them downe vpon the benches, whileſt the Baſſaes went in to Selymus; who before this time had made an end of dinner, and was remoued in all his royalty into one of his chambers, expecting the comming of the embaſſadours. All things now in readineſſe, and the embaſſadors ſent for, they ſet forward with their traine, and came to the third gate which leadeth into the priuie pallace of the Turkiſh emperour, where none but himſelfe, his eunuchs, and the yong pages his minions, being in the eunuchs cuſtodie, hath continuall abiding: into which inward part of the niers (that ſerue in the great Turks meat) with the Baſſaes & ſome few other great men; and that onely when they haue occaſion ſo to do by reaſon of ſome great buſineſſe, or ſent for by the Sultan. Being entered in at this gate, which is of a ſtately and royall building, the Capitzi by whom they were conducted, ſuddenly cauſed them to ſtay, & ſet them one from another about fiue paces; in a little roome, which neuertheſſe was paſſing delicate, all curiouſly painted ouer G with diuers colours, and ſtood betweene the gate and the more inner lodgings. On both ſides of which roome, when all things els were whiſt and in a deepe ſilence, certaine little birds onely were heard to warble out their ſweet notes, and to flicker vp and downe the green trees of the gardens (which all along caſt a pleaſant ſhaddow from them) as if they alone had obtained licence to make a noiſe. Selymus himſelfe was in great maieſtie ſet in an vnder chamber, parted only with a wall from the roome wherein the embaſſadors followers attended, wherinto he might looke thorough a little window, the portall of his ſaid chamber ſtanding in counterpoint with the third gate aboue mentioned. The embaſſadours entring in, were led ſingle and one after another, to make their reuerence vnto the Great Turke. And in the meane time certaine of the Capitzi with the preſents in their hands fetching a compaſſe about before the window, muſte- H red them in his ſight. All this while not the leaſt ſound in the world being raiſed, but a ſacred ſilence kept in euerie corner, as if men had bin going to viſit the holieſt place in HIERVSALEM.

Yet for all that the embaſſadours followers placed one from another (as is aforeſaid) were not aware that the great Sultan was ſo neere, looking ſtill when they ſhould haue bin led on forwards altogither: howbeit, they were ſet in one after another: neither did they that were ſo ſet out, returne againe into the roome; but hauing ſeuerally done their reuerence, were all (except the embaſſadours, that ſtill ſtayed in the chamber) by one and one ſent out another way into the Court: neither could he that came after ſee his fellow that went before him, after he was once taken in to do his reuerence: but ſuddenly as the former was let out, the next was aduaunced forward to the dore, where Iſman the Capitzi-Baſſa and the Odda-Baſſa taking him by both I arms & by the neck, the one at the right hand, & the other at the left, & ſo leading him a pace, by the way ſoftly felt his wreſts with their hands, leaſt peraduentre he might haue ſome ſhort weapon in his ſleeue. Yet were they not all thus groped, as Marc Antonio Pigafetta, the reporter of this negotiation, ſayth of himſelfe and ſome others alſo. Howbeit this hath bin (and yet is) the manner of giuing of acceſſe vnto the perſon of the Great Turke, euer ſince that Amurath the firſt was after the battell of CASSOVA murthered by one of Lazarus the Deſpots men, who admitted to his preſence (in reuenge of the wrong done vnto his maſter) with a ſhort poynard that he had cloſely hidden about him, ſo ſtabbed him in the bellie that he preſently died. And thus like men rather caried to priſon by ſergeants, than to the preſence of ſo mighty a Monarch, they were preſented vnto his maieſtie: he ſitting vpon a pallet, which the Turks call Maſtabe, K vſed by them in their chambers to ſleepe and to feed vpon, couered with carpets of ſilke, as was the whole floore of the chamber alſo. The chamber it ſelfe being not very great, was but darke, altogither without windowes, excepting that one whereof we haue before ſpoken: and hauing
the wals painted and ſet out in moſt freſh and liuely colours by great cunning, and with a moſt delicat grace: vet vſe they neither pictures nor the image of any thing in their painting. The ſix Viſier Baſſaes (before mentioned) were ſtanding at the left hand as they entred in at the chamber doore one by another in one ſide of the chamber, and the embaſſadors on the right hand on the other ſide, ſtanding likewiſe, & vncouered. The Dragomans were in another part of the chamber, neere the place where the Sultan ſat gorgiouſly attired in a robe of cloth of gold, all embro- L dered with iewels: when as the embaſſadors followers by one and one brought before him (as is aforeſaid) and kneeling on the ground, a Turke ſtanding on his right ſide, with all reuerence taking vp the hem of his garment, gaue it them in their hands to kiſſe. Selymus himſelfe all this while ſitting like an image without mouing, and with a great ſtate and maieſty keeping his coun tenance, dained not to giue them one of his lookes. This done, they were led backe againe, neuer turning their backs towards him, but going ſtill backwards, vntill they were out of his preſence.
So after they had all thus made their reuerence, and were departed out of the chamber, the embaſſadors deliuered vnto Selymus the emperours letters, and briefely declared vnto him their meſſage: whom he anſwering in foure words, as, That they were to conferre with his Baſſaes: preſently they were diſmiſſed. And ſo comming out of the two inner gates, they mounted on horſebacke, and tooke the way leading towards their lodging, being at their returne accompa- M nied with the whole order of the Ianizaries, with their Aga, and other captains: among whom were certain of their religious men called Haagi (which vſe to follow the Ianizaries) who continually turning about, and in their going, ſinging or rather howling out certain Pſalms and praiers for the welfare of their Great Sultan, gaue the embaſſadours and their followers occaſion to Itinerario Di. Marc. Antonio Pigafetta. ca. 5.

A wonder, that they either left not for wearineſſe, or fel not downe like noddies for giddineſſe. All theſe were ſent, the more honourably to accompanie the embaſſadors to their lodging: and beſide theſe, many more on horſebacke than attended them at their foorth comming: in regard whereof, the embaſſadors when they were come to their lodging, to requite their greedie courteſie, frankely diſtributed amongſt them aboue foure thouſand dollars, and yet well contented them not.

The embaſſadours after this entertainment at court, had diuers times conference with the great Baſſaes concerning peace, as Selymus had commaunded: wherein by reaſon of the Turks vnreaſonable demaunds (as their manner is at their firſt meetings) nothing could be as then concluded: ſo that Selymus himſelfe being ſhortly after to depart for HADRIANOPLE, where hee
B was to continue for ſome month (but rather as it was thought for that they could not agree vpon a point of great conſequence) the treatie for peace was intermitted, vntil ſuch time as a meſſenger diſpatched in poſt, might returne vnto the Turkes court with ſome reſolute anſwer concerning that matter. So it was, that during the raigne of the late emperour Ferdinand, that the Turke his ſubiects in HVNGARIE payed all their taxes and tributes vnto their old lords and maſters, abiding and liuing in the emperors juriſdiction, as did the ſubiects of Ferdinand to their lords that dwelt in the Turks dominion and territories: Now in this treatie for peace, the Turks (amongſt other their vnreaſonable requeſts) demanded to haue their ſubiects freed, and yet the ſubiects of the emperor to pay as they were before accuſtomed. Which as it was a requeſt nothing indifferent, ſo was it no leſſe preiudiciall and hurtfull vnto the emperour his ſubiects in C HVNGARIE: for which cauſe the embaſſadours would not by any meanes conſent thereunto, before they knew the emperours farther pleaſure concerning the ſame. Wherupon they diſpatched one Sig. Odoardo a gentleman of MANTVA, verie skilfull in the Turkiſh language and in ſuch like affaires, by reaſon that as wel about this buſineſſe as at diuers times before about other the like, hee had beene employed from VIENNA to CONSTANTINOPLE in the emperours ſeruice. So Selymus ſhortly after, viz. the twentieth of October, departing from CONSTANTINOPLE, in great magnificence paſſed by the gate where the embaſſadours lay, with his whole court in armes, and in the ſame order that is vſually kept when he goeth to warre or taketh any great iourney. After whoſe departure the embaſſadours hauing ſufficiently viewed the citie of D CONSTANTINOPLE, and then at good leiſure, to paſſe the time and to ſee the countries they had ſo often both heard and read of, together with the ports and hauens on both ſides that narrow ſea which deuideth EVROPE from ASIA, embarking themſelues, and croſsing the mouth of the hauen betwixt CONSTANTINOPLE and PERA, paſſed all alongſt the coaſt on EVROPE ſide vnto the Euxine or blacke ſea, and ſo backe againe by the other ſide of that ſtraight ſea: curiouſly noting the great ruines of the ancient cities of BITHINIA, with ſome others alongſt the Aſian ſhore, together with the pleaſant ſituation they in former times had, whileſt they yet flouriſhed in their glory, but now for moſt part (or rather altogether) laid in the duſt & brought to nought: and ſo returned againe to CONSTANTINOPLE. But whileſt they thus deceiued the time, and lay long expecting the returne, as well of their own meſſenger ſent vnto the emperor, as of Selymus himſelfe; they were aduertiſed in all haſt to repaire vnto him to HADRIANOPLE,
E whether the aforeſaid meſſenger was now come with full inſtructions of all things concerning the treatie for peace. For which cauſe they with great ſpeed making themſelues ready, & taking their leaue of Piall Baſſa (who for that he was Selymus his great Admirall, then lay at CONSTANTINOPLE) ſet forward the firſt of Ianuary in the yeare 1568: and ſo after nine dayes trauell at length arriued at HADRIANOPLE about an hundred fiftie three Italian miles diſtant from CONSTANTINOPLE. Heere they ſtayed vntill the peace was concluded, which was the ſeauenteenth of Februarie: the chiefe capitulations whereof were, That either of thoſe great princes ſhould ſtill hold what they had got each from the other in the late warres, That the emperour ſhould yerely pay thirtie thouſand duckats to the Turkiſh Sultan, as a tribute for HVNGARIE, the tribute to begin in the beginning of Ianuarie laſt paſt this yeare 1568, That the ſubiects of F the Turke ſhould pay nothing to the ſubiects of the emperour, neither the emperours any thing to the Turks, but to be both of thoſe paiments free. And that vpon theſe conditions there ſhould be a firme & ſure peace betwixt theſe two great monarchs for eight yeres next following: wherin the Vayuod of TRANSILVANIA was (as the Turkes tributarie) to be alſo comprehended. Neuertheleſſe, all things at this time thus agreed vpon, the Turkes after their ſubtile manner finding ding ſundry cauillations, and raiſing many doubts about the aforeſaid capitulations, did what they might to haue in ſome part altered what they had before agreed vpon, to the bettering of themſelues and the hurt of the Chriſtians: and ſo with many their vnreaſonable demaunds ſtayed the departure of the embaſſadours vntill the twentith of March following. At which time hauing their diſpatch, and taking their leaue of the Great Turke and the Baſſaes, accompanied with Hebraim-Beg (Selymus his embaſſadour vnto the emperour) they by land returned towards VIENNA; where they with the ioyfull newes of peace the tenth of May arriued, being there two daies after at the Court moſt honourably receiued. And fiue daies after, audience was giuen vnto the Turks embaſſadour; who well heard, and better rewarded, ſhortly after returned with a full concluſion of peace from the emperour to CONSTANTINOPLE. G

Embaſſadours ſent from Tamas the Perſian king to Selymus.

But whileſt this peace was thus in concluding, and the embaſſadours yet reſident at HADRIANOPLE, the ſixteenth of Februarie came an honourable embaſſage from Shach Tamas the Perſian king vnto the Great Sultan Selymus, to entreat a peace betwixt them, or rather to conclude the ſame, being before agreed vpon the controuerſies, for which they afterwards fell to open war. Which embaſſage for that it is no leſſe truly than plainely ſet downe in a letter ſent from ERZIRVM (a citie then in the confines of the Turkes dominions towards the Perſians) written by a Chiaus to Muhamet cheefe of the Viſier Baſſaes; which Chiaus was of purpoſe ſent from CONSTANTINOPLE, to meet the ſaid Perſian embaſſadour: I thought it not amiſſe for the better vnderſtanding thereof, to ſet downe the effect of the ſame letter as it was tranſlated out of the Turkiſh into the Italian by the emperours embaſſadours interpreter. The effect of the letter written to Muhamet Baſſa, the cheefe Viſier, by a Chiaus ſent of purpoſe to meet the Perſian Embaſſadour.

*After due ſalutations, this is the effect of that which we thought good to make knowne vnto your lordſhip. Now at this preſent (to wit in the beginning of the month Giuma Sulacchir) is in good health arriued the embaſſadour of Perſia, the kings cheefe counſellour, called Schach Culi Soltan, attended vpon with a hundred and twentie gentlemen, with guilt turbants on their heads, & well furniſhed with ſpare horſes led in mens hands. Beſides whom hee was accompanied alſo with two hundred knights all apparelled in cloth of gold, with foure hundred Perſian marchants, in all aboue ſeuen hundred perſons; with a thouſand nine hundred beaſts, cammels, mules, and horſes; fiue couple of drums, euery couple being placed vpon a ſeuerall cammell, fiue Nacars, three trumpets, fiue flutes, and other inſtruments, in all about thirie muſitions, playing vpon theſe inſtruments: There were alſo two queriſters or chaunters of the Alcoran, one Organiſt, one playing vpon a Turkiſh inſtrument like a Lute, two players vpon Sagbuts, with two other muſitions, eight in all. There were alſo foure bondwomen ſeruing in the embaſſadours owne chamber. Who when he was with all this magnificent pompe come within one dayes iourney of ERZIRVM, the * Sayms and Spahies aſſembling themſelues together to the number of eight thouſand men, went to meet him: amongſt whom were an hundred and more, all apparrelled in cloth of gold and ſattin: two thouſand men with guilt morrions on their heads: in which brauerie we marching forward, the Perſian embaſſadour amazed to ſee ſo great maieſtie and pompe, ſaid that all the armie of CONSTANTINOPLE was come to meet him: and ſo being come into the citie, cauſed all the inſtruments to be played vpon, euen from morning vntill night. The next morning the embaſſadour inuited the Baſſa with all the lords and officers, who being come, he entreated them to heare his muſicke: and in like manner the lord Baſſa inuited the Perſians. But as the embaſſadour was going to the banquet, came another Sultan of the kings, who brought to the ſame embaſſadour a guilt Turbant, and a rich gowne wrought with gold, which he cauſed him to put on by the way. By this embaſſadour the Perſian king hath ſent all the armour of Sultan Baiazet, with all his cammels and other wealth. The cauſes of the long ſtay of this embaſſadour were ſpecially two: the one for that the Perſian king had cauſed to be made two pauilions of one peece, the curtaines being interlaced with gold, and the ſupporters imbrodered with the ſame: Beſides this, he ſent two bookes of hiſtories, and two pearles, which in weight weighed ten * Meſcali: one Balaſſo as big as a little pearle, foureſcore and two times an hundred * Tumenlich of ſtuffe, amounting to foureſcore and two ſummes of Aſpers, and fortie Falcons: all which the Perſian king hath ſent vnto the Great Sultan, as to the onely Monarch and Patrone of the world. This Schach Culi is the next in authoritie to the king, and ſo was in the time

* Schach Culi Soltan was not the proper name of this embaſſadour, but a title of honour, and ſignifieth as much as a prince ſeruant to the king.

* Sayms are ſoldiors of greater honour than the Spahi, hauing for their ſtipend yearely 2000 Aſpers at the leaſt, out of the reuenues of certaine townes and villages.

* A Meſcali is foure drams.

* Tumenlich is in value as much as the Turkes Aſper.

A time of the great king Hyſmaell. Theſe two Perſian Sultans are the kings cheeſe Sultans and courtiers, and therefore ſet themſelues forth with all the pompe they can. Yet notwithſtanding all their brauerie, being come to Erzirvm within the view of our armie, the Perſians were amazed to behold the goodly order of the Othomans. One part of theſe Perſians are returned againe into Persia. And if it pleaſe God at the comming of my meſſenger vnto you, your lordſhip ſhall vnderſtand of what condition and ſtate theſe two princes and Sultans are. They haue each of them yearely ſix Tumoni: which maketh after the computation of the Othomans, ſix thouſand Aſpers. Your lordſhip after this account may iudge of the reſt. The other cauſe of the long ſtay of this embaſſadour, was for that in Sirvan the people were vp in rebellion, wherein many of them were ſlaine: to the appeaſing of which ſedition, this Schach Culi was
B ſent, and now at laſt is come. From Erzirvm in the beginning of the moneth of * Giuma Sulacchir, in the yeare of the prophet Mahomet 975. * December.

This the Perſian embaſſadour was with the greateſt pompe that might be entertained by the Turkes at his firſt comming to Hadrianople, all the braue Courtiers with the Ianizaries and other ſouldiors of the Court going forth in moſt ſeemely order to meet him. Who now entred the citie, and come before the houſe where the emperors embaſſadours then lay, and ſeeing certaine of their retinue before the dore, asked of Iſnam the Capitzi Baſſa, what people they were? who told him that they were the followers of an embaſſadour that there lay, ſent from one of the greateſt princes of the Chriſtians, namely the emperour, who was deſirous to make peace with the great Sultan his maſter. Whereunto the embaſſadour replied, That he would willing-
C ly ſalute them: which Iſnam hearing, ſtraightway turned his horſe towards the place where they ſtood. Now the emperours embaſſadour being ſecret within a lattiſe, and ſeeing him come towards them, went forth and ſtood vpon the dore threſhold, and ſo with ſignes and words ſaluted one another. Amongſt the others the Perſian embaſſadour ſaid vnto the emperours, That he would gladly talke with them, if it might ſo pleaſe the Grand Signior: Hebraim the Dragoman who then was with the emperours embaſſadours, being interpreter. So hauing courteouſly ſaluted one the other, they departed, but neuer after came together. Two dayes after the Perſian embaſſadours (according to the manner of thoſe barbarous nations, who with emptie hands ſalute not one another) by his Checaia or ſteward of his houſhold, preſented all the Viſier Baſſaes with diuers rich gifts and preſents, euery one of them according to their degrees & places. And D the day after went himſelfe to viſit them: where by the way fell out a ſtrange matter, like ynough to haue coſt him his life. For a Giamoglan (as the embaſſadour was going to viſit Muhamet the cheeſe of the Viſier Baſſaes for the firſt) meeting him, ſhot at him with an harquebuſh, with purpoſe to haue ſlaine him; but as God would, miſſed him, and hurt but one of his cheeſe followers in the arme. Wherewith the embaſſadour not a little diſmayed, as ſuppoſing himſelfe to haue beene betrayed, turning his horſe, was about to haue gone to his lodging: but the great Baſſa in the meane time hauing knowledge thereof, preſently ſent out men to guard him, and to excuſe himſelfe of the fact. Whereof the embaſſadour being aſſured, held on his way. In the meane ſpace the fellow who ſhot the harquebuſh, being apprehended, was brought before the embaſſadour and the Baſsa: who asking him for what cauſe he diſcharged the ſhot againſt the embaſſa-
E dour? he without change of countenance boldly anſwered, That he did it for no other cauſe but for that the embaſſador was an heretick, and ſent from an hereticall king, and an enemie to their religion: and therefore that it was not conuenient he ſhould come to entreat of peace with his lord, adding further, that he was not worthie of any peace. Which the Baſſa hearing, adiudged the deſperat villaine the next day to be drawne at an horſe taile through the citie, & then to haue his right hand cut off, and afterward his head, which was accordingly put in execution. After this the Perſian embaſſadour the two and twentieth of the ſame moneth went to deliuer the preſents ſent from his maſter vnto the Grand Signior, and to kiſſe his hand: ſending firſt before him the preſents vpon foure and fortie cammels, whereof foure and thirtie were the kings of Persia,
F and the other ten his own. The kings preſent was an Alcoran, with the authoritie of Ali, as they hold. For this is their cuſtome, alwayes to preſent one ſuch Alcoran vnto the princes to whom they ſend their embaſsadours. It was couered with gold, & garniſhed with moſt pretious ſtones. Hee preſented alſo a booke of hiſtories, couered as the other: he gaue alſo a box, wherein was a very faire pretious ſtone called Balaſso, & two pearles of a wonderfull greatneſſe, with two purſes of an handfull long, full of iewels. Beſides theſe, he preſented alſo eight Firuari or Porceſlane dishes(which we call China dishes)made of most pure earth,kept aboue fiftie yeares buried vn- G der the ground,to the end so to be fined and purified, which(as some say)will melt and dissolue if any poison be put into them. He gaue also two most stately pauilions,twentie great carpets of silke,and many other lesser of silke and gold; also nine faire canopies to hang ouer the ports of their pauillions,things not vsed among the Christians.He gaue also nine very faire carpets of camels haire,nine saddles set with stone after the Persian fashion,seuen staues of siluer,seuen scimitars with red scaberts, seuen bowes with arrowes and quiuers,all wrought with gold and precious stone; he presented also many other carpets called Teftich,made of the finest lawne,and so large,that seuen men could scarcely carry one of them. All the Faulcons were dead by the way.

The presents which the embassadour gaue vnto the great Turke in his owne name, were also H these: an Alcoran, a pauilion faire and large,certaine scimitars,bowes and arrows richly garnished,with certain carpets of silke,and camels haire.After which presents so deliuered,and reuerence done vnto the great Sultan by the embassadour,and thirtie of his followers all in cloth of gold,he returned to his lodging,verie honourably accompanied,as well by the Turkes as them of his owne retinue.First besides many others,there were a great companie of the Spahies and Chiausies,and other courtiers mounted vpon goodly horses,wel furnished and in decent order: here might a man haue seene store of cloth of gold,veluet,damaske,and other kinds of silk. After these there followed about three hundred Persian horsemen, apparelled after their manner, some with gowns made of diuers litle pieces of taffata of sundry colors,representing the picturs of men,women,horses,and other beasts;and some of them imbroidered with flowers and fruits of sundrie sorts;some had also gownes of cloth of gold,but not so faire as the Turkes;and some I of veluet,but very few of cloth: for that the Persians haue no great plentie either of veluet or yet of cloth,except such as they haue from the Portingals that trauell into those Easterne countries;yet of silke and wooll it appeareth they haue great plenty,most part of their gownes being of wooll quilted with bombast. After these horsemen followed many Persian footmen,peraduenture all seruants; after whom came the Turkish horsemen: and last of all came a horse of the embassadors led by a Persian; after which horse followed two hundred Ianizaries: and in the rearward of all came the embassador alone,gorgeously attired both himselfe and his horse. He himselfe was inuested with crimosin veluet,mingled with some other colors: his saddle and bridle were all bedeckt with iewels: the caparison of his horse,was all imbroidred with Turquoies and other precious stones: the horne vpon the top of his Turbant(which the Turkes call Meteuenchia)was altogether wrought with gold,and set with precious stones: in briefe, vpon euery K part of his body hanged iewels of great price. After the embassadour,followed about an hundred and fortie Persian horsemen,and others of his court apparelled as before,some well,some ill,according to their abilitie. Now although the Persians(as is to bee thought)shewed all their pompe,yet they made nothing so faire a shew as did the Turks: neither are they so faire men of complexion,being for the most part of a swart and browne colour,and rather little men than otherwise,not much vnlike to the Spaniards. The embassador being departed,the presents were all brought & shewed to Selymus; who allowed for their ordinary charges fiue hundred ducats a day,for that in deed their number was great,and their beasts many. These expences bestowed L vpon the embassadors,doe presently begin as soone as any of them enter into his dominions; and end,so soone as the businesse for which they come is finished. But long it was not, but that this embassadour hauing concluded a peace betwixt the two great princes,Tamas and Selymus, and dispatched such matters as he came for, returned home againe in PERSIA. The Venetians also now at this same time,by their embassadors sought to renew the league they had made with the great Turke,now expired: which,as it was easily obtained,so was it of small assurance;Selymus the next yeare quarrelling with them, and raising new warres,to the great hurt and disturbance of that state,as shall forthwith appeare.

1569 Selymus now at peace with all the world (a thing of the Turkes not much desired) began to thinke of workes of charitie: and purposing to build a magnificent temple at HADRIANOPLE for his owne sepulture, with a monasterie, a colledge, and an almes-house (as had his M father, and other his aunceſtors before him at PRVSA and CONSANTINOPLE, led thereunto with a vaine and superstitious deuotion)was troubled with nothing more, than how to endue the same with lands and reuenues sufficient for the maintenance of so great a charge: For that the Mahometan kings, are by their superstition prohibited to conuert any lands or possessions

A to ſuch holy vſes, other than ſuch as they haue with their own ſword woon from the enemies of their religion, which they may (as they are perſuaded) as a moſt acceptable ſacrifice, offer to their great prophet: which deuilliſh perſuaſion, ſerueth as a ſpurre to pricke forward euery of thoſe ambitious princes to adde ſomething to their empire. This his deuout purpoſe once knowne, wanted not the furtherance of many ripe heads, deuiſing ſome one thing, ſome another, as they thought beſt fitted his humor. But amongſt many things to him preſented, none pleaſed him ſo well, as the plot laid for the taking of the rich iſland of CYPRVS from the Venetians: a conqueſt of it ſelfe ſufficient, both for the eternizing of his name, and performance of his owne charitable works intended; with a large ouerplus, for the ſupplying of whatſoeuer wanted in his fathers like deuout works at CONSTANTINOPLE. But that which moued him moſt of all, was the glo-
B rie of ſuch a conqueſt, which as his flaterers bare him in hand, might make him equall with any his predeceſſors; who in the beginning of their raign, had vſually done or attempted ſome notable thing againſt the Chriſtians. Heereupon the matter was by Selymus propounded to the great Baſſaes to be conſidered of; without whoſe aduiſe and counſell, the Turkiſh emperors ſeldome or neuer take any great wars in hand. Amongſt theſe graue counſellours, Muhamet the chiefe Viſier Baſſa, a man of greateſt authoritie (vnto whom Selymus was beholden, that he had ſo quietly obtained the empire) and a ſecret friend vnto the Venetians, ſeemed much to miſlike of that motion, perſwading Selymus not to yeeld thereunto: alleadging, beſide the danger and vncertaintie of the expedition, that his father Selyman at the time of his death had charged him ſtraightly, that the league with the Venetians ſhould be religiouſly kept; and that he could not
C with his honour, without iuſt cauſe ſo quickly breake the league, which hee himſelfe had but a little before moſt ſolemnly confirmed. But Muſtapha the ſecond Baſſa, ſometime Selymus his tutor, and therefore of him much honoured, with Piall Baſſa the Admirall (both enuying at the great honour of the Viſier Baſſa) ſo mightily impugned that he had before ſaid, and ſo importuned Selymus with the ſhew both of honour and profit attending that action, as alſo with the eaſineſſe therof (a great part of the Venetian Arſenall being but a little before burnt, and their forces much weakned) that he reiected the counſell of Muhamet, calling him in his choller, Chriſtian (which among the Mahometanes is a word of no ſmall diſgrace:) and yeelding wholy to the perſuaſion of Muſtapha & Piall, preſently commanded preparation to be made both by ſea and land, for the performance of that his reſolution. Which was not ſo couertly carried in the D Turkes court, but that it was diſcouered by M. Antonius Barbarus the Venetian embaſſadour; and not without cauſe ſuſpected by the Venetian merchants, whom the barbarous Turks began now to cut ſhort in their trafficke, looking big vpon them, as men ſuddenly changed, and euill entreating them with hard ſpeeches, the vndoubted ſignes of greater troubles to enſue. The Venetian embaſſadour now out of doubt of the Turkes purpoſe for the inuaſion of CYPRVS, came vnto Muhamet the chiefe Baſſa, complaining of the breach of the league: and putting him in mind of the fidelitie of the Venetian ſtate towards the Turkiſh emperor, requeſting him, that Selymus might not make too much haſt to begin that warre, which would ſet all EVROPE on a broile; but rather by his embaſſadours firſt to declare his minde vnto the Senat, for that ſo it might happily come to paſſe, that all might bee quieted, to the good of both parties without E warre. Which the politike embaſſador requeſted not of the Baſſa for any hope he had to auert the warre, for which the Turke had now all things in a readineſſe, but onely by ſuch an hope of compoſition, to hinder the Turkes endeuours, and to win time, vntill that the State (being fully certified of all theſe matters) might make ready their fleet and forces, and ſo in armes be readie to anſwere their armed foes: neither did hee euer leaue the Baſſa, vntill he had by his meanes procured, That one Cubates ſhould be ſent embaſſadour to VENICE, to proue the minds of the Senatours, whether they would willingly deliuer the iſland, or aduenture to haue it taken from them by force. Theſe things and ſuch like as were then done at CONSTANTINOPLE, being by letters ſent in poſt from the embaſſadour, made knowne at VENICE, brought a generall heauineſſe vpon the citie: for why, that vnderſtanding and prouident State, warned by their former F harmes, of all others moſt dread the Turks forces. Cubates the embaſſadour accompanied with Aloyſius Barbarus the embaſſadours ſonne, and Bonricius his ſecretarie, departing from CONSTANTINOPLE, came by long journeyes to RAGVSIVM, where Angelus Surianus ſent from VENICE to meete him, was readie to receiue him, who being taken into his gallie, brought him to VENICE.

In

In the meane time the Senatours ſitting oftentimes in counſell, were deuided in opinions concerning the chiefe matter they conſulted vpon: ſome there were, that thought it not good to wage warre againſt ſuch an inuincible enemy, nor to truſt vpon a vaine and idle hope, neither to commit all vnto the hazard of ſuch fortune as was vnto them in that warre by the enemie propounded: they alleadged, That they had alwayes vnfortunatly taken vp armes againſt the Turkes, and that therefore they ſhould ſet before their eyes, what harmes they had ſuffered, and how that beſide the loſſes alreadie ſuſtained, they had alwayes in the winding vp of the warres loſt ſomething more: that it were better to depart with CYPRVS, ſo that they might quietly enjoy the reſt, rather than to enter into armes: Time they ſaid, would at length giue them ſome one fit occaſion or other to recouer that they had loſt, and to reſtore their ſtate vnto the former honour; which for the preſent, was aboue their power to maintaine: To put their truſt in their confederates (they ſaid) was but to deceiue themſelues: they ſhould remember how often euen ſmall cauſes of falſe ſuſpition, or hope of profit, or feare of harme, had vtterly fruſtrated and broken in ſunder the moſt ſolemne capitulations of the ſtrongeſt leagues: how often deſtruction had come thence from whence aid was alwaies to haue bin hoped for, they needed not to ſeek farther for examples, than from their own domeſtical affaires. Others were of a contrary opinion, as that the iſland was by force of armes to be defended: ſaying, That nothing could be more diſhonourable, than without fight to depart with ſo notable a part of their ſeigniorie; neither any thing more commendable, than to proue all things for defence of their honour: Neither would the proud Turkes, with whom no aſſured league could bee made (as they ſaid) hold themſelues content with this yeelding vp of the iſland, but by intreating of them and giuing them way, become more inſolent: and when they had taken CYPRVS from them, would alſo ſeeke after CRETE and CORCYRA, and ſo yeelding them one thing after another, ſpoile themſelues of all together: Ambitious and greedy princes (they ſaid) grew more bold and inſolent by other mens feare: and that no great or notable matter was to be done without danger: that hard beginnings had oftentimes merry endings: that the fauor and good will of that inſatiable and greedy nation, was not to be gained but with ſo great loſſe and charge as that ſuch a coſtly peace would bee much more hurtfull then warre it ſelfe: beſide that, it much concerned other Chriſtian princes to haue the Venetian ſtate preſerued, and that therfore it was to be hoped, that they would to the vttermoſt of their power giue them aid. The matter thus debated too & fro, it was in the end reſolued vpon, to take vp armes in defence of their honour, and by plaine force to withſtand the Turke.

The Turkes embaſſador homely entertainted at Venice.

So when Cubates the Turks embaſſadour came to VENICE, neither did any man of courteſie meet him, neither was any honour done vnto him, or ſo much as common courteſie ſhewed vnto him: but being afterward admitted into the Senat houſe with his two interpretors onely, he deliuered Selymus his letters, encloſed in a little bag wrought with ſilke and gold; and ſo whileſt the ſame letters were in breaking vp, and tranſlating out of the Turkiſh language into Italian, deliuered alſo his meſſage by word of mouth as followeth.

What great account the mightie Sultan my dread Soueraigne hath alwayes made of your moſt honourable friendſhip, is therein right well declared; That in the verie entrance of himſelfe into his empire, hee foorthwith and without any hard or newe conditions renewed his league with you: which hee hath on his part alwayes kept moſt faithfully and vnuiolate, worthily grieuing the like kindneſſe not to bee ſhewed on your behalfe, neither the like care of keeping your faith to appeare in you; who by harbouring of Pirats in your hauens, and murthering of his ſubiects, haue oftentimes broken the league. Which iniuries, although they were by warre to haue beene reuenged, yet hath hee, ſo mightie a monarch, hitherto beene alwayes more mindfull of your honour and friendſhip, than of his owne maieſtie and profit. But for ſo much as there is an end of theſe iniuries and wrongs, and that it is now come to that point, That longer to forbeare, might be imputed vnto him rather for cowardiſe than courteſie, as alſo that it much more concerneth your ſtate than him, and that therefore you ought no leſſe than hee to deſire that all cauſes of vnkindneſſe might bee cut off, and order taken, that in ſo great and mutuall good-will, there ſhould bee no falling out by new quarrels daily ariſing: the onely remedie thereof is, if you ſhall deliuer vnto him the Iſland of CYPRVS, the cauſe of all theſe grieuances. Now it beſeemeth you for your great wiſedome, to make ſmall reckoning of ſo ſmall a matter, in compariſon of the fauour of ſo great a prince; which if you willingly of your ſelues yeeld vnto him, you ſhall right wiſely

A prouide for your affaires, and haue him ſo great a monarch alwaies your friend and confederat: wher as if you ſhall ſhew your ſelues obſtinate, and not to yeeld to this his ſo ſmall a requeſt, his purpoſe is by ſtrong hand not onely to take from you the Iſland, the cauſe of the war, but alſo to proſecute you with moſt cruell war both by ſea and land. And thereupon I take God to witneſſe, all the blame of the calamities to enſue of ſo mortall a war, to be imputed vnto your ſelues, as the worthie reward of your wilfulneſſe and breach of faith.

Which ſaid, he in the name of Muhamet the Viſier Baſſa told the Senatours, that he was right ſorie that this breach was fallen out betwixt the emperor Selymus and them: and that although he doubted not, but that they would right wiſely conſider of all things; yet he could not for
B the good will he bare vnto them, but admoniſh them of ſuch things, as he deemed for them both profitable and wholeſome: and therefore did moſt inſtantly requeſt them, and withall aduiſe them, not to enter into armes againſt ſo mightie a prince, neither wilfully to plunge themſelues into ſuch dangers, as they could hardly or neuer find the way out; for that their ſtrength was nothing anſwerable vnto his, and that the euent of that war was like to be vnto them deadly, and therefore he tooke God, and the loue he bare vnto them to witneſſe, that he had in friendly ſort forewarned them of their harmes, and aduiſed them for their good. Giuing them farther to vnderſtand, that Selymus did nothing but thunder out moſt cruell threats againſt their State: which his indignation was raiſed of the manifold complaints brought againſt them to his court at CONSTANTINOPLE.

C Selymus his letters anſwerable to his embaſſadors ſpeech, were alſo full of falſe ſurmiſed grie- The effect of Selymus his letters to the Venetians. uances: he complained, That the Venetians had in warlike manner entred into the frontires of his empire in DALMATIA, and there had done great harme; that they had put to death certaine Turkiſh pyrats whom they had taken aliue: that their Iſland of CYPRVS was an harbour for the pyrats of the Weſt, and that from thence they robbed his peaceable countries, and ſurpriſed his ſubiects trauelling that way for deuotion vnto the temple of MECHA, or otherwiſe about their affaires. And that therefore thoſe cauſes of diſcord might be taken away, and the hinderance of traffique remoued, he required them to yeeld vnto him the Iſland of CYPRVS: which if they refuſed to do, he would by force of armes take it from them; and by force and ſtrong hand cauſe them to doe that which they might the better haue done frankly and of their
D owne accord; and farther, to make them to vnderſtand how farre the Turks did excell all other men in martiall proweſſe. As for the league before made betwixt his father and them, he ſaid he had renewed the ſame, not becauſe he had any liking thereunto, but becauſe he had as then ſet downe with himſelfe, for a while in the beginning of his empire, peaceably to endure all things.

The Venetians, for that they knew the embaſſadours errand before his comming, hauing The anſwere of the Venetians to the Turkes demaunds. now read his letters, gaue him ſuch anſwere as they had before reſolued vpon: which was, That the Venetians had at all times inuiolably kept their leagues with the Othoman emperours, and had in regard therof let ſlip many opportunities and fit occaſions for them to haue augmented their dominions in: That they could without any danger to themſelues, haue deſtroyed the E Turkes fleet both at the RHODES and MALTA, and other places alſo; but that they more regarded their honour, and alwaies thought that nothing better became great and magnificent princes, than to performe their faith once giuen, and in all their actions to be like themſelues. And therfore had diſſembled, and put vp many grieuous and bitter indignities, leaſt they might be thought to haue firſt broken the league: That they had neuer paſſed their owne bounds, or inuaded the Turks: only to haue taken order, that no pyrats ſhould at their pleaſure roame vp and downe the ſeas. Now whereas all duties being on their part ſincerely and moſt religiouſly kept, Selymus complained himſelfe to be wronged, whereas he himſelfe had done the wrong, and had contrarie to the league denounced war againſt them, expecting nothing leſſe: ſithence
F that they could not by the power of the league, they would by force of armes defend that kingdome, which they by auncient and lawfull right poſſeſſed, deliuered vnto them by their auncеſtors: That God in whoſe help they truſted would weigh in indifferent ballance, all mens words and deeds, whom they tooke to witneſſe, that they were the authours of peace, and Selymus the cauſe of warre: and that the ſame God would be now preſent vnto their iuſt complaints, and forthwith after with his power to take reuenge on them, which falſifying their faith & promiſe

In the meane time the Senatours ſitting oftentimes in counſell, were deuided in opinions G concerning the chiefe matter they conſulted vpon: ſome there were, that thought it not good to wage warre againſt ſuch an inuincible enemy, nor to truſt vpon a vaine and idle hope, neither to commit all vnto the hazard of ſuch fortune as was vnto them in that warre by the enemie propounded: they alleadged, That they had alwayes vnfortunatly taken vp armes againſt the Turkes, and that therefore they ſhould ſet before their eyes, what harmes they had ſuffered, and how that beſide the loſſes alreadie ſuſtained, they had alwayes in the winding vp of the warres loſt ſomething more: that it were better to depart with CYPRVS, ſo that they might quietly enjoy the reſt, rather than to enter into armes: Time they ſaid, would at length giue them ſome one fit occaſion or other to recouer that they had loſt, and to reſtore their ſtate vnto the former honour; which for the preſent, was aboue their power to maintaine: To put their truſt H Hard to truſt vpon confederations. in their confederates (they ſaid) was but to deceiue themſelues: they ſhould remember how often euen ſmall cauſes of falſe ſuſpition, or hope of profit, or feare of harme, had vtterly fruſtrated and broken in ſunder the moſt ſolemne capitulations of the ſtrongeſt leagues: how often de-ſtruction had come thence from whence aid was alwaies to haue bin hoped for, they needed not to ſeek farther for examples, than from their own domeſtical affaires. Others were of a contrary opinion, as that the iſland was by force of armes to be defended: ſaying, That nothing could be more diſhonourable, than without fight to depart with ſo notable a part of their ſeigniorie; neither any thing more commendable, than to proue all things for defence of their honour: Neither would the proud Turkes, with whom no aſſured league could bee made (as they ſaid) hold themſelues content with this yeelding vp of the iſland, but by intreating of them and giuing I them way, become more inſolent: and when they had taken CYPRVS from them, would alſo ſeeke after CRETE and CORCYRA, and ſo yeelding them one thing after another, ſpoile themſelues of all together: Ambitious and greedy princes (they ſaid) grew more bold and inſolent by other mens feare: and that no great or notable matter was to be done without danger: that hard beginnings had oftentimes merry endings: that the fauor and good will of that inſatiable and greedy nation, was not to be gained but with ſo great loſſe and charge as that ſuch a coſtly peace would bee much more hurtfull then warre it ſelfe: beſide that, it much concerned other Chriſtian princes to haue the Venetian ſtate preſerued, and that therfore it was to be hoped, that they would to the vttermoſt of their power giue them aid. The matter thus debated too & fro, it was in the end reſolued vpon, to take vp armes in defence of their honour, and by plaine force K to withſtand the Turke.

The Turkes embaſſador homely entertained at Venice. So when Cubates the Turks embaſſadour came to VENICE, neither did any man of courteſie meet him, neither was any honour done vnto him, or ſo much as common courteſie ſhewed vnto him: but being afterward admitted into the Senat houſe with his two interpretors onely, he deliuered Selymus his letters, encloſed in a little bag wrought with ſilke and gold; and ſo whileſt the ſame letters were in breaking vp, and tranſlating out of the Turkiſh language into Italian, deliuered alſo his meſſage by word of mouth as followeth.

giuen,and violating the ſacred league, had enforced them to take vp moſt iuſt and neceſſarie armes,which they would with the ſame courage manage that they had taken them in hand. G

The Turkes embaſſadour ſent away in ſecret from Venice.

With this aunſwere the embaſſadour departed, let out by a ſecret poſterne, for feare of the people; who hauing got knowledge of the matter,were in great number aſſembled to the Court gate,muttering among themſelues,that it were well done to rend in pieces that accurſed Turke, the meſſenger of his faithleſſe maſter. Which outrage it was thought they would in their furie haue performed, had not ſuch as by the commandement of the maieſtrates guarded him,better aſſured him of his ſafetie,than either regard of dutie or the law of nations; he by the way as he went ſtill ſtorming and ſwearing by his Mahomet to be of that ſo great an indignitie reuenged.

This anſwere of the Senat vnto the Turkes embaſſadour concerning warre, was of ſome well liked and highly commended, as full of honour and valour. Others deemed it to ſharpe, liking H of nothing that was ſaid or done, to the further incenſing of the Turkiſh emperour: being of opinion,that they might haue of him obtained a more indifferent peace by courteſie than by rigour. As for the decreed war they vtterly diſliked,for as much as all wars were woful,but eſpecially thoſe which were to be maintained againſt them that are too ſtrong for vs. In ſuch diuerſitie of opinions it appeared, That the Senat ſhould of that ſo honourable a decree reape ſuch commendation, as the euent thereof ſhould affoord (than which nothing is more vnreaſonable:) if things fell out well,then was it wiſely and worthily done; if otherwiſe,than was it like to be reputed a fooliſh,a raſh,and wofull reſolution.

The greater the danger was now feared from the angrie Turke, the more carefull were the Venetians of their ſtate. Wherefore they forthwith ſent meſſengers with letters vnto the Go- I uernours of CYPRVS,charging them with all carefulnes and diligence to make themſelues readie to withſtand the Turke, and to raiſe what power they were able in the Iſland,not omitting any thing that might concerne the good of the ſtate: and at the ſame time made choice of their moſt valiant and expert captaines both by ſea and land,vnto whom they committed the defence of their diſperſed Seigniorie,with the leading of their forces. Hieronimus Zanius was appointed Admirall,Lucas Michael was ſent into CRETE, Franciſcus Barbarus into DALMATIA, Sebaſtianus Venerius into CORCYRA, all men of great honour,experience,and valour,Other meaner captaines were ſent alſo with leſſe charge into the aforeſaid places,as Eugenius Singliticus, a noble gentleman,with a thouſand footmen into CYPRVS, who had alſo the leading of all the horſemen in the Iſland: after whom countie Martinengus promiſed to follow with two thou- K ſand footmen moe. The ſtrong cities were now by the Venetians in all places new fortified, armour,ordinance,and victual prouided,and whatſoeuer elſe they thought needful for defence of their ſtate. And for as much as they well knew they had to do with too mightie an enemie, they by their embaſſadors ſent for that purpoſe, earneſtly ſollicited moſt of the Chriſtian princes to ioine with them in league,and to giue them aid againſt the common enemie, who as he was too ſtrong for any one of them, ſo were he not able to ſtand againſt their vnited forces. But the emperour Maximilian excuſed himſelfe by the league he had not long before made with the Turke for eight yeares,which(he ſaid) he might not breake: yet he had before his eyes a moſt pregnant example,what ſmall reckoning the Turke maketh of his faith and league,which he without any iuſt cauſe had broken with the Venetians. The like excuſe vſed alſo Charles the French king,and L Sigiſmund king of POLONIA, who both ſeemed to be very ſorrie for that the Venetians were fallen out with the Turke, but could not helpe them, for that they were in league with the Turkiſh emperour. Neuertheleſſe the French king did them the courteſie, to offer himſelfe to be a mediator, if they ſo pleaſed, betwixt them and Selymus. The young king of PORTINGAL Don Sebaſtian pretended alſo for his excuſe the great plague which had but a little before raged in his kingdome,and much deminiſhed his people;as alſo that he was to maintaine wars by ſea againſt the Turks in the Eaſt Indies, to the no leſſe benefit of the Chriſtian commonweale than if he ſhould aid the Venetians in the Mediterranean. Onely Pius Quintus then Pope,and Philip king of SPAINE, with certaine of the princes of ITALIE; namely Philibert duke of SAVOY, Guido Vdebaldus duke of VRBIN, Coſmus Medices duke of FLORENCE, and the knights of MALTA, M promiſed them aid,which they afterward moſt honourably performed.

The emperour, the French king and the king of Polonia entangled with their leagues, refuſed to aid the Venetians againſt the Turkes.

What Chriſtian princes promiſed to aid the Venetians.

Selymus of himſelfe angrie with the Venetians, and firme in his reſolution for the conqueſt of CYPRVS,was vpon the report of Cubates his embaſſadours bad entertainment at VENICE,farther enraged. He deemed the maieſtie of the Turkiſh empire contemned, and himſelfe in the perſon

A perſon of his embaſſadour diſgraced: ſeeing that they whom he had thought would haue yeelded vnto any thing, rather than the league ſhould haue bin broken, had ſent him ſuch a ſhort anſwere, and ſo contemptuouſly vſed his embaſſadour, vnto whom they had not affoorded ſo much as common courteſie. It did not a little moue him alſo, that the Venetians had in their letters ſent by his embaſſadour, omitted the glorious titles vſually giuen the Turkiſh emperours. Wherefore in ſome part to ſatisfie his angrie mood, he cauſed Marcus Anthonius Barbarus, the Venetian embaſſadour, and all the Chriſtian merchants of the Weſt throughout his empire, to be clapt vp in priſon, and their ſhips ſtaied vnder an arreſt. And ſetting all other things apart, ſet himſelfe wholly for the preparing of ſuch things as ſhould be needfull for the intended war.

of king Peter, who in the yeare 1423 was by Melechella Sultan of ÆGYPT taken priſoner, but afterwards for the ranſome of an hundred & fifteene thouſand Sultanins, was ſet at libertie and reſtored to his kingdome, paying vnto the Sultan and his ſucceſſours a yearely tribute of fortie thouſand crownes. This Ianus left a ſonne called Iohn, who after the death of his father married F the daughter of the Marques of MONT-FERRAT: after whoſe death he married one Helena, of the moſt noble houſe of the Paleologi in GRÆCIA, by whom he had one only daughter called Carlotte, but by another woman a baſe ſonne named Iames. This king Iohn was a man of no courage, altogither giuen to pleaſure, and according to the maner of his effeminate education, ſhewed himſelfe in all things more like a woman than a man: which Helena his wife, a woman of a great ſpirit, quickly perceiuing, tooke vpon her the ſoueraigntie and whole gouernment of G the realme, gracing and diſgracing whom ſhe pleaſed, and promoting to the eccleſiaſtical digni-ties ſuch as ſhe beſt liked, aboliſhing the Latine ceremonies, and bringing in them of the Greeks, and tooke ſuch further order as pleaſed her ſelfe in matters of ſtate concerning both peace and warre, her huſband in the meane time regarding nothing but his vaine pleaſure: whereby it came to paſſe, that all was brought into the power of the Greeks, the queenes friends. Now the queene her ſelfe was much ruled by the counſell of her nurſe, and the nurſe by her daughter: ſo that the people commonly ſaid, The daughter ruled the nurſe, the nurſe the queen, & the queen the king. The nobilitie aſhamed and wearie of this manner of gouernment, by generall conſent of the people ſent for Iohn the king of PORTINGALS couſin Germane (whom ſome call the king of PORTINGALL) to whom they gaue Carlotte the kings daughter in marriage, with full H power to ſupplie that want of gouerment which was in king Iohn his father in law. He taking the authoritie into his hands, quickly reformed the diſordered kingdome, as wel in matters concerning religion as ciuile policie. The Latine ceremonies were againe reſtored, and the gouerne-ment of the daughter, the nurſe, and the queen brought to an end. But the miſchieuous daughter doubting the countenance of the yong king, perſuaded her mother, as ſhe tendered her own life, to poyſon the king. Which thing the wretched woman, by the conſent of the queene mother (as was reported) in ſhort time performed, and ſo brought that noble prince, well worthie longer life, vnto his vntimely end: whereby the gouernment was againe reſtored to the Greeke queene, who in the name of her weake huſband commanded againe at her pleaſure. But aboue all, the nurſe and her daughter inſulted vpon the young queene Carlotte: which ſhe not well I brooking, grieuouſly complained thereof to Iames her baſe brother, requiring his helpe for redreſſe therof: who not long after ſlew the nurſes daughter, not ſo much in reuenge of the wrong by her done vnto his ſiſter, as to prepare a way for himſelfe for the obtaining of the kingdome:

grieuing inwardly, that ſhe or her huſband whoſoeuer, ſhould be preferred before himſelfe.
Which thing Helena the queene quickly perceiuing, perſuaded the king her huſband to cauſe his baſe ſonne to enter into the orders of prieſthood; and ſo to become a church man, therby to cut off all his hope of aſpiring vnto the kingdome: which the king at her inſtance did, and made him archbiſhop of NICOSIA. In the meane time Carlotte by the perſuaſion of her mother and the nobilitie of the countrie, married Lewis ſonne to the duke of SAVOY: who being for that purpoſe ſent for, came with all ſpeed to CYPRVS. After that the queene mother and the old K nurſe (deſiring nothing more than to reuenge the death of the nurſes daughter vpon Iames, now archbiſhop) deuiſed firſt how to thruſt him out of all his ſpiritual promotions, which were great, and afterward quite baniſh him the kingdome. Hereupon the queene wrote letters againſt him to the Pope, to haue him diſgraded, for that he being a man baſe borne, with his hands embrued with guiltleſſe blood, was vnworthie of holy orders. Which letters by chance came to Iames his hands: who enraged therewith, accompanied with a number of his friends and fauorits, ſodenly entred the Court, ſlew ſuch of his enemies as he found there, diuided their goods amongſt his followers, and as king poſſeſſed himſelfe of the regall citie. In this broile the Greek queene He- lena died, and ſhortly after her huſband alſo. All things being thus in a hurley and out of order, certaine of the nobilitie for redreſſe therof ſent for Lewis the huſband of Carlotte, as for him to L whom that kingdome in the right of his wife moſt iuſtly belonged: who vpon his arriuall was of all ſorts of men ioifully receiued and welcommed as their king. Iames the vſurper vnderſtanding before of the comming of Lewis, and perceiuing the inclination of the people towards him, fled with diuers of his friends to ALEXANDRIA, to craue aid of the Ægyptian Sultan: in whoſe Court he found ſuch fauour, as that he was by the Sultans commandment roially apparrelled and honoured with the title of the king of CYPRVS, which he promiſed for euer to hold of the Sultans of ÆGYPT as their vaſſall and tributarie. At which time the Sultan alſo by his embaſſadors commanded Lewis to depart the iſle: who by all meanes ſought to haue pacified the Sultan, declaring vnto him his rightfull title, yet offering to pay vnto him the wonted tribute, and to allow vnto Iames a yearely penſion of ten thouſand duckats, during his life. But all in vaine, for M Iames ſtill preſent in the Sultans court, and wiſely following his own ſuit, at laſt concluded with the great Sultan (who thought it more honour to make a king than to confirme a king) and re-ceiuing of him a great armie, returned into CYPRVS, where in ſhort time he ſo diſtreſſed Lewis, that he was glad to forſake the iſland, with his wife, and to returne into his countrie; leauing the king-

A kingdome of CYPRVS againe to Iames: who now by the ſupportation of the Ægyptian Sultan poſſeſſed thereof, yet liued not without care of Carlotte and her huſband Lewis, whom he knew the Cypriots wonderfully affected. Wherefore for the more aſſurance of his eſtate, he though it beſt to ioine in league and friendſhip with the Venetians, whom he knew to be of great power at ſea, and of all other fitteſt to croſſe whatſoeuer Lewis ſhould in the right of his wife attempt againſt him. Which league he afterwards made, & the better to confirme the ſame tooke to wife Catherine Cornelia, the daughter of Marcus Cornelius a magnifico of VENICE, being before adopted by the Senat, and euer after, their reputed daughter. Not long after this mariage, Iames died in the yeare 1470, leauing the queene great with child, who in due time was deliuered of a faire ſonne, vnto whom with the mother the Venetian ſtate became tutors, as their
B adoptiue fathers, and in their behalfe tooke vpon them the gouernment of the realm. This child ſhortly after dyed alſo, not without ſome ſuſpition of poyſon, after whoſe death great troubles aroſe in the kingdome, inſomuch that Andreas Cornelius the queens vncle, a moſt graue counſellor, and Gouernour of the realme vnder the queene, was by the conſpiracie of certain noble men ſlaine, and all the iſland readie to reuolt from the queene. For appeaſing of which troubles the Venetians were glad oftentimes to ſend their Admirals with their gallies into CYPRVS, to take order in the matter, and to aid the queene: who at length perſuaded by George Cornelius her brother (whileſt it was yet in her power) as a louing daughter to yeeld vp the kingdome vnto her adoptiue fathers, which ſhe deſtitute both of counſell and power, could not long hold ſo far from her friends, beſet on the one ſide with the great Turke, and on the other with the mightie
C Sultan of ÆGYPT. She I ſay thus perſuaded by her brother, came to VENICE, where ſhe was with the greateſt honour that could be deuiſed, receiued by the duke and the whole State at ſea in their great and goodly ſhip the Beucentaure, and ſo with all royall triumph brought through the midſt of the citie vnto the place moſt richly for the time appointed for the receiuing of her: where ſhortly after, attired in all her royal habiliments, ſhe came in great maieſtie vnto the Senat houſe, and there before the Tribunall ſeat of Auguſtinus Barbadicus, then duke of VENICE, laied downe her crowne and ſcepter, and as a moſt louing daughter reſigned vp her kingdome, to the great honour and profit of her countrie. Thus the kindome of CYPRVS was deliuered into the hands of the Venetians in the yeare 1473; which they peaceably held from that time, paying vnto the Sultans of ÆGYPT ſuch tribut as they had the late king Iames: which yearely
D tribute they in like manner paied vnto the Turkiſh emperours, after that the kingdome of ÆGYPT was by Selymus the firſt conquered in the yeare 1517, as due vnto them by law of armes: with which yearely tribute both Selymus himſelfe, and Solyman after him, held themſelues well contented. But now this Turkiſh emperour Selymus the ſecond, of whom we ſpeake, deſirous both of the honour of ſuch a conqueſt, and of ſo rich a prey, made no account of the accuſtomed tribute, but of the fruitfull iſland it ſelfe: wherof he as is before declared, hath by his embaſſador made a proud demaund, but is thereof denied by the Senat.

Sabellic. Enead. 10. lib. 8.

Selymus throughly furniſhed with all things neceſſarie for the inuaſion of CYPRVS, in the beginning of Februarie ſent a great power both of horſe and foot into EPYRVS and the frontiers of DALMATIA, to forrage the Venetian territorie, eſpecially about IADERA; of purpoſe by that
E war ſo neere at home to withdraw them from the defence of CYPRVS ſo farre off. About the middle of Aprill following he ſent Piall Baſſa with foureſcore gallies and thirtie galliots to keep the Venetians from ſending aid into CYPRVS. This Piall was an Hungarian, borne of baſe parents, but turning Turke, and giuing himſelfe to armes, was firſt preferred for his valour ſhewed againſt the Chriſtians at ZERBI, and afterward by many degrees riſe to the honour of one of the greateſt Baſſaes. He departing from CONSTANTINOPLE, and cutting through PROPONTIS and HELLESPONTVS, came to EVBŒA, and there for certaine daies lay in ſuch order, as if he ſhould haue preſently giuen the enemie battell: but vnderſtanding by his eſpials, that the Venetians grieuouſly viſited with the plague, and ſlowly relieued by their friends, were not like in haſt to come out, he tooke his courſe to TENOS, an iſland of the Venetians, to haue taken it
F from them. This iſland is one of the Cyclades, and was by nature ſtrong, but ſtronger by the induſtrie of the defendants; who liuing far from the Chriſtian countries, & compaſſed about with ſuch cruel and warlike enemies as people far diſtant ſtood in dread of, could neuer for any feare or danger be remooued from the Chriſtian religion, or induced to ſubmit themſelues to the Turks gouernment, as moſt of the other iſlands had. Piall here landing his forces, ſought both by faire means and foule to haue perſuaded the inhabitants to haue yeelded vp their towne; but G

when he could get nothing of them but foule words againe, he began by force to aſſault the ſame. Two daies the towne was valiantly both aſſaulted and defended, but at length the Turks perceiuing how little they preuailed, and that the defendants were reſolutly ſet down for the defence of themſelues and their countrie; ſhamefully gaue ouer the aſſault, and abandoning the Iſland, directed their courſe toward CYPRVS. For Muſtapha, author of that expedition (for his ancient hatred againſt the Chriſtians, made Generall by Selymus) had before appointed Piall Baſſa at a time prefixed, to meet him at the RHODES, and that he that came firſt ſhould tarrie for the other, that ſo they might togither ſaile into CYPRVS.

Muſtapha hauing before ſent a great part of his armie by land into PAMPHILIA, embarked the reſt with Haly Baſſa Generall of the forces at ſea, who yet ſtaied for him with the reſt of the H fleet at CONSTANTINOPLE. This Haly was one of the chiefe Baſſaes, a man of great account, and ſometime an eſpeciall and noted follower of Muhamet Baſſa: but now (as it is oftentimes elſewhere ſeene, that men togither with the change of fortune, change their minds and affections alſo) was become a great fauourit of Muſtapha. Now to colour ſo manifeſt a wrong and breach of the Turks faith, Muſtapha the Generall, according to the Turkiſh manner, a little before his arriuall in CYPRVS, gaue the Venetians there to vnderſtand by letters of his comming, as alſo of his purpoſe for the taking of that Iſland from them: for that without ſome ſuch ſlender denouncing of war vnto them againſt whom it is intended, the Turkes generally account their expeditions not to be altogither ſo lawfull or fortunat as otherwiſe: and therfore writ vnto them in this ſort. I

That the kingdome of CYPRVS by auntient right belongeth vnto the kingdome of ÆGYPT, you are not ignorant; which being conquered by the Turkes, is togither with it become of right a part alſo of the Othoman empire: that iſland wee come to challenge, leading after vs two hundred thouſand valiant ſouldiors, vnto which power, and the wealth of the Othoman kingdomes (all which the moſt mightie emperour is about (if need ſhall be) to ſend thither, and to bend his whole ſtrength thereon (all the vnited forces of the Chriſtian kings are not comparable; much leſſe the Venetians (ſo ſmall a part of EVROPE) forſaken of their friends, can ſuffice. Wherefore, we will and exhort you for the auntient amitie which hath beene betwixt your State and the glorious Othoman family, to yeeld this kingdome vnto the moſt puiſſant emperour, whoſe verie name is become dreadfull vnto all the nations of the world: and quietly, and without reſiſtance to leaue the iſland, with the loue and friendſhip of ſo great a monarch to be for euer inuiolatly kept betwixt him and you. Whereas if you ſhall before ſuch wholeſome counſell fondly preferre your vaine hopes, you are to expect all the calamities of warre, with ſuch dreadfull examples as the angrie conquerours vſe to make of their vanquiſhed enemies. For reſolution whereof, wee yet giue you halfe a moneths ſpace to bethinke your ſelues in: and ſo fare you well. K

Muſtapha Baſſa goeth for Cyprus All this being now in readineſſe, and a moſt royall gallie of wonderfull greatnes and beautie L
by the appointment of Selymus prepared for the great Baſſa the Generall: he togither with Haly Baſſa and the reſt of the fleet, departed from CONSTANTINOPLE, the ſix and twentieth of May, and at the RHODES met with Piall as he had before appointed. The whole fleet at that time
The Turks fleet deſcried in Cyprus. conſiſted of two hundred gallies, amongſt whom were diuers galliots, and ſmall men of warre, with diuers other veſſels prepared for the tranſportation of horſes: with this fleet Muſtapha kept on his courſe for CYPRVS. They of the Iſland in the meane time carefully attending the enemies comming, from their watch towers firſt diſcouered their fleet at the Weſt end of the Iſland not far from PAPHOS: from whence the Turkes turning vpon the right hand, and paſſing the promontorie CYRIO, now called DELLEGATE, landed diuers of their men, who burnt and ſpoiled certaine villages, and with ſuch ſpoile and priſoners as they had taken returned againe M
The Turke land in Cyprus. vnto the fleet: which holding on their former courſe, came at length to a place called SALINÆ (of the aboundance of ſalt there made) where they knew was beſt landing: and there in an open road came to an anchor, where the Baſſaes without any reſiſtance vpon a plaine ſhoare landed their armie.

Now

A Now all the hope of the Christians, was to haue kept the Turkes from landing, which they should with all their strength and power haue done; neither was it a matter of any great difficultie, for had the defendants but kept the shoare, and from the drie and firme land valiantly repulsed their enemies, they might vndoubtedly with their shot and weapons haue kept them from landing, or else haue done them greater harme: knowing in the meane time, that in all the iland was no good harbour for them to put into, and that riding in an open road subiect to all wind and weather, they could not long without danger of shipwrack ride it out: But they, either terrified with the greatnesse of the fleet, or preuented by the celeritie of the enemie, to their great hurt omitted so faire an opportunity, as the woful sequell of the matter declared. It exceedingly encouraged the Turks that they had so easily footed the iland, which they thought they should
B not haue done without a bloudie fight.

The Bassa now landed, presently entrenched his armie, and foorthwith sent the fleet to transport the rest of his forces out of PAMPHILIA into the iland. And at the same time sent out certaine scouts to take some prisoners, of whom they might learne the situation of the country, the best waies to passe them with his army, the strength of his enemies, & what they did, and many other such like things which it concerned him to know. But the greatest question amongst the Turkes themselues was, Whether they should first set vpon FAMAGVSTA or NICOSIA? FAMAGVSTA standeth low, altogether subiect to the scorching heat, which was then great, according as the time of the yeare, and nature of the countrey required: wherefore the Bassa for feare of diseases to arise in his armie of the immoderate heat and vnwholesome situation of the C place, thought it better to begin his warres with the siege of NICOSIA, and to make that citie the seat of the warre, for the conquest of the rest of the iland. So hauing put all things in order, and well viewed the country, and finding nothing he needed to stand in doubt of, he set forward with his armie toward NICOSIA, which was about thirtie miles distant, being the chiefe and richest citie of all the Island. Which way soeuer the armie marched, it spread a great deale of ground; and the neerer it came, the greater was the slaughter of the countrey people, and the number of prisoners taken of all sorts. But when newes of the enemies approach was brought into the citie, a generall feare presaging future miserie possessed the hearts of all men. There was not in the city any valiant or renowmed captain, who as the danger of the time required, should haue taken vpon him the charge: neither any strong army in the iland to oppose against the e-D nemy. The Gouernour of the citie was one Nicholaus Dandulus, a man too weake for so great a burthen; who alwaies brought vp in ciuile affaires, was to seeke how to defend a siege. Of the citisens and country people he had taken vp foure thousand footmen, and a thousand horsmen, all raw souldiors, commanded by the gentlemen of the countrey, men of all others most courteous: but as well the captains as the souldiors, as men brought vp in a plentifull country, fitter for pleasure than for warre. The greatest hope and strength of the citie, was reposed in twelue hundred Italian footmen, and sixe hundred horsemen. The whole number of the souldiors in garrison for defence of the citie, was deemed about eight thousand horse and foot: too weake a companie against so fierce and strong an enemie; and the more, for that the Bassa an olde and most expert Generall was there in person himselfe present, a most seuere and absolute com-E mander, whom it would haue been a hard matter to haue withstood with equall power. The Venetians had euer had great care of the iland of CYPRVS, as lying farre from them, in the middest of the sworne enemies of the Christian religion, and had therefore oftentimes determined to haue fortified the same: yet fearing thereby to seeme to distrust or dread the Turkes, and so giue them occasion of offence, left it still vndone. This citie of NICOSIA standeth in the middest of the iland, in a plaine and champaine countrey, compassed round with a wall, as if it had bin drawn with a compasse, & is in circuit about fiue miles: for the manner of the situation, and magnificent buildings, as well publike as priuat, many haue compared it vnto the beautifull city of FLORENCE in ITALIE: and was for the wholsome and commodious situation thereof notably peopled. This citie had the Venetians of late fortified with new wals, thicke rampiers, and F eleuen strong bulwarkes, according to the manner of the fortification of our time, and had raised three great fortresses for defence of the wall, which they furnished with a strong garrison, great store of artillerie, and other warlike prouision. Neuertheless, they found by experience in this warre, That fortifications are strengthened by the defendants, rather then the defendants by the fortifications,

The description of Nicosia.

The

The Turks before Nicosia.

The two and twentith of Iuly, the Bassa with his armie encamped within a mile and a halfe of the citie, when presently the Turks by troupes issuing out of the campe, rid contemptuously before the wals and gates of the city, and with often & lowd outcries vpbraided the defendants: which by them being answered with silence, was taken as a token of their feare. And Mustapha himselfe comming as neere as he might without danger, tooke full view of the wals and situation of the citie. Shortly after, the enemy drew neerer vnto the citie into a more open plaine, and with their tents filled the lower part of the hill, which they called MANDIA: but the Bassaes tent they set aloft vpon the hill, to the terrour of the defendants and encouragement of the Turkes. The camp being fortified, the Turks with incredible labour and celeritie brought their trenches from farre, and at the first cast vp some few forts, but afterwards, as their armie increased, many moe; which they raised so high, that they ouertopped the wals of the citie, and made the place more dangerous for the Christians to defend. There hauing placed seauentie great pieces of battery, they began to batter the citie both day and night without intermission; with such an horrible thundring, that the earth trembled, the houses shooke as if they would haue fallen downe: at which time many were slaine, both with the deadly shot, and the broken pieces of stones beaten out of the wals: neuer was such a feare as then within the citie of NICOSIA: euerie day the enemie brought his trenches neerer and neerer, and rested not vntill he had with restlesse labour brought them vnto the verie brim of the towne ditch, which the citizens before the comming of the Turks had not well scoured. Being come so nigh, they first skirmished a far off with their small pieces: but afterwards, they not onely battered the wals with their great artillerie, but with small shot, arrowes, and stones, ouerwhelmed the defendants, as if it had been a shower of haile; so to haue driuen them from off the wall and rampiers. In few daies, not onely all the curtaines betwixt three of the bulwarkes, was by the furie of the great ordinance beaten down, but all places thereabout lay full of the dead bodies of the assailants and defendants. For although the Christians fought at great disaduantage, both for the number of men, and indifferencie of the place: yet desperation joyned with extreame necessitie, of all other the greatest weapon, gaue them such courage, as with shot, stones, timber, and such like, to keepe downe their enemies, and defend their wals; and oftentimes to make great slaughter of them, with their artillery and murthering pieces, bent vpon them as at a certaine marke, who the thicker they stood, the greater was their harme. They also oftentimes dismounted many of the great pieces and made them vnseruiceable; and with featherbeds and sackes of cotten wooll, made vp their breaches: which the Turks laboured againe to burne with pitch barrels, and earthen pots full of wild fire. After long fight the Turks entring the ditch, made themselues two wayes to the wals, which they fortified on both sides with fagots and earth, in such sort, as that they were safe from the loupes of the bulwarkes which flankered the ditch. All this quickly performed, some presently set vp scaling ladders: others filled the ditches with brushwood, fagots, and earth; and others in the meane time with mattocks and leauers were digging down the foundations of the bulwarks CONSTANCE and PODOCATERA, taking name of them that had the chiefe charge in the building thereof. The Christians right valiantly endured the first assault of the enemy, and strucke down dead into the ditches many of them that were climing vp the ladders: and had in short time slaine mo than they were themselues in number, and inforced the rest to giue ouer the assault. These things were done in the beginning of the siege, whilst yet both parties were strong: in which hard conflicts a great number of souldiors were lost, and most of the canoniers slaine. After this assault, both parties for a while busied themselues & spent the time in their ingenious deuises: wherein it appeared, that the Turks were much cunninger in deuising of means to take cities, than were those Christians in defending the same.

Nicosia battred and assaulted, & by the Christians valiantly defended.

¶ Now had the Venetians in the first motions of these wars, praied aid of diuers Christian princes, from most part of whom they receiued but cold comfort, as is before declared: yet now at length (though somewhat late) they had drawne into the confederation of this warre, the Pope and the king of SPAINE: by whose example some other princes of ITALIE mooued, put to also their helping hands. The Venetians, as they whom the matter most concerned, had in good time put their fleet to sea; but knowing themselues too weake to encounter the Turks, they lay still vpon the coast of DALMATIA, about IADERA, expecting the comming of the Spanish admirall with his gallies. Two moneths (wherein much might haue been done) were now past in this expedition, and yet no newes of his comming: so that what the speed and industrie of the

Venetians

A Venetians had well prepared, was by the delay and lingering of the Spaniard, marred. Beſides that, the plague began to ariſe in the fleet, lying ſo long in one place; which at length grew ſo hoat, that many of the gallies had neither marriner nor ſouldior left in them: neither did this mortalitie ſo ſeaſe, vntill there were twentie thouſand dead thereof; amongſt whom were many noble gentlemen of great account, which might haue done their country good ſeruice, had they been in time imploied.

Sommer now almoſt halfe ſpent, and the plague well ceaſed, the Venetian Admirall wearie of expecting of the comming of Auria the Spaniſh Admirall; gathering together his fleet which he had before diſperſed, to auoid the infection ſailed to CORCYRA, where hee met with Venerius, another of the Venetian commaunders, who there ſtayed for him, hauing but a little before B taken from the Turks CESTRIA, now called SVPPOTO, a towne vpon the ſea coaſt ouer againſt CORCYRA. The whole fleet of the Venetians being aſſembled together, was an hundred and ſeuenteene ſaile, amongſt which were twelue great galeaſſes; but all too weake to giue battell to the Turkes, as being themſelues ſtronger in ſhipping than in men. Neuertheleſſe, the Admirall ſorie and wearie to ſee the ſpoile of the Venetian territory, and mooued with the diſtreſſe of the beſieged in NICOSIA, rather than for any hope he had with that ſtrength to doe any good againſt the Turkes fleet, departed from CORCYRA towards CRETE, and the twelfth of Auguſt landed at SVDA, a port of that Iſland. In the latter end of this moneth, Columnius the Popes Admirall, and Auria Admirall for the king of SPAINE, arriued there alſo, whom the Venetian Admirall welcomed with great ioy and triumph. The whole fleet of the confederat princes now C at length met together, conſiſted of an hundred ninetie two gallies, and twelue galeaſſes, beſide victualers and other ſmall veſſels, laded with munition and other neceſſarie prouiſion for the fleet. Of theſe gallies the Pope had ſet foorth twelue, the king of SPAINE fortie two, the reſt with the galeaſſes were the Venetians. In this fleet were embarked thirteene thouſand ſix hundred threeſcore ſouldiors: of whom the Pope ſent eleuen hundred, the king of SPAINE three thouſand nine hundred, and the Venetians eight thouſand ſixe hundred and ſixtie. Theſe three great commanders entred into counſell, what courſe to take in their proceedings in this warre; after long diſcourſe too and fro, at length by the perſuaſion of Zanius the Venetian Admiral, reſolued to go directly for CYPRVS, and to giue the Turks battell, in hope thereby to raiſe them from the ſiege of NICOSIA. About the middeſt of September, this great fleet furniſhed with D all things needfull for ſuch an expedition, looſed from CRETE, and with a faire gale of winde ſet forward for CYPRVS; in all their courſe keeping ſuch order, as if they ſhould preſently haue met with the enemie. In the middeſt of theſe troubles died Petrus Loredanus, duke of VENICE, leauing the reſt of the care of that warre to Aloyſius Mocenicus, who ſucceeded him in the dukedome.

The Chriſtian fleet ſetteth forward toward Cyprus.

Whileſt the Chriſtians thus ſlowly proceed in their ſo waightie affaires, Muſtapha in the meane time laid hard ſiege to NICOSIA: and diuiding his armie into foure parts, aſſaulted foure of the bulwarks of the citie, with greater force than at any time before from the beginning of the ſiege. The aſſault was both long and terrible: furie, and the very ſight of the warlike Generall, who was there a preſent witneſſe, and beholder of euery mans forwardneſſe or cowardE diſe (a matter of great moment) beſides their naturall fierceneſſe, carried the Turkes headlong without any perill or danger. And on the other ſide, the greatneſſe of the danger, the feare to loſe both life and libertie, with the hope of reliefe, encouraged the defendants to dare any thing: ſo that the Turks could not approach the wals, or mount the ſcaling ladders, but they were preſently ſlaine, or together with the ladders throwne to the ground. Many of the Turkes were there ſlain, but eſpecially ſuch as were moſt forward: and of the defendants were alſo more loſt than ſtood with the ſafetie of ſo ſmall a number: and for as much as few or none eſcaped out of that fight vnwounded, the poore defendants were brought vnto a ſmall number. Many skilfull men were of opinion, that the citie might haue bin that day taken, if the aſſault had by the Baſſa bin longer maintained, by bringing ſtill on freſh men: but ſuch was his loſſe, as that he was glad F for that time to giue ouer the aſſault, and ſo with diſhonour to retire.

After this aſſault, it was by ſome of the captaines thought good, that they ſhould (whileſt they were yet of ſome reaſonable ſtrength in the citie) ſally foorth vpon the enemy: ſo to make ſhew, that they had yet ſome good hope in themſelues, and withall by ſo ſudden an eruption to performe ſomething vpon the ſecure enemy. Of which motion Dandulus the Gouernour in no caſe caſe liked, as loath by ſuch a dangerous piece of ſeruice to deminiſh the number of the defendants, and ſo to giue the enemie an eaſier meanes to take the citie. Yet ſeeing all the captaines generally of another mind, he yeelded vnto their deſire. So in the hoteſt time of the day, when as the Turkes leaſt thought that the Chriſtians would haue ſallied out, certaine Italian companies vnder the conduct of Cæſar Plouianus of VINCENTIA, and Albertus Scotus, iſſued out by the gate that leadeth to FAMAGVSTA, and vpon the ſudden brake into the enemies trenches: where they found the Turks ſome playing, ſome ſleeping, but fearing nothing leſſe than that the Chriſtians, whom they daily braued, durſt to haue aduentured to come forth. At the firſt entrance the Italians preuailed, and brought a great feare vpon that quarter of the Turks armie, and ſlew many. But when the Turks awaked with the alarum, came running in on euery ſide, the Italians oppreſſed with the multitude, were glad to retire: in which retreat diuers of them were ſlaine, and amongſt them their two leaders Cæſar and Albertus: ſo that this ſally ſerued to no other purpoſe than to weaken the defendants themſelues, and to cauſe the Turkes to keepe better watch and ward againſt ſuch ſudden eruptions. G H

All hope of long defending the citie now almoſt loſt, and that the defendants could hardly ſtand vpon the wals, or ſhew their heads without preſent danger, they for want of better counſel rather than for any hope of good ſucceſſe, ſent out certaine ſcouts, men skilfull of the wayes and paſſages of the countrey (whom they had for great reward induced to vndertake the matter) to craue aid of the countrey people, that there in great multitude fled into the ſafetie of the mountaines: and to tell them, that if they came not in time to their reliefe, their wiues and children, whom they had before ſent into the citie, muſt needs in ſhort time fall into the enemies hand, or periſh with hunger: but theſe meſſengers were by the vigilant enemy intercepted, and in the ſight of the beſieged tortured to death. I

About the ſame time diuers letters were ſhot with arrowes into the citie, to perſuade the beſieged Chriſtians to yeeld themſelues; for that in ſo doing they ſhould find the Baſſa a mild & mercifull conqueror: whereas otherwiſe if they ſhould by wilful holding out delay his victory, they were ſure to endure whatſoeuer could be endured or ſuffered. But when Muſtapha had thus in vaine with hope and feare tried the minds of the defendants, he called foorth to parley certaine ſoldiors that were ſtanding vpon the bulwark called CONSTANTIVS, of whom ſome were by the conſent of the Gouernor ſent forth vnto him: vnto whom Muſtapha by his interpretor complained, That no anſwer was giuen vnto his letters; he ſet forth vnto them the glory, power, and greatneſſe of the Turkiſh empire; and debaſed the ſtrength of the Venetians: then he perſuaded them to yeeld, propounding vnto them the miſeries that would fal vpon them, if the city ſhould by force be taken; which he threatned would be farre greater than the danger the Turkes were to vndertake for the winning thereof: and that therefore it concerned none ſo much as themſelues, whether the citie were giuen vp by compoſition, or els woon by ſtrong hand: He ſhewed vnto them the profit that ſhould ariſe vnto them by yeelding of it vp, & offered vnto them large entertainement, if they would ſerue him: and to conclude, told them, that they ſhould neuer afterwards find at his hands ſo much grace as was at that inſtant offered them. The craftie Baſſa did what he mig ht to haſten the winning of the citie, both for that he doubted the comming of the Chriſtian fleet, and that his great army was exceedingly troubled with contagious and grieuous diſeaſes, ariſing of the immoderat heat and drought in that ſo hot a country. But the ſouldiors thinking any thing more aſſured than the Turkiſh faith, anſwered him, That they did not as yet doubt their owne ſtrength, and that they were ready to endure any thing that could happen, rather than to preferre the vncertain friendſhip of an vnknown prince, before the gracious fauour of ſuch worthy princes as they had ſo good experience of. K L

Muſtapha' Baſſa in vaine perſuadeth them of Nicoſia to yeeld.

This anſwere cut off all the Baſſaes hope for taking of the citie by compoſition: wherewith being both grieued and enraged, he commanded all things to be made ready for the aſſault: and the more to encourage his ſoldiors, promiſed vnto them great rewards and honors that ſhould firſt or ſecond mount the wals. After that he gaue a generall aſſault vnto the citie with all his power: wherein both he as a moſt worthie captaine, and his ſouldiors fought moſt fiercely. You haue to do (ſaid he) with the ſmall and laſt remainders of your enemies, which are ſcarce able to ſtand or hold their weapons in their hands, rather than with enemies indeed: ſhall you not then eaſily ouercome them, being both few and feeble, that haue vanquiſhed them when they were many and luſtie? The end of all your labours is at hand, your hoped rewards approch; onely M

A play you the men,and faint not in this aſſault; the ſpoile of this rich citie ſhall be the worthie reward of your labours; the fruit of all your trauell conſiſteth in this one moment. Whileſt he thus encourageth ſome,and reproueth others, they mindfull of his promiſes, and theſe of the diſgrace,altogether with their thick ſhot ſuffer no man to ſtand in ſafetie vpon the wals,and out of their forts alſo with their great ordinance greatly annoyed the defendants. This done,they attempted by the ruines of the wall,and in other places by ſcaling ladders to haue entred the citie. Which terrible aſſault was by the cruell enemie maintained,not for ſome few houres,but for diuers dayes together without any intermiſſion, freſh men ſtill comming on in ſtead of them that were wounded or ſlaine. Yet did the defendants valiantly indure all that ſtorme,and in ſuch weake caſe as they were,worthily performed what was poſſible for ſo few to do: yet ſtill in hope
B (the poore comfort of men in miſerie) that reliefe might come by the approch of the Chriſtian fleet. At length,when the matter was brought to this point, that the Turkes were in great hope to haue gained the walls, & Muſtapha himſelfe probably gueſſed, That the Chriſtians were now wearie of the long aſſault,and ſore weakned with wounds and other infinit miſeries,not to ſeek in a city ſo hardly diſtreſſed,and was in that his opinion alſo confirmed by certain fugitiue chriſtians: he neuertheleſſe vpon the ſudden cauſed a retreat to be ſounded,and ſo retiring into his trenches,lay ſtil all the next day without any thing doing. The defendants thinking that he had giuen ouer the aſſault,becauſe of ſome aid that was comming to their reliefe,became more careleſſe of the enemy,and vpon the vaine hope of ſuch aid,with leſſe diligence repaired their breaches and prouided for the repulſing of their enemies. But the Baſſa in the meane time had choſen out of his whole army about two hundred of his beſt captaines and ſouldiors,all men of approued valour and agilitie of bodie,whom the next day after he ſent early in the morning, to C make proofe if they could with ſcaling ladders ſecretly and without any noiſe ſet vp,get into the foure bulwarkes which he had before ſore ſhaken with his great ordinance. Theſe reſolute men leading the way,got firſt vp,after whom followed diuers others,and ſo tooke the aforeſaid bulwarkes: when preſently after other companies of their fellowes which ſtood readie for the purpoſe,comming on forward,did with their ſcaling ladders in diuers places recouer the top of the wals: for now the matter was not done by ſecret ſurpriſe,but by open force. In euery one of theſe bulwarkes were ſeuentie Italians,and as many Epirots,who there kept watch and ward; theſe men part aſleepe,as fearing no ſuch danger, and part lying laſily vpon the ground, were there
D ſurpriſed on the ſudden, and ſlaine: otherſome of them awaked with the ſtrange and vncouth noiſe,betooke not themſelues luſtily to their weapons, but forſaking their ſtations leapt downe out of the bulwarks at ſuch places as were next vnto them, ſome for feare ran vnawares into the middeſt of their enemies. Vpon this alarum ſome of the Chriſtian captains came ſpeedily to the wals with their companies,as did Eugenius, who whileſt he in vaine crieth out to ſuch fearefull ſouldiors as he met,that they ſhould not ſo cowardly flie,& ſtayeth others that were flying,was himſelfe ſhot thorow with a ſmall ſhot and ſlaine. Other captaines in other places likewiſe labored in vaine to haue ſtaied the flying ſouldiors, whoſe perſuaſions, requeſts, and authoritie in ſo generall a feare,nothing at that time preuailed.

Nicoſia moſt terribly aſſaulted by the Turks

The defendants thus beaten from the wals and bulwarkes,gathered themſelues into the mar-
E ket place: but the citiſens ſtealing home to their owne houſes,there ſtood in the entrances of the ſame,fearefully expecting the deſtruction of their countrey, together with their owne. In the meane time the Gouernour of ALEPPO with his regiment ſcoured the wals of the citie round about,as he had in charge from the Generall: and without reſpect put to ſword all that he met, armed or vnarmed. At the bulwarke called BARBARVS,it fortuned him to light vpon a companie of Italians,who for a while fought deſperatly, but were in the end ouerthrowne and ſlaine. When he had thus cleared the wals,and left ſuch companies as he thought good in places conuenient for the keeping of them,he came downe into the more open places of the citie: and ſeeing them that were gathered together into the market place to haue caſt themſelues into a ring, and to fight as men altogether deſperat, he cauſed certaine murthering pieces to be bent vpon F them: which they perceiuing, layed downe their weapons, and yeelded themſelues vnto the mercie of the enemie. By and by all the gates of the citie were ſtrongly guarded by the enemie, to the intent that no man ſhould go in or out. Dandulus the gouernor,and Contarenus the biſhop of PAPHOS, with the reſt of the nobilitie,and better ſort of the citiſens,had got themſelues into the towne hall, and there ſtood vpon their guard: vnto whom Muſtapha ſent word, that hee would would take them all to mercie, if they would without further reſiſtance yeeld themſelues. But G

whiles meſſengers run to and fro, the Turks violently brake in vpon them, and there ſlew them euery man. After the death of theſe noblemen, the cruell enemy ſpared none: and hauing ſlaine ſuch as they found abroad in the ſtreets, brake into the houſes, where they made hauocke of all things: yong babes were violently taken out of the armes of their mothers, virgins were ſhamefully rauiſhed, and honeſt matrons before their husbands faces deſpightfully abuſed, churches
A great ſlaughter. were ſpoyled, and all places filled with mourning and dead bodies: the ſtreets were in all places ſtained with blood, for in the citie was ſlaine that day foureteene thouſand eight hundred threeſcore and ſix perſons. Neither was there any end of the ſpoile, vntill the greedy enemie had carried away all the wealth that long peace had heaped vp. It is reported, that the prey there taken, amounted to twentie hundred thouſand millions of duckats: two hundred of the moſt goodly H and beautifull youths were choſen out of purpoſe to bee ſent vnto CONSANTINOPLE, for a preſent for Selymus. In the citie were taken alſo two hundred & fiftie pieces of great ordinance: wherof ſome were by the enemy carried away, and the reſt left for defence of the citie. Thus the famous citie of NICOSIA, ſometime the regall ſeat of the kings of CYPRVS, fell into the hands of the Turks, the ninth day of September in the yeare 1570, in whoſe power it ſtill remaineth.

Muſtapha hauing as he thought beſt diſpoſed of all things in NICOSIA, with the very terrour of his name, rather than by any force, brought moſt part of the reſt of the townes in the iſland vnder his obeiſance; and by faire intreatie and promiſe of good vſage, brought back again vnto their wonted dwellings the rude countrey people, who vpon the comming of the Turkes were fled with all that they had into the mountaines: them as men not to be feared, he commaunded I Cyrene yeelded vnto the Turks. to till and ſow their land as they were wont. The citie of CYRENE is ſtrongly ſituated, not farre from the ſea, and was then well furniſhed of all things needfull for the enduring of a long ſiege. Hither the Baſſa ſent one of his Sanzackes to ſummon the citie, more to prooue the courage of the defendants, than for any hope hee had to haue the citie deliuered vnto him. But Alphonſus Palacius then Gouernour of the citie, terrified with the loſſe of NICOSIA, no ſooner ſaw the enemie, but that without any further deliberation or force vſed againſt him, he deliuered vp the towne vnto the Sanzacke; couenanting only in reward of his cowardiſe, That he might in ſafetie depart from thence with all his garriſon ſouldiors: which was eaſily graunted, and the citie ſurrendred.

Not long after Muſtapha leauing a thouſand horſemen, and three thouſand foot in garriſon K
Famaguſta beſieged. in NICOSIA, marched with the reſt of his armie to beſiege FAMAGVSTA. And the more to terrifie them of the citie, he by a poore countrey fellow, whom he had for that purpoſe ſet at libertie, ſent vnto them in a basket the head of Nicholaus Dandulus, late Gouernour of NICOSIA: and at the ſame time ſent before him diuers horſemen, who vpon their horſmens ſtaues carried the heads of many of the noblemen ſlaine at NICOSIA, wherewith they rid as in triumph about the wals of the citie. Which thing he did, in hope that they of FAMAGVSTA terrified with ſuch a ſpectacle, and the late ouerthrow of NICOSIA, would for feare of like miſerie yeeld themſelues. But deceiued in this his expectation, he encamped his armie about three miles from the Muſtapha raiſeth his ſiege. citie. Afterwards hauing taken view of the citie, and well conſidered of the ſituation thereof, he with wonderfull celeritie caſt vp diuers mounts againſt the ſame, & at the ſame time cauſed bat- L terie to be layed againſt the great tower which defended the hauen: he himſelfe alſo in the mean while battering the gate that leadeth to AMATHVS. But perceiuing by the deſperat ſallies of the defendants, their great courage, and that he was like to haue much more to do in this ſiege than he had in the winning of NICOSIA, and Winter alſo now drawing faſt on (being about the latter end of September) he thought it beſt betime to prouide, that by lying there he hazarded not the honour he had with ſo much labour and danger before gained: and the rather, for that it was commonly reported, that the Chriſtian fleet was at hand: wherefore he riſe with his armie, and retired himſelfe further off into the countrey, where he ſhortly after billited his ſouldiors in the villages round about for that Winter.

The Turks at ſea aduertiſed of the comming of the Chriſtian fleet, prepare themſelues for battell. The Baſſaes at ſea, Haly and Piall, lying before FAMAGVSTA, doubting the comming of the M Chriſtian fleet, which then lay at CRETE, ſent out ſixe galliots to diſcouer the doings of the Chriſtians: who returning with certaine priſoners taken in the iſland of CRETE, declared vnto the Baſſaes what they had learned concerning the Chriſtian fleet, and that it was alreadie vpon the way to CYPRVS. Vpon which intelligence the Baſſaes put their fleet in order of battell, and ſet forward

A forwards towards LIMISSO, to haue met with the Christians: who with a prosperous wind were comming betwixt the islands of CARPATHOS and the RHODES: but there vnderstanding by their espials, that NICOSIA was lost, and that the Turkes were come to besiege FAMAGVSTA, they called a counsell of all the chiefe commaunders in the fleet, to consult what were best to do in so dangerous a case. Columnius the Popes Admirall, and then chiefe commaunder in the fleet, with Zanius the Venetian Admirall, were of opinion, That it were best to hold on their course for CYPRVS, and to relieue FAMAGVSTA: for that it was like that the Turkes proud of their late victorie, were for desire of prey for most part gone ashore into the island, & so left their fleet but slenderly manned. Beside that they alleadged, That the Venetian Senat had expressely decreed, that they should giue the Turks battell. But Auria the Spanish Admirall thinking it, as indeed it was, to be a matter of great difficultie and danger, was quite of another mind, saying, That he could not but maruell, how the Venetian Senatours sitting at their ease in counsell, could before they knew their owne strength, and power of the enemie, the nature of the countrie, and purpose of their foes, determine what were fit for martiall men to doe: vnto whose actions no certaine rule could be prescribed: All the shores (he said) were kept with the enemies garrisons: so that what need soeuer they should haue, they could neither come by water or wood, or put into any harbour. Besides that, the enemie would giue them battell at his own pleasure, & not at others: for that they were not of so much power as to enforce him to fight. And that if the Senate, which vsed to doe all things warily, and with great aduisement, did but see the weakenesse of their gallies, wanting both souldiours and marriners, they would be of another mind. He alleadged further, that they were to wage warre in the enemies countrie, where there was no port to receiue their fleet, no peaceable place, no confederat citie, nor king to friend: whereas the time of the yeare grew euery day worse and worse, when as they had neither harbour to put into, neither were able to abide the sea. And now that NICOSIA was lost, for the reliefe whereof they were come so farre, there was no reason for them longer to stay, the enemie so strongly possessing the island with his great armie, as that there was not any hope to doe any good against him. And that to keepe him from victuall, and so to distresse him, was not possible, lying in a most fertile island, and in the middest of his owne dominions: whereas they who were to be still relieued from far, should sooner feele the want than the enemie. He was victualled (as he said when he came from home) but for three months, in hope to haue made a short dispatch, and had now two thousand miles home. He said moreouer, That he had expresse commaundement from the king, to returne to MESSANA before Winter; and that therfore so soone as the moneth was out, he would depart. The Venetian Admiral desiring nothing more, than by battell at sea to ouerthrow the Turks, and so to relieue the distressed Cypriots, vrged the Spanish Admirall to proceed in the voyage, saying, That so great aid was not sent from the Pope and the king onely for the reliefe of NICOSIA, but to deliuer the whole island from the danger of the Turke. Of the same opinion with the Spanish Admirall were diuers other great captains in the fleet, namely Sforția; who said, That nothing was to be so done, as might rashly expose vnto casualtie or power of the enemie, the publike fortune and maiestie of the Christian commonweale, which was in that fleet greatly hazarded: That longer stay might bring farther danger. That in that fleet consisted the whole welfare of the commonweale, wherein more might be lost, if any mishap should chance therunto, than was good to be gained by the relieuing of FAMAGVSTA. The great commaunders thus differing in opinions, the counsel was in a heat dissolued, and nothing concluded. Vpon which so foule a disagreement the fleet began now to returne backe againe, but so, as that it was not now as before one, but three fleets, euery Admirall by himselfe drawing after him his fleet. Auria the Spanish Admirall, who first returned, after he had been two daies wonderfully with tempest tossed at sea, came at last to CARPATHOS, and departing thence, with much adoe arriued with his fleet in the island of CRETE: from whence he by a messenger sent of purpose, requested leaue of Columnius the Popes Admirall, that he might with his good will presently returne home: whereunto Columnius answered, That he would giue him no such leaue: but rather charged him in the dutie hee ought to the good of the Christian commonweale not to depart, but to keepe companie with the rest of the fleet, vntill it were past ZACYNTHVS; that so with their vnited forces they might more safely passe by their enemies countries: wheras otherwise, if any thing should by his hastie departure fall out otherwise than well, it should be imputed to the dishonor of him that had for-ſaken his friends, and not of them that were ſo by him forſaken. But vnto this Auria anſwered, G

That the welfare of the kingdomes of SICILIE and NAPLES, conſiſted in the ſafetie of this fleet: and that therfore hauing haſt home, he could not ſtay to keepe companie with their heauie galeaſſes and other ſhips of burthen, which muſt oftentimes be towed forward. This he openly pretended for his departure, yet ſecretly ſought (as it was deemed) to find an occaſion whereby to withdraw himſelfe (being as he accounted the better man at ſea) from the command of Columnius, whereunto he was full ſore againſt his will ſubiect.

After they had thus a while ſpent the time with reaſoning the matter too and fro, Auria of himſelfe without farther leaue hoiſed ſaile, and ſo at length came to MESSANA in SICILIE, neither did Columnius and Zanius ſtay in thoſe quarters long after him, but hauing endured much trouble at ſea, arriued at laſt, Columnius in ITALIE, and Zanius at CORCYRA. Thus this mighty fleet, which had all this Sommer filled the Mediterranean with all the countries thereabout with the expectation of ſome great matter, was by the diſcord of the Generals diſſolued, hauing done nothing at all worth the remembrance. In this idle expedition many thouſands of right valiant men loſt their liues, being dead of diuers diſeaſes proceeding of change of diet, and vnſeaſonableneſſe of the weather in that hoat climat; amongſt whom was the valiant countie Hieronimus Marteningus ſent by the Senat with three thouſand ſouldiors, for the defence of FAMAGVSTA; who alſo moſt of them periſhed in that voiage. The Venetian fleet was no ſooner arriued at CORCYRA, but Auguſtinus Barbadicus was ſent from the Senat to diſcharge Zanius the Admirall of his office, and to ſend him priſoner to VENICE: in whoſe roome was placed Sebaſtianus Venerius Gouernour of that iſland. I

The Turks Baſſaes at ſea, certainely aduertiſed of the departure of the Chriſtian fleet, were not a little prowd thereof; as by the confeſſion of their enemies, their betters. Yet for as much as the ſeas began then to grow rough, and no enemie appeared, they thought it to no purpoſe to keepe the ſeas with ſo great a fleet, and therefore reſolued to leaue Muſtapha with his armie in CYPRVS, the next yere to make an end of his conqueſt ſo happily begun; and ſeuen gallies at ſea before FAMAGVSTA, that no reliefe ſhould that way be brought into the citie, and ſo to depart themſelues with the reſt of the fleet to Winter in more ſafer harbours: Piall with the greater part of the fleet to CONSTANTINOPLE, and Haly with the reſt to the RHODES. And becauſe they would for their greater credit prepare ſome worthie preſent for their great lord and maſter Selymus, they fraughted a great gallion of Muhametes the chiefe Baſſaes, and two other K tall ſhips, with the richeſt of the ſpoile of NICOSIA, and the choice of the priſoners there taken. But when they were now readie to hoiſe ſaile and depart, as they were carrying out of the gallion certain barels of gunpounder which Muſtapha the Generall had commaunded for his better prouiſion to be landed, a noble gentlewoman captiue in the gallion, wiſhing rather to die with honour than to liue diſhonoured, ſecretly fiered the pouder: by force wherof, the ſame gallion with the other two ſhips were ſuddenly rent in pieces, and all that was therein blowne vp into the ayre. Of all that were in thoſe three veſſels, none eſcaped with life but the maſter of the gallion and two Chriſtian captiues, but there periſhed togither with the rich ſpoile. But the Baſſaes following their former reſolution departed from CYPRVS, and afterwards in ſafetie arriued at CONSTANTINOPLE: where both then and all the Winter following, ſuch preparation was L in making, as if Selymus had the next yeare purpoſed ſome far greater matter than the conqueſt of CYPRVS.

A deſperat fact of a woman.

Whileſt Sebaſtianus Venerius (now the Venetian Admirall) yet lay at CORCYRA, the rude Acroceraunian people, more famous for nothing than for their theft, and want of all things, by truſtie meſſengers promiſed to deliuer into his power the ſtrong caſtle of CAYMERA, kept by a garriſon of three hundred Turks, if he himſelfe with a few gallies and a conuenient number of footmen would come into the bay of AMBRACIA; offering him good hoſtages for the better aſſurance of their promiſe. Of which their offer he gladly accepted, and forthwith went to the appointed place with a companie of horſemen, three thouſand footmen, and certaine gallies; who were no ſooner landed, but that preſently a thouſand of thoſe rough mountaine people M came vnto them: with which power taking the hill, and repulſing the Turks garriſon; comming to the reliefe of the caſtle, he ſo diſcouraged them that were in the hold, that the next night they let themſelues downe with ropes into the valley below; but being deſcried, were there all either taken or ſlaine. And ſo in a verie ſhort time was that ſtrong caſtle taken by the Admirall, and a

A ſtrong garriſon of Chriſtians put into it in ſteed of the Turkes.

Not long after, Quirinus the Viceadmirall, a man of great courage, landed with foure and twentie gallies in PELOPONESVS neere the bay of MAINE, and there vpon the ſudden both by ſea and land beſieged a ſtrong caſtle, which the Turks but two yeres before had built to trouble the Chriſtians paſſing that way. Which caſtle he tooke in fiue houres, and put to the ſword fiue hundred Turks which lay there in garriſon, and raſing it down to the ground caried away with him foure and twentie great pieces of artillerie into the Iſland of ZACYNTHVS. Quirinus taketh a caſtle of the Turks in Peloponeſus.

At ſuch time as Muſtapha before lay at the ſiege of FAMAGVSTA, Bragadinus Gouernour of the towne, with Baleonius a moſt expert captaine, from out of the high places of the citie beholding the great armie of the Turkes (which couered the ground almoſt as far as they could ſee)
B with their cunning manner of their fortification, were therewith much moued: and therefore thought it good betime to giue the Senat knowledge thereof, and in ſo great a danger to craue their aid. And that their requeſt might be of more weight and haue the better hearing, they entreated Hieronimus Ragazonius biſhop of the citie, a reuerend and deuout man, to take vpon him that charge, vnto whom they ioined Nicholas Donatus, a noble gentleman of CYPRVS. The biſhop at the firſt was verie vnwilling to go, as loath in ſo great danger to leaue his flock: but at length ouercome with the entreatie of the Gouernour, and teares of the beſieged, ſuffered himſelfe to be entreated. And embarked in a gallie about the going downe of the Sunne, looſing out of the hauen, and hoiſing ſaile, with a faire gale of wind paſſed through the Turks fleet, which
C then lay at anchor before the citie; and by the comming on of the night, and by the great way he made, got him quickly out of ſight. After foure daies ſayling he came to CRETE, and ſo at length to VENICE: where, as he had before vnto the Admirall, ſo there vnto the Senat he declared the dangerous eſtate of the citie, the ſtrength of the enemie, the weakneſſe of the defendants againſt ſo great a multitude, and the want of many things needfull for the holding out of the ſiege: and to be briefe, that except they ſent ſpeedie reliefe, the citie could not be kept. Zanius at that time Admirall, carefull for the beſieged, cauſed foure tall ſhips to be laded with all maner of victuall, and a great quantitie of gunpouder, and put into them ſeuenteene hundred ſelect ſouldiors: all which he ſent from CRETE to the reliefe of them of FAMAGVSTA, appointing M. Antonius Quirinus with twelue of the beſt gallies in all the fleet, to conduct the ſame thither. This Quirinus was a moſt valiant and expert captaine, meanely diſcended, but by ſeruice
D growne to be a man both of great reputation and wealth: and therefore Zanius at his departure to VENICE, although he knew the matter required haſt, yet preſuming vpon his wiſedome and careſulneſſe, left it to his diſcretion, when, and how to performe that piece of ſeruice. Quirinus (not without cauſe) doubting to ſet forward, the ſeas as then full of the Turks gallies, ſtaied vntill Winter was well ſpent, and then ſetting forward the ſeuenteenth of Ianuarie, kept aloofe from the ſhips, which with a proſperous wind came directly before FAMAGVSTA: in hope, that the Turks gallies which lay in the mouth of the hauen, might ſo be drawne farther into the ſea, in hope of ſome good bootie, he himſelfe ſtaying with his gallies in place conuenient out of ſight. Neither had the euent deceiued his expectation, had not his fierce nature hindred the ſame: Quirinus a valiant gentleman 1571
E for the Turks vpon the dawning of the day deſcrying the ſhips, made haſtily toward them. But Quirinus not able longer to ſtay himſelfe, and before deſirous to fight with them, ſhewed himſelfe too ſoone in the open ſea before the enemie was come neere the ſhips: whom as ſoone as the Turks had ſeene, and that there was no hope to withſtand him, they ſtaied their oares, and with all ſpeed retired. But Quirinus following faſter vpon them, they were glad for ſafegard of their liues, with all the power they could, to run three of their gallies aground, and to run to ſhoare themſelues: which three gallies, Quirinus did with his great ordinance beat all to pieces, and ſore gauled the other foure. The hauen thus cleared, he returned againe vnto the ſhips, and brought them with the ſupplie in ſafetie to FAMAGVSTA; vpon whoſe arriuall was great reioicing, both amongſt the garriſon ſoldiors & the citiſens: for the Turks thought nothing leſſe than F that the Chriſtian gallies durſt at that time of the yere haue put into thoſe dangerous ſeas: which Quirinus well knowing, came forth againe with his gallies, and roaming vp and downe at his pleaſure, tooke two of the enemies ſhips richly laded comming vnto the camp, with which bootie he enriched his ſouldiors: and farther incited by occaſion, landed his men in diuers places alongſt the ſea coaſt in PAMPHILIA, and there did great harme. So hauing filled the countrey with the terrour and fame of his name, he returned againe to FAMAGVSTA, where he notably encouraged the garriſon ſouldiors, perſuading them to remember their wonted valour: and fil- G ling them with hope, that the Chriſtian fleet would be with them in the beginning of the next Sommer, to deliuer them from their enemies, and to raiſe the ſiege. So hauing in twentie daies diſpatched that he came for, and done what good ſeruice elſe he could, he departed from FAMAGVSTA, and within fiue daies after arriued at CRETE.

Negligence ſeuerely puniſhed by Selymus.

It was not long, but Selymus had knowledge of this late ſupplie put into FAMAGVSTA, and of the harmes done by Quirinus; wherwith he was ſo highly diſpleaſed, that he commanded the Gouernor of CHIOS his head to be ſtruck off, and the Gouernor of the RHODES to be diſgraced, whoſe charge it was to haue kept thoſe ſeas ſo that nothing ſhould haue bin conueied into FAMAGVSTA. Neither ſpared he Pial Baſſa, but depriued him of his Admiraltie, and placed Pertau Baſſa Admirall in his ſtead, for that he had not the yere before diſcomfited the Chriſtian fleet at H the iſland of CRETE, as it was ſuppoſed he might haue done.

From the beginning of this warre, the Venetians, with Pius Quintus then Pope, who greatly fauoured their cauſe, had moſt earneſtly from time to time ſolicited Philip king of SPAINE, to enter with them into the participation and fellowſhip of this war; which their requeſt ſtanding in deed with the good of his ſtate, he ſeemed eaſily to yeeld vnto: and therefore ſent Auria his Admirall the laſt yeare with his fleet to aid them, but with ſuch ſucceſſe as is before declared. As for to ioine with them in perpetuall league and confederation (as it was tearmed) againſt the common enemie, that he referred vnto the diſcreet conſideration of the two Cardinals, Granuellan and Pace, and Io. Zunica his embaſſadour, ſent for that purpoſe to ROME: promiſing to performe whatſoeuer they ſhould on his behalfe agree vpon or conſent vnto. At the ſame time, and I for the ſame purpoſe lay alſo Surianus the Venetian embaſſadour at ROME: vnto whom the Pope ioyned Cardinall Morone, Aldobrandinus, and Ruſticucius, with certaine other of the chiefe Cardinals, as men indifferent to both parties, to moderate and compoſe ſuch differences and difficulties as ſhould ariſe betwixt the aforeſaid commiſſioners for the king, and the Venetians, concerning the intended league, But theſe graue men, ſent from ſo great princes about ſo great a matter (as well there could not be a greater) were no ſooner met togither and ſet in conſultation, but that forthwith they began to iarre about the capitulations of the league. Neceſſarie it was thought, that a league ſhould be agreed vpon againſt ſo puiſſant & dangerous an enemie, but to find the way how the ſame might be concluded to the contentment of all parts, ſeemed a matter almoſt impoſſible. Oftentimes theſe commiſſioners ſat, but the oftener the farther K off: if one difficultie were by the diſcretion of ſome appeaſed, in ſtead therof at the next meeting ariſe three others. The chiefe commaund of the armie to be raiſed, the proportion of the forces, the maner of the war, with many other ſuch like circumſtances incident to ſo great actions, made great differences among them: but moſt of all, the indifferent proportioning of the charge, the Spaniſh commiſſioners ſeeking to turne the greateſt part thereof vpon the Venetians, & the Venetians vpon them: which was done with ſuch earneſtneſſe and ſtudie of euery man towards his owne part, as if they had all there met for the bettering of the particular ſtate from which they were ſent, rather than for the common good: For the Spaniard, who in former time was glad to keepe the frontiers of his large dominions in ITALIE, SICILIE, SARDINIA, CORSICA, L MAIORCA, MINORCA, yea and of SPAINE it ſelfe, with ſtrong garriſons for feare of the Turke: now that the warre was riſen betwixt the Venetians and him, and the daunger therof tranſlated farre off into other mens territories; enioyed now in his owne an vnwonted quietneſſe, to the great content of his ſubiects, & eaſing of his own charge in maintaining of ſo many garriſons as before: whereof many were now thought needleſſe. Beſides that, he by the indulgence of the Pope, raiſed ſuch great ſummes of money vpon his cleargie, as was thought by many ſufficient to diſcharge the charge of the warre: For which cauſes he cared not for entring into any farther league with the Venetians, but as it were in courteſie to ſend them a yearely aid to maintaine a defenſiue lingering war, & ſo to keepe the Turke buſied vpon the Venetian a far off from his owne territories. But the Venetians, in whoſe dominions the fierce enemie daily raged, as wel in DALMATIA as in CYPRVS, were euen for the ſame reaſons moued to haſten and M ſhorten the war, that the Spaniard was to protract it: for beſide the neernes of the danger, & the infinit calamities by thē ſuſtained, their yearly reuenues ariſing for moſt part of their cuſtomes, were gteatly empaired, and their traffique (the maintenance of their State) almoſt quite cut off; which cauſed them more earneſtly to confederat themſelues with the Spaniard. But hard it was

A to ioine in one, States ſo far differing in reſpect of their particular profit, and almoſt by nature contrarie. Thus was all the laſt yeare, and a great part of this alſo, ſpent by the aforeſaid commiſſioners in turbulent and fruitleſſe conferences, but nothing as yet concluded concerning the league: which troubled the Venetians not a little, being of themſelues too weake for ſo mightie an enemie as was Selymus, and yet no other certaine ſtrength from their friends to reſt vpon. But whiles they ſtood thus doubtfull of the league with SPAINE, and quite out of hope of any attonement with Selymus; vpon the ſudden when they leaſt expected, it was by good fortune laid as it were in their laps, to make choice whether they would (as they had before moſt earneſtly deſired) ioine in league with the Pope and the king of SPAINE, or elſe fall to agreement with Selymus: and that by this meanes.

B Muhamet the chiefe Baſſa, a ſecret friend vnto the Venetians, of whom he had been of long time honoured, had no great liking of the proſperous ſucceſſe of Muſtapha in CYPRVS, and therefore deuiſed night and day how to croſſe the riſing of him, the competitor of his honour; and withall, to help the Venetians vnto whom he was much beholden. He by ſecret meſſengers had before oftentimes ſounded the mind of the Venetian embaſſadour, and put him in hope that if ſute were made vnto Selymus for peace, it would vndoubtedly be graunted; and farther promiſed, to be himſelfe an helper and interceſſor for the ſame. But finding the embaſſadour to caſt many perils, and to giue ſmall credit vnto their talke, who had before by truſting them deceiued him: he did not ſo giue ouer the matter, but referring the farther tempering with him vnto a more fitter time, for the preſent he tooke opportunitie to enter into diſcourſe with Selymus C himſelfe concerning the Venetians, and told him that it was reported, That they wearie of the long altercation they had had with the Spaniards concerning the league, and now deſtitute of all hope & aid, would now happily of their own accord grant him that which they had before to him denied. And perceiuing him not vnwillingly to heare ſo of them, he proceeded farther in the matter, to know his pleaſure what he would haue done therein: cunningly by the way of good counſell perſuading him vnto that which he moſt wiſhed himſelfe to be done. Immediatly after he ſecretly aduertiſeth M. Antonius the Venetian embaſſadour, That there was great hope of peace, and that therfore the Senat ſhould vnder the colour of exchanging of priſoners, and redeeming of merchants goods, ſend ſome fit man to CONSTANTINOPLE, with whom he would in ſecret confer of all ſuch matters as might farther the pacification. This vnexpected D newes from the embaſſador brought to VENICE, was well heard of the Senat: for they thought it much to concerne their State, to haue a way opened whereby vpon tollerable conditions to make peace with the mightie tyrant, if that the league betwixt them and the king of SPAINE could not be concluded. Hereupon they made choice of one Iacobus Ragazonius to go about the matter to CONSTANTINOPLE. This Ragazonius was a man of great ſpirit and dexterity of wit to take any matter in hand, and of a great reach and deepe iudgement in the managing thereof; and withall exceeding rich, and of ſo good carriage of himſelfe, as that he was therfore famous: all which things were thought of great moment, to win the fauour of that couetous and barbarous nation. The Senat, although they had not yet made proofe what men thought of the matter, yet doubted they not, but that vpon the report of the ſending of this notable man, E men would thereof diuerſly diuine euery man according to his own fantaſie: and that many of the wiſer ſort would indeed ſurmiſe, as the truth was, that he was ſent for to intreat of peace, although the exchange of priſoners, and redemption of merchants goods, were the onely things were openly pretended: and the Senat, although they thought it not amiſſe to haue it ſo vnderſtood, becauſe ſuch a ſuſpition was like enough to ſtir vp both the Pope and the Spaniard to accept of ſuch conditions of the deſired league, as they had before reiected; yet leaſt the hope of the league (which they for many cauſes thought good to cheriſh) thereby cut off, might cauſe the Pope and the Spaniard both to be cold in the matter, they certified both them and other Chriſtian princes, of the ſending of Ragazonius; yet of purpoſe concealing the ſecret drift of his going. Ragazonius throughly inſtructed by the Senat, was in a gallie conducted to RAGVSIVM; which F Caſſan-beg (the great Baſſa Muhametes ſonne, Gouernour of LIBVRNIA) vnderſtanding, met him vpon the frontiers, and told him, That he was ſent by his father both to meet him and ſafe conduct him: which the martiall man, contrarie to the manner of the Turks courteoully performed, honourably entertaining him, and afterward ſending him with a ſafe conuoy vntill hee was out of all danger. Ragazonius comming to CONSTANTINOPLE, was there by night ſecretly cretly receiued into the citie, and at firſt brought into a little baſe Inne, and a guard ſet ouer him G that he ſhould ſpeake with no man. But after three daies hee was remooued to a much better place, and preſented with diuers kinds of daintie diſhes of ſundrie kinds of meats. The effect of his meſſage was, to trie the Turkes minds, and after conference had with the embaſſador to entreat of peace. At length hauing acceſſe to the great Baſſa Muhamet, after he had deliuered vn-

to him (as he had in charge) his meſſage concerning the exchange of priſoners and merchants goods; Muhamet asked him, if he had nothing in charge from the Senat concerning a pacification to be made? Wherunto he anſwered, that he had, but that he muſt firſt ſpeake with the em-baſſadour, without whoſe aduice and counſell he was not of himſelfe to do any thing. At that firſt encounter the Baſſa to terrifie the meſſenger, declared vnto him the innumerable multitude of the Turks horſemen and footmen, which no nation (as he vainely boaſted) was able by force H or policie to withſtand: alſo his great and inuincible fleets at ſea, with whom all the power of the Chriſtians vnited togither, was not able to encounter; and much other ſuch like ſtrength and wealth of his: and that the Venetians were now no more able to withſtand Selymus, than they were in times paſt to reſiſt his father and his anceſtors. Yet he diſcourſed of this matter in ſuch ſort, as not thereby to cut off the hope of the pacification: but ſaid, That the Venetians ſhould beſt haue prouided for the ſafetie of their ſtate, if at the firſt they had liſtened vnto him, friendly and faithfully aduiſing them not to haue entred into armes, in which doing they ſhewed more courage than power: and that yet, as the caſe now ſtood, and that Selymus was in a moſt aſſured hope, in ſhort time to become lord and maſter of the whole iſland, it ſhould bee to their great good to preferre the fauour and good will of the Turks before war, and by the voluntarie yeel- I ding vp of CYPRVS gaine vnto themſelues perpetuall peace and tranquilitie. As for the iſland it ſelfe, it was not now worth the hazarding of ſo many dangers, being deſtitute of inhabitants, which were almoſt either ſlaine or fled, the cattell driuen away, the townes ranſackt and burnt, and the whole countrie, of late moſt pleaſant and beautifull, now ſo ſpoyled & vnpeopled, that it could not of long time yeeld vnto him that ſhould haue it, any profit or commoditie. Raga-zonius being a coole and aduiſed man, and withall perceiuing that the Baſſa was not to be contraried in his talke, ſo tempered his anſwere, as that he ſhewed no token of feare, neither let any word fall that might offend his eares, ſaying, That he was right glad, that he had found ſo much fauour in his ſight, as to haue acceſſe and leaue to talke with ſo great a prince, who for wiſedome and grauitie excelled all the reſt of the princes of the great emperors court: who ſo farre as he K might, with his loyaltie towards his ſoueraigne, had alwaies moſt gratiouſly fauoured the Venetian ſtate: who alſo not ignorant of the vncertaintie of worldly things, knew of all others beſt that on both ſides were both men and armes, and that moſt mightie princes had oftentimes with ſmall forces bin ouerthrowne, the euent of things neuer deceiuing men more than in matters of warre; no power vpon earth being ſure, which could not within ſome bounds containe the ſtrength of it ſelfe: and that therefore he was in good hope, That he ſo worthie a man knowing beſt what belonged both to peace and warre, would deuiſe ſome ſuch courſe as might ſort to the good and quiet both of the Venetian ſtate and Turkiſh empire: in which doing hee ſhould find ſufficient matter for his eternall praiſe and glorie, if by his diſcreet wiſedome a pacification might be made. Such talke hauing paſſed at their firſt meeting, Ragazonius had leaue to ſpeake L with the embaſſadour, who then lay at PERA vnder ſafe keeping. In paſſing ouer to PERA, Ragazonius might ſee a fleet of Turkiſh gallies one encountering with another, in manner of a fight at ſea, which the Turks had of purpoſe prouided, to ſhew vnto him as a ſtrange ſight. Whereat Ragazonius ſmiling, ſaid vnto the Turks that were preſent with him, That it was a pretie childiſh ſport for him that had neuer ſeene the like before: but not to the Venetians, who were acquainted with theſe matters in earneſt; as the Turks ſhould well know, whenſoeuer they had a mind to make proofe what they were able to do at ſea. Ragazonius comming to the embaſſadour, had conference with him at large, & reſolued with him what to do in his negotiation. And ſo returning to Muhamet, eaſily diſpatched with him for the exchange of priſoners & marchants goods:
but when they came to talke of the capitulations of a pacification to be made, at the firſt they M were ſo farre off, as if they would neuer haue met: but after much and often conference, ſome-time the one yeelding, and ſometime the other, the matter was brought to ſome conformitie, ſo that there was no ſuch great difference betwixt them, but that they were like ynough to haue agreed. Pius the Pope, and Philip the king of SPAINE aduertiſed of the ſending of Ragazonius

A to CONSTANTINOPLE, began to imagine as the truth was, that hee was ſent about ſome treatie of peace, what colour ſoeuer the Senat pretended to couer the ſame. And therefore doubting leaſt the Turkiſh emperour hauing once made peace with the Venetians, ſhould turne his great forces already prepared, vpon the one or both of them, they thought it good for troubling of that peace, now with all ſpeed to haſten the league, which they had ſo long before delayed. For which purpoſe the Pope ſent the noble Colampius to VENICE: who admitted into the Senat, declared at large how matters had paſſed at ROME concerning the league: and afterwards what profit might ariſe of ſuch a league concluded, and what harmes might enſue of the ſame, neglected. And to haſten the matter, ſet as it were before their eies, how much it concerned the common good, but them eſpecially, to haue the ſame with ſpeed confirmed. As for to giue any
B truſt vnto the Turks, was (as he ſaid) not beſeeming their deepe wiſedome and iudgement, ſeeing they ſo often had beene by them rather deceiued than vanquiſhed. In concluſion, he requeſted them, That for his Holineſſe ſake, moderating in ſome part their hard demaunds, they would with ſpeed ioyne with him and the king in a moſt firme and Chriſtian league. Although this ſpeech of Columnius had much moued the minds of the Venetians, ſo that many enclined to the league, yet were there many doubtfull thereof, and could not be reſolued whether it were better to embrace peace with the Turke, or the league with the Pope and the king. Peace pleaſed them, neither did the league diſpleaſe them: it ſeemed a matter moſt difficult whether to reſolue vpon. They were fearefull of the league either receiued, or reiected: the hope of victory, the inconſtancie of the Turkes, their owne ſtrength at ſea, the large promiſes of the Chriſtian princes, the cer-
C taine hope of the league, and vncertaintie of the peace, perſwaded them to embrace the league. On the other ſide, the bad ſucceſſe of the yeare before, their forces ſhaken, and almoſt ſpent in CYPRVS, the ſuſpected and doubtfull faith of their confederates, with the vncertaintie of the ſucceſſe, induced them to preferre the hoped peace before the league. So the Venetians in ſuſpence betwixt both, gaue the embaſſadour daily more doubtfull anſwers than other: neither by promiſe binding themſelues, neither by flat deniall cutting off the hope of the league, by examples & arguments rather refelling what was by others alledged, than any way declaring what they themſelues thought. Sometime they alleadged ſuch things as might make a man beleeue, that they were willing to ioyne in league, and by and by againe they would ſeeme neither to re-D iect nor accept of the ſame. In which doubtfulneſſe many daies paſſed. At length the matter being propounded in the Senate, there found not vnlike diſpoſition of minds that it had amongſt the meaner ſort: for ſome of the Senatours enclined to the league, whoſe reaſons were grounded not vpon profit only, but vpon credit and honour alſo, which they wiſhed to be chiefly regarded: declaring alſo what great ſecuritie, honor, and glory ſhould redound vnto them, by entring into ſuch an honourable league. But the remembrance of former loſſes, the ſtrength of the Turke poſſeſſing a great part of the world, compared vnto their owne, the terrour of the enemies name, the feare of euill ſucceſſe, the ſmall hope of preuailing, induced others to like better of peace: whoſe opinion was alſo confirmed by this, That the confederation with thoſe Chriſtians, was of no more aſſurance or continuance than the Turks peace: Beſides that, they alledged,
E That leagues were therfore of leſſe aſſurance, for that confederations and amities were ſeldome or neuer ſincerely & faithfully kept on both ſides, euery man commonly ſeruing his own turne, without care of other men. They alſo ſet as it were before their eyes what great occaſions, euen ſmall ſuſpitions might giue princes to breake their leagues, what ſtrange effects the feare of the loſſe of goods, or ſome part of their territorie might worke. After this ſo weightie a matter had been thus with great contention throughly debated on both ſides in the Senat, it was at laſt put to voices: and ſo by the conſent of the greater part the league was as more honorable receiued, and the Turkes peace reiected: and a decree of the Senat to that effect made. Rugazonius by ſe-
F cret letters from the Senat vnderſtanding of all theſe matters, began to deale more warily with Muhamet the great Baſſa in matter concerning the pacification, and more hardly to yeeld to his demaunds; and propounding many difficulties of purpoſe deuiſed, requeſted of him, That he might by his good leaue returne to VENICE, to be reſolued of many things by the Senat, whereof he was not able himſelfe to iudge, and ſo to returne to him againe with more certaine inſtructions: aſſuring him, that the Senat would vpon knowledge of the conditions of the peace do and deuiſe many things for the furtherance of the ſame: which could not ſo well bee done by letters, as if hee were there himſelfe preſent to reſolue them vpon euery particular. This his re-queſt obtained, he with great ſpeed got him out of CONSTANTINOPLE: but was ſcarcely got G out of the gates, when report of the league which the Venetians had made with the Pope and the king of SPAINE, was brought vnto the Court, and had in ſhort time filled the citie: Which made all the way as hee trauelled more troubleſome, and fruſtrated that alſo which was before concluded concerning the exchange of priſoners and marchants goods. Ragazonius being come to VENICE, declared at large in the Senat the drift and purpoſe of the Turke, and what conference he had had with the great Baſſa, and in what forwardneſſe the peace was: for which his diſcreet carriage of the matter, his wiſedome was highly by the whole Senat commended, and hee himſelfe afterward honourably rewarded.

A perpetuall league cõcluded betwixt the Pope, the K. of Spaine, and the Venetians.

In the meane time the commiſſioners at ROME after long conſultation concluded a league, which they would haue to bee perpetuall, as well for inuaſiue as defenſiue warres againſt the H
Turke: and was by ſolemne oath confirmed by the Pope, the king of SPAINE, and the Venetian Senat the foure and twentith day of May, in the yeare 1571. For the execution of which league, it was agreed vpon, That the ſea & land forces ſhould conſiſt of two hũdred gallies, an hundred ſhips, fiftie thouſand footmen, and foure thouſand fiue hundred horſemen; with a proportionat quantitie of great artillery, victuals, & other things neceſſary, to be euery yeare ready in March, or at fartheſt in Aprill, to meet together at ſuch place in the Eaſt, as ſhould be vnto them for that purpoſe appointed; to be employed as the Admirals ſaw cauſe, and as the preſent ſtate of things ſhould require. For maintenance of which charge it was agreed, That the king of SPAINE ſhould defray the one halfe, and the other halfe to be diuided into three equall parts; whereof the Venetians ſhould beare two parts, and the Pope the third; which if it ſhould be too heauie for him, then that remained by him vndiſcharged, to be diuided into fiue parts, whereof the I king was to diſcharge three, and the Venetians two. The charge thus proportioned, they tooke order alſo for the prouiſion of victuals, to bee at a reaſonable price taken vp in any the confederats dominions, where the army or fleet ſhould chance to ſtay: yet ſo, that it ſhould be at the king of SPAINE his diſcretion, out of his kingdomes of NAPLES and SICILIE, firſt to take his prouiſion for the victualling of GVLETTA, MALTA, and his owne nauie. It was alſo agreed, That if the king of SPAINE ſhould at any time, when as the confederats had no common war, inuade ARGIERS, TRIPOLIS, or TVNES, that then the Venetians ſhould of their owne charge, aid him with fiftie gallies well appointed: As alſo, that the king ſhould in like manner and with like forces aid them, as oft as they ſhould by the Turks be inuaded. But if it ſhould fortune the K Romane territorie to be inuaded, that then the aforeſaid princes ſhould be bound with all their forces, to the vttermoſt of their power, to defend thoſe places, and the perſon of the Pope. And that in managing of the confederate warre, the three Admirals ſhould conferre together of all matters, and whatſoeuer the greater part ſhould agree vpon, that to be reputed as agreed vpon by them all: That Don Iohn of AVSTRIA, Charles the fifth his naturall ſonne, and brother to the king, ſhould haue the chiefe commaund of the forces both at ſea and land: but not to diſplay his owne enſigne, but the common enſigne of the confederats: Alſo, that ſuch places as ſhould bee gained from the Turke by the confederate armie, ſhould be deuided amongſt the confederate princes, excepting TVNES, ARGIERS, and TRIPOLIS, which ſhould remaine onely to the king of SPAINE: That all controuerſies ariſing amongſt the Generals ſhould be decided by L

the Pope, vnto whom the Venetians ſhould lend twelue gallies, furniſhed of all things ſauing men and victuals, which the Pope ſhould of his owne charge ſupplie: which gallies at the end of the warre hee ſhould againe deliuer, in ſuch caſe as they then were: That an honourable place ſhould be left for Maximilian the emperour, the French king, the king of POLONIA, and the king of PORTINGALL to enter into this league, whom with the reſt of the Chriſtian princes it ſhould beſeeme the Pope to ſtir vp in ſo good a quarrel: And that it ſhould not be lawfull for any the aforeſaid confederat princes to entreat of peace, or enter into league, without the knowledge and conſent of the other confederats. And for the better proceeding of all things, it was agreed, That euer in Autumne the confederate princes ſhould by their embaſſadours at ROME conſult of the next yeares warres, and according as the time and occurrents ſhould M require, to determine, whether their forces were to bee encreaſed or diminiſhed. This league thus at length with much adoe concluded, was not long after in Iune with great pompe and triumph openly proclaimed in ROME, VENICE, and SPAINE, to the great ioy of the greateſt part of Chriſtendome.

The league proclaimed.

Whileſt

A Whileſt theſe things were in doing, the Venetians the more to entangle the Turke, thought it good to make proofe, if they might by any meanes ſtirre vp Tamas the Perſian king to take vp armes againſt him: who as hee was a prince of great power, ſo did hee exceedingly hate the Turkes, as well for the difference betwixt the Perſians and them about matters of their vaine ſuperſtition, as for the manifold iniuries he had oftentimes ſuſtained. There was one Vincent Alexander, one of the Secretaries for the State; who hauing eſcaped out of priſon at CONSTANTINOPLE, was but a little before come to VENICE, a warie wiſe man, and of great experience, who for his dexteritie of wit, and skilfulneſſe in the Turkiſh language, was thought of all others moſt fit to take in hand ſo great a matter. He hauing receiued letters and inſtructions from the Senat, and furniſhed with all things neceſſary, trauelling through GERMANIE, POLONIA; and
B the forreſts of MŒSIA, in Turkiſh attire, came to MONCASTRON, a port towne vpon the ſide of the Euxine or blacke ſea, at the mouth of the great riuer Boriſthenes: where hee embarked himſelfe for TRAPEZOND, but was by a contrarie winde driuen to SINOPE, a citie of great trafficke; from whence he trauelled by rough and broken wayes to CVTAY, keeping ſtill vpon the left hand, becauſe he would not fall vpon any part of the Turks army (which was then marching towards CYPRVS through all thoſe countries) neuertheleſſe he fell vpon a part thereof, from which he with great danger rid himſelfe, being taken for a Turk, and by blind and troubleſome wayes, through rockes and forreſts arriued at length at ERZIRVM, a ſtrong citie of the Turks, then vpon the frontiers of the Turks dominions toward the Georgians. This iourney of Alexanders was not kept ſo ſecret, but that it was vented at CONSTANTINOPLE by a ſpie, C who vnder the colour of friendſhip, haunting the Venetian embaſſadours houſe at PERA, had got certaine knowledge of the going of Alexander into PERSIA. Whereupon certaine courrours were ſent out with all ſpeed to beſet the three ſtraight paſſages into PERSIA, whereby it was ſuppoſed he muſt of neceſſitie paſſe, with certain notes alſo of the fauour of the man, of his ſtature, and other markes, whereby he was beſt to be knowne. But he in ſo dangerous a countrie doubting all things, and fearing ſuch a matter, leauing his company behind him, with incredible celeritie poſted from ERZIRVM to TAVRIS, and was a great way gone before the Turkes currors came into thoſe quarters: who yet hearing of him, followed after as farre as they durſt, but could not ouertake him. Alexander comming to TAVRIS, vnderſtood that the court lay at CASBIN, about twelue dayes iourney farther vp into the countrey; comming thither, the foure-
D teenth of Auguſt of this yeare 1571, he chanced to meet with certaine Engliſh marchants, with whom he had been before acquainted: by whoſe helpe he not onely got to ſpeake with Ayder Tamas the kings third ſonne, but learned of them alſo the manners and faſhions of the Perſian Court, and how to beare himſelfe therein. The Perſians by reaſon of the intollerable heat doe moſt of their buſineſſe at that time of the yeare by night. Wherefore Alexander about midnight brought in to Aider, declared vnto him the cauſe of his comming: and the next night admitted vnto the ſpeach of his aged father, deliuered his letters of credence, & in the name of the Senat declared vnto him, with what perfidious dealing Selymus the Turkiſh emperor was about to take away CYPRVS from the Venetians, with what greedineſſe and pride he had ſet vpon the Chriſtians, and that diſcharged of that warre, he would of all likelihood ſet vpon the Perſians;
E hauing the ſelfeſame quarrell vnto the Perſians that he had vnto the Venetians, that is, an ardent and inſatiable deſire of ſoueraigntie: a ſufficient cauſe for the greedy Turke to repute euery king the richer that he was, the more his enemie. After that, ſetting foorth to the full the proweſſe of the Chriſtians, the wonderful preparation they had made both at ſea and land, he perſuaded the king with all his power to inuade the Turke, now altogether buſied in the warres of CYPRVS; and to recouer againe ſuch parts of his kingdome as Solyman the father of Selymus had taken from him. Warres he ſaid were more happily managed abroad than at home: that ſithence he alone (the Chriſtian princes all then at quiet) had withſtood the Turkes whole force and power, he needed not now to doubt of his moſt proſperous ſucceſſe, the Chriſtian princes now ioyning with him: That he was much vnmindfull of his former loſſes and wrongs, if he thought he en-
F ioyed an aſſured peace; which he ſhould find to be nothing els but a deferring of war vnto more cruell times: and that the Turke if he ſhould ouerrun CYPRVS, would forthwith turne his victorious armes vpon him: The end of one warre was (as he ſaid) but the beginning of another; and that the Turkiſh empire could neuer ſtay in one ſtate; and that hee would obſerue not the Turkes words, but his deeds; and how that the Othoman emperours according to the opportunitie dealing might appeare vnto the world: and that princes would thinke, that being combined together, they might more eaſily ouercome the Turke, than being ſeperated, defend their owne: That in former times ſometime will, ſometime occaſion, was wanting to them to vnite their forces: and that therefore they ſhould now combine themſelues for their common good againſt the common enemy: That it concerned no leſſe the Perſians than the Chriſtians, to haue the power of the Turke abated: and that this taking vp of armes, ſhould be for the good of the Perſian king howſoeuer things ſhould fall out; if well, he ſhould then recouer what he had before loſt, with much more that was the Turkes: if otherwiſe, yet by voluntarie entring into H armes to countenance himſelfe, and to giue the Turks occaſion to think that he feared him not:

which was (as he ſaid) the onely way to preſerue their common ſafetie, which would be vnto all the confederat princes eaſie enough, if they thēſelues made it not more difficult than the power of the enemy. The ſpeech of the embaſſadour was willingly heard: wherunto the king anſwe-red, that he would conſider therupon what he had to doe: and in the meane while, a faire houſe was appointed for the embaſſadour and his followers, and bountifull allowance appointed of the kings charge. Hee was alſo many times ſumptuouſly feaſted by the noblemen, whom hee ſtill requeſted to be mediatours vnto the king, to take that honourable warre in hand. The king had at that time a ſonne called Iſmael, a man of a great ſpirit, whom he then kept in durance, for that hee with too much inſolencie made roades into the frontiers of the Turkes dominions, to I the diſturbance of the league his father had before made with the late Turkiſh emperor Solyman:
vnto him Alexander hauing acceſſe, was of him courteouſly heard; who fretting and languiſh-ing for verie griefe of reuenge vpon the Turkes, wiſhed, that either the king his father had his mind, or he himſelfe the power of a king: and ſaid, That if euer it were his good fortune to obtaine the kingdome, he would in deed ſhew what hee then in mind thought. But of him more ſhall be ſaid hereafter. Whileſt this matter went more ſlowly forward in the Perſian court than the embaſſadour would haue had it, newes was brought vnto the court, of the great victorie which the Chriſtians had much about that time obtained of the Turkes at ſea: vpon which occa-ſion the embaſſadour ſolicited the king more earneſtly than before, to make himſelfe partaker of the victorie of the Chriſtians, by entring into confederation with them, and by taking vp of K armes; rather than to hold vncertaine friendſhip with the Turks in their miſeries, by whom hee had been ſo often wronged. This he ſaid was the onely time for the Perſian king to recouer his former glorie, the like offer whereof would neither often chance, neither long ſtay: and that if he ſuffered ſo fit an opportunitie to ſlip away, he ſhould afterwards in vaine wiſh for the ſame, when it were too late. This ſo wholeſome counſell was well heard, but preuailed nothing to ſtir vp the aged king: who then troubled with rebellion in MEDIA, or wearie of the former warres he had had with the Turke, and glad of ſuch peace as he had then with him, anſwered the em-themſelues, he would for two yeares expect the euent, and afterward as occaſion ſerued, ſo to reſolue vpon peace and warre. This improuident reſolution of the king, brought afterward vn- L profitable and too late repentance vnto the whole Perſian kingdome; when as within a few yeares after, all the calamities which the Senat had by their embaſſadour (as true prophets) foretold, redounded vnto the great ſhaking thereof. For the Cyprian warre once ended, and peace concluded with the Venetians, Amurath the ſonne of Selymus ſucceeding his father in the Turkiſh empire, inuading the Perſian king, tooke from him the great countrey of MEDIA, now called SILVAN, with a great part of ARMENIA the great, and the regall citie of TAVRIS, as ſhall be hereafter in due place declared. At which time the Perſian, who now refuſed to take vp armes, or ioyne in league with the Chriſtian princes, repented that he had not before hearkened vnto the wholſome counſell of the Venetians: and taught by his owne harmes, wiſhed in vaine, that the Chriſtian princes would againe take vp armes and ioyne with him againſt the Turke. M

Muſtapha Baſſa returneth to the ſiege of Famagoſta. Muſtapha the great Baſſa and Generall of the Turks armie, furniſhed of all things that could bee deſired for maintenance of his ſiege; and ſouldiors in great number daily repairing vnto him out of CILICIA, SYRIA, the Leſſer ASIA, and the countreys thereabout, beſide great ſupplies brought vnto him by Haly Baſſa from CONSTANTINOPLE; inſomuch, that it was thought

A thought he had in his army two hundred thouſand men: began now that Winter was paſt, in the latter end of April, to draw neerer vnto FAMAGVSTA, & with incredible labor to caſt vp trenches and mounts againſt the citie, of ſuch height, that the defendants from the higheſt places of the citie could ſcarcely ſee the points of the Turks ſpeares, or tops of their tents, as they lay encamped: which was no great matter for the Baſſa to performe, hauing in his campe fortie thouſand pioners alwayes ready at his command.

The citie of FAMAGVSTA is ſcituat in the Eaſt end of the iſland, in a plaine and low ground betwixt two promontories, the one called S. Andrewes head, and the other the head of GRÆCIA. It is in circuit two miles, and in forme foureſquare; but that the ſide toward the Eaſt, longer and more winding than the reſt, doth much deforme the exact figure of a quadrant: it is al-
B moſt on two parts beaten vpon with the ſea, the other parts towards the land are defended with a ditch not aboue fifteen foot broad, a ſtone wall, and certain bulwarks and parapets. Vpon the gate that leadeth to AMATHVS ſtandeth a ſix cornered tower: other towers ſtand out alſo in the wall, euery of them ſcarce able to containe ſixe pieces of artillerie. It hath a hauen opening toward the Southeaſt, defended from the iniurie of the weather by two great rockes, betwixt which the ſea commeth in by a narrow paſſage about fortie paces ouer, but after opening wider giueth a conuenient harbour to ſhips, whereof it cannot containe any great number, and was now ſhut vp with a ſtrong chaine. Neere vnto the hauen ſtandeth an old caſtle with foure towers, after the auncient manner of building. There was in the citie one ſtrong bulwarke, built after the manner of the fortification of our time, with paliſadoes, curtaines, caſamets, and ſuch
C like, in ſuch manner, as that it ſeemed almoſt impregnable. All which, although they made ſhew of a ſtrong and well fortified citie, yet for that there wanted many things, it was thought too weake long to hold out againſt the great power of the Turke: but what wanted by reaſon of the ſituation and weake fortification, that the Gouernour and other noble captaines ſupplied in beſt ſort they might, with a ſtrong garriſon of moſt valiant ſouldiours, the ſureſt defence of ſtrong places. There was in the citie two thouſand and fiue hundred Italians, two hundred Albanois horſemen, before entertained by the Gouernour; and of the Cypriots themſelues were muſtered two thouſand and fiue hundred mo, all men reſolutely ſet down to ſpend their liues in defence of their countrey.

The deſcription of Famaguſta.

The number of the defendants of Famaguſta.

Muſtapha with wonderfull celeritie hauing brought to perfection his fortifications, planted
D his batterie of ſixtie foure great pieces; amongſt which were foure great baſiliskes of exceeding bigneſſe, wherewith hee continually without intermiſſion battered the wals of the citie in fiue places, but eſpecially that part of the wall that was betweene the hauen and the gate that leadeth to AMATHVS. And with great morter pieces caſt vp huge ſtones, which from high falling into the citie, with their waight brake downe the houſes they light vpon, and fell oftentimes through their vaults, euen into the bottom of their ſellars, to the great terrour of the beſieged. The wals in diuers places ſore ſhaken, and the houſes beaten downe, he began to aſſault the citie: which the defendants (their forces yet whole) valiantly repulſed, and not only defended their wals and draue the Turkes from the breaches, but furiouſly ſallied out vpon them, and hauing ſlaine and
E wounded many, wonderfully diſturbed their fortifications, & abated their courage: neither did the enemy with greater fury maintaine the battery or aſſault, than did the Chriſtians the defence of the citie, ſtill ſending their deadly ſhot into the thickeſt of that great multitude; inſomuch that in few daies the Baſſa had loſt thirtie thouſand of his men: and the captaines themſelues wondering at the valour of the defendants, as if they had not now to do with ſuch Chriſtians as they had before ſo oftentimes ouerthrowne, but with ſome other ſtrange people, began to deſſpaire of the winning of the citie. The Turks thus doubting, and almoſt at a ſtand, the Chriſtians in the meane time made vp their breaches with earth, baskets, wool-ſacks, and ſuch like, not ſparing their very beds and bedclothes, cheſts, carpets, and whatſoeuer elſe might ſerue to fill vp the breach. Amongſt many wants they feared, the greateſt was the want of pouder, which with continuall ſhooting began greatly to bee diminiſhed: wherefore to reſerue ſome part thereof
F againſt all extremities, they thought it beſt whileſt yet ſome ſtore was left, to vſe the ſame more ſparingly, and to ſhoot more ſeldome. But the Turkes ſtill drawing neerer and neerer the citie, and caſting vp mounts higher than the wals of the citie, with earth and fagots filled vp the ditch: which done, they of the broken ſtones made walls on either ſide, to ſaue themſelues from the flankering ſhot of the Chriſtians; then giuing a freſh aſſault, they vſed not onely their ſhot and other other miſſiue weapons, but came foot to foot, and notably fought in the breach hand to hand. G Which manner of fight(as if it had been ſo agreede vpon) they euery day maintained for the ſpace of ſixe houres. And although the Turkes by reaſon of their multitude were diuided into many parts, and freſh men ſtill ſucceeded them that were wearie; yet ſuch was the courage of the defendants,that euery man requeſted to haue the places of moſt daunger,and from thence with conragious hand repulſed the Turkes with exceeding great ſlaughter. But for all that, the furious enemie maintaining the aſſault not onely by day,but by often alarums in the night alſo, kept the Chriſtians continually in doubtfull ſuſpence & readineſſe,as if they ſhould haue recei-ued a preſent aſſault: and aſſoon as it was day,with freſh men that had ſlept their fill,deſperatly aſſailed the chriſtians almoſt ſpent and maigre for lacke of ſleepe and reſt. Force not preuailing, the reſtleſſe enemy leauing nothing attempted, by a queint deuiſe was like to haue taken one of H the gates of the citie: There was growing in the iſland great plentie of a kind of wood much of the nature of the firre or pitch tree,eaſie to be ſet on fire,but hardly to be quenched,but differing in this, that in burning it gaue foorth ſuch a noyſome ſmell,as was not by any man well to be endured: of this kind of wood the Turkes brought a wonderfull quantitie to one of the gates called Limosina, which once ſet one fire, could not by the defendants by any meanes quenched,although they caſt whole pipes and tunnes of water at once into it; but moſt terribly burning cloſe vnto the gate by the ſpace of foure daies,with the vehemencie of the heat and loath-ſomneſſe of the ſmell,ſo troubled the defendants,that ſcarce any of them could endure to ſtand vpon the wall,but forſaking the ſame,were euer and anone like to haue giuen the enemie leaue to enter. I

Bragadinus encourageth the defendants.

Bragadinus the Gouernour, more carefull of the common ſafetie than of his owne danger, ceaſed not ſtill to be going about from one place to another,telling the Italians, That now was giuen the fitteſt occaſion they could deſire for them to ſhew their valour in, and to gaine great honor of their barbarous enemies: that it would be to their eternall glory,if by their only means without any other helpe,the citie ſo farre off from the reliefe of the Chriſtians might be defended,and the great power of the Turke defeated: This (hee ſaid) was the onely time wherein it ſtood them moſt vpon to play the men; for if they could keepe that little was left,the reſt of the iſland would be eaſily recouered: and although the Turks armie exceeded farre in number,yet did they excell them in proweſſe and valour; where by a fewe,and as it were but an handfull of men,had oftentimes preuailed againſt moſt infinit multitudes: Now all the eyes of the world, K as well friends as foes to be fixed vpon them, ſo that if they held out againſt ſo great a power, both their enemies would admire their valour, and all Chriſtendome extoll their inuincible courage and proweſſe; and that they themſelues ſhould therby reape both great profit and honour: Neither that any thing could be alleadged, why they ſhould not be compared with the worthie knights of Malta, who to their eternall fame had deliuered themſelues out of the mouth of the Turke,and left vnto the world a moſt faire example for men valiantly to ſtand in ſo good a quarrell vpon their owne defence: Nicosia (he ſaid) was loſt rather by the cowar-diſe of the defendants,than by the valour of the enemie. He alſo praiſed the fidelitie and courage of the Græcians,who for any feare or danger could neuer be remoued from the Venetians, or induced to ſubmit themſelues vnto the Turkes gouernment: and perſwaded them, with the L ſame reſolution to defend their owne citie that they ſaw in the Venetian ſouldiors, fighting for them; and for their owne honour to ſtriue with the Italians,in defence of their State,their countrey,their wiues and children, againſt the tyrannie of the Turkes; for as much as aid would in ſhort time come,and ſet them free from all danger. The Senat alſo in like manner had ſent letters to Famagvsta, willing them to bee of good cheere,and yet a while to hold out the ſiege, Baleonius a valiant captaine.

and that they ſhould be in ſhort time relieued. Baleonius alſo Generall of the garriſon ſouldiors, himſelfe in armes was preſent at euerie skirmiſh,carefully foreſeeing what was in euerie place and at all times to be done;and by encouraging of his ſouldiors,and aduenturing of his perſon, ſhewed himſelfe to be both a worthy commander,and valiant ſouldior. Neither did the ſouldi-ors alone, but euen the women alſo what they might,ſtriuing aboue the power of the ſtrength M both of the minds and bodies; ſome bringing meat, ſome weapons vnto the defendants, and others ſtones,beds,cheſts,& ſuch like ſtuffe to make vp the breaches. But victuals beginning now to wax ſcant,8000 of the vulgar ſort of the people were turned out of the citie,who all in ſafety were ſuffred to paſſe thorow the midſt of the Turks army, to ſeeke their liuing in the countrey.

Thus

A Thus whileſt open force preuailed not according to the Turkes deſire, they began in foure places to vndermine the citie, in hope to haue found entrance. But the defendants doubting ſuch a matter, by diligent liſtening, and great veſſels ſet full of water neere vnto the wals, and drums laid vpon the ground, by the mouing thereof diſcouered their works, and with countermines fruſtrated thoſe of the enemies: yet in ſo great a ſtir and hurly burly, all things were not poſſibly to be diſcouered. Whereby it came to paſſe, that whileſt the defendants were altogither buſied in defending the wals; a mine not perceiued, was ſuddenly blowne vp neere vnto the tower ſtanding vpon the hauen: by force whereof, a great part of the wall therabout was in a moment with a moſt horrible noiſe ouerthrowne. With the fall thereof, the Turkes thinking the citie as good as taken, with an horrible ſhout & outcrie mounted the wall, and in the breach
B ſet vp their enſignes; Countie Peter, who had the charge of that part of the wall, being not now able to defend the ſame, ſo ſodenly ouerthrown: which Neſtor Martinengus quickly perceiuing, came ſpeedily from his owne ſtation, to repulſe the enemie now readie to haue entred. The fight became there moſt fierce and terrible: on the one ſide, hope; on the other, deſperation enraged their minds: the Turks were in hope, that if they forced themſelues but a little, they ſhould forthwith win the citie; and the defendants propounded nothing vnto themſelues, but ſhamefull death and torture, fought as men altogither deſperat. The Turks truſted to their multitude, and the Chriſtians to their valour. In the meane time, Andreas Bragadinus with certaine great pieces aptly placed, out of the caſtle ſlew a number of the Turks, as they were comming to the breach. Baleonius hearing of the danger, came in haſt with a companie of couragious ſouldiors
C to relieue them that were fighting at the breach, and chearing vp his followers, thruſt himſelfe with the formoſt into the face of the breach: and there not only appointed what was to be done, and with cheerefull ſpeeches encouraged his ſoldiors, but with his owne hand hauing ſlaine many, tooke one of the Turkes enſignes (when as he had before ſlaine the bearer thereof) and tumbled him headlong into the ditch. With the ſight whereof, others encouraged, both on the right hand, and on the left, made there a notable battell, as men fighting for their laſt hope. In fine the Turkes were glad to retire, leauing behind them foure thouſand carkaſes of their ſlaine fellowes in the towne ditch, with fourteene of their enſignes, which were brought into the citie. Neither was this victorie gained without ſome loſſe of the Chriſtians: about an hundred were ſlaine, among whom were Robertus Maluetius, Dauid Nocius, Celſus Feto, Eraſmus Firmo, all D captaines.

The Turks freſh to vndermine the citie.

The breaches notably defended.

For all this they in the citie tooke ſmall reſt, the Turks great ſhot ſtill thundring in amongſt them; and that in ſuch furious ſort, as that in one day (which was the eighth of Iune) were numbred about fiue thouſand great ſhot, ſhot into the citie. With which continuall batterie, one of the round bulwarks of the towne was ſo ſhaken, as that a part of the front thereof was fallen downe into the ditch, and another part ſtood leaning readie to fall; in ſuch ſort, as that it was not longer to be defended: which the Chriſtians perceiuing, preſently vndermined the ſame bulwarke, and in the mine placed certaine barrels of gunpouder. The Turkes comming to aſſault the place they had ſo ſore battered, the defendants after ſome ſmal reſiſtance faigned themſelues to retire for feare, ſo to draw the enemie the faſter on; who was no ſooner come to the place de-
E fired, but that fire being put to the mine, blew vp the bulwarke with all them that ſtood thereon: of whom, ſome were ouerwhelmed with the earth it ſelfe, otherſome were blowne vp into the aire, and falling downe againe miſerably periſhed; and otherſome, ſhot as it were out of a gun, fell downe a great way off, and ſo were rent in pieces: which was vnto the defendants a moſt pleaſant fight. About ſix hundred of the Turkes periſhed at this aſſault, amongſt whom were Muſtapha Generall of the voluntarie ſouldiours, and Feregates, a man of great marke amongſt the Turkes. But by the haſtie fiering of the mine, there periſhed alſo about an hundred of the Chriſtians, ouertaken in their owne deuiſe, amongſt whom were alſo ſome of great account.

F ons of Muſtapha their Generall; who moſt earneſtly exhorted them with one conſent to aſſaile their enemies, now driuen into a corner of the iſland, ſpoiled all their countrie, truſting more vnto the ſtrength of the place than of themſelues, entreating for nothing more than with their liues to depart thence. But what place (ſaid he) is there impregnable for the Turks? NICOSIA, ZIGETH, and ſuch other ſtrong townes woon, what are they but the monuments and teſtimo-nies of the cowardiſe of the Chriſtians, and the proweſſe of the Turks? This day (ſaid he) will confirme all your former labours and victories; which you before vndertooke for honour, but here ſhall you haue honour mixt with gold, and prey ſufficient to make you all rich. The Turks encouraged with this ſpeech of their Generall, as men forgetfull of all dangers, began a more terrible ſiege than euer before: and hauing with incredible labour made three great mines, and blowing them vp, ouerthrew a great part of the wall with the caſtle, the notable defence of the hauen: which done, they with all their force oftentimes aſſailed the citie, as if it ſhould haue bin their laſt labour; neither ceaſed they ſo to do night or day. At which time alſo, that part of the citie which is beaten vpon with the ſea, was aſſaulted by them in the gallies alſo.

Famagusta hardly aſſaulted

The poore Chriſtians ſpent with deadly wounds, continuall labour, perpetuall watching both night and day, and now brought to ſmall number; hardly withſtood the furious enemie, aſſailing them in ſo many places at once, and held out that tempeſt rather with courage than ſtrength. In the meane time the enemies armie encreaſed daily, the Turkes in hope of the like ſpoile they had at NICOSIA, continually repairing out of the countries round about vnto the campe. The Chriſtian captaines ſeeing their men with continuall aſſaults ſore ſpent; inſomuch, that how many ſoeuer they ſeemed to be, there was not aboue three hundred ſound men left, but ſeuen barrels of pouder remaining, want of all things daily increaſing, hope of aid ſtill decreaſing, and the Venetians (their only comfort) ſo far from them; the captaines (I ſay) themſelues, began to quaile in courage: and the rather, for that ſuch reliefe as was ſent from VENICE, could not poſſibly be brought vnto them, but ſtaied at CRETE, the Turkes gallies ſtill lying before FAMAGVSTA; ſo that nothing could in ſafetie be brought thither. This feare of the captaines themſelues, could not long be hid or diſſembled, but that it was by the citiſens perceiued: who hauing neither power to hold out the ſiege, neither place left to flie vnto, ouercome with neceſſitie, came flocking to the Gouernor, crauing of him aid and comfort, and with abundance of teares beſought him in this common deſperation, to take compaſſion on them, their wiues and children, a people that had alwaies ſo well deſerued of the Venetian State. Their wals (they ſaid) were beaten downe, their bulwarks ouerthrowne, the few ſouldiours that remained, ſpent with wounds, watching, and famine; the enemies ſtrength encreaſing daily, ſo that they muſt needs in ſhort time all periſh with the ſword, if the citie were by force taken: wherfore they beſought him, that yeelding to neceſſitie, which no power was euer able to withſtand, hee would at laſt while time yet ſerued, prouide for the ſaftie of ſo faithfull and kind a people, and not to refuſe any conditions, how hard ſoeuer.

The citiſens of Famagusta requeſt the gouernour in time to yeeld vp the city

The requeſts and teares of the citiſens of FAMAGVSTA, with the due conſideration of the deſperat ſtate of the citie, moued Bragadinus to compaſſion; who comforting them in beſt ſort he could, perſuaded them to be of good cheere, for that he had care both of them & their ſtate, and would ſo prouide for them, as that they ſhould neuer repent themſelues of their fidelity and loialtie to the Venetian State. He in the meane time conſidering the greatneſſe of the daunger which preſently hung ouer all their heads, propounded the matter in a generall counſel called togither for the ſame purpoſe: wherein after a little debating of the matter, they all agreed to yeeld; onely Baleonius at the firſt diſſenting, as doubtfull of the Turkes faith, but afterwards yeelding vnto the opinion of the reſt. So an herauld being ſent vnto the Baſſa, a truce was token for certaine daies to parley in, and hoſtages on both ſides giuen: during which time, not ſo much as a dart was throwne, or an arrow ſhot from either ſide. After a few daies parley the conditions were agreed vpon, whereupon the citie ſhould bee yeeded into the power of the Baſſa, which were theſe: Firſt, that the inhabitants of the citie yet aliue, ſhould in ſafetie enioy their liues, libertie, and goods, with the free exerciſe of the Chriſtian religion: That the Gouernour with the reſt of the captains and ſouldiors might in ſafetie depart with bag and baggage, and at their departure to take with them fiue great pieces of ordinance, and three horſes, which ſoeuer it ſhould pleaſe them to make choice of: and that the Turkes ſhould ſafely conduct them into CRETE, finding them both victuall and ſhipping: all which things were with more kindneſſe promiſed, than with fidelitie preformed. Yet all theſe matters agreed vpon, and conceiued into writing, as alſo by ſolemne oath on both ſides confirmed: the Gouernur ſending a meſſenger before, requeſted that he might haue leaue to come to ſee the Baſſa, and to deliuer vnto him the keyes of the citie. Leaue being graunted, Bragadinus the Gouernour, Baleonius, Andreas Bragadinus, Laurentius Theupolus earle of PAPHOS, Io. Antonius Quirinus, Aloyſius Martinengus,

A parley betwixt them of Famagusta and the Turkes.

A tinengus, with a great sort of other captaines came into the campe: but before they entred into the Bassaes pauillion, they were commaunded to deliuer their weapons, which they all did. At the first meeting Mustapha entertained them courteously, and with many glorious words, as if it had beene in admiration, extolled their worthie valour and courage: saying, that he was glad now to know them by face, whose valiant minds he had before knowne by their most valiant deeds. Now, prowesse and valour seemed not onely in safetie, but also honoured euen of the enemie: when after a long discourse the false Bassa reuolued vnto the mischiefe and trecherie he had before resolued vpon: complaining that certaine of his men taken at the siege, had bin afterward against all reason and order slaine. Which the Gouernour and the rest vtterly denying, he start vp as in a rage, and with high words and sterne countenance vrging the fact, commaun-
B ded them all to be forthwith cast in bonds: and so bringing them out of his pauillion, in the sight of the armie, contrarie to his oath and promise, caused them all to be slaine. At which time Bragadinus and Theupolus were oftentimes commaunded to lay downe their heads, to haue had them strucke off: yet was their execution deferred, and their liues reserued, not to saue them, but with more exquisit punishment and torture to satisfie the barbarous crueltie of the faithles and vnmerciful tirant. The next day after, Bragadinus hauing his eares before cut off in despight, was brought forth to be wondered at, and tortured with the most extreamest kind of torture that tyrannie it selfe could haue deuised: for dispoiled of his iewels and attire, and a basket laid vpon his shoulders, filled with earth, he was enforced oftentimes to carie the same to repaire the ram-
C piers that were ouerthrowne; and euer as he passed by, the proud Bassa insulting vpon him to fall downe and to kisse the ground at his feet: and so buffeted with the Turks fists, & spurned as a dog with their feet, was in great derision and despight asked, Whether he hoped that Christ his God would come to helpe him or not? Which indignitie of it selfe bitter and miserable, the dignitie of the man made much more miserable: whose comely and stately countenance, with his long and reuerend beard, euen in that extreame miserie, added vnto him a certaine maiestie and grace. In this so foule a sight of vertue troden vnderfoot, the poore Christians could neither well stay their teares, nor let them fall, for feare of the displeasure of the Turks. But the forsworne Bassa, not only forgetfull of all humanitie, but enraged rather with extreame crueltie, caused that noble and worthie Bragadinus to be set in a chaire, and his skin to be flaine off from him
D quicke: a punishment vnworthie of him that suffered it, but most worthie him that inflicted the same. Yet in so grea[illegible] and horrible a torture he was not heard to let fall any word, not beseeming a faithfull Christian and the honour of his countrie: only he called vpon God for mercie, and detested the Turks perfidious trecherie, and so breathed out his life. But the tyrant worthie eternall infamie, not satisfied with the torture of the liuing man, caused the head to be cut from the dead bodie, and vpon the point of a speare to be set vp on a high place for all men to looke vpon. His skin also stuffed with chaffe, he caused to be hanged vp at the yards arme, and so to bee carried about: not so true a trophie of his victorie, as a testimonie of his perfidious and Turkish crueltie. Two daies after, countie Theupolus, after he had beene most shamefully entreated, full of the marks of the Turks crueltie, was (to make an end with all) shamefully hanged in the mar-
E ket place. With what crueltie the Bassa had tyrannised vpon the nobilitie, with the same he also raged vpon the meaner sort of the citisens, of whom some he slew, some he chained in the gallies, and carried away the rest into bondage. Three hundred Christians, some soldiors, some citisens, which came forth with the Gouernour to see the Turks campe, were there also all slaine. Nestor Martinengus a famous captaine, escaped the tyrants hands, being hidden by one of the Bassaes eunuchs, who by the helpe of a Greeke fisherman got to LEPTIS, and from thence to CRETE, and so afterwards to VENICE, where he faithfully reported to Aloysius Mosenicus the duke, the whole processe of that war, with the losse of the citie; and that in the space of threescore & ten daies there was aboue an hundred & fortie thousand great shot discharged against the citie. Such noblemen and gentlemen as escaped out of this so generall a slaughter, banished their countrie, and in miserie, dispersed without hope of returne, led afterward a miserable and F vagrant life, though some of them euen at this day (as I haue been credibly informed) are by the Venetian state right well maintained. The countrie people and artificers were generally by the Turks spared, for the peopling of the countrie. This was the fatall ruine of CYPRVS, one of the most fruitful and beautiful islands of the Mediterranean: the losse wherof not without cause grieued many Christian princes, as sometime a kingdome of it selfe, and now a prouince of the Whileſt Muſtapha yet lay at the ſiege of FAMAGVSTA, the other two great Baſſaes Partau and Haly, the one the Admirall, and the other Generall of the ſoldiors (appointed by Selymus for the keeping of the ſea, that no reliefe ſhould be ſent by the Venetians to FAMAGVSTA, and further as occaſion ſerued to infeſt their dominions) about the middeſt of May arriued in EVBŒA with two hundred and thirtie gallies; whether Vluzalis viceroy of ALGIERS, with diuers other the Turks notable pyrats, reſorted vnto them with their gallies. With this fleet departing from EVBŒA, and ſayling alongſt the coaſt of MYSIA, IONIA, CARIA, and ſo directly toward the RHODES, they were met with thirtie gallies moe of the Turks aduenturers. The deſcription of Crete. The iſland of CRETE, now called CANDIA, is greater than CYPRVS, but leſſer than SICILIA or SARDINIA: but for fertilitie comparable with any of the iſlands of the Mediterranean. It was in auncient time famous for many things, but eſpecially for an hundred cities which therein ſtood, as witneſſeth amongſt others Seneca: Vrbibus centum ſpacioſa Cretæ, but at this day it hath only three: CANDIA, a colonie of the Venetians, whereof the iſland now taketh name, CANEA, and RHETIMO. The circuit of the iſland is fiue hundred and twentie miles: full of hils: for which cauſe the people of the countrie are much delighted in hunting. In it is no nauigable riuer or venomous beaſt. It is now moſt famous through a great part of the world, I for the good Malmeſey which there groweth, and is from thence in great abundance ſent into many far countries. Therein alſo groweth great plentie of Cypreſſe trees, ſeruing for the vſe of ſhipping. It is at this day ſubiect to the Venetians. The Turkes being landed, and ranging

The Turkes driuen out of Crete vp and down the countrie, did what harme they poſſibly could, burning and ſpoiling all as they went: vntill that at laſt they were vpon the ſudden encountered by Franciſcus Iuſtinianus, who but a little before their landing was come into the iſland with a thouſand ſoldiors; and now ioining with the iſland people, notably charged them, being altogither diſperſed and ſeeking after prey: and hauing ſlaine many of them, enforced the reſt to retire to their gallies. The next day the Turks landing againe in greater number, burnt diuers townes, and ranſacked SETIA and RHETIMO, where they tooke a rich prey, and carried away many priſoners: but loded with K their bootie, diſperſed, and fearing nothing leſſe than to be at that time ſet vpon, they were aſſailed by Lucas Michael a valiant captaine, two thouſand of them ſlaine, and with the loſſe of their bootie and priſoners glad to retire vnto their gallies. Thus repulſed from CRETE, they tooke their courſe to CYTHERA, ZATHINTHVS, and CEPHALENIA, iſlands ſubiect to the Venetians: where beſide other harmes by them done, they caried away with them ſix thouſand poore Chriſtians into moſt miſerable captiuitie.

Departing thence, and ſayling alongſt the coaſt of EPIRVS, they came to SVPPOLO, an hauen towne in EPIRVS, which Venerius in the beginning of theſe warres had taken from the Turkes, but was now againe by them recouered. After that, they came to DVLCIGNO, which the Turkes had but but a little before beſieged by land, for that the Gouernor therof and of AN- L TIVARI (another towne of the Venetians vpon the frontiers of DALMATIA) had compacted with three hundred Epirots, to ſtir vp the countrie to rebellion, and to reuolt to the Venetians: for the effecting whereof the Epirots requeſted of the Venetians ſix thouſand ſouldiours to make head, which the Venetians promiſed to ſend them. Whereupon the aforeſaid Epirots forthwith tooke vp armes, and raiſed moſt part of EPIRVS into rebellion: vnto whom was ſent at the firſt one captaine with an hundred Italians from CATORA. But when the Epirots the reſt of the Epirots, enflamed with the hope of libertie, were readie to haue come vnto their friends, alreadie in armes, and by their example like ynough to haue raiſed all GRÆCIA into rebellion. But now deceiued of their expectation, bewailed their miſerie, and truſting in the promiſes of the Venetians, they had caſt themſelues and all theirs into moſt manifeſt danger. They

A of Dvlcigno seeing themselues hardly beset both by sea and land, sent to Partau Bassa, and couenanting with him, that they might in safetie depart, deliuered vnto him the towne: and so Sara Martinengus, Gouernor of the towne, with the garrison souldiors, were in foure ships conueyed in safetie to Ragvsivm: as for the citisens, promise was kept with them after the Turkish manner. In the same hurle the Turks tooke also the townes of Antivari and Bvdva. Antivari was both by situation and fortification strong, and furnished with a good garrison: neuertheless, Alexander Donatus Gouernour thereof, a man of no experience in martiall affaires, ouercome with the present feare, and despairing to be able to hold the towne, cowardly yeelded the same vnto the enemie. Which his beastly cowardise the Senat suffered not vnpunished, but confiscating his goods, and remooving him from the Senat, cast him into exile. From Anti-
B vari the Turks following their good fortune, departed with their fleet into the bay called Rizonicvs, but now the bay of Catharo, and both by sea and land laied hard siege vnto the strong towne of Catharo, called in auncient time Ascrivivm; against which they cast vp two great bulwarks, and planted thereon nine great pieces of artillerie, wherewith to haue battered the towne and the castle: but the defendants as resolute men sallying out, put them from their ordinance, and enforced them againe vnto their gallies.

Dulcigno, Antiuari, & Rudue, strong townes of the Venetians vpon the coasts of Epirus and Dalmatia, yeelded to the Turk.

Cowardise punished.

Whilest these things were in doing, Vluzalis and Caracossa, both men of great account and name amongst the Turkes, got leaue for ten dayes of the Admirall, with threescore gallies to spoyle the islands neere thereabouts, subiect to the Venetians. Who comming to the island of C Cvrzola, about fourescore miles Eastward from Ragvsivm landed their men, with purpose to assault the towne of Cvrzola, of the same name with the island. Which Anthonius Contarenus the Gouernour thereof perceiuing, in the dead time of the night fled for feare out of the towne into the rockes and places of more safetie, after whom the townsemen followed also: so that in the towne were not left aboue 20 men, and about 80 women; who with weapons in their hands, after the rest were fled, came to the wals, as wishing rather there to die, than to fal into the hands of the barbarous enemie. But at such time as the Turkes began to approch the towne, and the women with stones, fire, & such weapons as they had, were beating them off, & with greater courage defending the place than was to haue beene in their sex expected, by the goodnesse of God a great tempest suddenly arose out of the North, which so outragiously tossed the gallies, that Vluzalis and Caracossa were glad to giue ouer the assault, and to get them thence into a place D of more safetie. Sayling alongst the coast, they by the way spoiled Lysna, Bracia, and Lissa, little islands vpon the coast of Dalmatia, out of which they carried away with them 1600 poore Christians into captiuitie. These arch pyrats at their pleasure roming vp & down the sea, fortuned to light vpon a ship of the Christians bound from Messana to Corcyra, which they tooke; and in rifling therof found certain letters directed to the gouernor of Corcyra, certifying him of the leagne, then but lately concluded amongst the Christian princes: which letters they sent in post to Selymus to giue him knowledge therof, who thereupon writ to his Admirals, with all hostilitie to infest any of the dominions of the Christian confederats.

Curzola forsaken by the men, is defended by women.

Selymus aduertised of the league lately concluded betwixt the Christian princes.

The Turks fleet thus raging and raigning in the Adriaticke, brought a great feare not onely vpon the coasts of Dalmatia, Istria, and the islands thereabouts, which were by them most
E afflicted; but also vpon the sea coasts of Apvlia, and all alongst that side of Italie, yea & vpon the citie of Venice it selfe: insomuch that they were glad to fortifie as well the citie as the frontiers of their dominions, with new fortifications and garrisons; as did also the king, and the Pope in Italie: for why no ship or gallie could now looke out of any port, but it was presently surprised and taken by the Turks: which with the sundrie calamities before receiued, so confounded the Venetians, that they in their assemblies and consultations seemed rather to quake for feare, than after their wonted maner grauely to consult how the enemie was to be repulsed. Yet for the more safetie of their citie, and for feare least the Turks fleet should forcibly break in vpon them, they strongly fortified the passages through the rock or bank which defendeth the citie from the sea, and kept continually 12000 men in readinesse in the citie for the more assurance thereof.

F All the Turks fleet being againe met togither, Partau and Haly departed from Avlona the 26 of August, and sayled directly to Corcyra, which little island seemed to be compassed in round with the great enemies fleet. Partau Bassa at his first arriuall there, landed eight hundred horsemen and a thousand foot, who ranging vp & down the island did great hurt, and burnt the very suburbs of the citie: at which time the garrison soldiors sallying out vpon thē with a thouſand horſemen and fiue hundred foot, ſlew a great number of them, and amongſt thereſt one G Paphus Rays, a man of great name. Thus the Turks fleet hauing done wonderfull harme in the Venetian territorie, as well in the iſlands, as vpon the frontiers of DALMATIA, enriched with the ſpoyle of thoſe countries, and carrying away with them fifteene thouſand moſt miſerable captiues; departing from CORCYRA, arriued all in the bay of CORINTH, now called the gulfe of LEPANTO, where we wil for a while leaue them to ride in ſafetie.

The Turkes put into the bay of Lepanto.

The fierceſt of the confederat princes meet togither at Meſſana

AT ſuch time as this great fleet (the terrour of that part of Chriſtendome) firſt put into the Adriaticke, Venerius the Venetian Admirall then lying with fiftie gallies at CORCYRA, and fearing if he ſtayed there longer, to be enforced with ſo ſmall a power to fight againſt ſo ſtrong an enemie, or elſe ſo to be ſhut vp that he could not ioyne his forces with the Spaniſh fleet, which was daily expected: vpon the comming of the fleet departed thence to MESSANA H there more commodiouſly and more ſafely to attend the comming of Don Iohn of AVSTRIA Generall of the Spaniſh forces. At his comming, Columnius met him with twelue gallies (which the great duke of FLORENCE had ſent in the aid of the confederats) and three gallies of MALTA, who only were yet come thither, and with great honour receiued him. Not long after, M. Antonius Quirinus and Antonius Canalis came thither alſo with threeſcore and two gallies, before appointed by the Venetians for the reliefe of FAMAGVSTA, but now called backe againe to ioine with the reſt of the fleet: and in ſhort time the gallies of SICILIE arriued there alſo. At laſt after long expectation, in the latter end of Auguſt came Don Iohn with the Spaniſh fleet, a man then about foure and twentie yeres old, in whom wanted no honourable parts, his mothers blemiſh only excepted: who although he was moſt deere vnto his father Charles the fifth, yet I left he him nothing by his will, but onely at his death commended him vnto his ſonne Philip, as his brother. The Venetian and the Popes Admirals hearing of his comming, went to meet him, and that with ſuch triumph and ioy, that all the former heauineſſe before conceiued of his long ſtaying, was turned into gladneſſe, with moſt aſſured hope of triumphant victorie: their doubled forces, and two great fleets ioined in one, encouraged them aboue meaſure, filling all the Weſt with the expectation of ſome great matter. The Venetian fleet conſiſted of an hundred and eight gallies, ſix galleaſes, two tall ſhips, and a great number of ſmall galliots. Vnto them were ioyned twelue gallies of the Popes, of whom Columnius was Admirall. And with Don Iohn, the Generall, and Auria the Spaniſh Admirall came fourſcore and one gallies, of whom three were from the knights of MALTA. In this fleet, beſide marriners, were reckoned to be twentie thouſand fighting men: an armie not onely beautifull for ſhew, as conſiſting of moſt choice bodies; but indeed moſt ſtrong and puiſſant, old beaten ſouldiors almoſt throughout it, in euery place intermixed with others of leſſe skill: many knowne to be men of great experience, rich and luſtie bodies, were by name called forth to this ſo honorable ſeruice; and diuers other of great nobilitie, as well old men as yong & luſtie gallants, for the naturall hatred they bare vnto the common enemie, came and as voluntarie men cheerefully thruſt themſelues into that religious war: euery of which noble gentlemen, as they were greater by birth or power, ſo had they drawn after them a greater number of their fauorits and followers, ſtrong and able bodies, of their owne charge brauely armed; who ſought for no other pay for their paines and danger, but by ſome notable victorie to eterniſe their names, or honourably to ſpend their liues in ſo iuſt a quarrell, as L for the defence of the Chriſtian faith and religion. Amongſt theſe moſt honourable and reſolute men, were three of greateſt mark, Alexander Ferneſius prince of PARMA, in time to be the honour and glorie of ITALIE his natiue countrey, whoſe vntimely death in the low countries euen his honourable enemies lamented; and being dead, is not without cauſe and worthie deſert accounted amongſt the moſt politicke and famous leaders of our age. The ſecond was Franciſcus Maria prince of VRBIN, a yong man honourably deſcended & of an inuincible courage: and the third Pau. Iordanus Vrſinus, an honourable gentleman of the familie of the Vrſini in ROME.

All the power of the confederat princes thus met togither at MESSANA, and all things now in readineſſe; a counſell was called by the General, to reſolue what courſe to take in thoſe moſt dangerous wars, againſt ſo puiſſant an enemy: vnto which counſel were admitted only Don Iohn the Generall himſelfe: and Aloyſius Rechezenes, of ſome called Requiſenius, great commendor of CASTILE, the Generals lieutenant, or rather director of his actions: Sebaſtianus Venerius the Venetian Admirall: and Auguſtinus Barbadicus Generall proueditour, of equall authoritie and reputation with the Admirall: and one ſecretarie: Marcus Anthonius Columna the Popes

M

A Admirall, with Pompeius Colonna his kinſman. The chiefe point whereon theſe great commanders were to reſolue was, Whether they ſhould aduenture the general fortune of a battel againſt ſo ſtrong an enemy, or onely ſeeke to defend the frontiers of their owne dominions? Which queſtion (as all other of like ſort) was of diuers diuerſly phantaſied; euerie man pleaſing himſelfe with his owne reaſons. Requiſenius (Don Iohn his chiefe counſellor, without whom he willingly did nothing, and vndoubtedly a man of great valour and experience) ſpeaking firſt, ſaid, That the enemies ſtrength was neceſſarily to be known, before they committed al to the fortune of a battell: and that therfore delay was to be vſed, leſt improuident haſt ouerthrew all. Matters of warre that were to be decided by the ſword, were (as he ſaid) with great and ſound aduiſe to be adminiſtred; for that the errours of battell, whereby all was to be put in hazard, were not to B be againe amended. He highly commended the aduiſe of Scipio Africanus, who counſelled great commaunders, not to fight with the enemie but vpon ſome great Aduantage, or elſe thereunto forced by neceſſitie. But as things now ſtood, what opportunitie could be miniſtred or aduantage taken; the enemie keeping himſelfe cloſe within the bay of CORINTH, and no apparant meanes how to draw him out of from thence? Neither that he for his part was of ſo great ſpirit, as within the harbor in place of diſaduantage, without hope, to ſet vpon an enemy in common eſtimation ſtronger then himſelfe: for what diſhonour ſhould they incurre, if hauing receiued ſome notable loſſe, they ſhould be enforced with ſhame to giue ouer the enterpriſe begun? And to beſiege ORICVS, DIRRACHIVM, or CASTRVM NOVUM, frontier townes of the Turks,
C ſo to draw them out to battell; what were this other than to ſhew a certaine feare and diſtruſt in themſelues, and to diſcourage the minds of the ſouldiors? for as well the enemie as the common ſouldior would forthwith deeme ſuch a poore attempt to proceed of a meere feare, as to make a vaine ſhew of ſomething doing, when as they durſt not encounter the enemie in his full ſtrength. As for the other reaſon drawne from Neceſſitie: what neceſſitie had they ſo deſperatly to ſet vpon the enemie? who vpon the approach of Winter muſt needs in ſhort time lay vp his gallies: and being alreadie in ſafe harbor, would neuer be drawne to the hazard of a battell, eſpecially like hope, like ſtrength, and like daunger appearing on both ſides. Wherefore, it were beſt (in his opinion) onely to make a great ſhew of their forces, ſo to terrifie the barbarous enemie: but in no caſe to hazard the hope of the whole Chriſtian Common weale, vpon the for-D tune of a battell. Hee farther alſo propounded vnto them, the vncertaine euents of things, the common chaunce of warre, the ſtrength of the enemie, as well by ſea as by land; with whom they themſelues were not (as he ſaid) in deed comparable: then, what an infinit heape of miſeries was like to ouerwhelme the Chriſtian common weale, if they ſhould in any thing miſcarry: And that therefore, ſafe aduiſe was in this caſe to bee preferred before that which was attended vpon with greater danger.

On the other ſide, the Venetians, who thought all delay both infamous and dangerous to their State, were farre of another opinion. Wherefore Venerius and Barbadicus not onely vehemently perſuaded, but moſt inſtantly requeſted the Generall and the reſt of the great commanders, that ſo ſoone as opportunitie ſerued, they would commit the matter to the triall of a battel, and not to make that counſell, which their couragious minds might make moſt glorious and E fortunat, by declining of battell to become diſhonourable or fruſtrat. If deſire of honour (ſaid they) mooue vs not, ſhall neither theſe things mooue vs? the loſſe of ſo great and chargeable a preparation, the ſpoiling of our frontiers, and the inſolencie of our enemies, which we encreaſe by delay? We defend our ſelues and ours, we inuade not them: wee goe not about to driue the Turke out of his empire; but that wee our ſelues be not by him driuen out of our owne countries. Wherefore we ought ſo much the more readily and ſpeedily to thinke of battell, by how much the neceſſitie of him is greater that repulſeth a danger, than of him that offereth the ſame. What, are our weapons blunt, or our hands benummed? ſhall the Turkes ſo often preuoke vs, and we ſtill be vnreuenged? ſhall we alwayes ſhew our weapons, and neuer fight? one fortunat
F battell is able to blot out the infamie of former time, and to fill vs with the hope of future happineſſe: If nothing elſe, let the verie indignitie of the matter ſtirre vs vp to battell. And what doubt is there, but that the enemie ſwelling with pride, will come foorth with his fleet, and giue vs battell? Thinke you that a ſmall diſcredit will enſue to our honour and reputation, if contented with a vaine brag, hauing not once skirmiſhed with the enemy, or ſo much as ſeene him, wee ſhall returne home, to the generall ſhame of all Chriſtendome? See how many peſtilent incon-

ueniences will enſue, if we ſhall take this courſe. This manner of proceeding, will fill all mens G minds with diſpaire: the people will murmure, That they are to no purpoſe oppreſſed with exactions and tributs: the confederat princes (carefull of this war) will ſay, that they haue in vaine wearied themſelues with often embaſſages and care therof: the prowd enemy will account our departure, or declining of battell, for a manifeſt victory. The next yeare we may looke for him againe with a greater and a ſtronger fleet, which ſhall not onely make a more heauie warre, but deſtroy and beare downe all before it: at which time, who can aſſure vs that the Chriſtians ſhall haue the like preparation, if we ſhall now delay to fight? what labour is to be taken, what coſt to be beſtowed, to ſet forth againe ſo great a fleet? Vnto theſe cauſes which impoſe vpon vs a neceſſitie and force to fight, is adioyned not onely a ſingular regard of our honour, but a moſt notable opportunitie alſo offered: we neuer had a greater fleet, nor better furniſhed with men, H munition, & all things elſe to be required for the gaining of a notable victorie: and who knoweth not, that the Chriſtian gallies are farre ſtronger than the Turkes? beſides that, the greateſt part of their beſt ſouldiors are in hope of prey gone into CYPRVS, who there ſeeking after the ſpoile, and forgetfull of the enemie, without controlment glut themſelues with the pleaſures of that rich iſland; whereby their fleet is ſo much the weaker. All which things, as they promiſe no hard victorie, ſo doe they propound vnto vs honour, glorie, fame, and moſt honourable rewards; and open vnto vs the way both for the defence of the preſent, and recouerie of that hath been before loſt. What then ſtand we ſtill looking for? or why do we not in Gods name ioine that battell, which is vnto vs not only neceſſarie, but profitable alſo.

Thus much ſaid, they began to intreat and beſeech the Generall and the reſt, not longer to I ſuffer the Chriſtian common-weale to receiue loſſe vpon loſſe, but to repoſe their only hope in the good ſucceſſe of one worthie battell: and neuer to looke for the like opportunitie, if they let ſlip the preſent. This matter of ſo great conſequence, thus throughly debated amongſt the greateſt commaunders, they thought it good to heare alſo the opinions of other notable captaines, of no leſſe experience than themſelues (then in the fleet) before they would conclude any thing.

Cornea and Serbellio perſwade the giuing of battell.

Amongſt the reſt, Anthonius Cornea, and Gabriel Serbellio, both Spaniards, and for their great wiſedome and valour had in generall reputation of all men; being demaunded their opinions, with moſt ſubſtantiall reaſons, declared the neceſſitie of giuing battel, and that it was not ſo dangerous, as to be therefore ſhunned or delaied: For ſo much as that violent enemy was far eaſier to be dealt withall at ſea than by land; where hee muſt fight without his huge multitude of men, K
the Turks chiefe hope and only meanes whereby they haue obtained ſo many victories againſt the Chriſtians. And ſo concluded their opinions, with an effectuall perſwaſion to ſet forward to CORCYRA, and without delay as occaſion ſerued to giue the enemy battell. Which their opinion being generally well liked, was ſhortly after by the Generall and the reſt approued, and a reſolution ſet downe for the giuing of battell: which was no ſooner knowne, but there was a generall reioicing through the army, euery man cherefully preparing himſelfe to lay down his life in the publike defence of the Chriſtian common weale, and that with ſuch an earneſt deſire of battell, that euery day ſeemed now nothing elſe, but a delay of a moſt aſſured victorie.

The confederats put their fleet in order of battell.

Yet before they ſhould come into the ſight of the enemie, the three Admirals thought it L
good to bring foorth the fleet into the ſea, and there to martiall the ſame, in ſuch ſort, as if they ſhould euen then preſently haue ioyned battell: to the intent, that by ſuch orderly diſpoſing of their fleet, and by appointing vnto euery man his place he was to keepe, they might ſo acquaint them with the order of the battell, as that they ſhould when time ſerued (of themſelues without farther direction) martiall themſelues, and ſo more readily enter into battell. The next day the Admirals brought foorth their fleetes into the open ſea: in the right wing (which conſiſted of three and fiftie gallies) was Auria placed: in the left wing was Auguſtinus Barbadicus with the like number of gallies alſo: and in the middle battell ſtood the Generall with ſeuentie gallies: on the right hand of the Generall ſtood Columnius, and on the left Venerius, his aſſociats. Thus with equall front the fleet ſet forward, as if they ſhould euen preſently haue ioyned battell. Betwixt the wings and the middle battell, was left no more ſpace but for three gallies to row: in M the rearward behind the Generall, followed Requiſenius, the great Commendor of CASTILE, with his gallies: after Columnius followed the Admirall gallie of GENVA, wherein was Alexander Farneſius prince of PARMA: and behinde Venerius came the Admirall gallie of SAVOY, and in her the prince of VRBIN: in the ſpace betwixt the middle battel and the left wing, was placed

A placed Paulus Iordanus: and betwixt the middle battell and the right wing, was Petrus Inſtinianus with the gallies of MALTA: vpon the left wing attended Anthonius Canalis: and Quirinus on the right. About halfe a mile behind all the reſt, followed Aluarus Bacianus Marqueſſe of SANCRACE, and Admirall of the Neapolitane fleet, with thirtie gallies; a man of great experience in matters at ſea; and now ſo placed, to be at all times readie to relieue this or that part of the fleet, as the fortune of the battell, or impreſſion of the enemie ſhould require. The Chriſtians had repoſed great hope in ſix galeaſſes, which furniſhed with great ſtore of ordinance and certaine ſelect companies of moſt reſolute ſouldiors, ſeemed rather like caſtles than ſhips. Theſe galeaſſes conducted by Franciſcus Dodus, a moſt expert captaine, were placed about a mile before the fleet; two of them before each wing, and the other two before the middle battell: ſo far B diſtant one from another, as that with equal ſpace they anſwered the whole breadth of the front of the fleet, which was almoſt the ſpace of fiue miles, and ſerued the ſame in ſtead of moſt ſtrong bulwarks. The gallies throughout the fleet kept not cloſe togither, but ſuch a conuenient diſtance one from another, as might ſerue for them at libertie to diſcharge their ordinance when time ſhould require. In the wings, as alſo in the maine battell, were the Popes, the kings, and the Venetian gallies indifferently intermixed; that by the equalitie of the danger they ſhould haue more care to relieue one another than if they had ſerued apart. Ioannes Cardonius, a moſt valiant captaine, with eight gallies of SICILIE and two galiots, was appointed to go ten miles before the fleet to deſcrie what he might of the enemies doings, and in his returne to ioine the one halfe of his gallies to the one wing, and the other halfe to the other.

Six galeaſſes.

C In this ſort they departed from MESSANA, with purpoſe to ſeeke out the enemie: and not long after came to PAXO, where (of a ſmall broile) at the firſt, was like to haue riſen a great miſchiefe: for the next day, whileſt Don Iohn ſtaied there to take a view of the Venetian gallies, and how they were furniſhed both of men and munition; he finding them but weakely manned for ſupplying of that want, appointed foure thouſand Spaniards and a thouſand Italians to be put aboord into the Venetian gallies, where moſt need was.

The Chriſtian fleet departeth from Meſſina to giue the Turks battell.

Amongſt theſe ſouldiors was one companie vnder the commaund of Mutius Tortona their captaine, a man of an vnquiet and furious nature: who going aboord the gallie of Andreas Calergus, firſt fell to words with the captaine of the gallie, and after much ſtirre into plaine fight; ſo that in a trice they were altogether by the eares, as well the ſouldiours as the captaines: of all
D which ſtirre Mutius was the onely author. Venerius being not farre off, and hearing of the matter, ſent the captaine of his owne gallie to appeaſe the tumult: who thruſting himſelfe into the middeſt of the furious multitude, was by Mutius in his furie fouly intreated, and diuers of them that came with him ſhrewdly beaten. Which thing Venerius (himſelfe alſo of an hoat nature) taking as done in diſgrace of the Venetians, and therewith exceedingly moued; to the terrour of others, cauſed Mutius & his enſign-bearer to be hanged vp at the yards arme o fthe ſame gallie, to the great offence of all the Spaniards. The Generall alſo taking this execution in euill part, full of choler and indignation, grieuouſly complained, That he himſelfe as Generall, was therein not a little wronged; and that it became euerie commaunder to know what belonged to his place, and not to encroach vpon his betters: ſo ſhould the conditions of the league be the better
E kept, if euerie commaunder could keepe himſelfe within the bounds of his owne authoritie. Venerius he ſaid, whoſe authoritie was inferiour vnto his, could not of right without his command determine any thing againſt Mutius a Spaniſh captaine: And that therein his honour was empaired: for which, if he had not a publike and honourable amends, he threatned by force of arms to redreſſe his wrong, and the league being broken, to carrie away with him the kings gallies. Neither wanted there ſome who fauoring Don Iohn his quarrell, and angrie with the Venetians, laid ſtill more coles on the fire that was alreadie too great. Hereunto Venerius ſent word vnto the General, That he ſhould do well to moderat his anger, and at leiſure to aduiſe himſelfe, and better to vnderſtand the matter, ſo ſhould hee plainly ſee, that there was neuer more iuſt or wholſome execution done vpon any, than vpon thoſe mutinous perſons: But if hee, carried a-F way with the heat of youth, ſhould attempt any more violent courſe than ſtood with the common quiet, it were not to bee maruelled if hee afterward repented. He (as hee ſaid) was alſo in armes, and readie to ſhew himſelfe a man. The matter was growne to that heat, that it was not onely not farre from the breaking off of the league; but euen at the point to haue ſet all on a broile, and to haue put the whole fleet in danger: had not Columnius the Popes Admiall, againſt this this tempeſt oppoſed himſelfe: Hee with all his power laboured to cure the wounded mind of G

the Generall, and to appeaſe his anger: telling him, That the common enemy would hardly be withſtood by them all, being at vnitie and concord amongſt themſelues; but if vnto the forraine danger were alſo ioyned domeſticall diſcord, then were the Chriſtian commonwealth vndone. But if he would moderat his anger, and more regard the honour and credit of the Venetian Admiral, than the puniſhment of a ſeditious man, euen they which were vnto him friends, and enemies vnto the Venetians, would highly commend his moderation and ſtayednesſe: yea, that howſoeuer the matter was done, it could not now bee vndone. But whatſoeuer Venerius had done, was in his opinion iuſtly done, That it was alwayes ſo accounted and obſerued, that when many princes ioyned their forces together in matters that concerned the common managing of the warre, nothing was to be done without the command of the Generall: but in matters be- H longing to the priuate gouernment of euerie mans regiment, euery Generall had power of life and death ouer them that were vnder his commaund: which to bee ſo, was as he ſaid hereby to bee vnderſtood; King Philip was king of many kingdomes, and that hee might long ſo bee, hee heartily wiſhed: Now if any Millanoies had committed any capitall crime worthy death in the kingdome of NAPLES, ſhould the iudgement of that crime be of right to bee referred vnto the king himſelfe, as the chiefe ſoueraigne? or vnto the Gouernour of MILLAINE, where the offendour was borne? or rather to the ciuill magiſtrate of NAPLES, in whoſe iuriſdiction the fault was committed, and ſo of right there to be executed? What difference was there then, but that Mutius might rightly ſeeme to haue beene iuſtly puniſhed by Venerius, who although hee were a Spaniſh captain, had yet raiſed a mutinie in a Venetian galley, which was vnder the command I of the Venetian Admirall. Beſide that, the diſcipline of war ſometime required a ſeuere and exemplare kind of puniſhment: For which cauſe it was both notably and truly ſaid of Clearchus, That a Generall ought to be more feared of his ſouldiours, than the enemie: and that amongſt the auncient Romanes it had beene the cuſtome euen for priuat men with more ſeuere puniſhment to reſtraine the factious citizen than the moſt cruell enemie: That the fact was not ſo much to bee regarded, as the intention of him that did it: That it was the dutie of commaunders to withſtand the madneſſe of the mutinous. The authour of ſedition and tumult hee ſaid had ſuffered but condigne puniſhment to his fact: who if hee had eſcaped vnpuniſhed, would but haue beene the more diſordered, but now by his exemplarie puniſhment, would deterre others from the like inſolencie. Beſides that, the externall danger was ſuch, as ought to reconcile K them, were they neuer ſo much enemies: That ſuch men as they were, ſhould aboue all things regard what might profit or hurt the common cauſe, in contemplation whereof all priuat iniuries were to be remitted: and the rather, for that the honor and diſhonor of the good or bad ſucceſſe of ſuch important an action ſhould redound vnto themſelues, but eſpecially vnto the Generall. His own dutie he had as he ſaid diſcharged, in dealing ſo plainly and faithfully with him, and could no more but pray vnto God, with merciſull eye to behold the troubled Chriſtian common weale in ſuch a moſt dangerous time.

Don Iohn ſtill beareth a grudge againſt Venerius.

Thus was the mutinie at PAXO by the great labour of Columnius hardly appeaſed: neuertheleſſe Don Iohn could not afterwards endure to participate vnto Venerius his counſels, or ſo much as to come in his companie: all was done by Barbadicus the Venetian Proueditor. This L

Barbadicus the Venetian Proueditor a notable man.

Barbadicus was not inferiour to Venerius in courage and valour, but farre beyond him in diſcretion; a tall and goodly perſonage, well coloured, his beard grizie, though not for age, for why hee was not aboue fiftie yeares old: beſides that, in his eyes and countenance appeared a viuacitie or liuelineſſe of ſpirit; in his very gate and comely motion of his bodie, he carried a certaine grace and maieſtie: his talke and ſpeech was alwayes calme and temperate, his counſell graue and ſound, ſo that hee was both greatly honoured and beloued of all men: his chiefe endeauour alſo was, to further the hope of attonement betwixt the Spaniards and the Venetians, ſo well begun by Columnius. And ſo all things brought into ſome reaſonable tearmes, they departed from PAXO, and came to CORCYRA; the ſpoyle thereof well declared the enemies late being there. From thence they departed to CEPHALENIA: where M they by letters from Pau. Contarenus, Gouernour of ZACYNTHVS, were aduertiſed, That the Turkes fleet of three hundred and three and thirtie ſaile, of one ſort and other, lay in the gulfe of CORINTH, now called the gulfe of LEPANTO. Whereupon they ſhortly after remooued, with purpoſe to haue gone to PETALA, an hauen oppoſit ouer againſt the iſlands (or rather rockes)

A rockes called ECHINADES, but now CORZVLARES; and ſo to the bay of CORINTH, to draw the enemie forth to battell: but ſtaied with contrary winds, they put backe againe into the valley of ALEXANDRIA, another port in the iſland of CEPHALENIA: from whence they afterward departed to the iſlands CORZVLARES, where by the way they vnderſtood by letters out of CRETE, That FAMAGVSTA was loſt: with which bad newes they were no whit diſcouraged, but rather enflamed with the deſire of reuenge. From the iſlands they went to GALANGA, a good harbour, where they ſtaied one night, purpoſing the next day to haue gone to the mouth of the gulfe of LEPANTO, there to dare the Turks to battell.

The Turkes Baſſaes Partau and Haly, who then lay in good ſafetie within the gulfe, hearing of the approach of the Chriſtian fleet, began to conſult with the reſt of their moſt expert cap-
B taines, Whether to giue the Chriſtians battell, or to keepe themſelues ſtill within their ſafe harbour: vpon which doubt they were amongſt themſelues of diuers opinions. Amongſt the reſt Chiroche a man of great yeares and authoritie, and withall a moſt noble captaine, exhorted the Baſſaes, in no caſe, when no need was, vpon a vaine glorie to aduenture all to the fortune of an vncertaine battell: it was (as he ſaid) the part of wiſe and worthie commanders, to moderat with reaſon their happy fortunes, for that therunto were incident many accidents whereby their former felicitie might be diſgraced: They had already run alongſt the enemies coaſts, ſpoiled the frontiers of his countries, and were with much honour and greater ſpoile in ſafetie returned, hauing increaſed the Turkiſh empire with many ſtrong townes of the enemies: The iſland of CYPRVS was with wonderfull good fortune brought vnder the Turks obeiſance, the enemies great
C prouiſion at ſea fruſtrated, in ſuch ſort, as that hauing loſt diuers of their gallies, they were neuer yet able to draw their ſwords: They had with their fleet at their pleaſure romed vp & downe the Adraticke, and diſplayed their victorious enſignes almoſt vnto the very citie of VENICE. What could they then deuiſe or wiſh for more honourable or glorious, than with the ſafetie of their fleet, yea without any loſſe at all, to haue performed ſo great matters? Now the three generall commanders of the enemies fleet to be ſo at diſcord amongſt themſelues, as that they were readie to fall in ſunder of themſelues, who now vpon the approch of Winter, and for want of victuall, muſt needs in few dayes returne home with their fleet, neuer after to meet againe with the like ſtrength at ſea: and therefore to what purpoſe were it, by force of armes and vncertaine battell, with danger to ſeeke for the ſoueraigntie and commaund of the ſea, which would forth-
D with of it ſelfe without any danger fall vnto them? Neither ſhould they by the doubtful victory ſo much encreaſe their honour, as by the vncertaine euent of a battell blemiſh the ſame, if any thing ſhould fall out otherwiſe than well. And that therefore they ſhould do well to take heed, that in ſeeking to augment their former victories, they hazarded not their honour alreadie gained; but wholeſomely delay the warre, and keepe themſelues in ſafetie with their fleet within the gulfe, and not to goe out at the enemies pleaſure, but when they ſhould ſee good themſelues, at ſuch time as the enemy was not ſo well prouided: ſo ſhould they (as he ſaid) without any great labour or danger attaine to the full of their owne deſires.

Chiroche diſſuadeth the Baſſaes from giuing battell vnto the Chriſtians.

Partau Baſſa ſtandeth indifferent for giuing or not giuing battell.

Partau Baſſa was of opinion, That the Chriſtians would not at all offer him battell: which opinion the Chriſtians had alſo of him: and in this queſtion, for giuing or not giuing of battell,
E ſeemed neither to approue nor diſlike that Chiroche had ſo grauely ſpoken, but as a man indifferent and loath to incurre any blame, ſhewed himſelfe readie either to ſtay or to ſet forward, as ſhould be thought beſt by the greater part. But Haly Baſſa, a man of an hoter ſpirit, and the great champion of the Turks, could not endure to heare of any delay, but of preſent battell: The pleaſure of Selymus, the hope of victory, the remembrance of the diſpleaſure Piali Baſſa had the laſt yeare incurred, for not giuing the Chriſtians battell, induced him now in no caſe to refuſe battel: but forthwith to goe out of the gulfe, and to accept thereof, if it were offered. In which his opinion hee was the more confirmed by the relation of Caracoza a famous pyrat, and of great account amongſt the Turks: who in a ſwift galliot taking view of the Chriſtian fleet, had reported it to bee much leſſe than in indeed it was, deceiued as was afterward thought, by not taking full F view thereof, by reaſon of his poſting haſt; or els blinded by the iſland, which lying behind the fleet, ſuffered him not perfitly to deſcry the ſame. Vpon which report there was great reioycing amongſt the Turks, who now after their accuſtomed manner dreamed of nothing but victory and ſpoile. So that Haly vainely perſwaded that his fleete was both the greater and ſtronger, would now needs fight, in hope that the Chriſtians vpon the firſt ſight of the Turks fleet would either either retire and ſaue themſelues by ſhamefull flight: or els in aduenturing battell at ſo great ods, G by their fooliſh hardineſſe receiue a notable ouerthrow. This opinion of the Baſſa was alſo not a little confirmed by the perſuaſion of Caſſanes, Barbaruſſa his ſonne, Vluzales, and Chais-Beg, Go-uernour of SMYRNA, all men of great marke and experience, eſpecially in matters at ſea. And although Partau the other Baſſa ſtood wauering, as a man in doubt, and Chiroche Gouernour of ALEXANDRIA, with Carabuzes Gouernor of SILICIA, and Mechmet Gouernor of EVBŒA, men of no leſſe worth than the other, vpon better conſideration, were of a quite contrary mind,

The Turkes reſolue to giue the Chriſtians battell. for not giuing the Chriſtians battell: yet ſuch was the authoritie of Haly, or rather his importunitie, forced to his owne deſtinie, that his opinion preuailed; ſo that now out they needs muſt, and fight. Albeit that two other eſpials ſent out after Caracoza, & hauing more perfectly viewed the fleet, returning with ſpeed, told the Baſſaes, as truth was, That the Chriſtians, very ſtrong and H well appointed, were comming with enſignes diſplayed of purpoſe to fight: and that their fleet was in number much greater than was before ſuppoſed. With which newes ſo farre contrary to their expectation, the Baſſaes were exceedingly troubled: and demaunding whether the for-moſt gallies were all Venetians or not: and being anſwered, that they were intermixt, ſome Venetians, ſome Spaniſh, and of the other Weſterne countries: they began to doubt the worſt, and became exceeding penſiue. Neuertheleſſe knowing themſelues to be of all things well furniſhed, hauing new victualled in the bay of CORINTH, and there alſo taken in twelue thouſand Ianizaries and Spahies, drawne out of the garriſons of ÆTOLIA, ACARNANIA, PELOPONE-SVS, and the other countries thereby, all reſolute men, and foure thouſand other common ſoul-diors; and that they could not now with their honor ſhrinke backe, they held it ſtill for the beſt, I to hold on their former reſolution for the giuing of the Chriſtians battell. Yet before their ſet-ting forward, calling together the captaines and cheefe commaunders of the fleet, Partau the more to encourage them, ſpake vnto them as followeth:

Partau Baſſa encourageth the Turke.

Wee are to fight (ſaid he) fellowes in armes, with that kind of men whom our anncеſtors haue driuen out of EVBŒA, the RHODES, MITILENE, PELOPONESVS, and TRIPOLIS, and wee our ſelues but yeſterday out of the famous iſland of CYPRVS: whoſe cities and ſtrong townes, in number infinite, our Emperour hath, as the rewards of his warres: whom wee haue alwayes vanquiſhed, as well by ſea as by land: and ſhall it then now repent you, that you in this warre embrued in the Chriſtian blood, haue ſunke or taken many of their Ships and Gallies? That you haue caried away great and rich K ſpoils? That you haue taken whole Iſlands and Cities at the firſt aſſault? That wee haue by prooſe ſhewed vnto the world what force is in the Turke to ſubdue ſtrong Cities and Townes? and what little power is in the Chriſtians to defend the ſame? What direction brought vs victorie before, the ſame ſhall alſo at this preſent giue vs the like. Not to ſpeake of that, that wee farre excell them both in number of men and gallies, this is more to be reckoned of, that wee excell them in valour and proweſſe: for you being old expert ſouldiours, from your infancie trained vp in the warres, hardened in infinit battels, and full of courage and ſtrength, ſhall fight againſt weake, freſh-water, and effeminat ſouldiours; who entertained for pay (of the refuſe of all nations) know nothing belonging to the warres; or forcibly preſſed out of cities, ſerue not becauſe they would, but becauſe they muſt neither will nor chooſe. But not to L ſpeake more of the manner of he Chriſtian ſoul diors, who are nothing els than the perpetuall exer-ciſe of your renowne and proweſſe: and to come vnto him, vnder whoſe fortune and conduct they ſerue. What ſhould I ſay? ſhould I compare either of vs (who haue ſpent our liues in victories and triumphs: who borne and brought vp amongſt armes, haue with our right hands gained vnto our ſelues honour and fame) with this ſtripling and halfe moneths captaine, who neuer ſaw battels but theſe? who in a leſſe matter neuer ſhewed prooſe of himſelfe, why ſhould he be accounted of in a greater? who in ſo weightie a cauſe needeth a tutor: and ſuch a one, as indeed beareth the name of a Generall, more for his honour, than for any worth in himſelfe. Beſides, amongſt the enemies is ſuch diſſention, that euerie man regardeth his owne priuat, ſerueth as pleaſeth himſelfe, contemneth, and is contemned: Whereas with vs is ſuch conſent, that it cannot be deuiſed, how the ſouldiours in generall ſhould more truſt their commaunders, or the commaunders their ſouldiours. What things were by the diſcipline of warre or M *carefulneſſe of a Generall to be prepared, all thoſe you haue abundantly and plentifully in readineſſe: onely this laſt warlike labour remaineth, which once diſpatched, our enemies ſhall be diſcomfited euen in that wherein their greateſt confidence reſteth. They ſhall be deſpoiled of their honour and trafficke at ſea: and that * citie onte ſubdued, which is alone the glorie of the ſea, there ſhall be no hope left for*

* Vz Venice.

A for the Christians whether by sea or land: and (that wee haue alwaies wished) ITALIE, faire ITALIE (wherein these matters are plotted against vs) shall be in our hand and power: wherefore let vs with such courage assaile our enemies as beseemeth most victorious conquerours, men so many times conquered: And so set forward, as if you saw our emperour himselfe encouraging you, and giuing you the signall of battell; of his bountie, and the present victorie, expecting all felicitie and blisse.

This comfortable speech with great grauitie deliuered by the Bassa, so encouraged the Turks as that they all with one voice and mind, seemed to desire nothing more than battell: for they still possessed with the first report of Caracoza, and encouraged by the Bassaes speech, were in
B good hope to haue fought the battel vpon great aduantage, and therfore thought vpon nothing but present victorie. Whereupon setting forward with great cheerefulnesse, they came out of the gulfe, and shaped their course for the islands ECHINADES, about midway betwixt LEPANTO and PATRAS; before little islands or rather obscure rockes, scarcely appearing in the sea, but now to be made famous throughout the world, by the most notable battel that euer was fought in those seas.

The Turks fleet commeth out of the gulfe of Lepanto.
The islands Echinades, or Corzulares.

The Christians also comming still on towards the enemie, the seuenth of October in the afternoone, vnderstood by their espials, that the Turkes fleet was comming, and euen now at hand: whereupon the Generall commaunded the great ensigne of the confederats (the appointed signall of battell) to be forthwith displaied, and a great warning piece to bee shot off out
C of his Admirall gallie. And himselfe glistering all in bright armour, with Cardona Admirall of SICILIA, and Soto his secretarie, in a long boat went to all the squadrons of the fleet one after another, exhorting them with cheerefull countenance to follow their leaders, and to play the men: remembring, that they that day carried in their hands, the wealth, honour, glorie, and libertie of their countries; yea and the verie religion of their forefathers; and that that daies victorie would bring vnto them and theirs perpetuall felicitie: whereas otherwise, if they should as cowards suffer themselues to be ouercome and vanquished, it would be vnto them the beginning of all manner of most wofull calamities. To which and other his like speeches, the captaines and soldiors (before of themselues cheerfull ynough) in euerie place where he came gaue such applause with the ioyfull crie of Victorie, Victorie, so often and so cheerful in all places re-D sounded, as that it was taken as a luckie aboadment of the glorious victory shortly after ensuing. In like manner Auria in the right wing, and Barbadicus in the left (for the fleet kept the same order that they had appoointed before at MESSANA) ceased not by all comfortable speeches to encourage their followers: shewing vnto them, That now the time was come they had so long wished for, wherein they not oppressed with multitude, might at lenght shew their true valour against the false and faithlesse enemies: who being in deed nothing else but base and contemptible slaues, borne to bondage, and hauing lost their owne libertie, came to impugne the libertie of others; bringing with them a greater terrour of their name, than valour of their persons: and that therefore, if euer, they would now shew themselues valiant and couragious, and that day wherein of all others true force was to be seene, to abate the pride of the barbarous and cruell
E enemie; and to make their reioycing for the conquest of CYPRVS short, before they had well tasted the pleasure thereof. At which time also the captaines generally throughout the fleet, with cheerfull countenances and couragious speech, encouraged their souldiors: leauing nothing vnsaid, that might harten them on; or vndone, that might further the victorie.

Neither were the Turks wanting to themselues (although it was fallen out much contrarie to their expectation, to see the Christians, who they before thought durst not haue shewed themselues, now readie to dare them battell) but encouraged with their former victories, and furthered with a faire gale of wind, came on prowdly with their fleet, orderly and gallantly set after their wonted manner in forme of a Croisant or halfe Moone, their fortunat ensigne: neuertheless in their comming on they were much troubled with the brightnesse of the Sun, which F then shining full in their faces with his bright beames, so dazled their eies, that they could not well see how to their most aduantage to direct their gallies. In this fleet of the Turkes were two hundred and fiftie gallies, fiftie galiots, and twentie brigandines & other small vessels: all which a farre off shewed like a thick wood, but comming neere hand, presented (as we said) the forme of a Croisant. The middle battell in number much like the Christians, was conducted by the great great Baſſaes Haly and Pertau, attended vpon with Agan maſter of the Turks Arſenall: Muſtapha Zelibi, the treaſurer: Achmat Bay, with Mahomet his younger brother, the ſonnes of Haly: Achmat Aga, Gouernour of THRACIA: Aßis Caiga, Gouernour of CALIPOLIS: Caracoza: Caſſanes, the ſonne of Barbaruſſa: Malamur, Gouernour of MITYLENE: Dely Solyman Gider, captaine of CHIOS: Caſſambeius, Gouernour of the RHODES: Proui Aga, captaine of NAVPLIVM: Giapar Zelibi, preſident of CALABA: Dordagnan: Dondomeni, and many others, whoſe barbarous names I purpoſely omit: all men of great account and place, and for their experience at ſea, the chiefe ſtrength of the Turkiſh empire. The right wing was by the appointment of the Baſſaes, commaunded by Mahomet Bey with fiftie ſix gallies, with whom were alſo many worthie captaines: and in the left wing was Vluzales the old Archpyrat, but now the viceroy of ALGIERS with ninetie fiue gallies, accompanied with Caraiolo and Arabey his two ſonnes, with a multitude of pyrats, men of his owne profeſſion, but moſt valiant and expert ſouldiours. In the rearward came Amurates Dragut with thirtie gallies, and diuers other ſmall veſſels. G H

The great and notable battell betwixt the Turke and the Chriſtians, commonly called the battell of Lepanto.

Now was the day well ſpent, when both the fleets were readie to giue battell. The enemie ſtill comming on, almoſt in the ſame order that the Chriſtians did: for their middle battell came directly againſt our middle battell, and their wings againſt ours. So the ſignall of battell on both ſides giuen by the ſhooting off of certaine great pieces: the Turks, after their maner comming on with an hideous crie, firſt light vpon the ſix galleaſſes, which lying at anchor almoſt a mile before the fleet as moſt ſtrong bulwarks, out of their forecaſtles powred out their murthering ſhot vpon the Turks, now come within their danger; and in their paſſing by, ſo plagued them I by diſcharging their whole broad ſides, firſt the one, and eftſoones the other vpon them, that hauing receiued great loſſe, and diuers of their gallies ſunke, they were enforced to break their order, and to fall further off. Which ſo much the more troubled the Turkes, for that they had before ſuppoſed, thoſe great carts & vnſeruiceable ſhips (as they accounted of them) to haue caried little or no great ordinance on their ſides, after the manner of their gallies: for the vſe of the galleaſſes was not vnto the Turks knowne, vntill now that they had receiued from them moſt notable harme: which as it was the beginning of their miſerie, ſo was it vnto the Chriſtians of greateſt importance, for the gaining of the victorie. At which time alſo the wind, which all that day had much fauoured the Turks, was now (God no doubt fighting his owne battell) come about to the Weſt, and with a pleaſant gale in the time of the fight, carried the ſmoake of the K great ordinance vpon the Turks, to their no ſmall diſaduantage. Yet for all this loſſe and diſorder in their fleet, the fierce enemie with wonderfull pertinacie paſsing by theſe galeaſſes, quickly repared agine to their places, and made good their diſordered ſquadrons, & with all their force aſſailed the Chriſtian fleet. The trumpets, drums, and other inſtruments of warre, had ſcarcely well ſounded, when all ſhooke with confuſed cries, flames of fire, thundring of artillerie, and other noiſe of the marriners and ſeamen: wherewith many were ſo aſtonied, as if they had bin both deafe and blind, hauing vpon the ſudden almoſt loſt the vſe both of their ſight and hearing. At which verie inſtant, a man might haue ſeene the whole ſhowers as it were of arrowes and darts mixt with the deadly ſhot, flying from the one fleet to the other: the maſts broken, the ſaile- L yards ſtrucke downe, the tackles rent, and all confuſed with horrour and feare. Haly beholding the Admiral gallie (which was eaſie to be knowne by the flag) and vſing the ſurpaſsing cheerfulnes of his marriners and rowers, ran vpon her with ſuch violence as if he would haue preſently ſtemmed hir: but being with like force encountred by the Admirall, they met togither with ſuch violence, that both their beakes were with the feaze broken off, and ſo fell into the ſea. There began a moſt cruell fight betwixt thoſe two great commanders, who had before drawn vnto them the ſtrongeſt gallies in their fleets, and the choiſeſt men in their armies. In the Admirall gallie of the Chriſtians, were foure hundred ſelect men picked out of the whole armie, moſt of them captaines and auntients, men of approued valour: who not only valiantly repulſed the furious enemies, but with greater courage enforced them to ſhrinke backe, and preſsing hard vpon them entred the gallie euen to the maine maſt; where the enemie ſtrengthned with new ſupply, fought M couragiouſly, repulſed the Spaniards, and cleared againe their gallie. Many were there wounded on both ſides, and many ſlaine. Don Iohn ſeeing his men giue way, ſent in new ſupplie; wherwith the other encouraged, beſtirred themſelues more luſtily then before, and hardly charge the Turks: who with like hope and like courage encounter them. The battell was like vnto the ebbing

A dreadfull and doubtfull fight betwixt the two Admiral gallies

A ebbing and flowing of the ſea: Thriſe the Turkes were driuen euen vnto the maine maſt, and thriſe ſtrengthened with new ſupplies, they with great ſlaughter repulſed the Chriſtians backe againe.

Venerius perceiuing the danger of the Generall, was about to haue aſſailed the poupe of Haly his gallie, ſo to haue endangered her being ſet vpon both before and abathe: but in comming thither he was encountred by Pertau the other Baſſa, who with a companie of gallies oppoſed himſelfe againſt him, and that with ſuch celeritie, that hauing made ſhew as if he would haue charged him afront, he by and by ſet vpon his ſide. Which vnexpected manner of fight ſo ſuddenly faſhioned, at the firſt much troubled the Chriſtians, who afterward gathering courage, notably defended themſelues. Venerius vpon whoſe valour the Venetian ſtate reſted, gal-
B lātly armed, not only encouraged his men, one while with intreating, another while with threatning, but was himſelfe in the midſt of them fighting; whoſe great honor much moued the minds of his ſouldiors, but his reuerend yeares more; to ſee him (being aboue threeſcore and ſeauenteene yeares old) to performe all the parts of a braue youthfull commaunder, in the verie face of the greateſt danger. The fierce enemie hauing ſlaine many of the Chriſtians, preſſed on more furiouſly, and fighting cloſe togither, entred the prow of Venerius his gallie now bared of defendants, and with their multitude rather than true valour oppreſſed the Venetians; who had there no doubt been ouercome, had not Ioannes Lauretanus, and Catherinus Malipetra, two valiant captaines, and lying not farre off, ſpeedily come to their reliefe. By whoſe comming in, the fight was in the turning of an hand quite altered: ſo that they which a little before fiercely aſſai-
C led the Venetian gallies, were now glad to defend their owne: ſo for a ſpace the fight ſtood indifferent, but in proceſſe of the battell, thoſe two worthie captaines, whileſt they alſo performe the parts of moſt reſolute ſouldiors, were both ſlaine; ſhot through with ſmall ſhot. The fall of theſe notable men, did rather enrage than diſcourage the minds of their ſouldiers; ſo that blinded as it were with furie, and ſuddenly become other men, they deſperatly preſſed in vpon the Turks. So that whileſt they on the one ſide kill and wound them, & Venerius more hardly chargeth them on the other; the terrour of the battell was turned from them that were euen at the point to haue beene vanquiſhed, vpon the victors. And our men after great ſlaughter of the Turks, tooke two of their gallies: Pertau the Baſſa in a long boat eſcaped the danger, and ſo got D him out of the battell. Not farre off thence, Columnius the Popes Admirall, as a valiant chieftaine hardly aſſailed other of the Turks gallies, and made amongſt them great ſlaughter: one ſingled from the reſt, he tooke, and diſordered the other. Lignius the Admirall of GENVA, with like courage thruſt himſelfe into the thickeſt of the enemies, and there made a notable fight. Many an enemie fell about the prince of PARMA, Rueres, Vrſinus, Cornea and Iuſtinianus; who for their preſent honour and future fame, fought moſt couragiouſly.

Venerius comming to the reliefe of Don Iohn is encountred by Pertan Baſſa.

Lauretanus and Malipetra ſlaine.

At the ſame time Chiroche or Sirocke (of ſome called Mahomet Bey) with his right wing with great confidence came forward againſt the left wing of the Chriſtian fleet; but falling before he was aware into the danger of the galeaſſes, was from out of them miſerably beaten with the great ordinance, hauing many of his men ſlaine, and diuers of his gallies ſunke & torne, few
E of the hugie and deadly ſhot falling in vaine into the ſea, by reaſon of the thicke ſtanding of the Turkes gallies: where alſo diuers of the enemies were burnt with pots of wild fire, caſt into their gallies out of the tops of the galeaſſes. Chiroche to auoid the danger of the galeaſſes, and to ſhun the dangerous ſhelfe betwixt him and the maine (which the riuer Achelous running betweene the borders of ACHARNANIA and ÆTOLIA, & there falling into the ſea, maketh) ſent a great part of his gallies vnder the conduct of one Alis, a notable renegat of GENVA, to caſt about aloofe vpon the right hand, and ſo to come vpon the backe of Barbadicus the leader of the left wing of the Chriſtian fleet: Which he perceiuing, forthwith turned his gallies, and with their prowes receiued the firſt onſet. The great ordinance firſt on both ſides diſcharged; diuers of the gallies grapled faſt togither, in ſuch ſort, as that they encountred one another, not with their F miſsiue weapons onely (as with their ſmall ſhot, arrowes, & darts) but with their drawne ſwords foot to foot. Amongſt the reſt, the fight of two of the Chriſtian gallies was moſt notable, in the one was Barbadius himſelfe, in the other Marcus Cleonia, vpon whom fell ſix of the enemies gallies, and vpon Barbadicus fiue: who although they were on euerie ſide diſtreſſed with a moſt doubtfull and dangerous fight, yet did they moſt valiantly with worthie reſolution endure the ſame. In the furie of this battell, Barbadicus encouraging his ſouldiors, and fighting himſelfe euen there where moſt danger was, was hit in the left eye with an arrow, and ſo ſtrucke into the braine almoſt through the head: wherewith falling preſently downe, he was taken vp for dead; howbeit he dyed not thereof vntill three daies after. The ſuppoſed death of this worthie man much troubled the Chriſtians, and both the armies felt his fall (ſuch force there is in the valour of one worthie man) for the Turks now as conquerors luſtily boorded the gallie, troubled with the loſſe of the captaine, and the Venetians as men diſcouraged, gaue way: the gallie had there vndoubtedly beene loſt, had not Federicus Nanius and Syluius Porcia with their gallies ſpredily come to her reliefe; by whoſe comming in, ſuch an alteration was made, as that the gallie before halfe taken, was not only cleared, but diuers of the Turks gallies alſo bourded, & ſome of them taken, not without the great ſlaughter of the Turks. In this ſo hard and mortall a conflict, Syluius was grieuouſly wounded in the thigh, and in his right ſide. It is reported of Barbadicus, That ly- H ing that euening at the point of death, the battell then ended, he like another Epaminondas asked which part had got the victorie: and being told that the Chriſtians had got it, and that the Turks fleet was moſt part taken, and the reſt ſunke or burnt: he with his eyes caſt vp vnto heauen, gaue vnto God immortall thankes therefore, and not long after ioyfully departed this life, to liue in bliſſe for euer.

The death of Barbadicus.

Ciconia hardly beſet, and in danger to haue bin loſt, is relieued.

Ciconia in the meane time hardly beſet with ſix of the enemies gallies (as we haue beforeſaid) was himſelfe ſore burnt with wild fire, and hurt in the face: and hauing endured a long and terrible fight, was now euen at the point to haue bin loſt; when ſudden reliefe comming in, he was now contrarie to all hope ſaued, and therewith ſo much encouraged, that with his wearie and wounded ſouldiors, as men from death reuiued, he afreſh charged the enemie, and tooke one of I his principall gallies, with one of the Turkes faireſt enſignes, which in the Venetian Armorie is yet there to be ſeene: of his worthie valour, his honeſt wounds in his face and the forepart of his bodie, were moſt certaine and vndoubted witneſſes.

A hard fight betwixt Io. Contarenus and Chiroche,

Not far off, in the ſame wing, Ioannes Contarenus, an honourable and valiant gentleman, did with his great ſhot exceeding great harme amongſt the Turks gallies: Which Chiroche perceiuing, and therewith enraged, ran ſo fiercely vpon the ſide of Contarenus his gallie, that with his beake he had well neere ſtemmed her; & preſently grapling faſt with her, was like to haue bourded her: whom neuertheleſſe the Chriſtians notably repulſed, with greater ſlaughter than was thought poſſible for ſo ſmall a number to haue made: neither did the enemies fall vnreuenged; K but all embrued with the bloud of the Chriſtians. Seldome hath bin ſeene a more cruell fight, or more reſolute captaines to encounter hand to hand. But after the battell had of long time ſtood doubtfull, the hope of the Chriſtians encreaſed vpon two cauſes, for which the courage of the enemie quailed: firſt for that many of the Turks being ſlain or wounded, they were brought to a ſmall number; then for that both parties ſaw Chiroche himſelfe ſlain; from which time the enemie, as well deſtitute of a leader to conduct them, as of freſh ſupplies to relieue them, began to be cut down right, or taken. Which their danger was the more encreaſed, becauſe the gallie, bulged with the great ſhot, was now leake, and in danger to ſinke: wherefore the Turkes in that wing ouercome with deſpaire, began to thinke rather how to ſaue themſelues by flight than by fight, repoſing their truſt in nothing more than in the neereneſſe of the maine. But as they were turning about toward the ſhore, they were preuented by the Chriſtians: who entring the gallie, L and hauing ſlaine or driuen ouer boord almoſt all that were left, tooke Chiroche, yet breathing, but halfe dead; and ſeeing ſmall hope of his life, with freſh wounds made an end of him.

Chiroche ſlaine, and his gallie taken.

Diuers and doubtfull was the whole face of the battell: as fortune offred vnto euery man his enemie, ſo he fought; according as euery mans diſpoſition put into him courage or feare, or as he met with moe or fewer enemies, ſo was there here and there ſometime victorie, and ſometime loſſe. Many fights were in ſundrie places ſeene mingled togither. Some gallies whiles they run to ſtemme others, are themſelues by others ſtemmed. Some, which you would thinke were flying away, falling by fortune vpon one victorious gallie or other, ſuddenly take them. Otherſome as if they had bin of neither part, row vp and downe betwixt the battels. The chance of warre in one place lifteth vp the vanquiſhed, and in another ouerthroweth the victorious. All M was full of terrour, errour, ſorrow, and confuſion. And albeit that fortune had not yet determined which way to incline, yet the Chriſtians at length began to appeare much ſuperior both in courage and ſtrength: and the Turkes ſeemed now rather to defend themſelues, than to aſſaile their enemies.

A Bacianus in the rereward intentiuely marked all the whole fight, and euer as need required ſent in preſent aid, without reſpect whether they were the Popes gallies, the king of SPAINES, or the Venetians, that were diſtreſſed. In this long and terrible fight it chanced, that the Turkes ſeeing the Chriſtian Generals gallie hardly charged on the prow by Haly Baſſa, to be almoſt bared of defendants in the poup, all the ſoldiors hauing their hands full before, were about to haue bourded her abath, and to that purpoſe were fetching a compaſſe about her: Which Bacianus quickly perceiuing, gliſtring in bright armour, came ſpeedily in with certaine gallies, and by oppoſing of himſelfe againſt them, ſtayed their courſe. In all the battell was not ſeene a more cruell fight: for hauing diſcharged many volleys of ſhot, and arrows and darts without number, they grapled at length togither, and came to the ſword; where with the formoſt Bacianus not onely
B with words but with his preſence and valour wonderfully encouraged his ſouldiors, hauing receiued in his targuet of proofe two ſmall ſhot. Many were on both ſides ſlaine: the Spaniards attempting ſundrie times to haue entered the Turkes gallies, were with great loſſe repulſed: but not giuing it ſo ouer, neither giuing the enemie leaue to breath, or ſo much as to looke behind him, valour was vanquiſhed by pertinacie: and the Spaniards hauing ouerthrowne and ſlaine their enemies, enioyed their gallies.

Now had Don Iohn with like courage and ſtrength, but with doubtfull victorie, fought three houres and more with Haly Baſſa: when after ſo dreadfull and dangerous a fight, and many a deadly wound on both parts giuen and receiued, our men began to faint, and brought to the vttermoſt of their deuoire, were in danger to haue beene ouercome, had not Don Iohn betaken
C himſelfe vnto his only and laſt refuge. He had (as is beforeſaid) reſerued vnder the hatches foure hundred of his beſt and ſelect ſouldiors, for their valour choſen out of the whole armie againſt all the euents of ſo long and dangerous a battell: theſe men attentiuely attending euery beck of Don Iohn, vpon ſigne giuen, as was before appointed, ſuddenly ſtart out, and with a terrible crie and deſperat onſet aſſailed the enemie, before almoſt ſpent with labour and wounds. This freſh and vnexpected companie ſo ſodenly grown vp, firſt aſtonied, and afterwards confounded, and with a great ſlaughter vanquiſhed the Turks, and poſſeſſed the gallie. The Baſſa deadly wounded in the head with a ſhot, and all embrued with bloud, was taken, and as a ioyfull ſpectacle brought to Don Iohn: who ſeeing him readie to breath his laſt, commanded him to be deſpoyled of his armour, and his head ſtrucke off. Which preſently ſet vpon the point of a ſpeare, hee
D for a ſpace held vp aloft with his owne hand, as a trophey of his victorie, as alſo with the ſight thereof to ſtrike a terrour into the minds of the other Turkes, who in the other gallies faſt by fought yet right valiantly: neither was he therein deceiued, for the Turks beholding the known countenance of the Baſſa, their late Generall, and a flag of the croſſe ſet vp in the top of his gallie, and the noiſe of the Chriſtians (crying victorie) running through the armie, were therwith ſo diſcouraged, that confounded with feare, they turned their gallies and with might and maine made toward the land, which was not much more than a mile off. Which Canalis and Quirinus yet breathing with the late ſlaughter of the Turkes, perceiuing, with their gallies hardly purſued the flying enemie, and ſunke and tooke diuers of their gallies. Partau his ſonne by the ſtaying of E the reſt got time to run his gallie on ground, and ſo forſaking her, ſaued himſelfe and his men by running aſhore: ſo did alſo diuers others run themſelues aground & forſake their gallies, which preſently became a prey vnto the Chriſtians. In this hot conflict was Caracoza the famous pyrat (who abiuring the Chriſtian religion, had turned Turke, and of long time done exceeding much miſchiefe vpon the coaſts of the Chriſtian countries) valiantly fighting, ſlaine by Buzzacharinus of PADVA, by whoſe death many were deliuered of a great feare.

Haly Baſſa ſlain.

The Turks middle battell diſcomfited.

Caracoza the famous pyrat ſlaine.

Haly Baſſa had brought forth with him his two ſonnes Achmat and Mahomet, the one three and twentie yeares old, and the other thirteene, the nephewes of the great emperor Selymus, by his ſiſter maried to Haly; them their father had placed in a great gallie, with a ſtrong guard of the Ianizaries: who ſeeing the diſcomfiture of the maine battell, and the danger now drawing F neere vnto themſelues, were exceedingly afraid; and therfore to ſaue themſelues, thought it beſt with all ſpeed to make toward the maine. But in ſo doing, they were preuented by Requiſenius the great Commendour, who with his furious Spaniards bourding the Turkes, alreadie diſmaied and running away, ſlew of them a great number; and after a great fight and much cruell execution done, tooke the gallie, and that which pleaſed him more, the two ſonnes of Haly both aliue: in the time of which fight, the poore Chriſtians, who faſt chained in the gallie, had as ſlaues long ſerued in great miſerie: now perceiuing the Chriſtians to preuaile, brake of their giues, looſed one another, and with ſuch weapons as firſt came to hand luſtily laid about them, and notably furthered the victorie. G

Notwithſtanding all this good ſucceſſe, the fortune of the battell ſtood yet doubtfull in the right wing. There ſtood in either battell two of the moſt noble chieftaines, one againſt another: on the Chriſtian part Iohn Andreas Auria, the Spaniſh Admirall; and for the Turks Vluzales: both moſt valiant and expert commanders, well knowne the one to the other, for that they had of long vſed the ſame ſeas, equall for their militarie diſcipline, as alſo for their noble acts, but far vnequall for number of their gallies: for the Turks had of one ſort and other almoſt twice ſo many. Auria, whether it were for that he would in the beginning of the battell warily decline the danger, and not hazard his gallies, wherein his chiefe honour would be alſo endangered; or els afraid leaſt the enemie, who far exceeding him in number of gallies, ſhould extend his wing at large, and encloſe the Chriſtian fleet behind; vpon the ſignall of battell giuen, ſhrunke further off from the reſt of the battell: but whether vpon policie, that it might be at his choice either to fight, if the reſt of the armie preuailed, or to retire, if they ſhould be ouercome; or that he vpon martial policie declined the force of too ſtrong an enemie; diuers men diuerſly gloſed: but what the cauſe was indeed, the wiſeſt could not ſurely tell. Howſoeuer the matter ſtood, it ſeemed his purpoſe was by policie to counteruaile what he wanted in ſtrength. This his falling off ſeemed vnto the Turks moſt ſtrange, vnto whom his quicke departure ſeemed at the firſt in maner of a flight. Neither was Auria content with that ſpace he had firſt ſeperated himſelfe from the armie: but the ſecond time fell off further, and there ſtaying and houering aloofe off, ſeemed to await ſome good oportunitie, to take the enemie at ſome aduantage: hauing in the meane time one of the galeaſſes of PISA lying before him, as it were in ſtead of a bulwarke, which with often ſhot much troubled the enemie. Vluzales alſo extending his wing, tooke ſuch a ſpace, as that he ſeemed able to haue compaſſed in and incloſed Auria; yet offered not battell, but rather lay as expecting if any aduantage ſhould be giuen him by the Chriſtians, than raſhly or vnaduiſedly to offer himſelfe or his gallies to any deſperat danger. He had not long ſo lien, but that according to his deſire twelue of the Venetian gallies, which had withdrawne themſelues from Auria (and without any order or direction romed too & fro) fell into his danger: theſe gallies cut off from the reſt, Vluzales with wonderfull celeritie encloſed; and with the multitude of his gallies bourding them one by one, ſlew the defendants, and tooke the gallies. In this fight many of the knights of the Order of S. Stephen moſt valiantly fighting, were ſlaine. Benedictus Superantius, a noble Venetian, ſeeing moſt part of his men ſlaine, himſelfe mortally wounded, and his gallie now almoſt taken, reſoluing rather preſently to die, than to fall into the hands of his enemies; deſperatly put fire to the ſtore of pouder he had in the gallie, and blew vp himſelfe, his ſouldiors that were left, with a great number of the enemies togither. The report of the great ordinance, and noiſe of the battell in that part of the fleet being heard, they which had now in the middle battel got the victorie, togither turned their gallies thitherwards to aid Auria, but not in one ſquadron togither, but comming along one after another, as euery man had ſooner or later cleared himſelfe of his enemie: amongſt the reſt Petrus Iuſtinianus (Admirall of the gallies of MALTA) comming formoſt, was encountered with three of the Turkes gallies, with whom he with his knights had a great and moſt terrible fight. Which Vluzales beholding, and aboue all others hating the knights of the Order, ſpeedily ſent in other three gallies to help their fellowes. So Iuſtinian hardly beſet with ſix gallies, and oppreſſed with the multitude of his enemies, had loſt fiftie of his moſt valiant knights, with one of his enſignes, and with much ado hardly defended himſelfe. But being now brought to the laſt caſt, and the gallie in the iudgement of all men giuen for loſt, loe two of the other gallies of MALTA, who had ſo valiantly fought with other three of the enemies gallies that they were now vpon point to haue taken them all, ſeeing the danger of their Admirall, forſooke their vanquiſhed enemies, and with all ſpeed came to reſcue him: where they found him yet aliue, but ſhot in with three arrowes, and ſtill fighting couragiouſly at the deck of his gallie, with thoſe few he had yet left, beſet round with their enemies: but by the comming in of theſe two gallies, as if it had bin by helpe ſent from heauen, the Turks were notably repulſed, and the Admirall with his gallie reſcued, as a prey out of the mouth of the greedie lyon. Vluzales vnderſtanding that the maine battell and right wing of the fleet was ouerthrown by the Chriſtians, for feare gaue ouer the fight; and leauing the gallies he had taken and

A and hoiſing ſaile, was the firſt in that wing that fled. Which Cardonius perceiuing, who was come in before the reſt, ſuddenly ſhewed himſelfe at his backe, and by aſſailing the hindermoſt gallies, did what he might to ſtay their flight vntil the reſt of the victorious gallies were come in. But whileſt he ſo eagerly purſueth the flying enemie, fifteene of the Turkes captaines enraged with ſuch an vnwonted diſgrace, and mindfull of their wonted proweſſe, ſtayed their flight, and contrary to the expectation of the Chriſtians, turned themſelues and renewed the battell: What minds they bare, the euent ſhewed, for in a trice almoſt all Cardonius his ſouldiors and marriners were ſlaine: nothing letted the taking of the gallie, but that Vluzales ſeeing Don Iohn, Columnius, and Venerius neere at hand, and making towards him, and Auria alſo comming faſt on, was afraid longer to ſtay, and therefore giuing ouer the ſight, fled as faſt as he could: yet carrying
B away with him one gallie of CYPRVS, and one enſigne of the knights of MALTA, as teſtimonies of his owne valour when he ſhould appeare before Selymus. The Chriſtians, although wearie of the long fight which they had almoſt by the ſpace of fiue houres endured, yet ſo long as they were in any hope to ouertake any of their flying enemies, hardly purſued them in chaſe: but when they perceiued it preuailed not to follow farther, and that it was more than time to ſee to their weary and wounded ſouldiors and marriners, they ſtaied from further purſuit; for why the night came now faſt on, vnder the couert whereof the craftie old pyrat flying for life with ſailes and oares, eſcaped with thirtie (or as ſome write, fortie) gallies againe into the bay of LEPANTO.

The Chriſtians hardly purſue the flying enemy.

It was a right horrible ſpectacle to ſee, how in this battell the ſea ſtained with bloud, and co-
C uered with dead bodies, weapons, and the fragments of the broken gallies: beſides the great number of them that were ſlaine, and beaten into the ſea; many of the Turks blinded with feare, caſting away their weapons, to eſcape the furie of the enemie, threw themſelues headlong into the ſea: but finding no hope to recouer the land, laboured againe to come to the gallies; or elſe fainting by the way, were miſerably drowned. Others, either halfe dead, weake, and vnskilfull of ſwimming, or ouercharged with their armour, the ſea alſo deuoured: yea many that could well ſwim, wearied and wounded, ſunke for feare. Others vpon plankes and the pieces of the broken gallies, ſought to ſaue themſelues, and not knowing what to follow or what to ſhun, wo-
D fully periſhed. Otherſome ſwimming, and pitifully entreating their enemies, rather to take them priſoners than to kill them, were (as it oftentimes chanceth where things are done vpon choller rather than vpon diſcretion) without compaſſion ſlaine: in which doing, the Chriſtians thought they did rather reuenge former iniuries to them done, than to doe them any wrong: with ſome mercie more preuailed than wrath, who remembring the common chaunce of warre, choſe rather to take the Turkes priſoners, wofully crauing nothing but their liues, than without mercie to kill them. The numbers of the Turks loſt in this moſt famous battell, could hardly be known, by reaſon that many of them were drowned. Antonius Guarnerius writing the hiſtorie of this warre, reporteth two and thirtie thouſand to haue periſhed: but they which write more ſparingly thereof, report not paſt halfe ſo many to haue beene ſlaine: of whom theſe were of greateſt name; Haly Baſſa the Generall, Mahomet Bey (otherwiſe called Chiroche or Sirochus) Gouernour of ALEXANDRIA, Caſſanes the ſonne of Barbaruſſa, with his ſonne Malamar, Gouernour of MI-
E TILENE, Gider Gouernour of CHIOS; Caſſambeius Gouernour of the RHODES, Proni Aga captaine of NAVPLIVM, Muſtapha Zelibi the great Treaſurer, Caracoza the famous pyrat, with many others whom but to name were tedious. The chiefe priſoners there taken, were Achmat and Mahomet the ſonnes of Haly Baſſa, both afterwards ſent as preſents to the Pope, of whom the eldeſt died by the way at NAPLES; the younger preſented vnto the Pope by Columnius at ROME, was there honourably kept priſoner: and Mechmet Bey, Gouernour of EVBŒA: and about three thouſand fiue hundred others were in that battell taken alſo. The chiefe of them that eſcaped by flight, were Partau Baſſa, who ſeeing all goe to wracke, fled in time in a long boat to land: and Vluzales, who (as it was afterwards certainly known) but with fiue and twentie gallies, and ten galliots fled to LEPANTO. Of the enemies gallies were taken an hundred threeſcore
F and one, fourtie ſunke or burnt: and of galliots and other ſmall veſſels were taken about ſixtie. The Admirall gallie then taken amongſt the reſt, was ſo goodly and beautifull a veſſell, that for beautie and richneſſe ſcarce any in the whole Ocean was comparable vnto her. The deck of this gally was on both ſides thriſe as great as any of the others, and made all of blacke Walnut tree like vnto Ebony, checkered, & wrought marueilous faire with diuers liuely colors and variety of hiſtories.

hiſtories. There were alſo in her diuers liuely counterfets, engrauen and wrought with gold, G with ſo cunning hand, that for the magnificence therof it might well haue been compared vnto ſome princes palace. The cabbin gliſtered in euery place with rich hangings wrought with gold twiſt, and ſet with diuers ſorts of precious ſtones, with certaine ſmall counterfeits moſt cunningly wrought. Beſides this, there was alſo found in her great ſtore of the Baſſaes rich apparell, wrought with the needle, ſo curiouſly and richly embоſſed with ſiluer and gold, that his great lord and maſter Selymus himſelfe could hardly put on more royall or rich attire. His caſket there alſo found with ſix thouſand duckats in it, with a yerely penſion of three hundred duckats, was giuen in reward to a Greeke, borne in MACEDONIA, which ſlew the Baſſa; and was therefore alſo knighted by Don Iohn: who had alſo giuen vnto him the Burrell of the Turkes ſtanderd, which at his returne to VENICE (where hee had of long time before dwelt, and ſerued H in the Arſenall) he ſold vnto a goldſmith: Whereof the Senat hauing intelligence, redeemed it of the goldſmith, paying for euerie ounce a duckat, and layed it vp amongſt the trophies of that moſt famous victorie. It was all of maſſiue ſiluer, guilt and engrauen round about with Turkiſh letters. On the one ſide was written: God doeth conduct and adorne the faithfull in worthie enterpriſes: God doth fauour Mahomet. On the other ſide, God hath no other God, and Mahomet is his Prophet.

The Greek that ſlew the Baſſa, honourably rewarded.

This notable victorie thus happily obtained, Don Iohn the Generall, with Venerius and Columna, the other two Admirals, came together; whom the Generall friendly embraced, but eſpecially Venerius, calling him father, and attributing vnto him the greateſt part of the victorie. Afterwards, all together with their hands and eyes caſt vp towards heauen, they vpon their I knees gaue immortall thankes to Almightie God. So did alſo the reſt of the captaines and maſters, commending one anothers valour and good ſeruice: but eſpecially theirs, who for their religion and countrey had there moſt honourably ſpent their liues; which were in number about 7566. Amongſt whom, the chiefe men that were ſlaine, were Ioh. and Bernardinus, of the honourable familie of Cordona in SPAINE, Horatio Caraffa, and Ferantes Bisballus. Virginius and Horatius, noble Romanes, of the honourable familie of the Vrſini. Of the Venetian nobilitie, Auguſtinus Barbadicus, Benedictus Superantius, Vincentius Quirinus, Ioannes Lauretanus, Marinus Contarenus, Catherinus Malipetra, Georgius and Andreas Barbadicus, Marcus Antonius Landus, Franciſcus Bonus, Hieronimus Contarenus, Antonius Paſchaligus, Hieronimus Venerius, all of the order of the Senatours. Beſides diuers other honourable gentlemen, K who well deſerued to be enrolled in the eternall monuments of fame. Of the knights of MALTA were alſo many ſlaine, amongſt whom of the Germane nation theſe were chiefe: Ioachim Spart, Commendour of MOGVNTIA and FRANCKFORT, Ro. of Hamberke, Commendour of HEMMENDORF, and Fra. Droſt. Of them that were wounded, theſe were of greateſt name: Don Iohn the Generall, Venerius the Venetian Admirall ſhot through the foot, Paulus Iordanus, Troilus Sauell, and Mar. Molinus, with diuers others of leſſe fame, to the number of almoſt ſeuen thouſand.

The number of the Chriſtians ſlain in the battell of Lepanto.

Great was the ioy conceiued of this victorie, but to none more welcome than to the poore Chriſtians faſt chained in the Turkes gallies, of whom twelue thouſand were thereby deliuered from moſt miſerable thraldome, and contrary to all hope reſtored to their antient libertie. L

Two dayes after this victorie, Venerius ſent Humfredus Iuſtinianus with newes thereof vnto the Senate at VENICE: who comming in at the Adriaticke port about noone the nineteenth of October, by ſhooting off of certaine great pieces, gaue warning vnto the citie of his comming, which at that time hung in great ſuſpence betwixt hope and feare. The citizens generally awaked with the report of the great ordinance, came flocking by heapes to the port, euery man longing to heare the firſt newes. There they might ſee Iuſtinian comming afarre off with his gallie, but when he was come neerer, they might perceiue all the marriners attired like Turkes, and foure of the Turkes enſignes hanging behind at the poupe of the gallie, which filled their minds with the hope of good newes, deeming it to bee (as indeed it was) part of the ſpoyle of the enemie. But after that Iuſtinian was landed (which hee had much to doe for the preaſe) and M was gone to the court, with a world of people following after him, crying out for newes: and had there deliuered his letters, and at large diſcourſed of all the ſucceſſe of the battell; which was foorthwith blowne into the citie; and that the marriners alſo after his departure had reported the victory; and that the enemy was in a great battell ouerthrowen: good God, how

A the people as men ouerioyed, ran vp and down the ſtreets, doubling and redoubling their ioyfull name of victorie. The Senatours alſo reioycing together, gaue thankes to God with publicke praiers and ioyfull hymnes in euery church: and afterwards by ringing of bels, peales of ordinance, bone fires, and other ſuch like things, ſhewed all the tokens of ioy poſſible. And to make this ioy the more generall, all priſoners were ſet at libertie, and all debts that exceeded not the ſumme of fiue and twentie crownes, payed out of the common treaſurie, which was generally done through all the Venetian ſeignorie: and a decree made, That that day whereon the victo-rie was gotten, which was the ſeuenth of October, dedicated to the memoriall of Iuſtina, ſhould for euer be kept holyday: and for the perpetuall remembrance therof, a great maſſe of money was coyned, with the impreſſion of Iuſtina vpon it, and an inſcription declaring the victorie.
B Many alſo their neighbor princes ſent their embaſſadours congratulatorie to VENICE, namely, the dukes of SAVOY, FLORENCE, FERRARA, PARMA, MANTVA, and VRBIN, and the knights of MALTA. In which ſo publike ioy no man was ſeene to put on any mourning garments, or to ſhew any token of heauineſſe, although many had loſt their deareſt friends and nee-reſt kinſmen, whoſe liues they reckoned not loſt, but giuen vnto the Chriſtian common weale.
The like reioycing was alſo made in ROME, in SPAINE, NAPLES, SICILIA, and MALTA, eſpecially at ſuch times as embaſſadours from their neighbour princes, came to ioy them of this victorie:
yea and afterwards in other countries further off was like reioycing and ſignes of ioy, as with vs here in ENGLAND.

This is that notable battell, commonly called the battell of LEPANTO, fought neere vnto the C Iſland CVRZOLARI, the ſeuenth day of October, in the yeare 1571, the like whereof was neuer fought at ſea againſt the Turke, wherein hee loſt his chiefe ſtrength at ſea, with moſt of his beſt ſea captaines: and might thereby well perceiue what he and his ſucceſſours were to feare, if the Chriſtian princes at vnitie amongſt themſelues, all diſcord ſet apart, ſhould in zeale of their religion ioyne their inuincible forces againſt them.

In the middeſt of all this ioy, generally conceiued of the late victorie, one of the chiefe priſo-ners of the Turks, hearing it compared with the loſſe of CYPRVS (for that Selymus had therin loſt his fleet, his beſt men of warre, with great ſtore of ordinance) by a fit compariſon ſhewed it not to be ſo, ſaying, That the battell loſt, was vnto Selymus as if a man ſhould ſhaue his beard, which would ere long grow againe; but that the loſſe of CYPRVS was vnto the Venetians, as the loſſe D of an arme, which once cut off, could neuer bee againe recouered. Declaring thereby the great inequalitie of the loſſe.

A wittie and fit compariſo made by a Turke, to ſhew that the loſſe of Cyprus was greater than the loſſe of the battell at Lepanto.

The rich ſpoyle taken from the enemie in this moſt glorious victorie, was thus deuided amongſt the princes confederat. Vnto the Pope were allotted nineteene gallies, two galliots, nine great pieces of ordnance, two and fortie leſſer pieces, and fourſcore and one priſoners. Vnto the king of SPAINE eight and fiftie gallies and an halfe, ſix galliots and an halfe, eight and fiftie great pieces and an halfe, eight great murthering pieces and an halfe, an hundred twentie eight leſſer pieces, and a thouſand, ſeuen hundred and thirteen priſoners. Vnto the Venetians were aſſigned for their ſhare, nine and thirtie gallies and an halfe, foure galliots and an halfe, nine and thirtie great pieces and a halfe, fiue great murthering pieces and a halfe, fourſcore and ſix leſſer pieces, E and a thouſand one hundred threeſcore and two priſoners. The reſt were beſtowed vpon ſuch other princes as had giuen aid, or otherwiſe well deſerued in that ſeruice.

The ſpoile of the enemie diuided amongſt the confederats.

The ioy conceiued of this victorie was not ſo great amongſt the Chriſtians, but that the ſor-row thereof was amongſt the Turkes farre greater. Selymus himſelfe was then at HADRIANO-PLE, where eight dayes after the battell, newes was brought vnto him, That his fleet was ouer-throwne and almoſt all taken or ſunke by the Chriſtians. Which ſo ſoone as he heard, hee was ſtrucken with exceeding griefe: and ouercome with melancholy, would not that day ſuffer any man to ſpeake with him. And the rumor of the ouerthrow ſtill encreaſing, had in ſhort time filled all places with feare, teares, mourning, and heauineſſe: ſome bewayling their parents, ſome their children, ſome their huſbands, ſome their friends or kinſmen there loſt. But that which moſt F grieued the Turkiſh emperor, was the loſſe of ſo many worthy and expert captaines, of ſo many skilfull maſters and notable ſouldiors; who brought vp all their liues at ſea, were not thought inferiour to any then liuing: beſides the perpetuall ignominie and vnwonted diſgrace, thereby inflicted vnto him and his poſteritie for euer. Wherefore full of wrath and indignation, he was about to haue commanded all the Chriſtians in his dominions (in number infinit) to bee put to death.

death. Doubting indeed nothing more, than that they wearie of the Turkish thraldome, and G desirous of innouation, should with weapons put into their hands, rise vp against him, and take part with the other Christians his enemies. But whilest the other Bassaes (as men dismaied with the crueltie of the command) stood all silent, Muhamet Bassa for his former deserts in great fauor with the tyrant, thought it good to make proofe if his furie might by reasonable perswasion be mitigated, and some better course taken, both for the honour of Selymus himselfe, and the common good of the State: Yet well knowing how full of danger it was, in that tyrannicall government, openly to speake any thing contrarie to the good liking of the wilfull emperour, he durst not apertly contradict him: but leaning as it were to his opinion and pleasure, by little and little to draw him from himselfe; and so before he were aware, to lead him into his owne deuise, and by delay moderate the rigour of his former furie. To which purpose, he cunningly set vpon him H in this sort.

Muhamet Bassa cunningly dissuadeth Selymus from so rigorous a resolution, by filling his head with most necessary considerations.

Your anger (said hee) most magnificent and inuincible Emperour, against the Christians, is most iust: and in this my desire exceedeth all others, That they should endure and suffer such punishment as they haue of right deserued. Yet it behoueth vs so to satisfie our wrath, as men better regarding their owne good, than the hote desire of reuenge. And for as much as I am for your many and vndeserued fauours, in all loyaltie bounden vnto your highnesse aboue others; I reckon it in part my duetie, so much the more frankely to deliuer my opinion, such as it is, in matter of so great importance. Neither will I attemper my speech in any respect to the comforting of your grieued minde: for how can it bee that you, who following the worthie examples of your noble progenitors, haue alwayes heeretofore shewed I your most heroicall and couragious minde, contemning all the chaunces of fortune; should not for euer after shew your selfe to bee rather dreaded of all men, than dreadfull of any? Let others, whose kingdomes built vpon vncertaintie are subiect to the reuolution of time and chaunge of fortune, yeeld vnto their euill haps: as for you, whose empire is founded by the mightie hand of the most highest, and compassed about with an impregnable defence, and are your selfe by the power of God appointed king and commaunder of nations and people in number infinite, fortune may well a little pricke you, but neuer ouerthrow you. As for this late mischaunce, if it must needes so fall out, as proceeding from some immutable and eternall cause; must it bee therefore alwayes fixe and permanent? Onely those miseries and mischiefes which the cowardise or foolishnesse of men bring vnto themselues, haue their firme K and certaine calamities: other common euents comming from other causes, haue also their common and sudden chaunges: But how this late mishap at sea may bee amended, and your former glorie there againe recouered, is heereafter to bee considered. Now for the present (in mine opinion) this one thing, as of all others most necessarie is to bee prouided; That the weake and worst fortified places of your empire, most subiect to daunger, may bee presently strengthened with strong garrisons; and that by your present repaire to the imperiall citie, you cheere vp the mindes of your heauie and dismayed subiects: which done, what shall let, but that you may at your pleasure bee reuenged to the full of the Christians? For there is no cause why we should feare the Christians, six hundred times and more before ouerthrowne: both our enemies and wee are the same men wee haue beene for many ages, wee beare the same minds, the same bodies, the same strength, the same weapons, wherewith wee haue gotten infinite victories, both of L them and others. And although such bee the state of man, as that hee cannot otherwise but sometime or other taste of the worst turne; yet I thinke this present misfortune to bee rather imputed vnto some fatall cause to vs vnknowne, than to the valour of the Christians. Besides that, wee may well enough oppose one ouerthrow against our so many and infinite victories: yea wee are to giue immortall thankes vnto almightie God, that wee haue by force of armes subdued the rich and famous Island of CYPRVS, and that your high designes haue in that point sorted to your hearts desire. And hard it is in mine opinion to iudge, whether this late vnfortunat battell shall more hurt vs, or the Christians: for besides that the multitude of the Turkes hath no feeling of so small a losse, they will not as men discouraged, giue themselues to mourning and vaine lamentations, but with greater courage and furie come foorth againe into battell, and reuenge this losse with the infinit calamities of the Christians: who after this their good hap, M will according to their woonted manner giue themselues to excesse, pleasure, carelesnesse, and ease, vnto their owne farther confusion. Thus haue I in briefe faithfully declared mine opinion: yet with that submissiue loyaltie, as that whatsoeuer shall proceed from the mouth of your imperiall Maiestie, shall be of me deemed most wisely and magnificently considered of.

The

A The Bassa was in such grace and authoritie with Selymus, that his opinion in counsell preuailed, and the tyrants wrath by his persuasion was well assuaged. But by the comming of Vluzales to court, the remainder of his former griefe and malancholy was fully quieted: who after he had excused himselfe of the late ouerthrow, and declared what he had himselfe done in the battell, and in testimonie thereof, presented him with one of the ensignes of the knights of MALTA, told him also how that he had left the Christian fleet so rent and torne, as that it could not possibly be made seruiceable against the next yeare: which newes was both of Selymus and the rest gladly heard. In the meane time Selymus placed this Vluzales in the stead of Haly Bassa that was slaine: and straightly commanded the great officers which had the charge of his nauie, to build new shipping night and day: and further enioyned euery Gouernor out of his prouince he had Selymus repaireth his nauie with all diligence possible.
B in charge, to haue in readinesse one gallie or two against the next Spring, as well for the defence of his owne dominions, as to reuenge the losse he had so lately sustained: whereunto also many of his great men put to their helping hands, and cheerfully furthered his desire. New supplies of soldiors were also presently raised, and put into his frontier towns, great store of new ordinance cast, weapons and armour prouided, and whatsoeuer else the necessitie of the present time required. So with the Turks stood reason and industry, rather than with the Christians, who (as some note) rather wanted discretion how to vse the victory, than valour to gaine the same: which whether it chanced for that prosperity begetteth negligence, or that men ioying in their present blisse regard little the time to come, I leaue it to the iudgement of the wiser to determine.

After this so memorable a victorie, the three great commanders of the fleet sat in counsell to The Christian fleet dissolued
C consult, what farther course they were best to take. But for as much as Winter began now to approach, and that they could not much doe vntill their fleet were new furnished and manned, they all resolued for that time to dissolue the fleet, and the next Spring in the beginning of April, to meet together againe at CORCYRA. Wherupon Don Iohn and Columnius returned to MESSANA, where they in safetie arriued in Nouember; and departing thence, and taking their leaue the one of the other, arriued, Don Iohn at NAPLES, and Columnius at ROME: where they were in both places with great ioy and triumph receiued.

The Venetians for all that grieued with the losse of CYPRVS, gaue not so ouer, but repairing their nauie with thirtie gallies, wherein were embarked sixe thousand souldiors, woon a castle in EPIRVS called MARGARITA: and also recouered the towne of SVPPOTO, which the Turkes had Suppoto againe recouered by the Venetians
D that Sommer before taken from them; but now hearing of this ouerthrow, did vpon the approch of the Venetian fleet, againe forsake it. The gallies also of CRETE conducted by Canalis, intercepted many of the Turks vessels laded with captiues and the spoiles of FAMAGVSTA, as they were passing thence to CONSTANTINOPLE.

Although vpon the late obtained victorie, a certaine reconciliation had beene made betwixt Don Iohn and Venerius, yet of the former dissention remained an inward heart-burning of one of them against the other: for which cause, the Spaniards requested the Venetians to appoint an other Admirall in his place. Venerius was now indeed a man of great yeres, and his strength far spent; yet for that in his aged body rested great wisedome and courage, and that they thought him for his great deserts worthy all honour, they were wonderfull loath, and vnwilling therein
E to gratifie the Spaniard: for why, they well knew there was no other cause of the Spaniards prowd hatred, but that he had stood against them vpon the honour of the Venetians: and farther, they liked not that the Spaniard should so presumptuonsly prescribe vnto them, whom they should place or displace in or out of their honorable offices. Neuertheless, not forgetting what commoditie came by concord, and what euils of discord, and that they might not against so mightie an enemie well spare the helpe of the Spaniard; they resolued to make choise of some other; who succeeding Venerius, might with one consent manage their wars together with Don Iohn and Columnius. There was then one Iacobus Fuscarinus their chiefe Gouernour in DALMATIA, who but a little before had notably fortified IADERA and the other frontier townes, and for the space of fourteene moneths had notably represt the furious incursions of the Turks:
F of him then absent and not desirous of the place (as of a man of worthie desert) the whole State by generall consent made choise for their Admirall & General by sea against the Turke: which most honourable place hee receiued not with all the solemne ceremonies thereto belonging, at VENICE, as the manner was, but at IADERA; from whence he in the Admirall gallie sent for that purpose by Aloysius Grimanus his successour in IADERA, sailed ouer to CORSYRA: where he found found the old Admirall Venerius, with no leſſe care prouiding for all things, than if hee ſhould himſelfe haue ſtill continued the warre. Of which great care Fuſcarinus at his comming eaſed him, by taking it wholly vpon himſelfe. G

Caſtronouum in vain attempted by the Venetians

Whileſt Fuſcarinus thus lay making his preparation againſt the next Spring at CORCYRA, Sara Martinengus, who had the charge of the Adriaticke (by the counſell of Venerius, who was now returned to VENICE) vpon the ſudden landed his men, and beſieged CASTRO NOVUM, a ſtrong towne of the Turks in the borders of ISTRIA; where at his firſt comming he tooke the ſuburbs, and had in ſhort time brought the towne to great extremitie. But in the height of his hope to haue woon the towne, hearing that the Beglerbeg of GRECE was with great power comming thither, he was glad to raiſe his ſiege, and with all ſpeed to get him againe to ſea. The Turkes in like manner, to diſtreſſe the ſtrong towne of CATARO, holden by the Venetians in H the borders of DALMATIA, built a great and ſtrong fort vpon the paſſage from ſea to the town, wherein they placed great ſtore both of men and artillerie: in hope by keeping them of the towne from all reliefe by ſea, at length to gaine the towne which they had many times in vaine attempted by force; for by land it was alreadie enuironed with the cruell enemie, poſſeſſing the countrey round about it.

Iacobus Superantius the great Prouidetour, then lying at CORCYRA with the Admirall, vnderſtanding how CATARO a towne of no ſmall importance, was thus both by ſea and land by the enemy diſtreſſed: with twentie gallies manned with the moſt choiſe ſouldiors could be pickt out of the whole fleet, tooke vpon him the raſing of the fort, and relieuing of the towne. Superantius with this ſelect companie, and certaine other gallies which met him by the way, came by night before the mouth of the bay of CATARO, and there diuiding I his fleet, left the one part therof at anchor before the fort, and with the other himſelfe couragiouſly paſſed by the fort, further into the bay: at whom the Turkes out of the fort made diuers ſhot, but (by reaſon it was darke) to ſmall purpoſe. In paſſing by, Superantius tooke ſuch view as he could of the fort, and by and by began on that ſide to batter the ſame; as did alſo the other gallies on the other ſide: and withall, landed their men on both ſides; who vpon ſignall giuen, ran reſolutely to the fort, and by plain force entring the ſame, preuailed vpon the fearful Turks, and put them to the ſword euery mothers ſonne; ſo that of all that great garriſon, was not one left aliue to carie newes of the ſlaughter. This fort was in length fiue hundred paces, but not ſtrong towards land, from whence no ſuch feare was doubted. In it was taken ſeuenteene great pieces of ordinance, with much faire armour, and great abundance of victuals: and ſeuen galliots which lay at anchor vnder the fort. CATARO thus relieued, Superantius with victorie returned againe to CORSYRA. K

1572 Fuſcarinus the Venetian Admirall with all things in readineſſe, hauing long lien at CORSYRA, expecting the comming of the confederats, as was before appointed; ſent Superantius the Prouidetour with fiue and twentie gallies to MESSANA, to haſten the comming of Don Iohn, and to attend vpon him by the way. But comming thither, and thinking to haue found a great fleete and a ſtrong power in good forwardneſſe to haue ſet forward; he found ſuch ſmall preparation, as well ſhewed the Spaniards ſmall care for repreſſing of the Turke, and that they would not be very forward in the ſeruice intended. Which filling him with griefe and indignation, cauſed him L to complaine vnto himſelfe of their vnfaithfulneſſe, and to bewaile the ſtate of his countrey, with the whole Chriſtian common-weale: for Don Iohn had before ſolemnely promiſed vnto the Venetian embaſſadour, that all things ſhould bee in readineſſe againſt the appointed time: but now a great part of Sommer was paſt, when ſcarce ſome few companies, and about fiftie gallies were met together at MESSANA; and when Auria would come with the reſt, no man could tell. So that the carefull Prouidetour ſtood now no leſſe in doubt of the Spaniards delay, than of the Turkes fury.

Selymus ſendeth out Vluzales with two hundred gallies.

Selymus, after the great ouerthrow he had receiued at the iſlands CVRZOLARES, for feare he ſhould be driuen quite out of the ſea, was aboue all things carefull for the renewing of his nauie: and hauing partly new built, partly repaired two hundred gallies, commended them to the conduct of Vluzales, with expreſſe charge, That by how much things had fallen out worſe the laſt M yeare, he ſhould with ſo much the more care now beware the like danger; and not to goe out of the bounds of the ARCHIPELAGO, or to aduenture battell but vpon aduantage, or at leaſtwiſe vpon an euen hand.

This Vluzales (otherwiſe called Occhiall) was an Italian borne in CALABRIA, who in his youth

A youth taken at ſea by the Turkes and chained in the gallie, and afterwards renouncing his faith, by many degrees grew vnto the higheſt preferments amongſt the Turks, & ſo became an exceeding plague, as well to his owne countrey as to all other of the Chriſtians bordering vpon the Mediterranean. He now Admirall for the Turke, after the manner of the prowd Barbarians, threatned with fire and ſword to be reuenged vpon the Venetians: which known at VENICE, much troubled them, aſwell acquainted with the furie of the old Archpyrat. Beſide that, Ant. Barbarus their embaſſador, all the time of this war kept in ſafe cuſtodie at CONSTANTINOPLE, had by letters certified them, what a great fleet, and what a ſtrong armie Selymus had prouided againſt them: and that he himſelfe told two hundred and fiftie ſaile of gallies when they ſet forward from CONSTANTINOPLE, beſide ſome other that were to meet with them at GALI-
B POLIS: and that therefore they ſhould beware how they encountred with the Turkes fleet, but vpon equall ſtrength. It was alſo at the ſame time commonly reported, that king Philip chiefe of the confederats, careleſſe of the warres againſt the Turke in the Eaſt, was about to turne his forces vpon the kingdomes of TVNES or ALGIERS, neerer vnto him (as in deed he did the yeare following.) The Venetians entangled with ſo many difficulties, were euen at their wits end, and day by day the Senat ſat from the riſing of the Sunne vnto the going down of the ſame, conſulting how all theſe miſchiefes were to be remedied. But for as much as the greateſt danger was to be feared from the Turks fleet, as then houering euen ouer their heads, they by letters commanded Fuſcarinus their Admirall, That whether the confederats came vnto him or not, he ſhould forthwith take his courſe towards the Eaſt; & there according to the enemies deſ-
C ſignes, & his own diſcretion and valour, to do what he ſhould think beſt to be done for the common good of his countrie: and not to refuſe to ioine with the enemie in battell, if he ſaw any good hope of victorie. Neither ceaſed they at the ſame time (both by their embaſſadours and letters) earneſtly to call both vpon the Pope and the king, to haſten their forces to encounter the enemie before he ſhould come out of his owne ſeas; and to carrie the terrour of the warre home to his owne doores, rather than to receiue it at their owne. The like meſſage was alſo done to Don Iohn, putting him in mind what his place, what the time, and what the danger of the time required: entreating him (if it were poſſible) of himſelfe to adde ſomething vnto that haſt which the neceſſitie of ſo important a cauſe required. Who neuertheleſſe for all the meſſages and letters to him ſent (which were many) went ſtil on faire & ſoftly, delaying from day to day; telling,
D that he would by and by come, and that the Spaniards would alwaies be ſo good as their word. Which was ſo far from his thought, that afterwards finding one excuſe after another, he not only ſtaied his comming, but called back again Requiſenius alſo, whom he had ſent before with 20 gallies to CORCYRA. Now were two months (fitteſt for the wars) vainly ſpent; when Superantius grieued to ſee time to no purpoſe ſo ſlip away, & fearing leaſt the reſt of the Sommer ſhould to as ſmal effect in like maner paſſe alſo, with great inſtance importuned him to haſten his iourney. Then at length Don Iohn anſwered, that the Venetians requeſted but reaſon, neither that he wiſhed for any thing more than to ſatisfie their deſires: but that a greater care hindred the leſſe, which was firſt to be preuented: He was aduertiſed (as he ſaid) that the French king pretending the ſuppreſſing of certain pyrats, had aſſembled a great fleet at ROCHEL, with purpoſe indeed to inuade
E SPAINE, now that the king was buſied in theſe wars againſt the Turk: & that therfore they muſt pardon him, if he preferred the regard of SPAINE before others, being expreſſely commanded from the king not to depart from MESSANA, vntill he had other commaundement from him. But whether this his excuſe by FRANCE, proceeded of a true feare or otherwiſe, the Venetians much doubted; and the rather, for that the French king vnderſtanding therof by the Venetians, was therewith (as reaſon was) exceedingly offended: proteſting, that he was euer ſo farre from that purpoſe of hindering any the confederat princes in that their religious warre, that if the troubles of his owne countrie would haue ſo permitted, he would gladly haue giuen them aid therein. Many there were alſo, that thought, Enuie the auncient enemie of vertue and valour, to haue had a great power in this delay: doubting whether the Spaniards would more reioyce of F the victorie well hoped for, if they ſhould ioine with the Venetians, or grieue if the ſame ſhould by the Venetians be obtained without them. Superantius wearie of diſcourſes and long expectation, and almoſt out of hope of any helpe in time from the Spaniard; how vntowardly ſoeuer things went, thought better yet warily to moderat his griefe, than in ſo dangerous a time to giue any occaſion for the Spaniard to fall quite off. Yet ſpake he not fauningly or flatteringly of the matter, but with a certain modeſt grauitie declared, That he had thought heauen would ſooner G

haue fallen, than that Don Iohn would not at the appointed time haue come to CORCYRA. And withall beſought him, and wiſhed him to beware, that he brought not the common State into ſome great danger: if they had to do with ſuch an enemie as might be delaied with, then he ſaid he could eaſily abide delay; but now for that the warre and the enemie was ſuch, as wherein, or with whom neuer any Generall had dalied without loſſe, to what end did he longer deferre or trifle out the time? or what other fleet did he expect? If they ſhould diuide their forces, then were they all too weake; but vnited togither, ſtrong ynough to defend the common cauſe: The neerer the enemie came, the more haſt were to be made to ioine with the Venetian fleet. And what could be (as he told him) more honourable or glorious, than for him a noble yong gentleman royally deſcended, of whom the world had conceiued a great hope, that he would in mar- H tiall honour exceed the glorie of his moſt famous anceſtors, againe to vanquiſh the proud Turk, the greateſt and moſt mightie monarch of the world; to fight the battel of the higheſt, to aſſure the Chriſtian common-wealth againſt ſo puiſſant an enemie, and to purchaſe vnto himſelfe immortall glorie and renowne. As for the French, there was no ſuch thing to be feared as was pretended, who with ſuch ſlender preparation not worth the name of a fleet, was not ſo vnaduiſed as to ſet vpon a kingdome of ſuch ſtrength and power as SPAINE. Furthermore (he ſaid) that it concerned not the Venetians more than the king himſelfe, to haue the Turks repreſſed: whoſe kingdomes of NAPLES, SICILIA, and SPAINE, were no leſſe than their territory, expoſed to danger by ſea. The good ſucceſſe of their affaires in the Eaſt, would open the way for the conqueſt of AFFRICKE: but if the Turke ſhould preuaile, then were they to deſpaire, not of AF- I FRICKE, but of all ITALIE, SICILIE, yea and of SPAINE it ſelfe. The time (he ſaid) and neceſſitie of the war, with the extremitie of the danger of the whole and common State, required that he ſhould with all his power and ſpeed poſſible, take vpon him the defence of the common cauſe, or to ſay more truely of the Chriſtian common-weale, then ſo dangerouſly impugned. Theſe reaſons drawn from the common good and the truth it ſelfe, much moued the General: but the kings pleaſure was to be preferred before all reaſons or dangers that could be alleaged. But hearing afterward what reſolute command the Venetian Senat had ſent vnto their Admirall, he became exceeding carefull: for he feared leaſt if the Admirall ſhould without his helpe fight the battell and gaine the victorie, he would conuert all the glorie thereof vnto him-ſelfe; but if he ſhould chance to be ouerthrowne, it would turne to his vtter reproach and per- K petuall infamie, that in ſo neceſſarie a time he had withdrawn himſelfe from the common cauſe. Wherefore as a man perplexed, and in doubt what to do, he ſtood for a while as one at his wits end: yet at laſt, he vpon deliberation reſolued to take a middle courſe, and ſo neither without the command of the king (by whoſe preſcript order, all was to be done) to depart with the fleet from MESSANA; neither altogither to fruſtrat the confederats of the expected aid. And to that

Now was Pius Quintus the late Pope dead, and Vgo Boncompanius by the name of Gregorius Decimus Tertius, Pope in his ſtead, who vpon the ſame conditions with his pre-deceſſour, had entred into the league; and liking verie well of Columnius, kept him ſtill for his L Admirall.

Long had Fuſcarinus expected the comming of the confederats, and albeit that the yeare was farre ſpent, Auguſt being then come, and no ſuch aid ſent as he had expected; yet deſiring to do ſomething worth the remembrance and beſeeming their honour, he earneſtly perſuaded Columnius and Lilly to ſet forward with him toward the Eaſt, & with their vnited forces to giue the enemie battell: telling them, That if they were all of like courage, they ſhould go not only to the glory of the preſent battell, but to the great honour and aduancement of the whole Chriſtian common-weale. After that he extenuated the power of the enemie, ſaying, That he could not but maruell, from whence ſuch a number of gallies as was reported, could ſo ſuddenly be M gathered; or wherupon ſo great confidence and boldnes was grown vnto them, ſo lately ouerthrown and put to flight: The enemies fleet (he ſaid) was the yeare before ouercome and diſperſed, the captaines and marriners ſlaine; and that therefore it was not credible, that ſo many gallies could with ſuch celerity be built, and ſuch a number of mariners & maſters as was needfull, in ſo ſhort time prouided: That the prouiſion of the enemy was by flying fame made far

A greater than indeed it was,or possibly could be; for why, they might easily guesse what the enemie was able to doe,by the Christians themselues,who could not without much ado and great labour build their fleets, and traine vp their marriners and masters: and that therefore letting fame flie,which commonly maketh things greater and more dreadfull than they are,he was verily perswaded, that the enemie was glad to vse most vnskilfull and ignorant as well marriners masters as souldiors; who suddenly taken vp in the inland countries, and put into the gallies, knew not so much as the very names of the ropes and tacklings,and other equippage: and then those gallies which they had, were like ynough to be but weake, as of them which were the last yeare rent and brused,and now againe botched vp; or in hast built of greene timber, could not be nimble or greatly seruiceable. Wherefore he exhorted them, as valiant men, to set forward
B against the enemie; and that with the greater courage, for that the last yeares victorie had opened vnto them the way for the gaining of another. Which if it should so fall out, as good hope there was, they should thereby take from the proud enemie both power and hope (but in long time) to be able to recouer his strength at sea: so that they in the meane time without feare might at their pleasure take the rich ilands in the ARCHIPELAGO. Now if the Turks declining battell should retire themselues into the HELLESPONT, then might they with fire and sword spoyle all the frontiers of their dominions on this side the straits, and open a way vnto the Christians to doe great matters.

Hardly were Columnius and Lilly perswaded by the Admirall: neither did they thereunto giue their consent, vntill it was decreed, That they should not in any case ioyne battell with the ene-
C mie,but with their galleons and galeasses first placed in the front of the battaile, in whom consisted the greatest hope of the victorie. So setting forward toward the enemie,and come to COMMENTITIA, letters were brought vnto them from Don Iohn, certifying them, That he was now by letters from the king commaunded to come towards the East, and to ioyne his forces with the confederats; but yet that for certain dayes he could not come, vntil he were better prouided of all things necessarie: and that therefore they should in the meane time carefully looke vnto all things, promising so soone as he possibly could to come vnto them. Vpon these letters Columnius and Lilly began to doubt, Whether to goe on further, or to expect the comming of the Generall: yet for as much as he had not expressely written any thing concerning their staying, and Fuscarinus vrged them forwards, on they went, with their fleet deuided into three battels.
D The whole fleet consisted of an hundred fiftie fiue gallies, six galleasses, and twentie tall ships: in the right wing was Superantius: in the left wing Canalius: and in the middle battell Columnius, Fuscarinus, and Lilly: and in the rereward followed Quirinus. Before each battell went two of the galleasses, still in readinesse for present battaile. In this order they came first to ZACYNTHVS (commonly called ZANTO) and so to CERIGO: the next day after to COLVBRARIA (commonly called DRAGONARIA, oueragainst CERIGO:) Here Angelus Surianus, a valiant gentleman, sent before to discouer the enemie and what strength he was of, returning vnto the fleet, declared vnto the Admirall, That the Turks fleet, consisting of an hundred and threescore gallies, threescore galliots, and foure great ships, lay about MALVASIA, in the entrance of the bay called SINVS ARGOLICVS, vpon the borders of PELOPONESVS, about fiftie miles off from E the Christian fleet. Shortly after the same fleet was againe discouered, making for MALEA: whereupon the Christians before resolued to fight whereseoeuer they should meet the enemie, forthwith put themselues in order of battaile, and so with their galleasses in the front, made with what speed they could toward him. These two fleets were thought for many respects almost equall: the enemie was in number moe, but inferiour in strength. The Christian fleet by reason of the heauinesse of the galleasses, made but small way; and the enemie afraid of the great store of ordinance the galleasses carried, durst not come neere them. The Turks fleet was rather nimble than strong; but ours more firme and forward. Looke wherin each exceeded the other, therwith they endeuored to help themselues and annoy the enemie. The Christians fearing to be circumuented by the multitude of their enemies, opposed their ships and galleasses before them
F as a most sure fortresse: and the Turke, by how much he had had the worse successe the yeare before, was so much the more carefull to beware how he endangered himselfe within the reach of the galleasses. The Christians desired nothing more than to fight, & to come to handy blows: but the Turke, who thought it sufficient for the present not to be ouercome, sometime made away as fast as he could, and by and by stayed againe, if happily he might haue taken the gallies ſeperated from the galeaſſes, neuer ſeeming willing to aduenture further than reaſon and diſcre- G tion were. The enemy ſeeing the Chriſtian fleet comming ſtill on, & ready to giue battel, firſt ſeemed as if he would haue done the like, but afterwards turned his courſe vpon the right hand, and kept alooſe alongſt the coaſt of MALEA: At which time the Chriſtians, although they were very deſirous to haue followed them, yet the Turks with their nimble fleet were quickly too far gone for the Chriſtian fleet to ouertake them, eſpecially with their heauie ſhips. That day almoſt ſpent as it were in the chaſe of the enemy, towards the going down of the Sunne the enemy put into the current of the ſea betwixt CERIGO and the Harts iſland, in breadth about ten miles; and there diuiding their fleet into three parts, lay in good order, as expecting the comming of the Chriſtians, with the prows of their gallies turned, as if vpon the confidence of the place, which they had filled ouerthwart, they had purpoſed nothing more than to fight. Yet H both fleets ſeemed reſolued; the one not to fight without the galleaſſes, & the other not to come neare thoſe hot ſhips, from whom they had but the yeare before receiued ſo great harme. And Vluzales meaning nothing leſſe, yet maketh ſhew of battell. although the enemy, as was afterwards knowne, purpoſed nothing leſſe than to fight, but vpon great aduantage: yet fearing by open flight to diſhonour his lord and maſter, and by granting as it were of victorie, to encreaſe the fame of the Chriſtians, the craftie pyrat made a great ſhew of that he leaſt indeed purpoſed. For pretending a great deſire to fight, he indeed deluded the Chriſtians hope: who although the wind had failed them, yet in hope the enemie would abide them battell, with much labour and rowing came ſo neere him, that the great ſhot began to flie too and fro on both ſides: but when the matter ſhould haue come to haue bin tried by dint of prows of his gallies vpon the Chriſtians, he by little and little ſhrunke backe: and beſide that the ſhadow of the night began then to approch, he cauſed all his great ordinance, charged only with pouder, to be ſhot off, and ſo in the thicke of the ſmoke retired vnſeene; colouring his ſubtill departure alſo by certaine lights left in their cock-boats, making ſhew as if the whole fleet had ſtill there ſtaied. By this means the Turks with great celeritie eſcaped, being alſo holpen in this, that the Chriſtians hindred by the heauines of the galleaſſes, could not but faire and ſoftly purſue them: for theſe galleaſſes, as they are veſſels of great ſeruice, ſo are they alſo heauie & vnweldie, & not fit for chaſe. The departure of the enemie at length known, the Chriſtians alſo vnwilling to fight by night, returned to CERIGO. Two daies after the Turks ſtaied in the bay of TENARVS, now called METAPAN, and the Chriſtians at CERIGO; contented in K

The third day after, the Chriſtians deſirous of nothing more than to ioine in battell with the enemie, in their former order ſet forward from CERIGO, and ſayling all the night, were in the breake of the day deſcried from land by the Turkes: whereupon Vluzales by ſhooting off of certain warning pieces, commanded all his men to go abourd, and to put themſelues in readines for battell. And now the Chriſtians were not far off, when as the Turks (leaſt declining of battell might reprooue them of feare) came out of the hauen, with their fleet diuided into three battels: wherof the left wing was extended a great way into the ſea, the right wing ſtill keeping neere vnto the main, and in the middle battel was Vluzales himſelf: who came all on no faſter than the tide draue them, ſtay- L ing their courſe oft times of purpoſe, to haue drawne the gallies of the Chriſtians from the galleaſſes and ſhips. Vluzales ſeeing his fleet thus in order, and fearing nothing more than the galeaſſes, commanded both the wings of his fleet (hauing in each of them fourſcore gallies) to fetch a great compaſſe about, the one on the right hand, and the other on the left, alooſe off from the galleaſſes, and ſo to aſſaile the wings of the Chriſtians on the ſides or behind: in hope ſo to haue diſordered their battell, and without danger to haue drawn the gallies from the galleaſſes and the other heauy ſhips. Which their intent the Chriſtians perceiuing, in their wings turned about their gallies alſo, in manner of the new Moone, their maine battell ſtill facing the middle battell of the Turks. The wings of the Turks fleet thus far ſeperated from the middle battell, ſeemed to preſent vnto the Chriſtians a great aduantage: which Fuſcarinus (intentiue to all the offers of M good fortune) quickly perceiuing, and calling vnto Columnius and Lilly, and ſhewing them the enemies main battell at hand, and the wings gone a great way off, requeſted and perſuaded them, That not ſtaying for the heauie ſhips and galleaſſes, they would with him vpon the ſoden aſſaile the enemies middle battell, now deſtitute of the wings: not doubting, but ſo to ouerthrow

A the enemies greateſt ſtrength there, before the wings could, now they were ſo far gone, ioyne themſelues to the battell againe. What could as he ſaid haue happened more wiſhedly, than to haue their battell diuided? So that they might at more aduantage fight againſt euery part thereof, now ſeperated, than againſt all three parts at once. If they had thought themſelues not only equall, but too ſtrong for the whole enemies fleet vnited, ſhould they not the better ouercome them apart and diſperſed? The oportunitie he ſaid was but ſhort, and therefore to be forthwith reſolued vpon. If they would take the preſent occaſion of victorie then offered, and as reſolute men charge their enemies, little fearing any ſuch thing, they ſhould by their celeritie and valour teach the Turks, what the Chriſtian diſcipline of war and power was able to do: but if they would therin vſe delay, they ſhould ere long in vain wiſh for the like occaſion they had let ſlip,
B when as their battell was againe ſtrengthned with the wings. This the Admirals ſpeech was of moſt that heard it ioyfully receiued, and his counſell well liked; and that with ſuch a generall cheerfulnes of the ſouldiours, as ſhewed in them no want of courage to haue giuen the enemy preſent battell. But Columnius and Lilly being of the ſame mind they had bin alwaies, ſaid it were daungerous ſo to do, for feare of drawing the whole three battels of the enemy at once vpon them, againſt which they ſhould be too weak, without the helpe of the galleaſſes and heauie ſhips: and therfore ſaid flatly, That without thoſe veſſels, ſo much feared of their enemies, they would not in any caſe hazard the fortune of a battell. But whether Columnius and Lilly were of that opinion, for that they ſo thought, or were ſo charged by Don Iohn (of C whom they altogither depended) not to fight in his abſence, many doubted. The wings of the Chriſtians in turning about to confront the wings of the enemie, were a little diſordered: which the Turks perceiuing, and taking the preſent oportunitie, with fifteen of their gallies were about to haue charged the ſtragling gallies. Which Superantius perceiuing, to ſtay their courſe, went out couragiouſly againſt them with foure gallies, and made with them a great fight: in the heat whereof, Superantius ſeeing fortie mo of the enemies gallies making towards him, and doubting to be incloſed, with all ſpeed ſent for reliefe, which came preſently in, namely, twentie gallies, with two of the galleaſſes: which forthwith ſent their thundering ſhot ſo thicke and furiouſly amongſt their enemies, that in a little time eighteen of their gallies were by them all rent and torne; and the Turks therwith diſmayed, were glad in ſuch haſt to returne, as if they had rather fled than retired. Superantius hauing at that fight but one of his gallies ſhot through, re-D turned againe vnto his place. Of this light fight many deemed what would haue bin the euent of the whole battell, if the opinion of Fuſcarinus had preuailed. Both the fleets falling againe into their order, although the Chriſtians could not ſo faſt follow, as the Turks went before them; yet came they ſo neere them, that oftentimes they changed bullets, as well with their ſmall ſhot as their great. And yet for all that, it was by many ſignes gathered, that neither the Turks would abide preſent battell, neither the Chriſtians longer delay, if by their enemies they ſo might. The Chriſtians had agreed (as is before ſaid) not to ioine in battell without their galleaſſes and tall ſhips: which Vluzales well vnderſtood both by the fugitiues and his owne eſpials, as alſo by their manner of ſayling. And he himſelfe although he had no great deſire to fight: yet to be the E better able to fruſtrate the endeauours of the Chriſtians, who with great labour drew with them the galleaſſes and other heauie ſhips, ſent his chargeable great ſhips to MALVASIA, there to be vnrigged; wherby he diſcharged himſelfe of a great burthen, and made himſelfe able at his own choice and pleaſure to leaue or take, to fight or not: and alſo with ſuch ſouldiors and other neceſſaries as were in the ſame great ſhips, ſupplyed the wants of his whole fleet. By which policie the matter was brought to that paſſe, that if the Chriſtians would needs draw the enemie to battell, they muſt of neceſſitie forſake their galleaſſes, their moſt aſſured ſtrength: or if they would not leaue them, then they could not by any means enforce the readie enemie to fight. The day now declining, the enemie ſuppoſing himſelf to haue done ynough for that time, both for the abating of the heat of the Chriſtians, and incouraging of his own people, in ſeemly or-
F der, as one not afraid, ſayled with his fleet to CORONA. The Chriſtians in like manner retiring themſelues to CERIGO.

The Turks fleet at Corona, and the Chriſtians at Cerigo.

Whileſt things thus went, Don Iohn by a frigot ſent of purpoſe gaue knowledge to the fleet, that he was come to CORCYRA, ſharply blaming the great commaunders for their departure, and that they ſtayed not for his comming: and further commanded them as their Generall, all other things ſet apart, forthwith to meet him at ZACYNTHVS, there to reſolue of all matters.

Don Iohn ſendeth word to the fleet to meet him at Zacinthus.

Columnius wholly deuouted to the Spaniards,and preferring the fauour of Don Iohn before the G reſt,hearing his meſſage, was in ſuch haſt to haue returned, that he would haue perſuaded Fuſcarinus to haue left the heauie veſſels and other weake gallies at CERIGO, and with an hundred of the beſt gallies with all ſpeed to haue returned to the Generall. Of which opinion was alſo Lilly.But Fuſcarinus more carefull than the reſt,as he whom the danger more concerned,would not yeeld to that perſuaſion: for that in ſo doing they ſhould (as he ſaid)leaue the ſhips & galleaſſes,the chiefe part of their ſtrength, in danger to be ſpoyled by the enemy; whom they now kept at a bay,without the help of the Generall; and ſhould, as he well hoped, by often prouoking of him, at one time or other draw him to battell, and haue ouer him a notable victorie. And therefore requeſted them for the loue of God, and the zeale they bare vnto the common good of all Chriſtendome,not to depart farther off,nor to ſuffer the enemie to eſcape out of their H hands, neither by their departure to leaue the iſlands of the Venetians ſubiect to the fury of the enemy: wheras the Generall might at his pleaſure and without danger come vnto them, they lying betwixt the enemy and him.But Columnius and Lilly reſolutely ſet downe, hap what hap ſhould,to do what Don Iohn had commanded, would not liſten vnto the reaſonable perſuaſions of the Venetian Admirall,but told him flatly, That if he would not in that they had ſaid yeeld vnto them,they would forthwith leaue him vnto himſelfe,and with their gallies preſently return to ZACYNTHVS, as the Generall had commaunded. Whileſt they were yet thus diſcourſing newes was brought, That the enemy was come with his fleet into the fret of CERIGO: which cauſed thē all with one conſent to reſolue in ſuch order to paſſe by the enemy,as if they ſhould haue giuen him preſent battell: wheras before,they were determined by the perſuaſion of Fuſ- I carinus, to haue gone to CRETE,and their leauing the ſhips and galleaſſes in ſafetie, to haue afterwards returned to the Generall. In ſuch order the Chriſtians paſſed by the enemies fleet, which lay ſtill in the fret of the ſea without mouing, ſtanding as it were rather vpon the guard of themſelues,than reſolued for battell.In three daies ſayling they came to ZACYNTHVS,where they found not Don Iohn,but two of his gallies,and commandment,that they ſhould there leaue their heauie ſhips, and with their gallies come to CEPHALENIA, where they ſhould not faile to meet him.Hereupon the Venetians were exceedingly grieued,and muttered through the whole fleet,That the Spaniards bearing themſelues vpon their wealth, were too proud,and in compariſon of themſelues regarded neither the conditions of the league,neither any other mans credit, K but trode all men vnderfoot; and would now vſe the Venetians not as their friends and confederats,but as their ſlaues & vaſſals,feeding them in the mean time but with vaine hope. Yet for as much as the time & neceſſitie ſo required, they were content to be ouerruled: and ſo leauing their ſhips and galleaſſes at ZACYNTHVS,went with the reſt of the fleet to CEPHALENIA: whither Don Iohn was not yet come, but had ſent word thither, That if they had any deſire to ioyne their forces with his,they ſhould yet come further backe vnto him in CORCYRA.This meſſage,which they had rather feared than expected,much troubled the Venetians:who readier to ſuſpect euery miſchiefe, than to hope for any good,began to fret and complaine, That the Spaniards could very well tell the Venetians what they had to doe, and forget in the mean time what was on their own part to be performed.A hard thing it was to ſay(and yet to be ſaid)that now they had more to do with thoſe their dallying friends and confederats,than with their ene- L mies: for with their enemies they were to fight but in time of battell,but with them they were to wreſtle and ſtriue at all times and in all places.They were by them(as they ſaid)drawn from the ſight of their enemies,when as they might haue been ouerthrowne: not to the intent that with their vnited forces they might more ſafely fight againſt them,or vnder the conduct of Don Iohn gaine the victorie; but rather leaſt any thing ſhould haue bin done, which might be to the honour or profit of the Venetians: and that time which was to haue bin beſtowed in the managing of the war, ſpent in lingering and delaying,and vain going forward and backward to no purpoſe.One only way there was (as they ſaid) to haue diſpatched with the Turke, which was, by ouercomming him in annother notable battell,and ſo to haue vtterly broken his ſtrength at M ſea: which courſe the confederats made no leſſe difficult by their ofwardnes and delaies, than the enemy by declining of battell: That they had long ago by many ſecret ſignes probably coniectured,that the Spaniards had more care to hinder & croſſe other mens doings,than to do any thing of themſelues: That their indeauors were, to fruſtrat thoſe great hopes which promiſed vnto the Chriſtian common-weale the greateſt felicitie and happineſſe, togither with immortall

A mortall glory: and, That the Turks, of late diſcouraged with the fortunate proceedings of the Chriſtians, might againe reioyce at their miſhaps.

The Venetians, notwithſtanding all theſe their murmuring ſpeeches, loath to fall off from the Spaniard, kept ſtill on with the reſt vntill they came to Don Iohn at CORCYRA, who then lay with three and fiftie gallies, and eighteene ſhips at SPILCA, in the vttermoſt end of the iſland. At their firſt meeting, Don Iohn ſhewed himſelfe not a little offended, that they had not with more dutie before attended his comming: and they againe not a little complained of his long ſtay, with many other their grieuances, which were tedious here to rehearſe. The fleet now all with much adoe at length met together, which conſiſted of two hundred gallies, nine galleaſſes, and thirtie ſix tall ſhips: it was by generall conſent agreed, that they ſhould againe ſet forward
B toward the enemie. They were not yet vnder ſaile, when two of their eſpials brought them newes, that the enemies fleet (weakly furniſhed both of marriners and ſouldiors) was come to NAVARINVM: which filled them all with good hope, that the Turks fleet ſo euill prouided, might in that place vpon the ſudden be eaſily oppreſſed; and the rather, if they came vpon them vnexpected. Wherefore, becauſe they would not be deſcried, they kept not their courſe on right forth, but ſailing by night, kept aloofe vpon the right hand: and hauing paſſed ZACYNTHVS, came with great ſilence vnto the STROPHADES, where they lay at anchor all that day. In the euening they looſed thence, ſo caſting their courſe, that the more to terrifie the enemie, they might before day fall vpon him; and be ſeene in the mouth of the hauen where he lay, before there could bee
C any report made of their comming thither. But this courſe ſo well ſet, the time was ſo euill caſt, that it was faire day long before they could come to the appoynted place; when the Turks out of their watch-towers diſcouering a farre off the comming of the Chriſtian fleet, gaue warning thereof vnto their fellowes: whereupon an alarum was preſently raiſed in the towne, and all men in armes ran headlong to the wals and to the hauen. But the Turkes out of hope with their euill rigged fleet to be able to withſtand the Chriſtians, and not daring to truſt to that weak harbour, and all now in a great hurly burly, ran confuſedly hand ouer head, ſouldiors and marriners aboord: and whileſt they had yet time, got them in haſt out of that harbour, and as men chaſed by their enemies, got them into ſafe harbour at MODON, a ſtrong towne of PELOPONESVS about ſixe miles off. Columnius was ſent before the reſt of the fleet to haue purſued them: but they were got ſo farre before him, that they had recouered the harbour before hee could ouer-
D take any of them. The Chriſtian fleet comming before the harbour, and leauing a ſpace as it were of purpoſe for the enemy to come out into, there lay in the face of the towne, daring the Turks battell. But when they had ſo lien almoſt all that day, and no man durſt come out; and now towards the euening certaine ſignes of tempeſt appeared, the Chriſtians fearing to bee by force of weather driuen on ground, put farther off againe to ſea. Then at length Vluzales ſent out certaine light gallies to follow in the taile of the fleet, when the confederates ſuddenly ſtaying their courſe, and turning their prowes vpon them, draue them headlong againe into the harbour: and afterwards retired themſelues with the whole fleet into the iſlands OENVSÆ, now called SAPIENTIA, right oppoſite againſt MODON. The next day wanting freſh water, they remooued vnto the bay of MESSANA, there to water in the mouth of the riuer Pamiſus, which there falleth
E into the ſea: where in paſſing by CORONE, they were oftentimes ſhot at out of the towne; and landing their men to water, were encountred by certaine troups of horſemen, ſent for that purpoſe by Vluzales. There was water dearely bought with the liues of many there ſlaine on both ſides: in the end, the Chriſtians preuailing, watered, and ſo againe returned vnto the OENVSÆ from whence they came.

METHONE or MODON (for it is by both names knowne) ſtandeth almoſt in an Iſland ſtretching farre into the ſea, where toward the Weſt runneth out a long point of the land a great way into the ſea; in the vttermoſt part whereof, ſtandeth a great round tower. The towne it ſelfe is on the one ſide encloſed with the ſea, and toward the land ſo ſtrongly fortified, as that it ſeemeth
F almoſt impregnable. Towards the South commeth in a faire bay about three miles wide, ſafe from all winds except the Northerly wind only: and ſhut vp by a litle iſland in the mouth of the bay, maketh a ſafe and quiet harbour, with two entrances thereinto on either ſide of the iſland. Within this bay lay the Turkes fleet, with the ſternes of their gallies toward the land, and their prows towards the ſea. wherewith to keepe the Christians from entring that way. So had they also vpon that point of G the maine, which (as we said) runneth out from the towne, and vpon S. Bernards rocke, planted other great pieces of ordinance to defend that passage also. The Christians comming vnto the mouth of the bay, there lay with their fleet diuided into foure parts, but yet doubtfull what to doe: for beside that the entrances of the bay were but narrow, they were also farre more dangerous to be entred, by reason of the great ordinance planted vpon them. Neuertheless, the Venetian Admirall in hope of good successe, and loth to let the fearfull enemie so to escape out of their hands, would faine haue perswaded the Generall with his whole fleet to haue entred the bay, and there in the harbour to haue oppressed the enemy: which hee shewed to be no matter to doe, for that the enemie was too weake in strength, and could not be from land relieued. In which doing, they should indeed ouerthrow but one fleet; but in the ouerthrowing of that one, H cut in sunder all the sinewes of the Turkish empire by sea: and raising a tumult in the bay, and filling all with a generall feare, should vndoubtedly at the first onset put the enemie to flight:
Which done, what should let, but that carrying about with them the terrour of the victorie, they should with their victorious fleet, take from the Turk all the islands of the ÆGEVM? That truly and wisely it was said of Themistocles, That whosoeuer had the command of the sea, must needs also preuaile in the rest, and at length carrie away the victorie by land also. It was (as he said) the part of good chieftains, not to be wanting vnto themselues when occasion was offered:
besides that, they were the same Turks, whom they had but the yeare before vanquished; and what had that one yeare either taken from them, or giuen vnto the Turks? or what should they feare six pieces of ordinance mounted vpon a hill, who if they should vndertake the battel, were I not to feare the great store of ordinance in two hundred & threescore of the enemies gallies and galliots? I my selfe (said he) will be the guide and leader, in whatsoeuer shall seeme most difficult and dangerous: and will in person my selfe be the first that shall enter the harbour, and aduenture the first danger. Great victories (he said) were not to be gained but with great aduentures; and that therefore the matter were to be hasted, before more aid should be sent vnto the Turkes. Wherefore they should as resolute men attempt that, the Turkes thought the Christians durst not to haue attempted; and with the same courage breake into the bay, wherwith they had but the yere before broken the strength of the same enemy; and by the power of God, carry away another notable triumph of the vanquished Turkes: who ouercome in a second battel at Don Iohn refu-seth to follow the counsell of the Admirall. sea, must needs depart with all their maritime territories. With euill liking of the Spaniards was K the Venetian Admiral heard. And Don Iohn the General, deeming both the time and place vnfit for the attempting of so great an exploit, rehearsed on the one side, the strength of the enemy, the disaduantage of the place, the difficultie of the battel, with the manifold and great calamities receiued by the ouerhasty and rash attempts of their enemies: That the enemies strength was not to be so much deemed by the eye, or by report, as by reason; and that many in seeking to increase their former glory, had in so doing ouerthrown the same: That the Christians in entring and aduenturing the harbour, should on the one side be beaten with the artillerie from the hill; and on the other with the artillerie out of the castle of MODON: And that it was not like, that Vluzales should if need were, lacke aid from land, who but the other day had sent great troups of horsemen to haue kept the Christians from watering: That a matter of so great importance, L was (by Fuscarinus his leaue) not rashly to be taken in hand, vpon an heat and hautinesse of stomacke, but vpon graue and mature deliberation: for if they should in a place of so great disad-uantage, hazard the fortune of a generall battell, it should seeme that either he knew not that kind of fight, and force of the enemy, or else would make the bay of MODON more famous by the ouerthrow of the Christians, than was the CVRZVLARI by the slaughter of the Turks.
Then what a shame would it be, if they which were about to oppresse the enemies fleet, should themselues be ouerthrown, and that in their owne deuice. He had rather (as he said) preserue his owne fleet, than to take six hundred of the enemies gallies; and to account the same for a greater honour. Which he determined not, for that he would not haue any thing done, but that vnripe occasions should not be too much hastned, and as it were thrust headlong forward: wheras time M would giue opportunitie for the ouerthrow of the Turks fleet, so that they ran not blindly on headlong: and that in future time, the Venetians would reioice that they had so moderated their desires. The Christians (he said) had sufficiently preuailed, if those things should fall out well, which were warily and aduisedly considered and resolued vpon.

The

A The matter thus on both ſides debated, and nothing done, they returned with the fleet into the port of NAVARINVM. This proceeding, as it diuerſly mooued the Spaniards and the Venetians, ſo brought it foorth diuers ſpeaches, euery man ſpeaking in fauour of his owne nation. The Spaniard openly vaunted, That he had moſt prouidently reſolued; for that how deere the counſell of the Venetian Admirall would haue coſt if it had beene followed, the thing it ſelfe (as he ſaid) ſhewed, by the extreame danger thereof preſented, not in the doubtfull opinion of men, but laied open before their eyes. The Venetians on the other ſide more deſirous of battell, the neerer they had ſeene the opportunity to haue preuailed vpon the enemy, the more impatiently they endured ſo aſſured a victory to haue bene let ſlip out of their hands: and therof ſpake accordingly.

B The Chriſtians lying at NAVARINVM, conſulted of many things what they were beſt to take in hand: and reſoluing at laſt by ſea and land to beſiege the caſtle of MODON, which kept the paſſage into the bay, and defended the Turkiſh fleet; they returned again thither, and landed ſeauen thouſand of their beſt ſouldiours, to beſiege the caſtle. And at the ſame time, appointed the galeaſſes with certaine gallies to batter it alſo from ſea: which the more commodiouſly to doe, they ioyned two of their greateſt gallies together ſide to ſide, which they made faſt with maſts and ſtrong ropes, and ſo bourded them cleane ouer, whereon as on a platforme, they placed gabions all afront, filled with earth, and great ordinance betwixt to haue battered the caſtle. But when this engine (in maner of a floating fort) ſhould haue performed the ſeruice for which it was deuiſed, it prooued vnſeruiceable, after it had with much adoe been brought thither, being
C readie to ſinke with the weight of the great ordinance and other things wherewith it was ouercharged. For which cauſe, and for that they vnderſtood a great number of horſmen to be come into the towne, they gaue ouer the ſiege vainly begun, and put againe with their fleet to ſea. It fortuned at the ſame time, that a tall ſhip of VENICE departing from ZACYNTHVS, and comming alongſt the coaſt of PELOPONESVS with prouiſion for the fleet, was deſcried by the enemy; who thinking to doe the Chriſtians a great diſhonour, if they could almoſt in the ſight of their fleet ſurpriſe her, they ſent out certaine light gallies to haue taken her; Vluzales in the mean time with the reſt of his fleet, lying in the very mouth of the bay, ready to come out if the Chriſtian fleet ſhould once ſtirre to relieue her. Which the Chriſtians perceiuing, and well hoping that ſo the enemy would be drawne to battel, ſent out Columnius with his gallies to reſcue the ſhip; and D others alſo which lying aloofe, might get in betwixt the Turks gallies and the bay: Don Iohn and the Venetian Admiral, lying ready to haue giuen battel, if Vluzales ſhould haue come forth. But the Chriſtians comming on with a ſmall gale, the enemy being afraid, by ſhooting off of certain warning pieces within the bay, in time called backe the gallies that were already gone out of the bay: who all forthwith came in, excepting Mahomet the nephew of Barbaruſſa, a moſt famous captaine amongſt the Turks, who as one of great courage, and deſirous of honor, ſtaied a little without the bay, with greater courage than diſcretion, expecting who ſhould aſſaile him. Him the Marques S. Crucis ſet vpon, and had with him a great and terrible fight: but in the end the Marques preuailing, ſlew Mahomet with all his Turks, and with honour caried away the gally. So the diſhonour which Vluzales would haue done the Chriſtians, fell vpon himſelfe, hauing in his own

Mahomet ſlaine

The next day, becauſe the yere ſhould not paſſe without ſomething done, nor the hope of ſo great a preparation come to nothing, the Chriſtians determined to beſiege the caſtle of NAVARINVM (which was in ancient time called PYLVS) more famous for nothing, than for that it was the natiue place of old Neſtor. The citie of NAVIRINVM ſtandeth vpon a riſing ground, ſtretching ſomewhat into the ſea; whereinto it hath a large proſpect, and a faire large hauen, but ſubiect to the Northwind. It is defended with a point of the maine, running compaſſe into the ſea, whereon ſtandeth an old caſtle. Some ſent before to view the ſituation of the place, brought word backe, that the caſtle might in three daies be woon. The performance of which exploit, was committed to Alexander Farneſius prince of PARMA, whom the Venetians furniſhed with F munition and victuall. He landing with two thouſand Italians, a thouſand Spaniards, and fiue hundred Germans, began with twelue great pieces to batter the caſtle. And albeit that the batterie was planted ſo farre off, as that it did the enemie no great harme; yet happily the enterpriſe had taken effect, if by taking the ſtraight and troubleſome paſſages through a rough and thicke forreſt, the citie had been kept from reliefe: but for as much as thoſe paſſages were left free, the enemie enemy cunningly opposed policy against force, for sallying out of the citie, they gaue the Chri- G stians an hot skirmish: and in the meane time whilest the Christians were so busied, by a port toward the forrest on the other side of the citie, receiued in great number both of horse and foot. The report of this new come aid caused the prince to raise his siege, and to goe againe a-boord. And now rested all the hope of the gaining of the towne in the strength of the fleet: and that not small, for that the Turks not relieued with victuals by land, were by the confederates kept from them also by sea: for at that time the Turks were troubled with two great mischiefes, the plague, and famine. For no prouision had there bin made, as in a thing not feared; and that little being spent that was in the towne, they were enforced to seeke for victuals further off:

which comming but sparingly, as in time of dearth, was oftentimes by the way intercepted by the souldiours that lay about in the countrey villages, wanting victuals no lesse than they in the H citie. And the moe men the Beglerbeg of GREECE brought down for defence of the sea townes, so much the more the wants of all things daily encreased. So that no man doubted, but that in short time all would be brought to extreame penurie. What a death the mortalitie had made, the want of men in the gallies well declared: for many of the gallies for lacke of marriners and
The weakenesse of the Turkes fleet. souldiors were sent away into EVBŒA, or left at MALVASIA, or carried away to CONSTAN-TINOPLE. Those which staied in the bay of MODON, were scarce an hundred gallies, and fortie galliots: and they so slenderly manned, that the greatest gallies had scarcely an hundred and twentie men left in them, and they so meagre and faint, as that they could scarcely hold vp their weapons. The Christians vnderstanding of these things, were in good hope, that by continuing the siege, they should without daunger gaine a notable victorie: For which cause Fuscarinus I perswaded the Spaniards, of whose constancie he doubted, to hold it out, as men of resolution;
shewing them, that in the euent of this action rested for them for euer to be feared or contemned of the Turks: who except they should be changed into fishes or into birds, could not (as he said) without a notable ouerthrow escape their hands out of the Bay. But vnto this his hope and counsell the euent was not correspondent: For the Spaniards, whether it were for the tedious-nesse of the siege, or for want of victuals, or for the approch of winter, or else moued with some other reasons, began to thinke of the matter diuersly: and at the first a report was raised, That the Christians giuing ouer the siege, would shortly returne home: and the reason was, for that they wanted bisket, and had scarcely victuals left for fifteene dayes, which was to be reserued for their long iourney home: Besides that, the approch of Winter did call them from the action: K and that hauing done what they might, they could neuer draw the enemie forth to battell; and that therefore hauing sufficiently and as farre as was possible alreadie discharged their duties, they were now also to regard their safetie, and to foresee that their fleet, wherein the welfare of them all was reposed, were not too farre endangered. At the first these speeches were divulged by the common souldiours and marriners of small credit or reputation, but afterwards by moe, and they also men of better place and sort: Yea Don Iohn himselfe, whether it were to some other purpose, or that he so spake in good earnest, began to lay the fault vpon others, why that he, so lately come from MESSANA, should in so short time want victuals and all things els necessarie.

The Venetians murmure against the Spaniards. With these vnexpected reports, and so farre different from the confederation, the Venetian L
Admirall with the rest of the Venetian commaunders were exceedingly troubled and grieued aboue measure: for it seemed not credible, that they which but a little before were come from the most fertile and plentifull countrey of SICILIA, in all ages the most faithfull and abundant granarie and storehouse of ITALIE, both in peace and warre, could so soone want victuals.
Could eighteene tall ships (which ought by the capitulations of the league to haue come loaded with bisket, victuals, and other warlike and necessary prouision) become emptie? or but to haue brought so much as might but suffice for a moneth onely? If this were done without the knowledge of Don Iohn, where was then the care of a Generall? If he winking thereat, where was his zeale to the confederation? or to what purpose came he to CORSYRA? was it to auert the Christian fleet (hauing once or twice met with the enemy) from doing any good vpon him? Could it M come into any mans head (besides that in so doing he was therein to extinguish the glorie of a most certaine victory, like to worke the Turks confusion) by the infamy of a voluntary returne to encrease the glory and renowne of his enemy, and bring a perpetuall ignominy and disgrace vnto the honour of the Christians? verely the Spaniards, therein to shew themselues not so willing

A willing to haue the power of the Turks abated, as the ſtrength of the Venetians not encreaſed.

These things Fuſcarinus and the Venetians ſometimes fretted at amongſt themſelues; and otherwhiles the Admirall himſelfe expoſtulated the ſame with Don Iohn and Columnius: and in the preſence of the greateſt counſellors ſhewed, not onely how profitable but alſo how neceſſarie perſeuerance was in all martiall affaires: That it was an old and vſuall matter for men in beſieging of their enemies to ſuffer many difficulties: if they ſhould, hauing performed nothing, returne with the fleet, who would doubt but that both their labor and charge was againe the next yeare to be renewed? And what could this delay be elſe, but a propagation of their further calamities? That therefore it much concerned the Chriſtian commonweale, although they had not all things in abundance, yet reſolutely and with patience to endure the ſcarcitie of victuals. If
B want of bisket were feared, the Generall might eaſily remedie that matter, by ſpeedily ſending for thoſe ſhips which lay laded with victuals good ſtore at TARENTVM; which thing might in ſhort time bee performed. In the meane time he promiſed to ſupply the Spaniards wants with part of his owne ſtore: and that he had rather his men ſhould liue with roots, than to let the enemies fleet coupt vp, ſo to eſcape his hands: That the deſire to protect the honour of the Chriſtians, would ouercome all difficulties. Beſides that, the matter would be but ſhort, if it were done at once, in one continued courſe; and would vndoubtedly be by them performed, if they gaue not ouer the thing they had ſo well begun, vntill they had accompliſhed it. They (as hee ſaid)
C might in good ſafetie lie with their fleet in the ports of NAVARINVM, SAPIENTIA, and CAPRARIA: wheras the enemie, lying ſhut vp in the bay of MODON, ſhould haue but a bad and dangerous Winter harbour; and October being now begun, ſhould in ſhort time be in danger to periſh with bluſtering ſtormes and rage of the ſea, familiar vnto that time of the yeare; or els enforced with the extremitie of the weather, and with want, to aduenture into the open ſea, and with their weake forces to ioyne battell. What ſhould therfore let, why they ſhould not for ten or for fifteene dayes continue the ſiege, as beſt beſeemed the honor of themſelues, the valour of their ſouldiors, and worthineſſe of the Chriſtian name? What a terrour it would bee vnto the enemy, to ſee the Chriſtians ready to endure all extremities and wants to gaine the victory ouer the Turks? Againe, what diſhonor and diſcredit would it be vnto themſelues, if they ſhould ſuffer the enemy (ſhut vp and not daring to fight) to eſcape: eſpecially, when as they might ſitting
D ſtill, end the warre? The Senat of VENICE, he ſaid, moſt reſted vpon the valour and courage of Don Iohn, and therefore hee requeſted him not to deceiue the great hope they had of him conceiued: For how much ſhould he himſelfe blemiſh his owne honour, if when he had before relieued the afflicted ſtate of the commonweale, he ſhould now, when it was moſt of all to be holpen, forſake the ſame? Which ſhould not be much vnlike, as if a man ſhould with great labour purchaſe great ſtore of precious pearles, and vpon an humourous paſſion caſt them all into the ſea: That men generally held a great opinion of him the Generall, an honourable remembrance of his victorie, and regard of his valour; all which, how much the more pregnant and honourable ſhould they be, by the ſecond vanquiſhing and ſubduing the moſt mighty monarch of the world: And that if the action well begun ſhould be effectually proſecuted by the goodneſſe of E God, the direction of the commanders, and the reſolution of the ſouldiors, in ſhort time the Chriſtians ſhould carrie the victorie from the Turkes, and make him their Generall equall not onely with the great chiefetaines of the preſent time, but euen with the moſt famous commaunders of all former ages. Whereunto Don Iohn replied, That the action then in hand no leſſe concerned the Spaniards than the Venetians: and that he had in his life deſired nothing more, than to ſtand the Chriſtian commonweale in ſtead: That he pointed at the ſame marke with Fuſcarinus, and in zeale to doe good vnto the Chriſtian commonweale, gaue place to no man; but indeed to performe it, was a thing much more difficult than to ſay it: Leſſer things he ſaid were to be ouerpaſſed, to reſerue themſelues for the performance of greater: and therfore marueiled that Fuſcarinus alone could not ſee things moſt manifeſt before his eyes, who otherwiſe could with F his piercing wit ſee through the deepeſt matters: Could he thinke by any other meanes to abate the power of the Turke, than if they kept their fleet whole? That it was euer the manner of the greateſt and moſt worthie commaunders, rather to ſhun the preſent daungers, to to encreaſe their territories: That nothing was ſo well purpoſed, which might not be of ſome wrongfully ſuſpected: but his faithfull meaning to be pure and without ſpot; and albeit that the oportunity ſerued not for him to ſhew it, yet was his deſire and endeuour nothing leſſe: And that Fuſcarinus

rinus ſhould doe well more intentiuely to conſider, what the cauſe, the matter, and the time re- G quired: That the manner of warre at land and at ſea, were much different: And that although warres of both ſorts were to giue place vnto the moſt vnſeaſonable time of the yeare, vnfit for any kind of warr; yet might men at land, better endure the Winter ſtormes in their tents and cabins, than at ſea in their gallies, where oftentimes, will, skill, wiſdome, nor valour helpe not: but that (except it be ſo prouided and foreſeene, that the ſeaſonable time of the yeare, and commodious for ſayling may be taken) all muſt together periſh by ſhipwracke. What, would hee haue them to ſtriue aboue their power with the winter ſtormes, and famine, the greateſt extremities of nature? Beſides that, he was verily perſwaded, that the Turks enioying the commodities of a good harbour, and of a rich citie, would there in ſafetie winter; the countrey of PELOPONESVS relieuing them with all neceſſaries: When as the Chriſtians in the meane time, except H they in time returned home, ſhould lie expoſed to the rage of the ſea, ſtanding as it were in a continual watch, not laying away their weapons in the depth of winter and dead time of the yeare, which in reaſon ought to giue reſt to all men. And that therefore euerie man ought for the preſent to beare his owne grieuances, and not by the harmes of his friends and confederats, to ſeek his owne auaile. And that hee, bearing himſelfe vpon the inward integritie of his good will toward the Venetians, would this ſay, howſoeuer Fuſcarinus ſhould vnderſtand it, that if the kings fleet ſhould by long ſtaying there periſh, it would no leſſe concern the Venetians, than the king himſelfe: and taking God to witneſſe, would ſolemnely promiſe, Nothing to be vnto him more leiſer or religious, than to be preſt ſo ſoone as the time of the yeare would giue leaue, and by his endeuour to make all men to know, that hee had no leſſe care of the Venetian State, than of the I kings affaires; neither deſired any thing more, than to be accounted, & indeed to be, a moſt conſtant vpholder of that moſt Chriſtian league; and that beyond all expectation, euen in the iudgment of the Venetians themſelues: but for the preſent they muſt pardon him, if he gaue place vnto the neceſſity of the time. As for the offer of the communicating of their victuals, that would not be any helpe, but the deſtruction of both the fleets; for ſo they ſhould both ſooner feele the want: wherfore it were much better to preſerue the fleet which they might vſe in the next yeares warres, than wilfully to caſt away the ſame by famine, and the rage of the ſea. In briefe, what an indignitie ſhould the Chriſtians ſuſtaine, if they themſelues ſhould by the ſame meanes be ouerthrowne, whereby they had thought to haue ouerthrowne others.

The Spaniards about to return without the knowledge of the Venetians.

Now the Spaniards were ſo reſolutely ſet downe for their departure, that not only without K the conſent of the Venetians, but euen without their priuitie, their departing was reſolued vpon, and ſecret commandement giuen vnto the maſters of the gallies, with all the haſt that might be, to depart thence to MESSANA. Which the Venetian Admirall vnderſtanding, and therewith troubled as with an vnexpected matter, came aboord the Generall, and greatly complained of his purpoſe for ſo ſudden a departure: requeſting him a while to ſtay, vntil the two gallies made faſt together in the harbour of NAVARINVM (as is before ſaid) with the ordinance vpon them, might be put in good ſafetie; and neither they, or any thing elſe left for a prey vnto the enemie. With much adoe, Fuſcarinus perſwaded him to ſtay that night, that thoſe gallies might bee brought out of the harbour, and all things put in order for their departure. The reſt of the night L was ſpent in debating of the matter too and fro: where Don Iohn would needs haue it conceiued into a publike inſtrument in writing, That the fleet by the general conſent of the three Admirals returned for lacke of victuals: whereunto the Venetian Admirall hardly conſented. But when the inſtrument ſhould haue been made and confirmed, Don Iohn better aduiſed by one of his ſecretaries, That the ſame would redound vnto the great diſhonor both of the king and himſelfe, that the fleet comming out of the fruitfull countrey of SICILIA, ſhould in a moneths ſpace want victuals; changed his mind for the writing, and onely requeſted the Venetian Admirall to credit him and Columnius, in that they had ſaid concerning the want of victuals: promiſing him, that if vpon the way he ſhould meet with the victuals that were ſent for, he would forthwith returne and giue him aid, as the time and occurrents ſhould require: but in the meane time to proceed by common conſent, to doe that which was moſt needfull. Hereupon they returned: and M comming to CORSYRA, they met the expected ſhip laded with victuals. Now is not Fuſcarinus vnmindfull of his dutie, but comming to Don Iohn, put him in remembrance of his promiſe, telling him, That it was not vnlike, but that the enemy ſo ſoone as he vnderſtood of their departure, would come out of the bay, and returne with his fleet towards CONSTANTINOPLE; and being

A being but weake manned, and worse furnished of mariners, might easily be ouertaken vpon the way, and ouerthrown. But Don Iohn was not by any meanes to be therunto persuaded, pretending that he was by the king commanded forthwith to return. So the expectation of great matters to haue bin this yeare done, came to nought but vanished into smoake: and nothing performed worth so long a discourse, more than to see with what difficultie great actions are managed, wherin the hands of many great ones are required; who ielous of their own honour, or enuying at others, corrupt with delaies the faireſt opportunities, and by their crosse dealing, no lesse than the enemie hinder the common good whereas they would all faineſt seeme to aime. From CORCYRA Don Iohn departed to MESSANA, and Columnius vnto ROME. Fuscarinus with greater honour than ſucceſſe, returned to VENICE; where he was with great ioy receiued, both of the B Senat and the citizens in generall: and ſo (no leſſe famous for his patience and moderation towards the other confederats, than for his policie and valour) with the good liking of all men gaue vp his charg, in few yeres after to receiue a greater.

About this time, Amida king of TVNES (of whom much is before ſpoken in the life of Solyman) being but a little before driuen out of his kingdome by the Turks (who had of long by little and litle encroched vpon him) and as a priuat man liued in exile with his two ſonnes at GVLETTA vth Franciſcus Touares Gouernour thereof: hearing of the great ouerthrow of the Turks at LEPANTO, and of the good ſucceſſe of the Christians, ſent embaſſadors to Don Iohn Generall of the confederat princes then lying in SICILIA, humbly requeſting his aid for the recouerie of his kingdome, promiſing to defray the whole charges of the warre, and for euer to C hold his kingdome of the king of SPAINE, as his vaſſaile and tributarie. Which his requeſt well conſidered of, and the matter thought of no ſmall conſequence, for the ſafetie of the Christian countrie lying ouer against that part of AFFRICKE, to haue ſo dangerous an enemie remoued: Don the yeare following (in the beginning of October) by the commaundment of 1573 the king of SPAINE his brother, departing from DREPANVM in SICILIA with an hundred and fiue gallies and forty ſhips, arriued the next day about noone at GVLETTA, where the gallies of MALTA came vnto him; and ſhortly after, Io. Andreas Auria the Admirall with nineteene mo; Columnius the Popes Admirall with foureteene mo, all well appointed. At his arriuall at GVLETTA, he vnderſtood by Amida and the Gouernour, the whole eſtate both of the citie, and of kingdome of TVNES: and that the Turks and Moores, terrified with ſo great a D fleet, were also forſake the citie. Wherefore hauing well viewed the place, he the next day after landed forces about foure miles from the citie, and ſent 2500 footmen before the reſt of the armie to citie; who found it all deſolat, the Turks and Moors being before for feare fled, ſome to CAPHANA, ſome to BISERTA: who entring without reſiſtance, came to the caſtle, wherein they found two hundred Moores, who ſaid, the kept it for Amida their king; but yet would by no meanes ſuffer the Christians to enter. All which was forthwith made knowne to Don Iohn, when because it was almoſt night would not moue, but early the next morning ſet forwith his whole armie: and entring the citie before abandoned by the inhabitants, and ſo ning to the caſtle, found nothing therein, but great ſtore of oyle, butter, and wooll.

E Amida the king, by the commandment of Don Iohn, all this while ſtaied at GVLETTA. But whileſt Don Io yet at TVNES, newes was brought vnto him the thirteenth of October, That the Turks gar before fled out of TVNES, with diuers Moores, comming to BISERTA, were there kept out citizens and not ſuffred to enter: For which cauſe they began to burn and ſpoile the coutrie about. Wherupon the General ſent Touares the captain of GVLETTA thither with part armie, who encountring with thoſe Turks, ouerthrew them, and had the citie by the citizens quietly deliuered vnto him.

The kingdom of TVNES thus eaſily once againe recouered from the Turkes, Don Iohn throughly enformed of the faithles and cruel dealing of Amida the late king, and that in deteſtation of the Christians and their religion, he had alreadie had intelligence with the Turkes, and F procured the deſtruction of ſome of the Christians: gaue this definitiue ſentence vpon him, being yet in the caſtle of TVNES: That for as much as he had of long time bin the authour of great diſcord, and troubles in that kingdome, and had moſt vnnaturally deprined Muleaſſes his father, firſt of kingdome, and afterward of his ſight; and in like maner tyrannized ouer his natural children the rightfull heires of that kingdome, whereby the Turks had taken occaſion ſion both to inuade and poſſeſſe the ſame: he ſhould therefore by the commaundement of the king of SPAINE, be carryed priſoner with his two ſonnes into SICILIA, there to remaine for euer. Which heauie doome hee taking moſt grieuouſly, and yet crying out for mercie, was forthwith thruſt into a gallie, and with his wife and children tranſported into SICILIA, there to liue in perpetuall exile: the iuſt reward of his mercileſſe and vnnaturall dealing with his father and brethren, God no doubt requiting him with the like meaſure he had before meaſured vnto them. G

Mahomet, Amydaha brother, made king of Tunes, and vaſſaile to the king of Spaine.

After that (the king of SPAINE ſo commaunding) Mahomet, Amida his elder brother, and right heire of that kingdome, was appointed king in his place: who departing from GVLETTA to TVNES, was receiued as king, and there by ſolemne oath promiſed for euer to be the king of SPAINE his vaſſaile, and to do whatſoeuer he ſhould commaund. H

There was before departed out of TVNES fortie thouſand Moores, who now came and offered their ſupplication to Don Iohn, that they might againe returne and liue with their new king: which their requeſt being eaſily granted, they in great numbers euery day returned into the citie. Shortly after, fifteen hundred Turks, with three thouſand of thoſe wild people which ſome call Arabians, ſome Alarbes, ſore troubled all the paſſages about the citie; who were at laſt by the Chriſtians ouerthrowne, and an hundred and fiftie Chriſtians whom they had taken priſoners, reſcued. After that, Don Iohn by the aduiſe of his moſt expert and skilfull captaines, commaunded a ſtrong caſtle to be built in the middle way betwixt GVLETTA and TVNES: and for the performing thereof, left Gabriell Serbellio with two thouſand Italians, and Calazar a Spaniard with other two thouſand at GVLETTA. And ſo hauing performed that he came for, and diſpoſed of all things as he thought beſt, returned againe into SICILIA. I

A griefe of griefes it is, and ſorrow almoſt vnconſolable, when worthie actions moſt happily begun, ſort not to ſuch happie end as was in reaſon hoped for. The greateſt and the moſt famous victorie of all ages gained againſt the Turke, ſeemed to haue lightened the Chriſtian common-weale: and great hope there was, that the Chriſtians falling into vnitie among themſelues, would by an happie exchange make the Turkiſh empire the ſeat of their wars; and to turne into the Turks dominions, the terrour, ſlaughter, and other calamities of warre, which had ſo many yeares afflicted the Chriſtian common-weale. But by how much the more the ioy was amidſt ſuch dayly calamities and teares; ſo much greater was the ſorrow, ſo great an hope to be come to nought, and men to be ſo blinded with the darkneſſe of enuie and diſdaine, that they could not ſo much as think with what diſhonour and danger of the common ſtate, they ſhould ſhrinke from ſo iuſt, ſo honourable, and ſo needfull a ſeruice, including in it ſelfe the generall good of all Chriſtendome. When poſteritie ſhall conſider what things might then haue beene done, and the deuiſes wherby the common cauſe was ouerthrown; it will worthily blame, and greatly lament ſo notable a victorie and fit opportunitie, ſent as it were from hauen, for the effecting of great matters, to haue bin let ſlip and paſſed ouer ſo lightly regarded. This made, that they who before had repoſed all their hope in armes, had now no other confidence or hope of their welfare, but in concluding of peace. Truly the Venetians both ſpoke and thought honourably of king Philip, as of a moſt faithfull, iuſt, deuout, and honourable prince: yet greatly blaming his officers, and others of great authoritie about him, as men more regarding their owne priuat, than the good of the Chriſtian common-weale. In theſe perplexities of the Venetians, king Philip promiſed them to ſet forth a greater and ſtronger fleet againſt the next yere, & to be ſooner in readineſſe with all his forces and warlike prouiſion, & ſo to help them in all he might: who for all that, gaue ſmall credit vnto thoſe promiſes, for that with the like they had bin oftentimes before deceiued. And therefore as truſting moſt vnto their owne ſtrength, they with all carefulneſſe and expedition entertained mo ſouldiors; of whom, ſome they put into their fleet, the reſt they placed in their garriſons, in CRETE, in DALMATIA, and their frontier townes in EPIRVS. Neither were the Turkes then idle, as the report went; yet were they thought to manage that warre with greater fame than ſtrength: for they had of purpoſe giuen it out, That they would the next Spring with diuers armies, inuade the Venetian territories in CRETE, in DALMATIA, in EPIRVS, yea and in ITALIE in ſelfe; and with their innumerable multitude both of horſe and foot, ſo ouerwhelme the Venetians, that they ſhould not be able poſſibly to hold out. This & more too they brauely vanted of: but in deed Pluzales comming to CONSTANTINOPLE, had brought his fleet ſo ſhaken & ſo weake, as that it ſeemed not poſſible, but in long time

A to be againe repaired, and furniſhed with ſouldiours and mariners, in ſtead of them that had bin loſt, ſome in fight, but moe by the contagiouſneſſe of the infection. But howſoeuer the matter ſtood, the Venetians carefull with the expectation of great matters, and in ſmall hope of good ſucceſſe, comparing their owne ſtrength with the ſtrength of the enemie: yet were they no leſſe diſcouraged with the delaies and croſſe dealing of the confederats, than with all the prouiſion of the enemie. It ſtucke in their minds, how that the Spaniards at ſuch time as CYPRVS might haue bin defended, delayed their comming ſo long, that NICOSIA being loſt, it was time to returne: Neither could they forget that lingring delay to haue beene the cauſe of the great mortalitie amongſt their men, dying in the fleet at IADERA: They remembred alſo, that the commodities, which of ſo notable a victorie were moſt plentifully to haue beene reaped,
B were by the ſlender proſecuting of the ſame, ſo ſparingly taken, that the former dangers ſtill remained. And that Don Iohn, who ought by appointment to haue bin at CORCYRA in the beginning of Summer, was ſcarcely come thither in the latter end of Auguſt: and that he in the third yeare of this war, at ſuch time as their fleet was with great labour and charge againe repaired, would not or liſted not to aduenture to haue againe ouerthrowne the enemies fleet, but in the verie action to haue alwaies trifled away the greateſt part of Summer, before his Spaniards could ſet forward: and when hee might ſafely haue come to CERIGO, to haue called backe Fuſcarinus and the reſt, then facing of the enemie, and euen readie to haue giuen him battell: It was then ſecretly ſuſpected, the Spaniards to haue ſtayed of purpoſe, and to haue dallyed on the time, that the Venetians hauing ſpent their forces might be the more expoſed and
C ſubiect to their iniuries: It ſtucke faſt not in their minds alſo, but euen almoſt in their eyes, what things had happened of former times in their confederations with that nation: They were grieued in the ſpace of three yeares an hundred times, twentie hundred thouſand duckats to haue been to little or ſmall purpoſe ſpent in that warre: Beſides that, they doubted leaſt the Flemmings with their confederats ſhould ſo intangle the king of SPAINE in defending of his owne territories, as that he ſhould not be at leiſure to ſend any aid into the Eaſt: in which caſe, what hope or helpe were they to looke for? How ſhould they then defend thereſt of their Seigniorie in the Eaſt? How ſhould their emptie cofers ſuffice to maintaine ſo great armies both by ſea and land, as might withſtand ſo puiſſant an enemy? Long were the diſcourſes, and effectuall the per-
D ſuaſions, that the Venetians had amongſt themſelues, to induce one another, and all in generall more circumſpectly to conſider, not only what had alreadie paſſed, or was preſently in hand; but alſo more warily to foreſee, what would be the courſe and what the euent of a matter ſo important: and betime to breake off the confederation, which they had alwaies found to haue ſtood them in ſmall ſtead. In reuoluing of theſe things, only one remedie ſeemed moſt effectuall for the curing of their afflicted ſtate: which was, By deſiſting from warre, to conclude a peace with the Turke, howſoeuer: which they were the rather in good hope to obtaine, for that diuers ſpeeches concerning the ſame had paſſed at CONSTANTINOPLE, and were from thence againe reported at VENICE. All men thus enclining to peace, the Senat referred the proceeding therein vnto M. Antonius Barbarus their embaſſadour (who all the time of theſe wars had lien E in ſafe cuſtodie at CONSTANTINOPLE) willing him therein to vſe the helpe of the French embaſſador, who had alwaies bin a perſuader of peace.

Selymus hauing got the iſland of CYPRVS and diuers other places from the Venetians, and yet well wearied with the harmes and loſſes he had himſelfe receiued both by ſea and land, was alſo deſirous ynough of peace. So that the French embaſſadour might, as it was thought, haue got a reaſonable and indifferent peace, if he had but expected the opportunitie of time: But he, (whether mooued with the common harmes, or ſome other ſecret cauſes to him beſt known) in making too much haſt, and ſeeming too deſirous of peace, much hurt the common cauſe of the Venetians, which he moſt deſired to haue furthered. Selymus hauing found him, reſolued with Muhamet the great Baſſa, what he would haue done: who at ſuch time as the ſame embaſſadour
F came vnto him about the matter, told him, That he had himſelfe many times mooued, yea and ſo far forth as he might importuned his great lord and maſter for peace, but could neuer find him willing to heare therof, vntill that now at length ouercome and wearied with the continuall ſollicitation of ſuch as might do moſt with him, he had yeelded thereunto. So the thing that Selymus himſelfe vndoubtedly deſired, that the craftie Baſſa ſeemed him with much difficulty to grant, rather vpon the inſtance and contemplation of them that laboured for the ſame, than for any deſire he had thereunto of himſelfe. For certaine daies at the firſt the French embaſſadour was moſt courteouſly heard, and the Baſſa with faire and cunning ſpeech promiſed that the matter of pacification ſhould eaſily and in ſhort time be compoſed: and ſo at their firſt conferences things paſſed rather in generall tearmes, than that any conditions of peace were particularly agreed vpon: onely this was on both parties conſented vnto, That the Venetians ſhould ſend their embaſſadour of purpoſe, for the full concluding and confirming of the deſired peace. G

The Venetians ſend their embaſſador of purpoſe to Conſtantinople, to entreat a peace.

Which charge was by the Senat committed to Iacobus Superantius, in whoſe wiſedome and valour they had repoſed great hope and confidence. He was no ſooner come to CONSTANTINOPLE, and the Turks deliuered of the feare of the Chriſtian ſword by the diſſolution of the confederation, but that all things were changed; and the Venetians glad perforce to endure the proud lookes of the Turks, their diſdainefull eares, their diſpightfull ſpeeches, their long and H inſolent attendance, with many other ſhamefull indignities: Yea the Baſſa was ſo ſhamleſſe, as proudly to aske them, How they durſt be ſo bold, as to impugne the great emperour Selymus his fleet at ſea; Whereunto the embaſſador anſwered, That the Venetians had alwaies honoured the maieſtie of the Turkiſh emperors, neither had at any time taken vp armes againſt them, but in their owne reaſonable defence, when force was by force to be repulſed, a thing lawfull euen for the wild beaſt in the wide wilderneſſe to do. At the firſt entreatie of the peace, the Baſſa ſeemed to put the Venetian embaſſador in good hope, that the Venetians according to his requeſt ſhould enioy their territories in DALMATIA in as ample maner as in former times, and bounded with the ſame bounds, whereof they had in theſe warres loſt ſome part about IADERA. But when the matter ſhould haue come to the ſhutting vp, the Turke began to ſhrinke from that he I had before promiſed, refuſing not only the reſtitution of the territorie they had indeed by treaſon got; but by cautelous expoſitions of his meaning, framing the concluſion of the preſent peace vnto the forme of their former leagues, required, That as the Turks had then yeelded vnto them MALVASIA and NAVPLIVS, ſo now they ſhould redeliuer vnto them other two places of like worth and importance: As for not reſtoring the territorie they had taken about IADERA, to colour their deceit, they pretended, that they might not by their law reſtore vnto the Chriſtians any town or place, wherein were any church or temple dedicated or conuerted vnto the Mahometane religion, as was there; and further, That the ſame territorie was alreadie giuen by Selymus in reward to his ſouldiors, men of deſert, from whom without great iniurie it might not be againe taken. Hereupon the French embaſſadour complained, That promiſes were not performed: & the Venetians ſo fretted, that they were euen about to haue returned, as men ſhamfully deluded, without concluding of any thing. Yet when no better could be obtained, the Turke ſtil K ſtanding vpon ſo hard tearmes, the embaſſadours by the appointment of the Senat concluded a peace with the Turke, whereof theſe were the chiefe capitulations: firſt, That the Venetians ſhould giue vnto Selymus three hundred thouſand duckats; one hundred to be preſently paied, and the other two hundred by equal portions in two yeres next following: then, That the merchants goods ſhould be indifferently on both ſides reſtored: and laſtly, That ſuch places of the Venetians as the Turke was alreadie poſſeſſed of, ſhould ſtill remaine vnto the Turks; but that ſuch townes or places as the Venetians had taken in the Turks dominion, ſhould be againe forthwith reſtored. For the firſt payment of the money, the Turke was earneſt, thereby as by a fine for L an offence committed, to make this league vnto him more honourable.

A peace concluded betwixt Selymus and the Venetians.

This peace at CONSTANTINOPLE concluded the eleuenth day of Februarie, in the yeare 1574, was by the decree of the Senat confirmed: and afterwards the thirteenth of Aprill following ſolemnely proclaimed in VENICE, to the great wonder of the other confederats. For the better ſatisfying of whom, the Popes Nuntio, with the embaſſadour of SPAINE, were ſent for into the Senat houſe. And although there were many things that grieued the Venetians, yet did they forbeare all hard ſpeeches, and of that their moderation receiued ſo much the more honor, as it is more difficultie for an angrie man to ouercome himſelfe, than others. The duke with calme and temperate ſpeech, framed to the purpoſe, declared vnto them, That anger and hope, two euill counſellors, being ſet apart, he had concluded a peace with the Turke: not for that he M was deſirous of the Turkes friendſhip, which what account it was to be made of, he right well knew; but for the loue he bare to the State, which was not only with loſſe, but euen with death it ſelfe, to be maintained. How he had been ſpoyled of the kingdome of CYPRVS, he further declared: and that the Venetian ſtate grew euery day weaker and weaker by the continual war:

The peace proclaimed at Venice.

A and that therefore, before it were by losse vpon losse come to the vttermost of extremitie, they not able to maintaine so heauie a warre, were to take some better course for the preseruation of that which was yet alreadie left of their seigniorie: for that the safetie of the Venetian state should at all times be a sure fortresse and defence for the Christian commonweale against all the furious attempts of the enemie, and vncertaine euents of time.

The fame of this sudden and vnexpected peace was for the iust and common hatred of the Christians against the Turks, generally euill taken: and the Venetians for the concluding thereof hardly spoken of, as if they had betraied the whole Christian commonweale, or at least wise their confederats. For men were for the most part of opinion, That the Turkes peace would be but fained and deceitfull; and that hauing gained time to set things in order, according to his
B desire, he would for the naturall grudge he bare vnto the Christians, come to his old course, & as he had alwaies done, breake the league, and take vp armes. Some said, That the Venetians, forsaken of their friends and confederats, would in their own deuices perish; yet so, as that their destruction should turne to the generall harme of all Christendome: and these men were of opinion, That in that case, and against that enemie, a dangerous war was to be preferred before an vncertaine and dishonourable peace. Neuertheless the Venetians, besides that they for the present eased themselues of many an heauie burthen, so haue they thereby enioyed the fruits of a long and happie peace, and found the same vnto their state both wholesome and profitable euen vntill this day. It was thought by the sequell of matters, that Selymus was the more willing to haue peace with the Venetians, that hee might the better recouer the kingdome of TVNES,
C and the strong castle of GVLETTA from the Spaniards: who with the knights of MALTA now gaped more after TRIPOLIS and the other port townes holden by the Turkes vpon the coast of BARBARIE, than how to defend the Venetians their confederats. Thus with the losse of CYPRVS, and some part of the Venetian territorie in DALMATIA, ended the mortall and bloudie warre betwixt Selymus and the Venetians. In the course whereof is well to bee seene, what great matters the vnited forces of the Christian princes were able to do against this most mightie enemie, if all discord and contention set apart, they would in the quarrell of the Christian religion ioine with heart and hand against him, and fight the battell of Christ Iesus.

The peace by experience found profitable vnto the Venetians.

Selymus now at peace with them who before most troubled him: to keepe his men of warre
D busied, shortly after conuerted his forces against Iohn, Vayuod of VALACHIA, and so at length ioyned all that prouince to his empire. This countrie of VALACHIA was in auncient time called DACIA: it hath on the East the Euxine (now called the Blacke Sea) on the South the famous riuer Danubius, on the West TRANSILVANIA, and on the North RVSSIA. It is diuided into two parts, the one called TRANSALPINA, and the other MOLDAVIA (of the riuer Moldauus running through the middest thereof) but farre passing the other both in greatnes and abundance of pasture. That part called TRANSALPINA, Mahomet (surnamed the Great, which woon CONSTANTINOPLE) made subiect to the Turkish empire; but vpon MOLDAVIA, the other part, he only imposed a yearely tribute of two thousand duckats. After which time the Vayuods of that countrey, aided sometime by the Hungarians, and sometime by the Polo-
E nians, rise vp oftentimes against the Turks, and refused to do their homage. It chanced, that Bogdanus, Vayuod of that countrie, fauoring the Polonians, and ioyning in league with them, liued much in RVSSIA, as purposing from thence also to haue taken his wife. Which Selymus suspecting, with a great power chased him into exile, and placed in his stead one Iohn (called of his countriemen Iwan, and of some Iuonia) the supposed son of Stephanus, sometime Vayuod of that countrey: who with Ieremias Czarnieuieczius (a Moldauian, who afterward notably betraied him) hauing of long time liued amongst the Turks, to be the more gratious amongst them, renounced his faith, & being circumcised, turned Turke: and following the trade of merchandise, became among them a merchant of such fame, that he became very familiar & well acquainted with the great Bassaes of the Court, and at length with Selymus himselfe. He vnderstanding by F his friends neere about the Turkish emperor of his purpose for the remouing of Bogdanus, corrupted with rewards the great Bassaes, to be mediators for him to Selymus, that commended by them, he might be preferred to be Vayuod of MOLDAVIA; still encreasing the suspitiō Selymus had conceiued of Bogdanus, & telling him, That he supported by the Polonians, was like ynough in short time to reiect his obedience to his imperial maiestie. Selymus at the instance of the Bassaes

nominated this Iohn to be Vayuod: who with a great power of the Turks horſmen entring into MOLDAVIA, eaſily poſſeſſed himſelfe of the countrie, Bogdanus being then abſent in RVSSIA, and as then ſuſpecting no ſuch matter: who yet afterwards attempted in vaine by the helpe of the Polonians to haue againe recouered his countrie, but finding no poſſibilitie ſo to do, fled afterwards into MVSCOVIA, where he long time after liued. G

Iohn the Vayuod falleth into ſuſpition with Selymus and the Baſſaes of the Court.

Iohn now quietly poſſeſſed of MOLDAVIA, for ſome few yeares held the ſame with the good liking of the Turke, paying him his wonted tribute: but afterwards repenting himſelfe of his wicked reuolt from the Chriſtian faith, and now eftſoones againe embracing the ſame, and (ignorant of his owne fortune) perſecuting with too munh ſeueritie thoſe which withſtood his coming into the countrie, eſpecially ſuch great men as tooke part with Bogdanus; and now after his returne vnto the Chriſtian faith, not fauouring the Turkes as he was wont, but croſſing them in many matters, became ſuſpitious both vnto Selymus and the Baſſaes his old friends. Which the Vayuod of the leſſer VALACHIA (commonly called VALACHIA TRANSALPINA) vnderſtanding, he became a ſuter vnto the great Baſſaes of the Court for his brother Peter, and earneſtly trauelled with them, That as Iohn ſupported by Selymus, had driuen Bogdanus out of MOLDAVIA, ſo Peter his brother might in like maner by his help driue Iohn out alſo. In which his ſute he ſpared for no coſt, neither ceaſed by malicious ſuggeſtions to encreaſe the ſuſpition alreadie conceiued of Iohn the Vayuod: who hauing reiected the Mahometane religion, and againe embraced the Chriſtian faith, would (as he ſaid) in ſhort time, as had Bogdanus, ioine hands with the Polonians, and caſt off his obedience towards the great Sultan, by whom he had bin ſo highly promoted. Beſide that, this malicious man offered, That his brother Peter for ſuch his preferment ſhould pay yearly vnto Selymus twice ſo much more as did Iohn, namely an hundred and twentie thouſand duckats by the name of a tribute. H I

The Baſſaes before corrupted and moued with the greatneſſe of the tribute, perſuaded Selymus, by an embaſſadour to ſend for Iohn the Vayuod, to come vnto him himſelfe in perſon, and to commaund him to giue place to ſuch a man as he ſhould ſend thither in his ſtead: which if he ſhould refuſe to do, then to denounce vnto him open warre. Hereunto Selymus, who had euen then much emptied his cofers with the loſſe of his fleet in the battell of LEPANTO, & the chargeable wars againſt the Venetians, was eaſily induced: and to that purpoſe ſent his embaſſadour to the Vayuod; who hauing audience the one and twentieth of Februarie, at the ſame time that Henry Valois, afterward the French king was crowned at CRACOVIA, deliuered his meſſage as followeth: K

The commanding ſpeech of the Turks embaſſadour to Iohn the Vayuod.

Selymus the great Emperour of the Turkes ſendeth mee vnto thee Iohn, Vayuod of VALACHIA his tributarie, with this commaund (whereunto his pleaſure is, that thou ſhouldeſt without delay ſend him anſwere:) firſt hee chargeth thee to ſend him not ſuch a tribute as hee was wont, but twice ſo much more, to wit, an hundred and twentie thouſand duckats. If thou ſhalt refuſe ſo to doe, there is another readie to giue it, both for himſelfe and his poſteritie. But Selymus mindfull of thy conſtancie, fidelitie, and valour, will not be troubleſome to thee in thy gouernment, if thou foorthwith ſend the aforeſaid tribute. Which if thou ſhalt refuſe to doe, then his will is, that thou ſhouldeſt giue place to another, and thy ſelfe returne with mee to CONSTANTINOPLE, there to anſwere the matter: otherwiſe I am in his name to denounce all hoſtilitie, and the calamities of warre both vnto thee and thy countrey. L

This proud meſſage of the embaſſador ſtruck further into the mind of the Vayuod than any would haue thought: yet diſſembling his greefe, he commanded him to be brought to the lodging appointed for him, telling him, That in a matter of ſo great importance, and ſo much concerning the whole ſtate of his countrey, he could not giue him ſo preſent anſwer as he required; but that vpon mature deliberation had with his nobilitie and counſell, he would in ſhort time anſwere him accordingly. The embaſſadour being gone to his lodging, the Vayuod forthwith began deeply to cõſider of Selymus his demaunds; and that in the Turks faith was no aſſurance, which he kept or brake with the Chriſtian princes, as beſt fitted his own turne: and beſides that, that if he ſhould graunt to pay that ſo great and heauie a tribute, in ſo great pouertie of his kingdome, ſore waſted with ciuile warre, Selymus would not be therewith long contented, ſo long as any man would giue him more, but happily would the next yeare exact a greater, and in the M end

A end ſuch an one as he with all his ſubiects ſhould not be able to pay; which it ſhould not be ſafe for him at any time to refuſe, ſo long as any man would giue it. Wherefore calling together the nobilitie and ſtates of his countrey, he brake with them in this ſort.

The ſpeech of the Vayuod vnto his nobilitie and ſubiects.

If euer you were to conſult and deliberate of a moſt important and difficult matter, this verily is that time: for Selymus the Turkiſh emperour, enflamed with inſatiable auarice, and I know not by whoſe perſwaſion, not contented with his woonted tribute, exacteth of vs twiſe ſo much more. If you ſhall graunt it, it ſhall not much concerne mee, as not to bee payed by mee your ſoueraigne, but by your ſelues and your poſteritie: if wee denie it, foorthwith hee denounceth vnto vs fire and ſword, with all the calamities of warre. And in this bareneſſe of our kingdome, almoſt ſpoyled by by ciuill warres, how B ſhall wee bee able to pay it him? wherefore declare your mindes. Verily I foreſee, that if you ſhall in this yeeld vnto Selymus, and graunt him ſo great a tribute, hee will not therewith long hold himſelfe contented, but euerie yeare extort a greater, vntill hee haue altogether eaten vs vp. Wherefore it were better for vs (in mine opinion) to looſe our liues together with our wiues and children, than to ſuffer ſo great an indignitie: neither is it mine owne eſtate that troubleth mee, for why it is you that are to pay it, and not I. Wherefore if you liſt not to endure this ſo diſhonourable and baſe a ſeruitude, let mee forthwith ſo vnderſtand from you: and I will for my part ſo prouide, as that I will not onely not pay vnto the barbarous tyrant the new and heauie tribute hee demaundeth, but not ſo much as any tribute at all; ſo that you be not wanting both to your ſelues and mee. I know right well (beloued and fellowes in armes) what I owe both vnto you and the common-weale, for whoſe good and welfare I am alwayes rea-
C die to lay downe my life.

He had no ſooner thus ſaid, but that a ſecret ſorrow and vnwonted ſilence, had as it were oppreſſed the whole aſſembly. At length, as men awaked out of an heauie and dead ſleepe, they murmured among themſelues, that the Turkiſh emperour ſhould ſo without reaſon oppreſſe them, with doubling & redoubling of his tribute: and were generally of opinion, That the Vayuod had not ſo plainely as truly ſpoken of the intollerableneſſe thereof: and that therfore they had rather die, than to endure ſo great diſhonour, ioyned with ſo foule a ſlauerie. And therupon offered vnto the Vayuod to ſerue vpon their own charge, and with him vpon the banke of Danubius to meet the proud enemie, and there in defence of their liues and libertie, to fight it out
D vnto the laſt man. The Vayuod in few words commending their fidelitie, and taking of them an oath for the faithfull performance of that they had ſo reſolutely promiſed, ſent for the Turks embaſſadour, and gaue him this ſhort anſwere.

The anſwere of the Vayuod vnto the Turkes embaſſadour.

I, for the auncient fidelitie and allegeance which I owe vnto my lord and dread ſoueraigne, the mightie Emperour Selymus, would willingly yeeld vnto him the tribute hee requireth, were it not that I know the minds of my people to abhorre the ſame: wiſhing rather to endure all calamities, hap whatſoeuer hap may, than to yeeld vnto ſo diſhonourable and ſhamefull ſlauerie. Wherefore ſithence I cannot by any meanes extort the ſame from my ſubiects, tell my lord Selymus, That I moſt humbly re-
E queſt him, not to take the ſame in euill part; whoſe amitie I wiſh to bee vnto mee, rather an ornament and refuge, than diſgrace or hinderance. And that vpon that good hope I both asked, and for my ſingular fidelitie obtained of him the Vayuodſhip of Moldavia: which my good hope I moſt heartily beſeech him may not deceiue me.

With this anſwere he diſmiſſed the embaſſador vnrewarded, and with a ſafe conuoy brought him vnto the banke of Danubius: which his homely vſage of the ambaſſadour, cauſed him not a little to be ſuſpected, to be in mind changed from Selymus. The embaſſadour ſent away, the Vayuod not ignorant of the ſudden inuaſions of the Turks, forthwith began to raiſe his armie: and at the ſame time, ſent embaſſadours vnto Henrie king of Polonia his neereſt neighbour, certifying him of the dangerous ſtate of Moldavia, the ſureſt bulwarke of the Polonian king-
F dome, which once ouerthrowne, opened a faire and eaſie way for the common enemy into Polonia: and therefore requeſted him, that as the kings of Polonia had of auncient time, euen for the ſafetie of their owne ſtate, protected that countrey; ſo it would pleaſe him now in like manner in ſo dangerous a time, to giue him aid; or at leaſtwiſe to giue leaue vnto ſuch of his ſubiects as were willing to ſerue for entertainment, to come vnto him, whom he would with all

honour and bountie vſe according to their place and qualitie. Whereunto the king anſwered, G that for as much as he and his predeceſſours the kings of POLONIA, had for the ſpace of more than an hundred yeares been in league with the Turkiſh kings and emperours, he could not either ſend him aid, or yet giue leaue vnto any of his ſubiects to ſerue againſt the Turke as he deſired. With this anſwere the Vayuod was much troubled, as there deceiued where hee moſt hoped for reliefe: yet hearing of certaine companies of the Polonian Coſſacks, which hauing long lien in hope of prey vpon the ſide of the great riuer Boryſthenes, were returning emptie home, he by fit meſſengers ſent of purpoſe, offred them great entertainment to ſerue him in his warres againſt the Turk; of which his offer, they (as men liuing for moſt part by ſeruice) gladly accepted; and ſo without the knowledge of the king went vnto him, to the number of twelue hundred, with their captains, men of great courage and valor, of whom Suierceuius was chiefe: who were H by the Vayuod honourably entertained, and did him in theſe wars right worthy ſeruice. Theſe Coſſacks are light horſmen, lying moſt commonly vpon the borders of the Polonian kingdom towards the Tartars: an hardie and valiant kind of men, whoſe beſt liuing, is the ſpoile they take from the enemie; and their beſt lands, their horſe and launce. For albeit that the Turks and Tartars are moſt commonly in league with the Polonians, and ſeem neuer ſo deſirous of peace; yet doe they oftentimes in great numbers, vpon the ſudden breake into the countries of PODOLIA, and RVSSIA, part of the Polonian kingdome, and there doe great harme, if they bee not in time repreſſed or cut off by the aforeſaid light horſemen, who for that purpoſe lie alwaies in wait for them, as doth the hawke for the prey.

The Vayuod entertaineth the Polonian Coſſackes.

Selymus vnderſtanding the anſwere of Iohn the Vayuod, was therewith exceedingly enra- I ged, and the more by the bitter complaint of the embaſſadour, who angrie with the Vayuod, that he was of him no better regarded nor rewarded, ſpared not to the vttermoſt of his power, to incenſe the angrie emperour againſt him, as if his honour had bin in the perſon of himſelfe contemned and violated. Wherefore without delay, he ſent thirtie thouſand Turkes, and two thouſand Hungarians vnto the Palatine of VALACHIA TRANSALPINA, that ioyning thoſe forces to his owne, he might take Iohn the Vayuod, and ſending him in bonds to CONSTANTINOPLE, to place Peter his brother, Vayuod in his place. The Palatine glad of this commaund, and hauing raiſed his owne power, together with the Turkes & the Hungarians, ſwam ouer the riuer Moldauus, hauing in his armie about an hundred and two thouſand fighting men: a power, not onely ſufficient to haue driuen the Vayuod out of MOLDAVIA, but alſo to haue ſhaken a right K puiſſant king in his kingdome. The Palatine in the middeſt of ſo great a ſtrength, little fearing, and leſſe regarding the ſudden comming of the Vayuod, ſuffered his men with their horſes to lie diſorderedly here and there, diſperſed in the large medowes and paſtures all alongſt the faire riuer ſide; ſo the better to refreſh themſelues, wearie of their long trauell. In the meane time certaine ſcouts came to the Vayuod then at dinner, certifying him, that the enemy with an huge armie, the certaine number wherof they could not well deſcry, was come ouer the riuer: and now reſting themſelues, had turned off their horſes into the rich medowes thereabout, in ſuch diſordered and careleſſe manner, as that they might with a ſmall power be eaſily ouerthrowne. The Vayuod glad of this newes, forthwith ſent before Suierceuius with his Coſſacks, and fiue thouſand other light horſemen, more certainly to deſcry what the enemy did, with the manner of his L lying; and he himſelfe with the reſt of his army, followed faire and ſoftly after. Suierceuius with great ſilence approching the enemies campe, ſuddenly light vpon the enemies ſcouts, in number about fiue hundred; who encloſed before they were aware, were taken euery man by the Coſſacks, and by them ſtraightly examined of the ſtate of their armie and campe. Who for ſafegard of their liues now in their enemies power, frankely confeſſed, how that the Palatine lay ſecurely there by, reſting his armie, not ſo much for the refreſhing thereof after his trauell, as with greater ſtrength to ſet vpon the Vayuod with his freſh ſouldiors: and that in the armie were about ſeauentie thouſand Valachians, thirtie thouſand Turks, and three thouſand Hungarians; who now diſperſed, and ſleeping in ſecuritie, might eaſily be ouerthrowne. Of all theſe things Suierceuius aduertiſeth the Vayuod, requeſting him with all poſſible ſpeed to haſten his comming, for the M obtaining of a moſt notable and aſſured victorie: he in the meane time lying cloſe with his men not farre from the enemie. The Vayuod certified of all theſe things, came without delay, and forthwith commaunded Suierceuius with his men to giue the onſet vpon the enemie: purpoſing himſelfe with the reſt of his armie on the other ſide, to charge the diſordered campe in three places.

Selymus ſendeth his forces againſt the Vayuod.

The Palatine with the Turks ouerthrowen by the Vayuod.

A ces. Suierceuius according as he had in charge, with a great and terrible outcrie, ſuddenly ſet vpon the ſecure enemies: who diſmaied with the ſuddenneſſe of the vnexpected danger, ſtood as men aſtonied, not knowing which way to flie, or how to make reſiſtance. But whiles Suierceuius with his light horſemen thus on the one ſide filleth the campe with tumult, terrour, ſlaughter, and feare; behold, euen as a ſudden tempeſt commeth the Vayuod, bearing all the diſordred campe downe before him: neither had the enemies any meanes to flie, hauing put their horſes a great way off from them into the rich paſtures; but there taken vnarmed, were miſerably ſlain. In all the campe was lamentation and mourning, death raging in euerie place, with ſuch furie, that of ſo great an army as of late paſſed the riuer, few or none eſcaped, more than the Palantine with Peter his brother, who by great chance with much adoe getting horſes, ſwam ouer the ri-
B uer, and ſo came to the caſtle of BRAILOVIA in VALACHIA; all the reſt were ſlaine, and left to bee of the beaſts of the field, and birds of the aire deuoured. It was a moſt horrible ſpectacle to ſee the ground couered with the bodies of the dead, all ſtained with gore bloud, and their weapons of all ſorts lying by them. In the campe were found great riches, all which the Vayuod gaue vnto his ſouldiors, and there ſtayed foure dayes to refreſh his wearied men. After that, he with his victorious armie entred into VALACHIA, the Palantines countrey, where hee tooke many caſtles and townes, and put to the ſword all that came in his way, men, women, and children, without reſpect of age or ſex: and burnt all the countrey townes and villages before him as he went; ſo that all that part of the countrey of VALACHIA TRANSALPINA, was couered with C ſmoke and fire, to the terrour of the beholders. The aged fathers were in euery place drawen forth to ſlaughter, the yong babes were cut in pieces, the matrons and virgins defiled, and afterwards ſlaine: and in briefe all the crueltie that could be deuiſed, performed: in the bloudy execution whereof, the Vayuod commended his men, perſuading them in like manner ſtill to proſecute the victorie, and that the reſt of their labours was all but for prey and bootie, for the enriching of themſelues. In this hauock of all things, it was told him, that the Palatine with his brother Peter, the men whom hee moſt ſought after, were in the caſtle of BRAILOVIA not farre off: whereupon hee forthwith marched thither with his armie. The citie of BRAILOVIA ſtandeth vpon the riuer Danubius, and had in it a caſtle of ſome good ſtrength, defended both by the nature of the place, and a ſtrong garriſon of the Turkes which Selymus had appointed for the keeping thereof, as the key of the countrey: not farre from this citie the Vayuod encamping his
D army, writ vnto the captaine of the caſtle, forthwith to deliuer vnto him the Palatine, with Peter his brother, his mortall enemies; who neuer wronged by him, had inuaded his countrey, and ſought after his life, and being ouerthrowne in battell, were fled vnto him: which if he ſhould refuſe to doe, he threatned neuer to depart thence, vntill he had to his further harme, conſtrained him by force to yeeld them. Theſe letters he ſent by two Valachian captiues, to be deliuered vnto the captaine of the caſtle: whereunto hee returned anſwere by foure Turks, two of the citie, and two of his owne ſeruants, by whom he alſo ſent ten great ſhot, and as many ſmall, with two Turkiſh arrowes, and this meſſage.

E For that I know thee to bee the ſeruant of my dread ſoueraigne Selymus, I regard thee: and will not denie the ſame men to bee with mee, whom thou ſo much requireſt. But for as much as I vnderſtand, that thou of late haſt ſlaine a great number of the ſeruants of the great Emperour, who by his commaundement were bringing Peter the brother of the Palatine into MOLDAVIA: I therefore tell thee, that except thou betime raiſe thy ſiege, I will feed thee and thy followers, with ſuch diſhes as theſe; whereupon thou and thine armie gorged to the full, ſhall all afterwards dangerouſly ſurfeit and caſt. Farewell.

The blunt anſwer of the captaine to the Vayuod.

This rough anſwere ſo much mooued the Vayuod, that he commaunded hands to bee laid vpon the aforeſaid foure meſſengers: and their noſes, lips, and eares being cut off, both their feet to be with great nailes faſt nailed vnto a long piece of timber, and ſo with their heads hanging
F downward, to be ſet vp before the citie, and ſo left for the captaine & the citizens to gaze vpon. Signifying withall vnto the captaine that ſent them, that he himſelfe with the other fugitiues his gueſts, ſhould in like manner be ſerued, if they fell into his hands. Immediatly after he aſſaulted the citie, and vſing the cheerfulneſſe of his ſouldiors, by plaine force tooke the ſame, the defendants being not able to hold them out. There was made great ſlaughter of the Turkes, whereas no

Barbarous crueltie.

The citie of Brailouia taken by the Vayuod and raſed downe to the ground.

no man was taken to mercie; the very babes were ſlaine, together with their mothers, and bloud G ran like riuers into the Danubius. For the ſpace of foure dayes this bloudie execution endured:
no place ſerued for refuge, euen the moſt ſecret and obſcure places were ſearched, and the poore creatures there found, drawn forth and ſlaine. The fury was ſo great, that no liuing thing, no not ſo much as the very dogs were ſpared. Much gold, ſiluer, plate, jewels, and other rich ſpoile was there found, all which became a prey vnto the greedy ſouldiors: for that citie was of all others in thoſe quarters the richeſt, as a place much frequented, and enioying long peace, as after ſuch time the Turks were fully poſſeſſed of Græcia, not being troubled with any warres; vntil now, that it was by the Vayuod firſt ranſackt, and afterwards raſed down to the ground, and nothing thereof left ſtanding, more than the bare caſtle it ſelfe: which the Vayuod durſt not aduenture vpon, for that it was well fortified, and furniſhed with ſo ſtrong a garriſon, as that it could not H without his great loſſe be taken.

The Turkes againe ouerthrowen by the Vayuod.

Whiles the Vayuod was thus buſied in the ſpoile of Brailovia, newes was brought vnto him of the comming of fifteene thouſand Turks to the reliefe of the caſtle: againſt whom hee forthwith ſent Suierceuius with his Coſſackes, and other eight thouſand Moldauian horſemen; who ſuddenly comming vpon the Turks, diſordered & fearing no ſuch matter, ſlew almoſt fourteen thouſand of them, and chaſed the reſt vnto the caſtle of Teina. Of this victory Suierceuius in all haſt certified the Vayuod; and withal, that there was another great power of the Turks com-ming, which might eaſily be alſo ouerthrown, if he leauing the ſiege of the caſtle of Brailovia, would without delay come and ioyne his forces with his. He glad of that news, and well perceiuing how difficult & dangerous that ſiege would be vnto him, riſe forthwith with his army, and I went to Suierceuius: and afterwards vpon conference had with him, laid ſiege to Teina: which citie taken without much labour, he put to ſword all the people found therin, not leauing one aliue: and by the ſeruice of Suierceuius ouerthrew the Turks comming towards Brailovia.

Selymus in doubt to haue bin thruſt out of Valachia by the Vayuod.

Selymus in the mean time much troubled with the proceedings of the Vayuod, and doubting to be quite thruſt out of Valachia Transalpina (which he was like enough to haue been, had not the treaſon of Czarnieuiche hindered the matter) prepared new forces for that ſeruice, and after the manner of the Turks, in time of their greateſt diſtreſſe, appointed general ſupplications and prayers to bee made vnto his prophet Mahomet, for the better ſucceſſe of his warres, the vn-doubted ſigne of his feare.

The Vayuod after ſo many victories againſt the Turkes, purpoſing for a while to breake vp K his great armie, called vnto him his old friend Ieremias Czarnieuiche, vnto whom, as vnto the man he of all others moſt truſted, he had reſolued to commit the charge, with part of his armie, to keepe the Turks from paſſing againe ouer the riuer Danubius into his countrey: and in deliuering to him his charge, ſpake vnto him as followeth:

The kind ſpeech of the Vayuod to Czarnieuiche

Sith fortune hath hitherto anſwered our deſires (worthie Czarnieuiche*) with moſt rare and perpetuall ſucceſſe againſt the Turkes, our moſt cruell enemies, wee are thankefully to take the ſame, and to render moſt humble and heartie thankes vnto Almightie God, that it hath pleaſed him, the Au-thour of all victorie, ſo to haue proſpered our endeauours againſt theſe fierce and deuouring enemies.
Now what remaineth for the preſent, but to disband mine armie, wearied with labour and trauell, L and to giue my ſouldiours leaue to depart home to reſt themſelues, that ſo I may as occaſion ſhall require againe vſe their freſh forces for our better ſeruice: you in the meane time with thirteene thouſand of my ſelect ſouldiours, ſhall lie vpon the ſide of Danubius, to keepe the Turkes from paſſing the riuer.
Haue good regard I pray you, vnto this your charge, which I vpon an eſpeciall truſt, grounded vpon your auncient loue and fidelitie, haue at this time impoſed vpon you. And let mee from time to time with all expedition vnderſtand from you of euery motion of the enemie, that ſo wee may in due time prouide for him accordingly.*

And ſo in token of his greater fauour, taking his leaue of him with a kiſſe (as the manner of thoſe people is) gaue leaue vnto the greateſt part of his ſouldiors to depart home, yet with this M charge, to be alwaies in readineſſe whenſoeuer they ſhould be called vpon.

Czarnieuiche hauing receiued his charge, and promiſing vnto the Vayuod the vttermoſt of his faithfull deuoire, went towards Danubius, and there moſt carefully kept the paſſages with continuall watch and ward. It was not long but that great numbers of the Turks were come downe

to

A to the other ſide of the riuer, and moe were ſtill comming, yet none of them was ſo hardie as to aduenture the great riuer; Czarnieuiche with his horſemen lying in the faces of them, readie to receiue them on the other ſide. Which the Baſſa whom Selymus had ſent with his armie, perceiuing, ſent certaine men pickt out for the purpoſe, to Czarnieuiche, to ſound him, if hee might by any meanes be drawne to come ouer, in ſecret to talke with him: and the more to mooue him, beſide his conduct for his ſafetie, ſent him by the ſame meſſengers thirtie thouſand Hungarian duckats for a preſent. With which ſo faire a bait Czarnieuiche allured, receiued the money, and faithfully promiſed to come. And ſo ſhortly after, ſecretly paſſing ouer the riuer, had conference with Peter the Palantines brother, who then lay on the further ſide of Danubius, with a great power of the Turks. In this conference, Peter declared vnto him in how great danger the Vay-
B uod ſtood, and how highly Selymus was offended with him, That he his tributarie and vaſſaile ſhould worke the deſtruction of his ſo great armies: which his heauie diſpleaſure hee could no otherwiſe ſatisfie but with his head: and that therefore he ſhould no longer rule in MOLDAVIA, for that gouernment was by the great emperour giuen vnto him. Wherefore (ſaid he) if thou be wiſe, whileſt it is yet in thy power, gaine the good will of Selymus by ſome good deſert: for an eaſie matter it is to begin any warre, but an hard matter to end the ſame. For as much as it is not alwaies in the ſame mans power to begin wars, and at his pleaſure to make an end. Euery foole may when he liſt enter into armes, but muſt lay the ſame down when it pleaſeth the conqueror. Now you haue a faire opportunitie, and it is in your owne power to procure his friendſhip for euer, better ſtanding with your affaires than war. And albeit you may hope well of the power of C the Vayuod, yet wiſdome would not, that you ſhould prefer vncertainties before things certain: you haue now receiued thirtie thouſand duckats, the earneſt of your further deſerts, which ſhall hereafter haue alſo their due rewards in moſt full and bountifull meaſure. Wherefore if you will do your ſelfe good, and prouide both for your ſafetie and preferment, confound not your own good fortune, with the broken and deſperat ſtate of the Vayuod, but ſuffer the Turks to paſſe as friends ouer the riuer of Danubius. For I am come (ſaid he) with a great and puiſſant army from the mightie Selymus, to take vpon mee the gouernment of MOLDAVIA, and to ſend the Vayuod in bonds to CONSTANTINOPLE: and of mee, being once Vayuod, what is it that for ſo great deſert thou and thine may not aske and obtaine? Wherfore I pray thee conceale the comming of the Turks, and withdraw thy ſelfe from the riuer: ſo ſhal we, paſſing ouer the riuer with our po-D pulous armie, eaſily oppreſſe the Vayuod with all his power, and at once reuenge all the former iniuries and diſgraces done both vnto Selymus and vs.

Czarnieuiche hath ſecret conference with Peter the Palantines brother, who cunningly perſwadeth him to giue the Turkes paſſage.

With greedie men what will not the foule deſire of gold worke? Czarnieuiche ouercome with the golden promiſes of Peter, and forgetfull of his faith before giuen vnto the Vayuod, yeelded vnto all he requeſted: and drawing his forces further off from the riuer, as if it had been for his more ſafetie, gaue the Turkes free paſſage. There was then in the Turks armie two hundred thouſand men, well appointed, & furniſhed with great ordinance, and all other things neceſſary both for the field and for ſiege, who by the ſufferance of the falſe traitour paſſed quietly ouer the riuer. Czarnieuiche forthwith poſting to the Vayuod, certified him, how that the Turks truſting to their multitude, had paſſed the riuer of Danubius, againſt whom hee was not able (as E he ſaid) to make head: and that therfore hee ſhould doe well, without delay to goe againſt them with ſuch forces as he had then in a readineſſe; which ioyned vnto his, might eaſily ouerthrow them. Glad was the Vayuod of this newes, and filled with the hope of good ſucceſſe, demanded of him what ſtrength the enemy might be of? They are (ſaid hee) not much aboue twelue thouſand that be already come ouer, but are ſtil comming more and more, and wil before your comming thither be aboue fifteene thouſand.

Czarnieuiche corrupted, giueth the Turkes leaue quietly to paſſe ouer the riuer of Danubius.

The Vayuod lay then at the ſiege of the caſtle of TSINA (hauing before taken the citie) but hearing this newes, raiſed his ſiege, and ſo in foure dayes came and encamped within three miles of the enemy: and forthwith ſent foorth Swierceuus with his Coſſackes, and Ieremias Generall of the horſemen, with ſix thouſand horſe, to take view of the enemies campe, and to vnderſtand
F what might be of their deſignes. Theſe two captaines marching together, chanced to fall vpon the Turkes ſcouts, in number about ſixe thouſand horſemen, with whom they had a light skirmiſh, and in ſhort time put them to flight. Of theſe ſcouts they tooke one, and him grieuouſly wounded: who being examined of the ſtrength of the enemie, and feeling himſelfe wounded to death, told them diſſemblingly, that the Turks were not in number many. But the Coſſackes doubting doubting of the truth of that report, and probably coniecturing by so great a number of scouts, G that the enemy was of farre greater strength than was supposed or reported; quickly certified the Vayuod thereof, wishing him in time to prouide for the safety of himselfe and his army, and not too much to trust Czarnieuiche, whom they had a good while before suspected. But the Vay-uod nothing doubting of the faith of him whom hee had a long time found most faithfull in the time of his hardest distresse, and vsed as a most trustie companion in all his trauels, answered nothing, but that he knew whom hee trusted, and that it was not now time to stand in doubt, or to be afraid; and that hee would ere long come and take view of the enemies campe himselfe:

for that hee was not come so farre to flie, but to fight in defence of his countrey and subiects, euen to the last gaspe. And so fortifying his campe neere vnto a lake that runneth out of Danu-bius (for the more conuenient watering of his armie) hee set forward with all his power against H the enemie.

Neere vnto the enemies campe was an high hill, from whence the Vayuod had thought to haue descried the number of them, with the manner of their lying: but comming thither, hee could descry nothing but foure companies of scouts afarre off, one company from another; who also vpon the sight of the Moldauians withdrew themselues of purpose out of sight vnto the armie, which then lay in a low valley behind an hill, not to be discouered vntill a man were almost vpon it. The Vayuod suspecting the enemy to be at hand, diuided his horsmen, in number thirtie thousand, into thirtie companies, and placing before euerie companie certain field pieces, so marched readie to giue battell. His footmen, in number many, a rude and homely kind of people, but vnto him of all others most faithfull, and armed with such countrey weapons as they I had, he placed by themselues. So marching on, he came to another hill, from whence he might not farre off easily descry the huge army of the enemy, and how he had been by the treason of Czarnieuiche deceiued: whereupon he presently sent for him; who sent him word backe againe,
That he could not now come, the enemy being so nigh at hand, but that he should forthwith see him in the field as forward as the forwardest against the enemy. Czarnieuiche had then vnder his command thirteene thousand of the most choice souldiers in the armie: who vpon the signall of battell on both sides giuen (for the Turks were now also ready) first according to his promise set forward, as if it had beene to haue giuen the onset: but being come neere vnto the enemie, Czarnieuiche reuolteth vnto the Turks. forthwith (as he had before agreed) caused his ensigne to be let fall, and his men with their caps vpon the points of their speares and swords, in token of their voluntary yeelding and submission K to bow downe their heads and bodies; whom the Turks with their speares and launces holden vp on high, ioyfully receiued as their friends, or rather as men taken to mercie. The rest of the armie almost discouraged with this so sudden a reuolt of so great a man, retired in hast to the Vayuod, crying out vnto him, that all was lost. But he nothing discouraged therewith (as a most resolute man in the most sudden daungers) with comfortable wordes cheared them vp, willing them as couragious men to follow him against the enemie, whom they in all things exceeded, excepting number, which alwaies gaue not the victory. The Turks perceiuing the Moldauians lately reuolted vpon the ioyning of the battell (as men in conscience wounded) to shrinke back, Traitors iustly rewarded. thrust them perforce into the head of their battell, making of them no more account, but to blunt the enemies swords; and such as hung backe, they themselues slew: vpon whom as false L traitors the Vayuod caused his field pieces to be most furiously discharged; so that most part of these treacherous men there slaine, some by the Turkes, some by their owne friends, receiued the iust reward of their infidelitie and treason, accompanied with perpetuall infamie. Ouer
The battell betwixt the Turks and the Moldauians. the dead bodies of these traitors the Turkes comming on, were at the first notably encountered by the Moldauians; and after a most cruell fight, as if they had beene discouraged, began to retire, but indeed of purpose to haue drawne the Christians before they were aware, within the danger of their great ordinance, and ambushes, which they had before aptly & couertly placed for that purpose. Which Swierceuius well acquainted with the Turks fineneſſe, perceiuing, with much adoe staied their further pursuit, and so auoided the danger prepared for them. The Turks deceiued of their expectation, came on againe afresh, with no lesse fury than at the first: whom M the Christians right valiantly receiued, and made with them a most cruell and mortall battell; wherein many both of the Turkes and Christians fell, and neuer rise againe. But what was so The Moldauians ouerthrowne. small a power against such a world of men? After long fight, the Moldauians oppressed with the multitude of their enemies, began to giue ground: and seeing no other remedy, but either to flie

or

A or to die, betooke themselues to flight, wherein most part of them were slaine, the furious enemie still hardly pursuing them at the heeles: of the Cossackes were left only two hundred and fiftie. The horsemen (the chiefest strength of the Vayuod) thus by the treason of Charniauiche ouerthrowne, the Vayuod with twentie thousand footmen, and such horsmen as had now after the battell ioyned themselues vnto the footmen, retired vnto a towne not far off, which he but a little before had rased; but was now glad in the ruines thereof to fortifie himselfe against the sudden and furious assaults of the Turks: who the same night so beset the Vayuods campe with such a multitude of men, that no man could go in or out of the campe; or the vttermost part of that hugie armie be from any place descried.

The next day (which was the eleuenth of Iune) the Turkes shot diuers great shot into the B Vayuods camp, but to small purpose, for the Christians had (for so short a time) notably fortified themselues within the ruines of the old town. Which the Turks well perceiuing, and withall considering how hard and dangerous a matter it would be to assault the Vayuod in his strength: they sent messengers vnto him, to perswade him without delay to yeeld himselfe, and to repose more trust in the mercie of the Turks, than in his owne broken forces; especially in his so hard distresse, being so beset, as that he could not possibly escape, and out of hope of all relieFe; and therfore should by such voluntarie yeelding, seeke for grace of his enemies, rather than by a desperat obstinacie to cast himselfe into a most certaine destruction, where no mercie was to be expected. Whereunto the Vayuod answered, That he was not ignorant into what danger he was brought, rather by the treason of Charniauiche and his followers, than by the valour of the C enemie; yet had left with him a strong power of most valiant and resolute men, who would in his quarrell and defence of themselues, sell their liues very deare vnto the Turks: neuertheless, that to auoid the farther effusion of bloud, he could for his part be content to yeeld vnto his hard fortune, so that the great commaunders of the Turks armie would condiscend vnto such reasonable conditions as he should propound, and for the performance thereof giue him their faith, not once or twice, but seuen times by solemne oath to be taken. Of this his offer the Turkes accepted, willing him to set downe the conditions: which were, first that the Polonian Cossackes might in safetie depart into their countrie, with their horses and armour: then, that they should without any violence offered to his person, send him aliue and in good safetie vnto the great emperour Selymus, before him to answere his owne cause: as for the Moldauians, he said he ne-D ded not to couenant any thing, for that the iniurie offered vnto them tended also to the hurt of the emperor himselfe, and of him whom he should appoint Vayuod, whose subiects they were. These conditions (as reasonable) were well liked of the Turks, and so according to his desire, confirmed seuen times by the solemne oath of euery captaine and commaunder in the armie, both for themselues and their followers. Vpon this agreement, the Vayuod brought all his armie out of their trenches wherein they had lien strongly encamped, and there with heauie heart tooke his last leaue of his souldiors, to the generall griefe of them all: amongst whom he diuided such money and iewels as he had, as a remembrance of his kindnesse. And there in the sight of them all disarming himselfe, accompanied only with Osmolius a Polonian, went in manner of E a suppliant to the Turks campe, where he had full foure houres talke with the great commaunders of the armie; vntill that at last Capucius Bassa (either offended with his speech, or vnmindful of his faith before giuen) with his scimitar vpon the sudden struck him a great blow ouerthwart the face, and another crosse the bellie: whom so wounded, and as yet but halfe dead, the Ianizaries tooke and cut off his head, which was forthwith set vp vpon a lance, for all men to behold. His dead bodie they bound by the feet vnto two camels, and so shamefully tore it in pieces: and happie was he that could get any little piece thereof, or embrue his sword with the least drope of his bloud. This was the lamentable and wofull end of Iohn the Vayuod of Moldavia, a right valiant and worthie man, shamefully murdered by the perfidious Turkes, who had hee beene more constant in the Christian faith, had not happily fallen into so great miserie. Whose wofull
F fall may serue as a most notable example of the vncertainetie of these worldly things: for as no man for a time had of the Turkes moe or more glorious victories, so in the end, and as it were in demonstration of mans fragilitie, no man perished more miserably. The Vayuod thus perfidiously murthered, the Turkes with like treacherie forthwith set vpon the Moldauians, and slew them downeright as beasts appointed for the slaughter. Which the Cossackes beholding, and hoping for no better measure, thrust themselues into the thickest of their enemies, and there valiantly fighting were all slaine, except some few of the better sort reserued for ransome, amongst G whom was Seuiercenius with some other captaines; who were afterwards for great sums redeemed, when as they could by no meanes be perswaded to forsake their religion and turne Turke.

All Valachia made subiect to the Turkes.

After this victorie and shamefull murder of the Vayuod, the Turks ouerran all MOLDAVIA, and put to sword all the nobilitie of that countrie, with many of the countrie people: of whom they also as their maner is in countries new conquered, sent great numbers in colonies into the farther parts of the Turkish empire: and for the more assured possession thereof, placed strong garrisons in euery towne and castle, as they thought it most conuenient. Thus all VALACHIA (both the higher and the lower) fell into the Turks hands in the yeare 1574, and was by Selymus ioyned vnto the Turkish empire, none of the least things by him done: For beside the gaining of so great a countrie (the most assured bulwarke of POLONIA) he hath thereby opened a faire H and easie way for his successors, at their pleasure to enter into PODOLIA, or RVSSIA, parts of the Polonian kingdome, yea and into POLONIA it selfe: which they will vndoubtedly in time doe, if God in mercie bridle not their immoderat desires, and with his mightie hand protect the dangerous state of that kingdome.

Selymus at the same time, not a little grieued with the losse of the kingdome of TVNES, and that Don Iohn had there done the yere before; began forthwith to cast in his mind, how he might againe recouer the same, and withall, thrust the Spaniards out of the strong castle of GVLETTA; which they had now almost fortie yeares kept, euer since that it was by Charles the fift taken from Barbarussa in the yeare 1535: for he well saw it to bee a matter of no small moment, to whom that strong fortresse (standing so commodiously in the frontiers of AFFRICKE) belonged. There was (and still is) vpon that coast diuers of the Turkes aduenturers, which liuing altogither vpon spoile, had to that place safe recourse, as to a most assured refuge: and if no bootie were to be met with thereabout, then would they run out towards MALTA, SARDINIA, SICILIA, and the other islands thereabouts; yea oftentimes into ITALIE and SPAINE, and from thence carrie away with them great booties both of men and cattell, and whatsoeuer thing else came in their way: for which cause, many of the Turkes men of war resorted thither in hope of purchase. But after that GVLETTA was possessed by the Spaniards, they were not onely depriued of that so commodious an harbour, but many times intercepted euen by them of that place, and by the gallies of MALTA: which two places serued as two most sure bulwarks against the Turkes and Moores aduenturers, by whose meanes they many times came short home. K
For which cause the Turkes, especially these pyrats (of whom the Turke maketh great account, as not his least strength at sea) wonderfully desired to haue both those strong places gotten out of the hands of the Christians. In the castle of GVLETTA was continually a strong garrison of a thousand Spaniards, who kept them of TVNES in great subiection, and oftentimes cut short these pyrats and rouers, who much troubled those seas. Wherefore the Turkish emperour Selymus, hauing made great preparation both for sea and land seruice, commanded Sinan, Piall, & Vluzales, his chiefe Bassaes, and men of great experience, with all speed to passe ouer with his fleet into AFFRICKE, to besiege TVNES and GVLETTA. Who when they had put all things in readinesse according as they had in charge, set forward, and with three hundred saile of gallies came before GVLETTA the thirteenth day of Iuly: whither also resorted vnto them other the Turks men of L war, from ALEXANDRIA, ALGIERS, and other places, in such number, as that all that coast seemed to be couered with shipping. The Turks at their first arriual laied siege to the water tower, wherin were eight hundred souldiors well pronided of all things needfull for defence, who most valiantly maintained the place, vntill such time as that most of them being by the often assaults of the enemie slaine: the rest by the commandement of the captaine retired to him into the castle. In taking of this tower the Turkes lost 3000 of their men.

Gulettabesieged by the Turks.

After that they began to besiege the castle of GVLETTA, against which they cast vp diuers mounts, and from thence most terribly battered the castle: from whence the deadly shot was sent againe amongst them not sparingly; so that in one day two hundred great shot were reckoned to haue bin shot out of the castle amongst the thickest of the enemies. But after many furious assaults, too tedious to report, and much harme done on both sides, the Turkes to their M great aduantage tooke the chanell of the lake of TVNES; and fearing least some relieue should be sent to the besieged, maintained their assault day & night without intermission. Neuertheless, certaine companies of Spaniards sent from the new castle by Serbellio, got into GVLETTA; after

A which, they in the beſieged caſtle ſallied out, and the twentith of Auguſt repulſed the Turkes, with an exceeding great ſlaughter. But the Baſſaes fully reſolued vpon the winning of the place to gage their whole forces, and without ceaſing ſtill bringing on freſh ſouldiors, after they had all the day continued a moſt terrible aſſault, at length about two houres after Sun ſet, they took the caſtle the 23 day of Auguſt, when there was now ſcarcely two hundred ſouldiors left aliue to defend the ſame; who altogither with the other weak people in the caſtle were without mercie cut in pieces. What wealth the Turkes found in this caſtle, is hard to ſay; but certaine it is, that they had therein great ſtore of victuals, armour, ſhot, and pouder, and foure hundred great pieces of artillerie. Guletta taken by the Turkes.

B GVLETTA thus taken, the Turkes forthwith laid ſiege to the new caſtle, appointed by Don Iohn the yeare before to haue bin built betwixt GVLETTA and TVNES, which was not yet altogither finiſhed: wherein the two auncient and valiant captaines, Serbellio and Salazar (left there of purpoſe for the building thereof by Don Iohn) lay with a garriſon of foure thouſand good ſoldiors. The Baſſaes when they gaue the firſt ſummons to the caſtle, the foure & twentith of Auguſt, required to haue it forthwith deliuered vnto them: to whom Serbellio ſtoutly anſwered, That he had promiſed the king his maſter, to giue him a better account of the place; and being now alſo very old, could not endure the Turks heauie yoake, but would therefore hold it out vnto the laſt man: which both he and Salazar truly performed, not omitting any thing that was by men to be done for defence of the place; and ſallying out, ſometime the one, and ſometimes the other, made great ſlaughter of the Turks, giuing them alſo repulſe vpon repulſe when C they came to the aſſault. But the great Baſſaes, little feeling, and leſſe regarding the loſſe of men, ſo that thereby they might gaine the place; after many moſt terrible and deſperat aſſaults, at length (namely the thirteenth day of September) when they had with all their force for the ſpace of ſix houres, furiouſly aſſaulted the caſtle, and ſlaine moſt of the defendants, at laſt tooke it. Serbellio, ſhot in with two bullets, and wiſhing rather to die than to fall into the hand of the enemie, thruſt himſelfe into the middeſt of the Turkes, there to haue periſhed: but by the haſtie comming in of Piall Baſſa, both he & Salazar were taken aliue; as for all the reſt that followed them, they were put to the ſword. The Baſſa in his rage ſtrucke Serbellio, and the more to grieue him, cauſed his ſonne to be cruelly murthered before his face. Neither was this victorie by the Turks obtained without bloud, hauing in leſſe than three moneths ſpace that the ſiege endured, loſt D aboue thirtie thouſand men. The notable anſwere of Serbellio. The new caſtle taken.

Theſe ſtrong holds (the greateſt ſtrength of that kingdome) thus taken, the Turkes marched to TVNES, which they eaſily tooke, and afterwards ouerthrew the fortifications thereof, becauſe it ſhould no more rebell. Mahomet the yong king, but the yere before placed in that kingdome by Don Iohn, was there taken, and in bonds ſent aboord to be caried with Carrera captaine of GVLETTA, priſoners to CONSTANTINOPLE. And thus the kingdome of TVNES, with the ſtrong caſtle of GVLETTA, fell againe into the poſſeſſion of the Turks, to the farther trouble of the Chriſtian countries lying ouer againſt it. The prowd Baſſaes hauing (as they thought) beſt diſpoſed of all things at TVNES and GVLETTA, departed thence, and with their fleet of 400 ſaile, came the fourth of October within ſight of MALTA. But vnderſtanding that they of MALTA were pro- E uided for their comming, and remembring what diſhonor their moſt magnificent emperor Solyman had not many years before there ſuſtained; wherof diuers of them had bin eye-witneſſes, they turned thence, and ſailed directly to CONSTANTINOPLE. Tunes yeelded to the Turke.

Shortly after, this great emperor Selymus ſpent with wine and women, vnto whom he had giuen his greateſt ſtrength, died, the ninth of December, in the yeare of our Lord 1574; when he had liued one and fiftie years, and thereof raigned eight, and lieth buried at HADRIANOPLE. He was but of a meane ſtature, and of an heauie diſpoſition; his face rather ſwollen than fat, much reſembling a drunkard. Of the Othoman kings and emperours he was of leaſt valour, and therefore leaſt regarded, altogither giuen to ſenſualitie and pleaſure: and ſo dying, left his empire vn- F to Amurath his eldeſt ſonne, a man of more temperance, but not much greater courage; who neuertheleſſe by his valiant Baſſaes and men of war did great matters, eſpecially againſt the Perſians, the mortall and dangerous enemies of the Turkes, as ſhall be hereafter in his Hiſtorie declared. Selymus dyeth.

THE LIFE OF AMVRATH, THE THIRD OF THAT NAME, SIXT EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKES.

THe death of the late emperour Selymus was for feare of the insolent Ianizaries notably concealed by the great Bassaes, vntill such time as Amurath his eldest sonne, then in ASIA, by speedie messengers aduertised thereof about twelue daies after, arriued at CONSTANTINOPLE: and there receiued into the Seraglio, tooke possession of the empire, the fiue and twentieth day of December, solemne amongst vs Christians for the natiuitie of our Sauiour Christ Iesus. He was about thirtie, or (as some write) seuen and twentie yeares old, when he began to raigne: of a manly stature, but pale and corpulent, wearing his beard thin and long: in his countenance appeared not the fierce nature of the Othoman princes, being indeed himselfe of a peaceable dispositon, a louer of iustice, and in the manner of his superstition very zealous. The riot and excesse growne amongst the Turks by his fathers euill example, he reformed, by his owne temperance, and the seuere punishment of notorious drunkards: yet is it reported, that he would oftentimes himselfe drink plentifully of wormwood wine: he was much subiect to the falling sicknes, and sore troubled with the stone: more spare handed than was for the greatnes of his state: and yeelding more to the counsell of his mother, his wife, and sister, than of his great Bassaes; which was of many imputed to him for simplicitie. At his first comming to CONSTANTINOPLE, to appease the murmuring of the Ianizaries (grieued to see themselues so disappointed of the spoile of the Christians and Iewes, which they were wont to take in the vacancie of the empire) he beside the vsuall largesse which the Turkish emperours at their first entrance into the empire bestow vpon them, augmented also their dayly wages, and granted them this priuiledge, That their sonnes as soone as they came to be twentie yeares old, should be inrolled amongst the number of the younger Ianizaries, & be partakers also of their immunities; wherby he woon their fauours exceedingly. And immediatly to rid himselfe of all competitours, he after the vnnaturall maner of the Turkish policie, caused his fiue brethren, Mustapha, Solyman, Abdulla, Osman, and Tzihanger, to be all strangled in his owne presence. The mother of Solyman pierced through with the cruell death of her young sonne, as a woman ouercome with sorrow, desperatly struck her selfe to the heart with a dagger, and so died. At which so tragicall a sight it is reported that Amurath let some teares fall, as not delighting in such barbarous crueltie, but that the state and manner of his gouernment so required.

Amurath taketh vpon him the Turkish empire the 25 day of December, in the yeare 1574.

The description of Amurath.

He pacifieth the Ianizaries, and augmenteth their priuiledges.

He strangleth fiue of his brethren.

A desperat woman.

In the beginning of his raigne he established diuers wholesome lawes, altered the coyne, and bountifully relieued the poore. And albeit that he was of a mild and peaceable nature, yet because he would not seeme to degenerat from the Othoman princes his progenitours, he prosecuted his fathers warres, and by the Tartars (called Præcopenses) in the month of October, in the yeare 1575 entred into RVSSIA, part of the Polonian kingdome, where he burnt and destroyed two hundred noblemens houses, besides an infinit number of towns and villages, made great slaughter ſlaughter of the poore countrey people, and carried away great numbers of cattell and priſoners bound in thongs made of raw hides. But whileſt they were diuiding the ſpoyle with Peter the new Vayuod of VALACHIA, who had before ſolemnely promiſed to giue the Tartars no paſſage that way, the Polonian Coſſackes, who had lien waiting for their returne vpon the riuer Boryſthenes, brake into the Tartars countrie, and there requited them with like harme, and brought backe with them a number of old captiues, who little expected that their ſo ſudden deliuerance. G

The Polonians at this time were at variance among themſulues about the election of their new king (Henry Valois their late king being the laſt yeare, after the death of Charles his brother the French king, ſecretly ſtolne from them into FRANCE, to take vpon him that kingdome: after whoſe departure ſome of the Polonian Nobilitie made choice of Maximilian the Emperour: otherſome no leſſe enclining vnto the choice of the great duke of MOSCOVIE, and ſome vnto others alſo.) Whereof Amurah vnderſtanding, and loth that either of thoſe two great princes his enemies ſhould bee inueſted or ſtrengthened with that ſo great a kingdome, and ſo neere vnto him: to hinder that their election, and to bring in another of leſſe power, and ſo leſſe dangerous vnto himſelfe, euen in the beginning of his reigne wrote vnto the Polonians to that purpoſe, commending vnto them Stephen Battor the Vayuod of TRANSYLVANIA, for their king, in manner following: H

Amurath God of the earth, Gouernour of the whole World, the meſſenger of God, and faithfull ſeruant of the Great Prophet: vnto the moſt honourable Nobilitie and Counſellors of the kingdome of POLONIA, greeting. I Amurath his letters vnto the Nobilitie of Polonia.

It is not vnto the world vnknowne (moſt honourable and mightie Senatours) our noble Progenitours to haue of long time and for manie yeares holden good friendſhip and religious leagues with the kingdome of POLONIA: For which cauſe it hath ſeemed good and reaſonable vnto vs, to put you in remembrance of this ſo auncient a league and bond of friendſhip; for that we vnderſtanding your kingdome to bee of late become deſtitute of a King, by the departure of the noble King Henry, your crowned King (deſcended of the royall race of the French kings) our friend: who for the ſmall regard you had of him (ſo great and worthie a prince) and for your diſloyaltie, is departed out of your kingdome, without purpoſe of returning any more into POLONIA. Whereupon, as it is reported vnto vs (but how truly we know not) you paſſing ouer your ſaid crowned king Henrie, are about to make choice of a new king, and eſpeciallie of Maximilian the emperour, or of the duke of MOSCOVIE, both men of running wits, and of vs greatly hated: for why, you may well know they will bee troubleſome and grieuous not vnto euerie one of you onely, but euen vnto vs alſo. Wherefore bee you ware that you bee not deceiued; and take heed leaſt your confederations and leagues cannot long by their valour and proweſſe be eſtabliſhed; and withall conſider well the great dangers and loſſes which you may thereby fall into, whereof wee haue thought good to giue you a taſt: wherefore beware that heauier things befall not your State. Wee know there are right noble and wiſe men amongſt you, which know better than they how to rule and gouerne: and if ſo bee it pleaſe you not to make choice of any of your owne nation; there is not farre from you one Stephen Battor, prince of TRANSYLVANIA, a man of great honour and valour, by whoſe labour and dexterie you may eaſily procure the peace and quiet of your Kingdome. Whereas if you ſhall doe otherwiſe, we take to witneſſe your God, and his ſeruant our Great Prophet, to deſtroy all your wealth and goods, which together with your ſelues, your wiues and children, ſhall be giuen for a prey vnto our ſouldiors; which the chiefe men of your cities of CRACOVIA and LEPERIS: which for all that we ſay not, as any thing at all doubting of your fidelitie and conſtancie towards vs. As for the reſt which it pleaſed vs by word of mouth to haue told vnto you, we haue giuen charge vnto this our embaſſadour and counſellour, vnto whom our deſire is that you ſhould giue full credence. From CONSTANTINOPLE the laſt of September in the yeare of your Prophet Mahomet 983, and firſt of our reigne. K L M

This the great Sultans commendations ſo much preuailed with the Polonians, that notwithſtanding that Maximilian the emperour was by the Archbiſhop of GNESNA and ſome others choſen king, yet was that his election by the greater part of the Nobilitie reuoked, and both

A both he and the great duke of MVSCOVIA being paſſed ouer, the noble princeſſe Anne (of the moſt honourable Iagellonian houſe) choſen queene of POLONIA, yet with this condition, That ſhe ſhould marrie Stephen the Vayuod of TRANSILVANIA, to them by Amurath commended. Who afterward elected king, all the time of his life right worthily gouerned that noble kingdome, not only defending the ſame in ſuch ſtate as he found it, but alſo notably extending the bounds thereof, enlarging it with ſuch territories as he by force of armes got from his neighbours, eſpecially the Muſcouite. Of this election Amurath would oftentimes afterwards boaſt and ſay, That he had giuen the Polonians their king. But of him and of the league by him made with Amurath, more ſhall be ſaid hereafter.

The yere following great troubles aroſe in PERSIA, wherby the flouriſhing ſtate of that moſt 1576
B mightie kingdome was ſore ſhaken, and opportunitie giuen for the Turkiſh emperor to inuade the ſame; which he laying hold vpon, entred into that bloudie war, which to the great quiet of the Chriſtian commonweale, for long time after exerciſed the forces of thoſe moſt puiſſant princes one vpon the other. For the better vnderſtanding wherof, it ſhal not be amiſſe compendiouſly to ſet downe the ſame troubles of the Perſian kingdome, the very ground of the long and mortall war between thoſe two moſt mightie Monarchs.

Old Tamas the Perſian king, ſonne to the noble Hiſmaell, who with great glorie had more than fiftie yeares worthily gouerned that large kingdome, and mightily withſtood the often inuaſions of the Turkiſh emperours, now ſpent with yeres, died the eleuenth of May in the yeare 1576, leauing behind him eleuen ſonnes, namely, Mahomet the eldeſt, of an infirmitie in his eies
C ſurnamed Codabanda, a man of a peaceable and quiet diſpoſition, more delighted with the ſweet pleaſures of a contented life than the carefull honors of ſo great a kingdome: Iſmahel the ſecond ſonne, of a more fierce and troubleſome nature, ſo much abhorring quietnes, that not regarding the league hardly concluded betwixt his aged father and the Turkiſh emperors Solyman and Selymus, hee would now and then without his fathers knowledge vpon a youthfull heat break out into the frontiers of the Turks dominions, and there make great ſpoyle; for which doing although he was both of his father and the people the more regarded, yet was he by his fathers commaundment (who in outward ſhew ſeemed to miſlike of thoſe his youthfull pranks, tending to the breach of the league) reſtrained of his libertie, and ſent to the caſtle of CAHACA, betwixt TAVRIS and CASBIN; where he remained at the time of his fathers death: Aidere the D third ſonne, no leſſe ambitious than was his brother Iſmahel, but not of like valour, kept by Zalchan, Piry Mahamet, and other his kinſfolkes, all men of great power and authoritie: The other eight were, Mamut, Solyman, Muſtapha, Emangali, Alichan, Amet, Abrahin, and Iſmahel the younger.

The eleuen ſons of Tamas the Perſia king.

The old king before his death had by his laſt will and teſtament ſolemnly appointed Iſmahel his ſecond ſonne to ſucceed him in the kingdome; as of all his ſonnes moſt fit to take vpon him ſo great a charge. Which thing Mahomet his elder brother ſeemed not much to diſlike, contenting himſelfe with ſuch honours as his father had before beſtowed vpon him.

Iſmahel appointed by his father to ſucceed him in the kingdome.

Tamas thus dead, Iſmahel was by the Sultans ſent for to CAHACA, to take vpon him his fathers kingdome at CASBIN; when in the meane time there aroſe a great tumult in the citie, yea
E euen in the kings pallace: for Aidere the third brother, who in the time of his fathers greateſt ſickneſſe had entred the chamber where he lay drawing towards his end, and in his ſight moſt preſumptuouſly ſet the royall crown vpon his head, to the manifeſting of his ambitious deſires, for which he was then worthily reproued: now after the death of his aged father, caried headlong with the ſame aſpiring humour, and ſupported by Zalchan, and other his mightie fauorits, had ſo effectually dealt with the great ladie Periaconcona, his eldeſt ſiſter, and the other Sultans counſellors of eſtate, put in truſt to ſee the will of the dead king put in execution, as that the ſucceſſion could not be any longer kept from him, and preſerued for Iſmahel, but by the helpe of ſome fine and ſecret deceit. This ladie Periaconcona (elder than all the young princes the ſonnes of Tamas, her brethren, a woman of great ſpirit and deep conceit) left in great truſt by her father,
F ſeeing the proceeding of her brother Aidere, durſt neither openly to mooue any thing vnto the Sultans, preiudicial to his deſignes; neither could ſhe in her heart indure ſo great an iniurie to be done to her brother Iſmahel, appointed by his father to ſucceed him. Wherfore in this perplexitie ſhe caſt in her wily head, how to ſatisfie her ambitious brother preſent, how to ſaue the right of Iſmahel abſent, the honour of her dead fathers will and teſtament, and the ſafetie of the kingdome.

Aidere aſpireth to the kingdome of Perſia.

dome. For hauing throughly debated the matter with the Sultans, ſhe reſolued, That Aidere in- G ueſted in royall apparell, and ſetled in the great gallerie, ſhould attend the acclamation of the people, and be there openly enthroniſed, as the very elected king. With which vaine ſhew the vnwiſe youth (blinded with ambition) ſuffered himſelfe to be led: and being ſet in his maieſtie, verely perſuaded himſelfe, that he ſhould now be honoured both of his friends and foes as king. But vnto theſe his ſo haſtie and proſperous deſignes, the ſucceſſe that ſprung from the ſubtiltie of thoſe counſellors and his diſſembling ſiſter, were nothing conformable: for that ſhee by their aduiſe tooke order for the gates of the pallace to be preſently locked, leauing at euerie paſſage a ſure guard, and onely one wicket open, ſafely warded with a companie of moſt faithful and valorous captaines and ſouldiors, wholly deuoted to Tamas and Iſmahel: with ſtreight charge, to ſuffer euerie man to enter in, ſauing onely the knowne friends of Aidere. In this ſort did ſhe H thinke to haue entertained the young man, vntill ſuch time as Iſmahel ſhould arriue from CAHACA, and ſo put in execution what he thought beſt for the honour of himſelfe and the generall quiet of the kingdome.

Who ioyeth now but Aidere? in conceit a king, repleniſhed with vnwonted ioyes, receiuing honour from all men, ſauing from his beſt friends. By meanes wherof perceiuing now the prohibition of them, and mooued alſo with the great ſtirre of Zalchan his greateſt fauourit (who diſcouered the deceit, and crying vpon king Aider, threatened the ladie, the Sultans, and the reſt that waited vpon the faigned ſucceſſion, indeed ordained but for the ſcorne and deſpight of the ambitious man) ſtrucken with an exceeding feare, and full of ſorrow, he withdrew himſelfe cloſly amongſt certaine women of the court, hoping ſo to find ſome way to eſcape with life. I

In the meane time ſo greatly encreaſed the cries and threatnings of the friends and fauourites of Aidere (who now had all of them prepared themſelues for ſome dangerous and pernitious attempt (that the counſellors with conſent of the lady his ſiſter, were inforced to take order, That to bereaue this tumultuous & ſeditious people of al their hope and courage, Aidere ſhould be depriued of his life. Whereupon Sahamal the Georgian, vncle to Aidere by the mothers ſide, by the appointment of the lady Periaconcona and the Sultans, after long ſearch made for him, at laſt found him hidden amongſt the women, and without further delay taking him by the locks, ſtrucke his head from his ſhoulders; and in the place where Zalchan and the reſt of his vnfortunat fauourites ſtood crying and threatning, amongſt the thickeſt preaſe of the proud conſpirators flung the head all bloudy, and as it were yet breathing for heat, crying aloud vnto them: Behold there your king, enioy him at your pleaſure. At which ſudden and horrible ſpectacle euery man K burned in rage and anger: neither for the preſent wanted there many a raſh head, that vainely threatned moſt cruell reuenge. But in the end, when they perceiued the neere ſucceſſion of Iſmahel ineuitable, and the death of Aidere irreuocable, euery man betooke himſelfe to his owne priuate affaires, and ſo at laſt diuided themſelues one from another, and ſo departing from the palace, ſcattered themſelues ſome one way, ſome another, euery man as hee thought beſt for his owne ſafetie.

Aider ſlain, and his head caſt amongſt his ſeruitis.

Iſmahel ſaluted king.

Shortly after Iſmahel the deſired king arriued at CASBIN, where he was of his ſiſter and the Sultans ioyfully receiued, as their lawfull and vndoubted ſoueraign, & with the great acclamation of the people ſaluted king: who as ſoone as he ſaw himſelfe poſſeſſed of the royall ſeat, and L his power now anſwerable to his deſires, hee (after the manner of the Turkiſh policie) moſt vnnaturally cauſed the heads of his eight yonger brethren to be ſtricken off: and withall vſed ſuch further diligence, that not onely all thoſe which were neere vnto them in blood or affinitie, were bereaued of their liues, but alſo all the fauourits of his late ſlaine brother Aidere, were deſtroyed in that publike ſlaughter: ſo that all the ſtreets of CASBIN were defiled with bloud, and all the citie reſounded with mourning and complaints. Which vnexpected crueltie, altogether vnworthie ſo worthie a thought king, ſo altered the minds of his ſubiects in generall, that all their former hopes were now conuerted into new feares, and their ioy into mourning. But much greater and farre more lamentable did the miſeries grow, as ſoone as it was giuen out, That hee would M change the religion of the Perſians (who with great deuotion honor their fooliſh prophet Aly) into the ſuperſtition of the Turks (who with no leſſe impiety obſerue and maintaine the wicked rites of Ebubekir, Haumer, Oſman, and others, by them ſuppoſed to bee the moſt true ſucceſſours of their great Prophet Mahomet.) For by meanes of this vncouth noueltie and vnexpected change, & by force of an edict concerning that matter, publiſhed by this new king, many of his

A prophane prieſts,many of the gouernours of his friendly and ſubiect cities (too much deuoted to their former ſuperſtition)were driuen ſome into exile,ſome clapt into priſon,ſome had their eyes pluckt out(among whom was the Caliph of CASBIN)and not a few others in ſundry ſorts depriued of their liues. Yea many ladies(ioyned in blood with Iſmahel himſelfe, and diuers others of his kinsfolks,to whom neither ſex,nor age,nor innocency could be a ſufficient defence) endured ſundry torments and ſtrange calamities: ſo that in PERSIA was neuer felt greater troubles,or a more dangerous change.

In this ſo great an innouation,and among theſe tumults,there went abroad withall a generall rumour,not in the cities of PERSIA onely,but in the regions of the Turks alſo, euen as farre as CONSTANTINOPLE,That Iſmahel with a puiſſant army of ſuch as fauored this new pro-
B claimed vanitie,was determined in perſon himſelfe to go to BABYLON, now called BAGDAT, there to receiue the crowne of the empire,at the hands of him that he ſhould find to be the ſucceſſour of their great Caliph,and in the chiefeſt place among their vncleane prieſtes: as had ſometime Solyman the great emperour of the Turks,and the Perſian kings of ancient times. In this world of troubles,when as the feare of farther miſeries increaſed, rather than any hope of ancient quietneſſe; he was when he leaſt feared,by the helpe of the aforenamed lady Periaconcona ſuddenly bereft of his life: but whether ouertaken in ſome of his own amorous practiſes,or poyſoned by his ſaid ſiſter; or that ſhe (as ſome probably affirme) hauing ſecretly conſpired with Calil Chan, Emir Chan, Pyry Mahamet, Curchi Baſſi (being all at that time men of great account, and as it
C were preſidents of the kingdom) who diſguiſed in womens apparell & brought in by her,ſtrangled him at ſuch time as he had priuatly withdrawne himſelfe amongſt his paramours, is vncertaine. Howſoeuer it was,ſufficeth it, that hee by the helpe of the ſaid ladie Periaconcona, was by vnnaturall death taken out of this world the foure and twentieth day of Nouember,in the yeare of grace 1577;to the exceeding ioy of all thoſe nations, who by his death thought themſelues now freed of many great and dangerous troubles: when he had raigned one yeare, ſeauen moneths,and ſixe dayes. 1577

Iſmahel thus taken out of the way,the lady began foorthwith to perſuade with the great Sultans(the miniſters of Iſmahels death)that as they had for the generall good of PERSIA contriued the death of the late king: ſo now that they would take vpon them the protection of that
D great kingdome,with the preſeruation of the maieſtie and libertie thereof, vntill ſuch time as it were known who ſhould worthily ſucceed in that crowne,which now remained in their hands. There was at that time many of the greateſt princes and gouernors of that kingdome aſſembled at CASBIN, there gaping after ſuch mutations of thoſe troubleſome times,as might beſt ſerue their priuat deſignes. Emir Chan burning in ambitious deſires,was in hope by means of a match to be made with a ſiſter of Periaconcona(who was already greatly enclining vnto him)to bee exalted to the ſoueraignetie of all PERSIA. Mirize Salmas the chiefe Sultan,hoped on the other ſide to aduance into the eſtate, either Mahamet Codabanda the eldeſt brother of the dead king, or elſe Hamze the eldeſt ſonne of the ſaid Mahamet; and by beſtowing vpon him his daughter in marriage (as afterwards hee did)ſo to encreaſe the grorie of his houſe. Others there were, that
E thought they ſhould be able to draw Abas Mirize (the middlemoſt ſonne of Mahamet) out of HERI, and to make him king. Neither wanted the infant Tamas his aſpiring friends,whoſe tutour waited likewiſe for ſome opportunitie to ſettle him in the kingdome, and ſo by meanes of his greatneſſe,to make himſelfe greateſt amongſt his fellowes. A number of others there were that ſecretly waited vpon euery occaſion that time ſhould preſent for their preferment. Howbeit in this ſo great variety of thoughts,the Sultans anſwered the ladie with one conſent,and promiſed her in moſt liberall tearmes,all the protection that their forces could affoord, or their weapons procure: and yet did euery one of them,both in action and word,clearkly diſſemble their ſeuerall imaginations,wherunto their minds were as prone and ready, as their hearts were cunning cloſely to conceale them.

F Amurath the Turkiſh emperour now wakened, firſt at the death of the old renowmed Tamas, and then at the rumour of the deſire Iſmahel had to paſſe with an armie to BABYLON, as alſo at the freſh report of the Turkiſh ſuperſtition newly publiſhed in PERSIA; and withall throughly inſtructed what harme this late king had done in PERSIA, what diſſentions hee had raiſed,and how hardly the prouinces of that empire had endured thoſe calamities: began forthwith to thinke hereby a faire occaſion to bee miniſtred vnto him, to take vp armes againſt the Perſians;

Amurath attentiue to the ſtate of Perſia.

Perſians, and matter ſufficient ſuggeſted for him to put in execution the great deſire he had of G ſome new conqueſt. For it is an ancient cuſtom, which is grown to be as it were a law amongſt the Otheman kings, That they may not challenge their due honours in their life time, nor their prowd monuments after their death, vnleſſe they attempt ſome great and ambitious actions and enterpriſes, and performe ſome exploit conformable to their maieſty. Amurath therfore bent vpon theſe great ſtirs in PERSIA, would not direct his mind any other way, or take any other war in hand, vntill he might firſt ſee what iſſue theſe marueilous innouations in PERSIA would bring forth: which in the perſon of Mahamet the ſucceeding king, ſeemed to be more pregnant than euer before, and miniſtred vnto Amurath new occaſions of victorious and ſtrange hopes.
For as ſoone as Iſmahel was dead, the aforenamed Mirize Salmas (in dignitie chiefe man among the Sultans, though in bloud and nobilitie inferiour to them all) after many letters diſpatched to H and fro, at laſt aſſured Mahamet Codabanda, how with all quietneſſe of mind, and ſecurity of per-ſon, he might come and poſſeſſe himſelfe of the kingdome. He was alſo aduertiſed by the ſaid Salmas, of the whole conſpiracie plotted againſt his brother to bring him to his end: and like-wiſe made acquainted, how the fraudulent lady (with the Sultans) had capitally conſulted againſt himſelfe; and how ſhe fauouring Emir Chan, and Abas Mirize of HERI (her nephew and his ſonne) more than became her, did little regard the due and rightfull ſucceſſion of him being the eldeſt brother. So Mahamet bearing himſelfe vpon the faith and diligence of Mirize Salmas, and deſiring withal to ſee his eldeſt ſonne Hamze Mirize aduanced to ſome ſuch ſoueraign dignitie, as he ſaw was due to the liuely hope euery man perceiued to be in him, in regard of his vertue and prudence for managing the common-wealth, and matters of war (wherein alſo he I ſhewed himſelfe vnto his father jealous and ſuſpitious, leſt ſome other man ſhould vſurpe vpon him, that honour and authoritie which ſo properly appertained vnto him) reſolued in the end not to leaue the kingdome in the hands of priuate perſons, nor the lightneſſe of an vnconſtant woman of ſuſpected modeſtie, and a rebellious conſpiratour againſt her owne blood, wherwith ſhe had without any pitie or remorſe of conſcience, now twiſe defiled her ſelfe. And therefore he wrote backe againe, That he was minded to take the rightfull ſucceſſion vpon him, and that for the ſame purpoſe he was putting himſelfe vpon his iourney: with ſtraight charge notwithſtanding, that Mirize Salmas ſhould before his entrance within the gates of CASBIN, preſent him with the miſchieuous head of Periaconcona; a woman (in reſpect of the ſcorne exerciſed againſt her brother Aidere, and of the treacherous death of her other brother Iſmahel, and of K the peruerſe imaginations which ſhee had conceiued to cauſe the ſucceſſion to fall into other mens hands, and of the prodigall familiarity which ſhe had with ſome of the Sultans) well worthy of a thouſand deaths. Secretly did Mirize Salmas put in execution what ſoeuer Mahamet had priuatly enioyned him, ſo that by his means he was preſently and ſolemly proclaimed king of PERSIA. And afterwards hauing gathered together many ſquadrons of men, wholly deuo-ted to the bloud and name of Mahamet, the ſame Mirize Salmas met him on the way, carrying the head of that manlike Virago Periaconcona vpon the poynt of a launce, with her haire diſper-ſed, and ſome other vncouth ſights to the terrour of the beholders. From which nouelties (one miſchiefe as it were hudling vpon the necke of another) there ſprung vp diuers inward hatreds, ſundry tumultuous ſeditions, and much ciuile warres: this new king by the inſtigation of Mi- L rize Salmas, ſeeking on the one ſide to be reuenged on the Sultans for his brothers death, and they on the other ſide oppoſing themſelues with all their power againſt him, the ſtate of PERSIA began to fall into great inconueniences, and of theſe nouelties to reape new loſſes. Sahamal the Georgian fled into his mountaine of BRVS, fearing the wrath of this new lord: Leuent ogli like-wiſe an other of the lords of GEORGIA, vnderſtanding of the flight of Sahamal his neighbour, eſtranged himſelfe ſo farre from his old loue and auncient deuotion towards the Perſian kings, that he ſeemed now to deſire ſome new innouation. The nations alſo that were neighbors to the Turkes, and the people of MEDIA ANTROPATIA, now called SIRVAN, diſliked of this new king; and in the end it appeared, that PERSIA vnder this king through many mutations, was in ſhort time fallen into moſt notable miſerie, and the ſtate thereof more weakened than it had beene of M long time before.

Mahamet reſol-ueth to take vpon him the kingdome of Perſia.

Mahamet pro-elamed king of Perſia.

The head of Periaconcona preſented to Mahomet on a launce

Of all theſe things had Amurath from diuers places intelligence, but more particularly from Vſtreff of VAN, a citie of ARMENIA the greater, ſituate vpon the lake Actamar, who ſent him moſt perfect information of all the ſtirs in PERSIA: Diſcourſing vnto him of the death of Iſ- mahel,

A mahel, the conſultations of the Sultans, the trecheries and death of Periaconcena, the broiles betweene the king & the Sultans, the nature of the new king (being diſeaſed in his eyes, little eſteemed of his ſubiects, beſotted in affection towards his ſonnes) the facilitie to ouerrule the chiefe Gouernors of the Georgians, and the people of SERVAN, euill affected towards the new king: and to bee briefe, whatſoeuer had in truth ſucceeded in PERSIA, and might enflame the mind of the ambitious Sultan, to conuert his forces againſt an enemie of ſmall counſell, and much confuſion: adding thereunto, that neuer was there greater opportunitie to ouercome that king than now was offered; and therefore wiſhed him, not in any caſe to let ſlip ſo faire an occaſion, as the Othoman kings had neuer before, for the obtaining of ſo certaine and glorious victories.

B Amurath of long time wholly bent to marke the euent of the troubles in PERSIA, now ſtirred vp with theſe aduertiſements from Vſtref, ſetled himſelfe more deeply in his former conceits to proue his forces in ſubduing the Perſian king, the auncient enemie of the Othoman emperors, and his onely corriuall and odious competitour in the Eaſt. But no one thing did more enflame him thereunto, than to thinke, how hee ſhould haue to his enemie a king not acquainted with deeds of armes, doting vpon his children, and weakned with the diſſention of his ſubiects: and on the other ſide entring into the conſideration of his owne forces, of the infinit number of his men, both horſe and foot, of the meanes he had to find money, of his artillerie and engines of warre, wherein he farre ſurpaſſed the Perſians; he did more and more reſolue with himſelfe, to take the occaſion that was now offered him to begin the warre. For the compaſſing of which
C his purpoſe he was greatly fauoured by the preſent ſtate of Chriſtendome, at that time being wholly in league and amitie with him. So not finding any thing contrarie to his deſignements, he reſolued at laſt to confer with the chiefe Baſſaes, which had the gouernment of his empire, Whether it were better vpon this occaſion to begin the prepenſed warre; or if they thought not this opportunity to be ſo fit, then to lay it aſide, and to conuert his forces and counſel againſt the commonwealth of Chriſtendome. For ſuch is the barbarous pollicie whereby this empire is mannaged, That it is lawfull for them to breake any league, be it by neuer ſo many promiſes or ſolemne oaths confirmed, whenſoeuer any enterpriſe is to be attempted for the aduauncing thereof. So that although this warre could not be moued either againſt the Perſians or Chriſtians, without breach of their promiſed faith: yet among the manifold conſultations that paſſed a-D mong the great Baſſaes, there was not any man found that made any account of that defect, but all with one accord, without further reſpect ſought to ſet forward the ambitious deſire of their proud lord and maſter. At laſt after long conſultation & large diſcourſes it was agreed vpon by the great Baſſaes Mahomet, Sinan, and Muſtapha, That it would be better and leſſe danger to attempt warre againſt the Perſians, than againſt the Chriſtian princes. Muſtapha among the reſt preferring the valour of the Latines (whereof he had made good triall eſpecially at FAMAGVSTA) before the armies and forces of the Georgians and Perſians. Wherby it is apparant to the world, that neither the zeale of their religion, nor any iniurie receiued from the Perſian king, but only the ambitious deſire of Amurath (to ſubdue a kingdome, both in his owne conceit and other mens relations, euill gouerned, by an effeminat and ſottiſh king, and through ciuile diſſention E brought into great danger) was the firſt prouocation of making this war.

No aſſurance in the Turkes league.

Ambition the cauſe of the Perſian war.

Vpon this reſolution there aroſe new conſultations touching the manner thereof, and vpon what coaſt they ſhould begin their iourney, for the more honourable ſucceſſe thereof. Which point Amurath greatly vrged, proteſting before his chiefe counſellours, That he would not enter into that war, except he were in great hope to beare away the victorie. Some thought it moſt conuenient to ſend the armie to BABYLON, and from thence to SYRAS, called in old time PERSEPOLIS, the chiefe citie of the countrie of PERSIA: others there were that gaue aduiſe, That the armie ſhould be directly ſent to TAVRIS, there to erect ſtrong fortreſſes, and to take poſſeſſion of all the countrie round about it: & there wanted not ſome (as it is reported) that thought it better to ſend two ſeuerall armies for both the forenamed places; and ſo by bringing the ene-
F mie into a ſtraight, to enforce him to yeeld to whatſoeuer ſhould be of him required. But Amurath durſt not repoſe ſuch confidence in his forces, as to thinke, that with his battels diuided and ſo weakened he ſhould be able to conquer that enemie, who had alwaies moſt valiantly fought againſt the monſtrous and puiſſant armies of his anceſtours. And therefore firmely reſolued with himſelfe, to ſend one onely armie, and ſo with his vnited forces to ſeeke the ouerthrow of the enemie. And ſo preferring the ſtrong hope he had conceiued to conquer the countrie of SIRVAN, and the chiefe cities of MEDIA the great, before the difficultie of making war vpon the coaſt of SCYRAS, repoſing alſo great hope in the notable helpe that was promiſed him by the Tartars called Præcopenſes, he confirmed the great Baſſaes his counſellours in the ſame opinion: and withal diſcouered vnto them a matter, which to all of them, but eſpecially to Sinan, ſeemed moſt ſtrange; namely, that he was determined not to go himſelfe in perſon with his armie, but to ſend one of his worthieſt captaines in his ſtead. The cauſes why he ſo did, were many, but eſpecially, for that he was troubled with the falling ſickneſſe, and feared greatly (and that not without good cauſe) leaſt his ſonne Mahomet (being much fauoured of the people) might peraduenture in his abſence be vntimely aduanced to the empire; beſide the dangers that he ſuſpected at the hands of the Chriſtian potentates: and withall perſuaded it to be vnto himſelfe a great honour to performe thoſe things by his ſeruants, which had in thoſe countries bin vnfortunatly attempted by his moſt noble predeceſſors in their owne perſons. G H

While they were thus conſulting about the expedition, and the great Baſſaes, Sinan, Muſtapha, and others, made means to be ſent as the ſoueraigne miniſters of their lords deſignement; he diſpatched away ſundrie poſts and light horſemen with order to the Baſſaes and Gouernors of VAN, BABILON, and ERZIRVM, in the frontires of his dominions, That they ſhould by often inrodes ſpoyle the townes and caſtles of the Perſians, and by all meanes to doe them what harme they could. Which they were not ſlacke to put in execution, and eſpecially Vſtref (or rather Huſreue) Baſſa of VAN: who with often incurſions did much miſchiefe, as well in the countries tributarie, as ſubiect to the Perſian king. A forcible preparatiue for greater troubles to enſue. I

Vſtref Baſſa beginneth the wars in Perſia.

Now in theſe great preparations for the Perſian warre (which for many yeares after notably exerciſed the greateſt part of Turks forces, to the great quiet of the Chriſtian commonweale) Stephen Bathor the late Vayuod of TRANSILVANIA, but now by the commendation of Amurath become king of POLONIA in the beginning of his raigne by his embaſſadors the great lord Iohn of SYENNA, entered into a ſtrong league and confederation with the great Turkiſh Sultan Amurath at CONSTANTINOPLE. Which for that it ſheweth in what tearmes that famous kingdome then and yet ſtandeth with the Turks great empire, and withall contayneth matter well worth the Chriſtian conſideration, it ſhall not be impertinent to our purpoſe (omitting the long and glorious ſtile of that barbarous Monarch, ſeruing to no other end but to ſhew the greatneſſe of his power) plainely to ſet it downe as it was on his part at the ſame time by him confirmed. K

The League betwixt the moſt puiſſant and mightie Princes, Sultan Amurath the Turkiſh emperour, and Stephen king of POLONIA, agreed vpon and concluded at CONSTANTINOPLE, in the yeare of our Sauiour Chriſt Ieſu 1577, and of the Prophet Mahomet 985.

A for the diſpatch of his letters to our moſt glorious court, for the new confirming of the moſt ſacred league and confederation with vs, ſending the honourable lord Iohn of Syenna (his moſt faithfull counſellour) his embaſſadour to our imperiall court; declaring his loue and integritie, and purging himſelfe of all the ſuſpition of hoſtilitie, hath requeſted the league and confederation to be renewed. At whoſe inſtance wee haue giuen theſe our letters confirming the ſaid leagne of peace and confederation: wherein wee commaund, that none of our Counſellors, Beglerbegs, Sanzacks, Generals of our armies, Captaines or ſeruants, ſhall doe, or on my behalfe preſume to doe any hurt vnto the kingdome, countries, cities, caſtles, townes, iſlands, or whatſoeuer elſe to the kingdome of Polonia belonging. And in like manner, that none of the Nobilitie, Generals, Captaines, or others whoſoeuer belonging vnto the king of Polonia, ſhall dare to doe any harme vnto my kingdomes, cities, caſtles, or townes con-
B fining vnto the kingdome of Polonia. In briefe my will is, that hee being a mortall enemie vnto mine enemies, and a faſt friend vnto my friends, ſhall doe no grieuance or harme vnto any my ſubiects, or things whatſoeuer vnto my iuriſdiction belonging. So in like manner commanding alſo, that no hurt by any meanes, or for any occaſion be done by our people vnto the ſubiects, or whatſoeuer elſe vnto the iuriſdiction of the king of Polonia appertaining.

The creatures, embaſſadours, meſſengers, and men of whatſoeuer condition elſe, ſhall on both ſides freely without let or trouble come and goe without any harme receiuing, either in their perſons or goods.

It ſhall be lawfull alſo for the king of Polonia his ſubiects, to ſeeke throughout our empire for any the Polonian captiues taken before the time of this league; and the ſame ſo found (if they haue not C receiued the Turkiſh religion, but ſtill remaine Chriſtians) to redeeme, without the contradiction of any man.

And that whatſoeuer ſhall be taken and carried away after the confirmation of this league, ſhall be all againe freely and without any thing paying, deliuered and reſtored.

That the merchants on both parts may freely traffique with all kind of merchandiſe in the blacke and white ſea, as alſo vpon the maine; and ſo paying their vſuall and lawfull cuſtome, to be in nothing wronged or moleſted.

If any of the Polonian merchants ſhall die in our dominion, the goods of him ſo dead ſhall not be embeſeled, but kept in ſafetie vntill his brethren or other his friends ſhall come with the king of Polonia his letters: vpon the ſhewing whereof, hauing alſo our letters mandatorie, the goods ſhall be forth-
D with reſtored vnto the dead mans heires. In which ſort alſo my merchants ſhall be dealt withall, if any of them ſhall chance to die in the kingdome of Polonia.

If any wrong be done within the limits of mine empire, vnto any belonging vnto the kingdome of Polonia, after the date of theſe letters confirming the league; the doer of the wrong ſhall by my commaundement be ſought out, and being found ſhall be puniſhed, and the wrong done, without any delay or contradiction forthwith recompenced. And the like Iuſtice to be alſo on the behalfe of the king of Polonia adminiſtred.

If any debtor ſhall depart out of mine empire into the Polonian territorie, whereſoeuer he ſhall chance to be found by his creditor, he ſhall be brought to the Iudge of that place to be examined, and whatſoeuer it ſhall be proued him of right to owe, the Iudge of that place ſhall according to the equitie of the cauſe,
E make the creditor to be ſatisfied.

But if the debtor cannot himſelfe perſonally be found, no other man ſhall by reaſon of an other mans debt be taken, detained, or moleſted: neither ſhall the innocent be troubled for the guiltie, in either or both our kingdomes.

In briefe, vpon whatſoeuer conditions and capitulations the league of peace and confederation was in the time of my father, my grandfather, or great grandfather of famous memorie, made with the kings of Polonia, vpon the ſame conditions and capitulations be it now made alſo.

Whatſoeuer hurt hath hitherto been done to either part by reaſon of the diſagreement of the Gouernors and captaines, ſhall all be on both parties neglected and forgotten.

Alſo after the time of theſe letters confirming the league and confederation, Whereas the king of F Polonia ſhall in time pay a certaine ſumme of money vſed to be paied vnto the Tartars; the Tartar Chan and his ſonne Mirzeleby their princes, ſhall reſtore the ſame againe, and not to dare to ſuffer his armies by any meanes to hurt the Polonian territories. So that on the part of the Tartars and their armies, no harme ſhall be done vnto the kingdome of Polonia: neither on the part of the Polonians to the territories of the Tartars. And if any harme ſhall by the Tartars be done in the king of POLONIA his territories, it shall by my commaundement be againe restored. And so likewise on the part of the Palatine of MOLDAVIA, or the inhabitants of the kingdome of MOLDAVIA, no harme shall be done vnto the countries subiect vnto the king of POLONIA: but if any be done and certainly knowne, to be by my commaundement againe recompenced. G

On the part also of the king of POLONIA and his subiects, whatsoeuer harme shall be done vnto the territorie or subiects of the Moldauian Palatine, or Tartars; the harme so done to be recompenced, and the doers thereof punished.

Also that all such fugitiues as hauing done any notorious felonies or other villanies in MOLDAVIA, and so are fled into POLONIA, shall at my request, or at the request of the Palatine of MOLDAVIA, be restored, and in no case denied.

That all the Polonian captiues within my dominions, yet professing the Christian religion, may by the king of POLONIA his subiects be redeemed, not paying any more for them than their lords and masters paid: euerie such master of the slaue taking his oath that he cost him so much. But such captiues as haue receiued the Turkish faith, to be forthwith set at libertie: and so the Turkes slaues in the kingdome of POLONIA to be likewise manumised. H

That our embassadours on both sides (so long as we are in league and amitie) may freely come and go, and not be staied in any place; and being willing to meet together, may at their pleasure so doe. And being entred into the confines of either part, to be forthwith by some good and faithfull guide appointed vnto them, conducted vnto the place they are to goe vnto. And this to be on both sides kept.

No man to dare to hurt, or slay any Merchant, hauing paied his thirtith part, or lawfull custome.

If any of our subiects shall haue any suit with any of the king of POLONIA his subiects, the Iudges shall without delay be bound to administer iustice. All theeues and robbers shall be diligently sought out; and being found, to be seuerely punished: and the goods taken away, without impeachment to be restored vnto the right owners, their heires, or to the king. I

The Sanzacks of SILISTRIA and BOLOGRAVE, the Customers and water-baylifs shall not suffer any man but Merchants and such as are sent in our seruice, to passe ouer the riuer Nyester; who passing ouer, if they shall bring with them any slaue or bondman out of POLONIA, hee shall be sent back againe. The shepheards, if they will transport their sheepe into the iurisdiction of the king of POLONIA, shall not so doe without the leaue of the Polonian Gouernours, before whom they shall also number their sheepe: of whom if any shall be lost, the Gouernours shall cause them to be sought for, and to be restored vnto the shepheards, as also to pay for their hey. K

The Zauzij, Ianizaries, or Posts, shall not dare in time of peace or war, to take any horses from the Polonian merchants, or other the kings subiects comming into our kingdome.

The Palatines of MOLDAVIA, in whatsoeuer condition they haue been towards the former kings of POLONIA, they shall now also still so be hereafter. The thirtiths and customes of both parts, shall continue in their old manner, and not be increased. The Polonian kings subiects and merchants, as well Armenians as of any other nation, whensoeuer they shall enter into MOLDAVIA, or any other part of our empire, shall not trauell by vncertaine and vnknowne, but by the common and high waies: wherein if they shall suffer any losse or harme, either in their goods or persons, the doers of such wrongs shall be sought for, and seuerely punished. Which merchants shall be suffered without any molestation quietly to come and goe, hauing paied their thirtiths: and no merchant to be troubled for anothers debt. L

If any the Polonian kings merchants or subiects, be willing for readie money to redeeme and carrie away any slaues taken out of the Polonian kingdome, and yet professing the Christian religion; the Iudges shall in no case withstand them, neither presume to take them from them, or againe to redeeme them. But if any of such slaues haue receiued the Turkish religion, they shall not be againe demanded by the king of POLONIA.

Such slaues as haue not receiued the Turkish religion, if after a certaine space they shall be set at libertie by their masters, and in the letters testimoniall of their libertie, it shall be declared that they haue receiued the Turkish religion; yet shall they not by the Iudges be therefore detained.

In the citie of BVRVSA, the Polonian merchants hauing paied their vsuall thirtiths, shall not be farther pressed with any other vnusuall payment. M

My will is also, that the territories at this present in the possession of the king of POLONIA, as hereafter to be by him taken from the Muscouite or any other the Christian princes, to be comprised within this league, and so to be royally by him possessed.

And

A And for the confirmation of the articles and conditions in these our letters of confederation contained. I sweare by the power of the most mightie God, and of his most holie prophet, and by the most cleane and pure spirits of all the prophets; that for all the daies of my life, and so long as nothing shall on the behalfe of the king of POLONIA be done contrarie to the peace and league, nothing shall also on my part be done contrarie vnto the same. Witnesse the Almightie, the vpright iudge and discerner of mens actions. From CONSTANTINOPLE the yeare of the holie prophet Mahomet 985, the 14 of the moneth Cziemassi Eumel, and of Christ 1577.

This league betwixt these two mightie princes Amurath and king Stephen thus concluded, and after the death of Stephen by Sigismond the third (which now raigneth) renewed; as it hath
B beene euer since vnto the Polonian kingdome for the time commodious, so hath it as with an Adamantine band so bound that most famous kingdome, as that in the hardest distresses of the Christian common-weale, and most in deed concerning it selfe, it hath affoorded no more helpe than hath the members farther off, which is (I rue to say it) none at all. As in these late and present warres betwixt the Christian emperour and the two last Turkish Sultans, it is too plainly to be seene: wherein had it in due time giuen but such reasonable helpes as it might well haue spared, much nō doubt might haue bin done for the repressing of the common enemie, and the recouerie of the greatest part of that is lost of HVNGARIE: But thus bound, standeth as a dead member, seruing to no vse more than to the more speedie destruction of it selfe, togither with the rest of the sicke bodie. For what assurance it can haue in this long (I must needs say) but euill as-
C sured peace, is well to be seene in that in the great consultation of this great Sultan Amurath with his Bassaes after the Persian war, for the inuading of Christendome; the Polonians for all this league so solemnely constrained, were nothing the more regarded, but laied in the same ballance with the left, and preserued only by the Prouidence that all gouerneth: which leading the Turke against the Christian emperour their neighbour, hath giuen them that peace they were otherwise hardly to haue looked for. Vnto whom for all that, hauing to his endlesse praise maintained a long and most chargeable war, they haue not lent any great helpe or friendly hand; yet lying themselues still in the lyons mouth, and like ynough to be the next (God grant I be therein deceiued) that is to be of him deuoured.

But leauing these the heauie conceits of a melancholy mind, and ominous forbodings of that
D I wish not, to returne againe toward PERSIA, Amurath his greatest care. Amongst many the ambitious competitours for the mannaging of these Turkish so great designes, was the great Bassa Mustapha (euen he, who in the raigne of the late emperour Selymus conquered CYPRVS, carrying thence togither with his victorie perpetual infamie, for his faithlesse and cruell dealing with Bragadine the worthie and renowmed Gouernour of FAMAGVSTA) appointed Generall of the Turkes armie into PERSIA: and authoritie giuen him, to prouide whatsoeuer he should thinke needfull for so great a warre. And commaundment giuen vnto the Bassaes, and other commanders of the greatest part of the Turkish empire Eastward, that they should themselues with their souldiors of all sorts, bound by their perpetuall annuities to go to the warre, in the beginning of the Spring this yeare 1578, repaire to ERZIRVM, a citie of CAPADOCIA bor-E dering vpon ARMENIA, there to attend the commaund of their new Generall. Who hauing his dispatch from CONSTANTINOPLE, and for fashion sake conducted by most of the court ouer the strait to SCVTARI, and from thence passing through the countries of AMASIA and SIVAS, in the verie beginning of Sommer arriued at ERZIRVM; and there staied vntill such time as his people, victuals, artillerie, & other his necessiarie prouision was come thither. From whence he departed for SERVAN, hauing first taken a diligent surueigh of his whole armie, mustering the souldiors of euery nation by themselues: namely, of the Mesopotamians twelue thousand, of the Assyrians and Babylonians fourteene thousand, of the Syrians two thousand, of them of the lesser ASIA (now comprehended vnder the name of NATOLIA) ten thousand, of the Iewes and Philistims one thousand, and of the Cilicians foure thousand. After whom followed the sol-
F diors of GRÆCIA, the glorie and hope of all the campe, valiant men to the number of ten thousand: and after them the familiar and faithfull guard of the Generall, ten thousand Ianizaries of CONSTANTINOPLE with harquebusiers on their shoulders, and scimitars by their sides: of the citie also of ERZIRVM, and the iurisdiction thereof, appeared foure thousand vnder the ensigne of Beyran Bassa their Generall. All these were stipendaries to the Turkish emperor: vnto whom other voluntarie aduenturers ioyned themſelues, in number not inferiour to the reſt, but better furniſhed, and of greater courage. So that in this generall furuey of the armie were found about an hundred and ten thouſand men, moſt part horſemen: yet was there not any ſtirred out of ARABIA, ÆGIPT, AFRICA, or HVNGARIE, or other places alongſt the ſea coaſts: neither were the prouinces from whence theſe ſouldiors were drawne, left deſtitute or vnfurniſhed of their ordinarie garriſons. Beſides this multitude of men, Muſtapha brought with him fiue hundred ſmall pieces of artillerie, with many loads of mony for his ſoldiors pay, with further order for the taking vp of more at ALEPPO, and other places, if his occaſions ſhould ſo require. He cauſed alſo great quantitie of corne to be tranſported by the Great ſea called in auncient time Pontus Euxinus, to TRAPEZONDE, ſo to be conueyed to ERZIRVM; being but foure daies iourney diſtant thence. To be ſhort, hauing taken order for all things he thought neceſſarie for the warre, he in ſeemely array departed from ERZIRVM, and in eight daies arriued at the ruines of CHARS, and in the fruitfull countrie thereabout reſted himſelfe: but was there ſurpriſed with ſuch a violent tempeſt of wind and raine, as rent in ſunder his tents, and did great harme, by means whereof many fell ſicke and were conſtrained to forſake the armie.

Muſtapha at Chars.

Hauing ſtayed three daies at CHARS, the bounder of the Turkiſh and Perſian empires, he departed thence with his armie, and that euening lodged vnder the mountaines of CHEILDER, ſuppoſed to be part of the hils PERIARDO: where hearing the Perſians to be in armes, he thought it beſt for the ſecuritie of his armie, ſo to pitch his tents as that he might well diſcouer the comming of the enemie, and not to be aſſaulted at vnawares. And therefore planting himſelfe in the plaine, he gaue order that Beyran, Baſſa of ERZIRVM, ſhould take poſſeſſion of a certaine hill on the right hand; and Deruis the Baſſa of CARAEMIT ſhould keepe another hill that ſtood on the left hand; and with them Oſman Baſſa, Mahamet Baſſa, Muſtaffade Baſſa, aduenturers, with many others as well ſtipendarie as voluntarie men, ſhould likewiſe pitch their tents vpon the ſame hils, in ſuch ſort, as that they making as it were two wings to the campe, might diſcouer the comming of euery man; and yet he himſelfe being ſhaddowed with the two hils, might lie vnperceiued of any.

Mahamet the new king of PERSIA, as yet ſcarcely ſetled in his kingdome, ſtirred vp by the fame of theſe motions, reſolued in himſelfe to ſtand vpon the defence of his ſtate, and for a time to diſſemble the conceiued hatred which he bare to ſome of the Sultans of PERSIA, and princes of GEORGIA, and to make ſome apparant ſhew that he was reconciled to them; for that without them he could not promiſe vnto himſelfe any forme of an armie, or defence: wherein (notwithſtanding all the troubled ſtate of his kingdome) he wrought ſo cunningly, that almoſt all the great men of account tooke vpon them the protection of his ſtate and kindome. And ſo Tocomac a Sultan, the Chan and Gouernour of REIVAN, a famous man, well knowne vnto the Turkes, and of great reputation amongſt the Perſians, was choſen Generall of this expedition; with charge, That gathering togither the greateſt number of men he could out of ATROPATIA, out of MEDIA the greater, and other places neere vnto the Turks, he ſhould by all meanes poſſible ſtop their paſſage into GEORGIA and MEDIA ATROPATIA. And thereupon precepts were ſent out into all parts of the kingdome, That all the Chans, Sultans, and ſouldiours whatſoeuer ſhould come readie preſt to attend vpon their new Generall. Many obedient to the kings proclamation came, but many there were that would not ſtirre a foot, for their obſtinacie in the broiles begun, and for the ſuſpition they had of vnlooked for miſchiefes: at whoſe diſobedience the king much grieued; but now there was no remedie but to make the beſt of the matter, and for the ſafegard of his honour to make the beſt reſiſtance they could. So with thoſe few which for the loue of their prince and countrie were met togither in thoſe parts, being in number not aboue twentie thouſand, Tocomac was diſpatched about his buſineſſe, if happily he might with theſe ſmall forces oppreſſe the enemy in ſome ſtraight & trobleſome paſſage, where the great multitude ſhould rather ſerue to the confuſion of themſelues, than to the helpe of one another. Theſe twentie thouſand were all horſemen, armed with ſcimitar and bow, with ſome harquebuſies among, and furniſhed with very fine and well tempered armour; but aboue all couragious they were and reſolute, and well the more for the valour and proweſſe of their Generall. So prouided of all things neceſſarie, they ſet forward, and keeping the way of TAVRIS and GENGE, they came to the turning of CHARS, where they were aduertiſed that the enemies armie was alreadie paſſed.

Tocomac Generall of the Perſians.

They

A They were now come within a dayes iourney of CHIELDER, when they ſent quicke and faithfull ſcouts to bring them certaine newes of the condition and number of the Turks armie; who came thither euen at the very time that Muſtapha was encamping his armie betweene the two hils, whereupon the two Baſſaes Beyran and Deruis, with their people had alreadie pitched their tents. Theſe ſcouts diſcouering the Turkiſh hoaſt aloft, perſuaded themſelues that there was not any other battell than thoſe which they ſaw vpon the hils; whereof with all ſpeed they could they returned newes to Tocomac, who at eaſe had followed theſe his ſcouts afarre off. Tocomac thus miſinformed by his ſcouts of the number of his enemies, held on his way boldly, with purpoſe to aſſault them: and hauing diſcouered their tents vpon the hils, was throughly confirmed in the opinion he had before conceiued of the number of his enemies and the ſcouts rela-
B tion, and with ſo much the more confidence ſet forward to aſſaile them. But Beyran and Deruis, who quickly from the hils perceiued the Perſians comming in the plaine, although they knew them to bee men of great courage, yet repoſing an aſſured confidence in their Generals battell; with all ſpeed mounted vpon their horſes and ran to meet them. So in the aforeſaid plains vnder CHIELDER, within one houre after noone was ioyned a moſt bloudy battel, wherein at laſt were ſlaine ſeuen of the Turkes Sanzacks, with a very great number of ſouldiors, without any apparant loſſe at all among the Perſians; who fighting cloſe together in a great heat, and all beblou-died, vrged their happie and fortunat victorie.

But Muſtapha who perceiued all that had paſſed; and ſtayed waiting till the fight was at the hoteſt, and the medley at the thickeſt, that ſo the flight of the enemies might breed their greater
C diſorder: and now ſeeing that his people could no longer endure the furie of the enemies rage (euen as if it had lightened and thundred, and as though the earth had ſhaken) with ſuch cries and exclamations as the Turks vſe in their aſſaults, for the more terrour of the enemies, exciting his armie, ran as it were headlong vpon his aduerſaries, and ſo renewed a moſt terrible battell. The Perſians wonderfull courage endured this vnexpected and dreadfull aſſault, and with incredible ſignes of valour, in that little time of daylight that was left (for the night began now to approch) continued their manifold ſlaughters, and at laſt being fauoured by the darkneſſe of the night, withdrew themſelues with as little loſſe as poſſibly they might. Neither durſt Muſtapha any longer purſue them, but was glad by night to returne to his campe. Of the ſucceſſe of this battell the Perſians certified their king: as alſo of the greatneſſe of the Turkiſh armie, with D their further purpoſe for the annoying thereof. And by the Turks alſo were preſented to Muſtapha (who had already ſent away poſts with newes to Amurath) fiue thouſand heads, which by their color, countenance, and beards, bewraied themſelues to be Perſians; and three thouſand Perſians aliue. Of this victory Muſtapha greatly reioyced, and to make it ſeeme the greater, ſeeking by all meanes to conceale his owne loſſes, and to raiſe a greater terrour by the fame thereof among his enemies) cauſed the heads of thoſe three thouſand that were brought before him aliue to be preſently cut from their ſhoulders, and gaue order, that of thoſe heads there ſhould be framed a bulwarke in thoſe fields for a moſt horrible and vncouth ſpectacle.

Muſtapha commeth with his battel to relieue his diſtreſſed people.

The ſame day that Muſtapha employed himſelfe about this barbarous and cruell worke, there came vnto him certaine meſſengers from Manucchiar, the younger ſonne of the Georgian wid-E dow Dedeſmit (a great prince in that countrey) who told him, That with his good fauour and leaue Manucchiar their lord and maſter was comming to ſalute him, and to offer himſelfe vnto him as his obedient and deuoted ſeruant. At which newes Muſtapha redoubling his ioy, gaue commandement, That all the Baſſaes and captaines of the armie with all ſolemne pompe, with trumpets, drums, peales of ordnance, & all other ſignes of munificall and ioyfull entertainment, ſhould goe forth to meet the ſaid Manucchiar, and to accompanie him to his preſence. Which they did accordingly, and ſo encountering him with all ſignes of honour, conducted him to the great pauillion of Muſtapha, who there cauſed him againe to bee ſaluted with like triumph. Manucchiar diſmounted from his horſe, and againſt his will beholding the ſtrange and vncouth pile of heads, all pale and filthie to behold, and indeed imagining what the matter meant: yet not-
F withſtanding, before all other things hauing done his due reuerence to the great Baſſa; and according to his degree placed himſelfe next to his ſide, after he had preſented him with ſuch gifts as his countrey yeelded, he gaue him to vnderſtand, That for the honour and eſtimation which he bare to the Turkiſh valour, he was alwayes deuoted to the houſe of the Othomans; and as he had oftentimes deſired to ſpend his goods and life in their ſeruice, ſo at this preſent time, moued by

by his auncient deſire, allured by the ſtrange fame of this victorious and wonderfull armie, and ſtirred vp by a particular phantaſie to learne the painfull and hard precepts of the art militarie, vnder ſuch a Generall, commaunder of other commaunders; hee offered him all denotion and ſeruice, more than euer he had done to any heretofore, & himſelfe hauing nothing in the world more deere vnto him, conſecrated his owne life to his commandements; deſiring that the ſame might be employed in the conflicts of warre vnder his banners, among warriours and ſouldiors of fame and renowne: and therefore beſought him to accept of him in the name of Amurath, whoſe obedient vaſſale he vowed himſelfe to remaine for euer. G

The anſwere of Muſtapha.

Graciouſly did Muſtapha receiue all this diſcourſe from Manucchiar, and hauing ſhewed him againe the pile of heads, together with his battels, armour, and prouiſion of war, told him, That as all theſe forces are the gift of God, who alwayes fauoured the righteous counſels of the Othoman emperours, in ſuch ſort, that they Lord it ouer all the world, euen to the aſtoniſhment of all that liue in the world at this day: ſo had he for his particular choſen the better part, in comming now to yeeld himſelfe, and to ſubmit his obedience to his lord, although it had beene better if he had done it before. And as concerning the deſire he had to be his companion and fellow in theſe warlike affaires, hee did very friendly accept of his comming, and promiſed him all good entertainment and aſſured ſafetie. And ſo in exchange of the preſents which hee brought him, hee apparelled him in cloth of gold, honoured him with a battle axe and targuer, wrought with gold and ammell, and neuer permitted him to goe from his pauillion without a traine of his ſlaues following him. H

A terrible raine and tempeſt.

This Georgian prince thus ſolemnly entertained, the Generall gaue order through the camp, That they ſhould the next morning remoue from thoſe mountaines: and now euery man was putting himſelfe in readineſſe, when as there riſe a moſt terrible tempeſt of wind and raine, mixt with thunder and lightning; which continued with ſuch violence by the ſpace of foure dayes together, as if the heauens had beene diſſolued into waters. Whereby it came to paſſe, that out of the dead carkaſſes and heads before mentioned, iſſued a moſt horrible ſtinke: ſo that thereby, and by the foulneſſe of the weather, with the other annoiances alwaies attending vpon ſo great a camp, the whole army was exceedingly troubled, and diuers diſeaſes aroſe among the Turks. But at the laſt the weather breaking vp, Muſtapha riſe with his campe, and ſet forward toward TEFLIS: and being not able by reaſon of the fouleneſſe of the way to paſſe any further, that day ſtayed in the plaines, where the lake CHIBIDER GIOL ſtandeth, and there refreſhed his ſicke and wounded ſouldiors: remooving thence, the next day about noone he came to the caſtle of ARCHICHELEC, ſometime a caſtle of the Georgians, but taken from them by Solyman in his warres againſt Tamas, and euer ſince holden by the Turkes. Heere Muſtapha ſurueyed his armie, and by diligent account taken, found himſelfe to want fortie thouſand of his ſouldiours: wherof ſome were ſlaine in the battell, ſome were dead of ſickneſſe, and many wearie of ſo long and perillous a iourney were by night ſtolne out of the campe and returned to take their eaſe at home. From thence the armie remoued, and lodged at night neere the mariſh, called of the Turks PERVANA GIOL, or lake of ſlaues, and the next day came to TRIALA: where at this day are to be ſeene the ruines of a great citie, and of many churches; whereof ſome are yet repaired and maintained by deuout Chriſtians, the reliques of thoſe happie & religious forces, that with ſo great & faithfull zeale paſſed the ſeas and mountaines through thoſe barbarous nations into the holy land, men worthie of eternall praiſe. The next day the Turkes aſcended the high and craggie mountaine that ſtandeth vpon TEFLIS: from the top whereof deſcending the day following, they ſeized vpon a caſtle of the Georgians, called by the Turks GIVRGI CHALA. Departing thence, and lodging in certaine plaines, the next day they came neere to the riuer that runneth by TEFLIS. But in theſe foure dayes march from ARCHICHELEC, where Muſtapha tooke view of his armie, many of the Turks, who in ſeeking for victuals for themſelues and their horſes, had ſtragled from the armie, were cut off by the Georgian captaines; who with a number of their own countrey ſouldiors ſecretly followed the Turks armie, and well acquainted with all the waies of the country, lay in ambuſh vpō ſuch places as the victuallers were to paſſe through, and ſo ſuddenly ſetting vpon them, ſpoyled them at once both of their goods and liues. I K L M

Muſtapha ſurueyeth his armie at Archichelec, and lacketh fortie thouſand of his men.

The Turks victuallers cut off by the Georgians.

Muſtapha comming to TEFLIS, found that caſtle emptie, for that Dant Chan lord therof, hearing of the comming of the Turks, forſooke the ſame, and betooke himſelfe to the fields; prouiding better for himſelfe in ſo doing, than by ſtaying ſtill in the caſtle, to haue bin there taken priſoner.

A ſoner. This caſtle for the conuenient ſituation thereof Muſtapha cauſed to be repaired and fortified, and planted therein an hundred pieces of artillerie, and appointed Mahamet Baſſa Generall Gouernor of that place, with a garriſon of ſix thouſand ſouldiors: which done, he departed for SIRVAN. At which very time thoſe of SORIA, which had brought a thouſand loads of rent corne to the camp from ALEPPO, being themſelues in number a thouſand perſons, with fiue hundred others of OMPS (in antient time called HVS, the citie of the patient Iob) and other places of SORIA, men neither of dutie bound, nor of themſelues willing to follow the camp, returned homewards towards their owne countrey: but vpon the way they were ſet vpon by Aleſſandro, Giuſuf, and Dauid (three of the Georgian lords) and all ſlain, except ſome few, who by the ſwiftneſſe of their horſes eſcaped with Naſſardin their captaine.

B Now after that Muſtapha had paſſed the diſcent of the ſteepe mountaines of TEFLIS, the next day he encamped in certaine low plaines: where the embaſſadours of Aleſſandro ſurnamed the Great, ſonne of Leuent a Georgian prince, came vnto him and told him, That their lord was readie, if it ſo pleaſed him to come vnto him to doe him reuerence, and by word of mouth to promiſe him that deuotion he had alwaies in mind borne to the Othomans emperours. With a glad heart and cheerefull countenance did Muſtapha receiue theſe embaſſadors: and preſently ſent them backe to will their lord to come, and to tell him, That his friendſhip ſhould be vnto him moſt deare and acceptable. And after their departure tooke order with all the commanders of his armie to receiue him with all the ſignes of ioy that might bee; which at his comming was accordingly by them performed. Who after he had preſented vnto the general the rich gifts he C had brought with him, he offered his obedience to the Baſſa with moſt liuely ſpeeches he could poſſibly deuiſe, calling Amurath his lord: ſeeming to take it euill part, that hee paſſed not through his territory, where he ſhould (as he ſaid) haue had plentie of all things for the reliefe of his armie; yet hoping, that in his returne from SIRVAN, hee would take it in his way, where as hee ſhould find him moſt readie to beſtow all that he had in the ſeruice of his lord: telling him moreouer, That although hee could not for many vrgent reſpects goe with him in SIRVAN, yet he would alwayes accompanie him in mind, and continually pray vnto the Creator of all things for his proſperitie and moſt happie ſucceſſe. Courteouſly did Muſtapha receiue both his preſents and ſubmiſſion, and in exchange therof beſtowed vpon him certain gifts after the Turkiſh manner, and in magnificall tearmes gaue him anſwer, promiſing him in his returne to paſſe D through his countrey: and ſo diſmiſſed the Chriſtian duke with like honour, wherewith he was entertained at his comming.

Aleſſandro the Georgian ſendeth embaſſadors to Muſtapha.

Aleſſandro courteouſly entertained by Muſtapha.

Muſtapha holding on his iourney toward SIRVAN, through mooriſh and troubleſome wayes, in twelue dayes after he departed from TEFLIS, came into the confines of Sirvan, neere to the riuer Canac, and there reſted on this ſide the riuer one day. At which time they of the city of Sechi, bordering vpon the Siruanians and Georgians, foure dayes iourney from SVMACHIA, came to offer themſelues to Muſtapha, as ſubiects to the Turks. Of whoſe ſubmiſſion the General gratiouſly accepted, promiſing to them his aſſured protection.

The Turkes armie ouerwearied with the continuall trauell of twelue dayes march, but yet farre more afflicted with hunger, not finding in thoſe parts ſo much as one wild beaſt to aſſuage E their greedy deſire of meat, ſought by all meanes euery man for himſelfe to get ſomething, eſpecially when they vnderſtood their Generall would paſſe the riuer into a countrey vnto them all vnknowne, where they were altogether vncertaine what to find for their reliefe. So whileſt they were inquiring among themſelues, who were able to conduct them to ſome ſuch place as where they might ſupply their wants, behold certaine Perſians were taken; who being ſtraightly examined on that point, after much reſiſtance at laſt told them, that not far off, after they had paſſed certain mariſhes, where Canac diſchargeth it ſelfe into Araxis, they ſhould find many fields full of Ryſe & corne in the blade, and a little further certaine fat herds of cattell, ſufficient to relieue the whole armie. Of this newes was the Generall certified: who although he greatly doubted the ſubtilties of his enemie; yet to gratifie his ſouldiors, and to make them more willing to fol- F low him into SIRVAN, hee licenced euery man that had a deſire thereunto to goe and prouide themſelues of victuals, and ſo ſuffered all that would to goe freely. Whereupon there went of themſelues, and were ſent by their captaines about ten thouſand ſeruile perſons, with cammels, horſes, and mules, to fetch away this prouiſion of corne and cattell: but the euent anſwered not to their deſires. For Tocomac with the other Perſian captaines, and the reſt of the ſouldiors that were were eſcaped from the ouerthrow giuen them in the plaines of CHIELDER, hauing gathered togither the remainder of the armie, and recouered ſuch places as they thought ſafe & friendly for them, carefully attended the marching and paſſing of the Turkiſh armie. And being certainly enformed by them of REIVAN and GEORGIA what way they kept, and that of neceſſitie they muſt arriue at the banks of Canac; they began to deuiſe how they might in ſome meaſure be reuenged of their former loſſe, and empeach their enemies entrance into SIRVAN. But wanting rather ſtrength than courage to aſſaile the whole armie, they thought it beſt to ſtay in ambuſh in ſome fit place, vntill ſome part of the Turkiſh armie (allured with the prey of the corne and cattell) ſhould for the reliefe of their common neceſſities deſcend into thoſe fields. And the rather to draw them on, ſent out diuers men, who as if they had gone about their owne buſineſſe, and by chance at vnawares had lighted vpon the Turkes campe, reuealed vnto them as a great ſecret, what a good prey was hard by them. And ſo withdrawing themſelues out of ſight priuily, awaited the comming of the Turks: when as within the ſpace of three daies it ſo fell out, that the aforeſaid ten thouſand forragers arriued at the wiſhed place; where they had no ſooner begun to charge themſelues with the prey, but they were ſurpriſed by the Perſians, and all ſlain, ſauing a few who by haſtie flight ſaued themſelues. The noiſe of this hoat skirmiſh being heard into the Turkiſh hoaſt, cauſed Muſtapha to imagine that the matter was fallen out euen as in deed it was: and therefore riſing with his whole armie, haſted with all poſſible ſpeed to haue ſuccoured the poore people, who were now all ſlaine. And albeit he came not in ſo good time as to yeeld them reliefe, yet came he verie fitly to reuenge their death vpon the Perſians, ſtaying too long to load themſelues with the ſpoile of their enemies.

The place from whence the Turks were to haue had the aforeſaid bootie, was almoſt in manner of an iſland, encloſed with the riuers of Araxis and Canac: whereinto Muſtapha entred with his whole power, Deruis Baſſa leading the one wing, as did Beyran Baſſa the other, and he himſelfe comming on in the middle with the maine battell. The Perſians ſeeing Muſtapha with all his forces haſting towards them, and withall remembring the late ouerthrow by them receiued in the plaines of CHIELDER; began to bethinke themſelues, how much better it had beene for them to haue contented themſelues with the late ſlaughter of the forragers, and with ſpeed to haue got them away out of that ſtrait, than by ſtaying longer to be encloſed with the multitude of their enemies, as that they could now no way eſcape without moſt manifeſt perill. In this perplexitie, diſcourſing among themſelues whether it were better for them to flie, or with ſo great diſaduantage to ioine battell, and ſo rather to die with honour than to liue with reproach: at laſt they reſolued to reſerue themſelues to the farther ſeruice of their prince & countrey; deeming it rather a point of wiſedome than of diſhonour, Not to aduenture vnto moſt deſperat and aſſured death; ſo many worthy men, as might in future time ſtand their countrey in great ſtead: yet did they not ſee how by flight well to eſcape, for that they were in ſuch ſort ſtrained within the riuers, as that there was no ground left for them to eſcape by, than that which contrary to their expectation was by the Turks alreadie poſſeſſed. In theſe difficulties euery man began to betake himſelfe to his owne priuat conceit and fortune. Tocomac with Emir Chan, and other the great commanders of the armie, were the firſt that turned their backes, and by the helpe of their couragious horſes, got ouer the riuer of Canac: whoſe example moued many others to attempt the like, though not with like fortune; for that their horſes being not of ſuch courage, and out of breath, lay many of them drowned in the riuer. Wherewith others being amazed, as perceiuing ineuitable death in flying preſent before their eyes, and repoſing all their hope euen in deſpaire, ran as it were headlong in a rage and fury vpon their enemies, and in fighting ſhewed vnſpeakable valor: but what was one againſt an hundred? for there they were alſo all ſlaine, though worthie of immortall fame. Thus was the Perſian armie quite diſcomfited in this demy iſland, being firſt ſtained with the blood of the enemie, and afterward with the ſlaughter of the neighbour and proper inhabitant: and ſo became the perpetuall ſepulchre of a moſt couragious and warlike people. The Turkes in this laſt conflict, loſt not aboue three thouſand men, beſide the ſlaughter of the ten thouſand forragers: although Tocomac to make his loſſe to ſeeme the more tollerable, made report to the king of a greater ſlaughter made. The Perſian captaines full of ſorrow for this vnexpected ouerthrow, with the licence of their Generall departed, euery man to his ſeuerall gouernment: as Emanguli Chan to GENGE, Serap Chan to NASSIVAN, Tocomac himſelfe to REIVAN, and all the reſt to other cities, to the gouernment whereof they were before

Muſtapha was now come to the riuer of Canac, which he was to paſſe ouer into SIRVAN, and therefore made ſtraight proclamation through his whole armie, That euerie man ſhould be in readineſſe againſt the next day to paſſe the riuer. At which proclamation all his people ſuddenly aroſe in a tumult, and with iniurious tearmes euen to his face reproued his folly and inhumanitie, propounding vtter danger vnto himſelfe, and an vniuerſall confuſion vnto the whole armie: and therefore praied him to ſurceaſe from proceeding any farther, vnleſſe he were minded to caſt them all away. But his reſolute mind was not by their threats or intreaties to be remoued, neither gaue he them other anſwere than this: That ſo had Amurath commaunded: and that if all the reſt ſhould ſhew themſelues vnwilling to obey their Soueraigne, hee himſelfe would not nor B could not, but would be the firſt man to attempt and performe that, which they all ſo abhorred and reproued. Valiant ſouldiors (he ſaid) were diſcouered and knowne, not in idleneſſe and eaſe, but in great paines taking, and difficult enterpriſes: who neuer ought to be afraid to change this momentarie life for euerlaſting honour, or to ſhun death, if the ſeruice of their prince ſo required. And for mine owne part (ſaid he) I moſt earneſtly requeſt you, that after I haue attempted the paſſage of the riuer, if any thing happen vnto me otherwiſe than well, yet carrie my dead bodie to the other ſide of the riuer: to the end, that if I cannot whileſt I yet liue execute the commaundement of my Soueraigne, I may yet at leaſt performe the ſame when I am but a ſpeechleſſe and liueleſſe carkaſſe; for as much as the deſire of my lord is not in any ſort to be fruſtrated, for making too great account of mine owne life.

The reſolute anſwere of Muſtapha to his tumultuous ſouldiers.

Diuers and ſundrie murmurings and whiſperings followed vpon this ſpeech of the Generall, C who notwithſtanding the next morning did firſt of all wade ouer the deepe and ſwift riuer himſelfe: after whom preſently followed the Baſſaes with all their ſlaues, by whoſe example the reſt alſo were induced at laſt to doe the like, and ſo continued vntill the darkneſſe of the night interrupted their paſſage; by which occaſion more than halfe the armie could not then get ouer. In this paſſage, being with great tumult and diſorder attempted, it came to paſſe that about eight thouſand perſons carried away with the violence of the riuer, were miſerably drowned, with the great outcrie of all the hoaſt. The like hapned alſo to many mules, camels, and ſumpter horſes, vpon whoſe backs diuers perſons being mounted, in hope to haue paſſed drie ouer the riuer, were likewiſe headlong ouerwhelmed therein. With great complaints and blaſphemous curſings was the whole night ſpent, by them that were yet on this ſide the riuer; whoſe feares were D not a little increaſed, by the example of their vnfortunate fellowes before drowned. And like enough it was, ſome peſtilent ſedition to haue enſued thereupon, had there not a ſhallow foord by great chance been diſcouered, which gaue ſafe paſſage to thoſe that were left. For in the paſſage which the people made that followed Muſtapha, the grauell of the bottome of the riuer being raiſed & remoued by the heauie hooues of the cattell, was driuen down the riuer to a place, where by great good hap there was alſo a foord: and there gathered togither in an heape, had in ſuch ſort raiſed the depth of the channell, that it made as it were a ſhelfe for their commodious paſſage, ſo that the remnant of the armie, carriages, and artillerie paſſing ouer the ſame, there was not ſo much as one man that periſhed. So hauing with much difficultie at laſt got ouer the riuer of Canac, they reſted themſelues that day and the next, and there ſtaied vntill the whole E armie was muſtered, and againe put in order. Remouing thence, the day following they encamped in certaine barren Champaines, where was neither corne nor cattell: neither could they perceiue or learne, that in thoſe quarters were any villages at all. By meanes whereof the hunger of their beaſts increaſing, they were inforced to giue their horſes and mules leaues, and ſtalks of verie drie and withered reeds, and ſuch other like things of little or no ſuſtenance at all: and the men themſelues were faine to ſatisfie their hunger with thoſe vttermoſt reliques, which they were faine to picke out of ſuch poore victuals, as now by corruption were become loathſome to mans nature: and that which worſe was, they ſaw no end of theſe miſeries they were ſo entred into. Notwithſtanding there was now no looking backe, but needs on they muſt, and follow the fortune of their leaders: among whom Muſtapha before all the reſt ſet forward on his F determined iourney. He had not long marched, but there was diſcouered good ſtore of ſundrie plants, and ſhortly after a verie large plaine countrey all greene and flouriſhing, and garniſhed with many trees: by the onely ſight whereof, euerie man was refreſhed with the hope of reliefe; and with more than ordinarie paces, haſted vntill they were entered into thoſe Champaines, abounding with all kind of corne & fruits that could be of an hungrie man deſired. In this place did did euery man ſatisfie his appetite, and forgot in part the forepaſſed calamities. Through this G fruitfull and pleaſant countrey Muſtapha leading his army, at laſt arriued at ERES, the chiefe citie in that coaſt of SIRVAN, as you trauell from GEORGIA.

This citie of ERES was forſaken of a number of her inhabitants, as ſoone as it was knowne that the Turkes were come to Canac; who all followed their Gouernour Samir Chan: who with Ares Chan Gouernour of SVMACHIA, and other the Gouernours of SECHI, and other places of SIRVAN, forſooke the cities, and altogether withdrew themſelues into the mountaines, as places of more ſuretie, attending the euent of theſe ſo great motions. So that as the Turks entred the citie vndiſturbed, ſo were they with the prey they found therein, nothing enriched: for that in this common danger, euery man had caried away with him the beſt things he had. Here ſtaied Muſtapha two and twentie daies, during which time he erected a fortreſſe in the ſaid citie: wher- H upon hee placed two hundred ſmall pieces of artillerie, and for the keeping thereof appoynted Caitas Baſſa, with a garriſon of fiue thouſand ſouldiors. In the meane time alſo he commanded Oſman Baſſa (one of the voluntarie captaines) with ten thouſand men to poſſeſſe SVMACHIA, ſometime the Metropoliticall citie of that prouince, with the title of Viſier and Gouernour generall of SIRVAN. Giuing him farther in charge, that in any caſe he ſhould cleare the paſſage to DERBENT, and giue preſent aduertiſements to the Tartarians of his arriuall there: whom he ſuppoſed by that time to be come into thoſe quarters, for that they had before ſo faithfully promiſed to Amurath. Oſman comming to SVMACHIA, preſently ſeazed vpon the citie, & was friendly entertained of thoſe that remained there: whom he likewiſe courteouſly entreated, without doing or ſuffring any outrage to be done vpon them. Of which his courteous vſage they of DER- I BENT vnderſtanding, ſent preſently to offer their citie vnto him, beſeeching him to receiue them into his protection, and to defend them from the Perſians: vnder whom, although they had long liued in ſubiection, yet differed they from them in the ceremonies of their Mahometan ſuperſtition, wherein they better agreed with the Turks.

Muſtapha returneth out of Siruan.

Muſtapha hauing thus brought the countrey of SIRVAN into the Turkiſh ſubiection, and finiſhed his fortreſſe at ERES, and put all things in ſuch order as he thought beſt: importuned by the Ianizaries and the people of GRÆCIA, and ſomewhat enforced by the ſeaſon of the yeare which was now farre ſpent; departed from ERES, and turned his courſe homeward toward the countrey of Alexander ſurnamed the Great, as he had promiſed in his late paſſage into SIRVAN. And hauing trauelled a long iourney, he ſent before him certaine engines and pioners K to make a bridge ouer Canac, ſo without danger to paſſe ouer his armie. Hauing paſſed the riuer, hee gaue notice to Sahamall (one of the lords of GEORGIA) of his arriuall, who preſently came and yeelded himſelfe as vaſſal to the Turks: and being entertained of the Baſſa with great pompe, and rewarded after the Turkiſh manner, took his leaue, and ſo returned into his mountaine of BRVS.

Muſtapha ſetting againe forward, and trauelling by night becauſe hee would not loſe the opportunitie of the faire weather; by the errour of his guides loſt his way, and ſo fell into rough and difficult paſſages, wherby he was enforced to ſtay and wait for day light: which ariſing, did manifeſt vnto them, that they were now entred into the countries of his friend Alexander. And L therefore hee gaue forthwith proclamation through all the armie, That no man vpon paine of death ſhould be ſo hardie as to moleſt or diſquiet any of the ſubiects of Alexander, but to haue good reſpect vnto them, and to entreat them with all courteſie. The day following hee ſtill trauelled on in the ſame countrey, when there arriued from ZAGHEN, certaine embaſſadours of Alexanders, with great abundance of cattell, corne, fruits, and other reliefe ſent for a preſent to the Generall, with a ſolemne excuſe, that hee came not himſelfe, becauſe the infirmitie of his bodie would not ſuffer him. Wherewithall Muſtapha reſted ſatisfied, and leauing the citie of ZAGHEN on the right hand, cauſed the meſſengers of Alexander to guide him the way to TEFLIS: which they ſo directly did, that within the ſpace of three dayes they conducted him thither with his armie, without the feeling of any annoyance; from whence they returned, being well rewarded for their paines by the Generall. Who now come to TEFLIS, found the garri- M ſon he had there left for the keeping thereof, ſo hardly pinched with famine, that they were glad to eat cats, dogs, ſheepskins, and ſuch like vnwonted food: for neither durſt they for feare of the enemy go out of the caſtle to prouide for themſelues; neither if they had ſo done had it any thing auailed, ſuch was the carefulneſſe of the enemie in keeping of his things: but now by the com-

A ming of the Generall they were relieued with meat, money, and plentie of all things. Hauing ſtaied there two daies, he put himſelfe againe vpon his way, and with fire and ſword deſtroied whatſoeuer came in his way in the Champaines ſubiect to the ſaid citie: onely the ſepulchres of Simons progenitors (lord of that countrie) were left vntouched by the Turks furie. The next day they trauelled ouer rough and ragged mountains, full of a thouſand difficulties, which were the more encreaſed by wonderfull great ſnowes that were fallen: by reaſon whereof, many ſoldiors, horſes, camels, and mules periſhed. In which diſtreſſe the armie continued two daies; during which time the ſouldiors were fallen into ſuch a diſorder, that forgetting the feare of the enemies countrie wherein they were, euery man without regard tooke vp his ſeuerall lodging apart, ſome here, ſome there, where they might find either ſome thicke buſh or ſome ſmall cot-
B tage, or ſome quiet valley to ſhelter themſelues in from the wind, the ſnow, and the ſtormes. Of which diſorder certaine Georgian lords vnderſtanding by the ſcouts which from time to time waited vpon the Turks armie, ioyned themſelues togither and in the night ſecretly approached vnto it, expecting the opportunitie of performing ſome notable exploit: and hauing obſerued, that Hoſaine Bey had withdrawne himſelfe with his regiment from the reſt of the armie vnder certaine mountaines, to defend himſelfe from the ſtorme and wind; they tooke the occaſion preſented, and ſo aſſayling him, ſlew his ſlaues and all his ſquadrons; tooke a great bootie of many loads of mony and apparrell; lead away with them all his horſes, and whatſoeuer elſe they could find, and ſcarce gaue him leiſure to ſaue himſelfe, by flying into the tents of Beyran Baſſa. The next morning the Turkes remoued, and in the euening came to a caſtle called CHI-
C VRCHALA, where they ſtaied a whole day to make prouiſion of victuall: which was attempted by ſending abroad many of their ſlaues into the fields, conducted by them of the caſtle; who were all miſerably cut in pieces by the Georgians. From this place the Turks armie departed in great hunger, ouer diuers rough places of the Georgians, where they were faine oftentimes to reſt themſelues: and at laſt came to the confines of Dedeſmit, of her called the widdowes countrie. In the entrance whereof, they muſt needs paſſe through a narrow ſtrait, betweene certaine mountaines, where the riuer Araxis windeth it ſelfe with a thouſand turnings in the low vallies: a dangerous place, and ſo narrow, that no more but one man alone could at once paſſe through it. Betweene this ſtrait and a very thicke and hillie wood, they lodged vpon the banke
D of the ſaid riuer: and from thence they remoued the next morning, & trauelled ouer very ſteep mountaines and rough forreſts, ouer yſe and ſnow more harder than marble, and ouer other hanging rockes, in ſuch miſerable ſort, that many camels, mules, and horſes, tumbling downe headlong into the riuer, there miſerably periſhed. Through theſe ruinous crags and diuers other miſeries, they marched all the next day, and after that another day alſo, as miſerable to the armie as the former. And ſo at laſt being ſore afflicted with hunger, ſpoiled of the enemie, tormented with the hard ſeaſon of the yeare, and ſituation of the place, they arriued in the territories that lay vnder ALTVNCHALA, or Golden caſtle, the princely widowes pallace, where they had all maner of reliefe, for all the miſeries they had endured ſince their departure from CHIVRCHALA, by the ſpace of ſix daies: which if it had bin a faire common trauelled way, might haue bin perfor-
E med in one only daies iourney.

The miſerie of the Turkiſh armie in paſſing the ſtraits of Georgia.

The widow, with Alexander her eldeſt ſonne, came downe from her caſtle, and went vnto the pauillion of Muſtapha; offering him diuers preſents, and promiſing vnto him all faithfull obedience. Whom Muſtapha courteouſly receiued, declaring vnto her, what honourable entertainment he had giuen to Manucchiar her younger ſonne there preſent, who had been with him in all the expedition into SIRVAN. And for the preſent, diſſembling the priuie diſpleaſure he bare againſt Alexander (whom he thought to haue been one of them that ſpoiled the Soriana in their returne from the campe) he embraced him courteouſly, and praied her to be content to leaue him alſo there with him: giuing her farther to vnderſtand, that he would ſend both her ſons to CONSTANTINOPLE to Amurath, with letters of credence for their yeelded obe-
F dience, for their fauour ſhewed to his armie, in giuing it ſo ſecure paſſage, and ſo many helpes: and laſtly, that for their good deſerts, they might be of the ſaid great Sultan both honourably entertained and rewarded. The aged ladie, although her mind was herewithall ſore troubled, yet outwardly in her countenance ſhewed her ſelfe pleaſed; and ſeemed courteouſly to yeeld, what ſhe was of neceſſitie conſtrained to grant: as wel for that he was alreadie poſſeſſed of one of her ſonnes, as alſo for that both herſelfe and her whole ſtate were now in his power, and as it were at his deuotion. And therefore leauing both her ſonnes behind her, ſhe returned her ſelfe heauie to her caſtle. G

Muſtapha commeth to Erzirum, & diſchargeth his armie.

In this place Muſtapha hauing refreſhed his armie two dayes, departed thence toward CHARS, and after many dayes trauell at laſt arriued at ERZIRVM, to the great reioycing of the whole armie, which was there preſently diſcharged by the Generall, without any muſtering at all, and leaue giuen for euery man to returne into his countrey.

Muſtapha magnifieth his owne exploits to Amurath.

Muſtapha ſetling himſelfe in ERZIRVM, diſpatched poſtes with letters of plentifull aduertiſements to his great lord and maſter, of all things that had paſſed: not forgetting to magnifie his owne exploits aboue meaſure. He certified him of the battels he had had with the Perſians, the obedience he had receiued of the Georgians and Siruanians, the mutiny of his owne ſouldiors, the fortreſſe he had built at ERES, the garriſons left in that citie with Caitas Baſſa, and in SVMACHIA with Oſman Baſſa: and in briefe, whatſoeuer elſe had paſſed, and whatſoeuer he had taken from the enemie. Neither did hee faile to propound vnto Amurath, what hee thought conuenient to be attempted the next yeare, for the ſtrengthening of thoſe places he had already conquered, and for preparing the way for new enterpriſes. And principally he put him in mind of a fortification to be made at CHARS, a place very fit for any paſſage into GEORGIA or ARMENIA, by ſituation fruitfull & commodious both for men and cattell. And withall he ſent vnto him the widdowes two ſonnes, Alexander and Manucchiar, the Georgian princes, certifying him of their ſubmiſſion, and that he had receiued in their country all good entertainment & friendly welcome: and withall declaring his opinion, That Manucchiar was the meeter man for gouernment than his brother Alexander, and the readier to do him ſeruice. Greatly did Amurath commend the valour & diligence of Muſtapha, and highly pleaſed himſelfe with this conceit, That of theſe beginnings might grow mightie conqueſts, to the enlargement of his empire, and that by this meanes he ſhould be able to ſurpaſſe the glory of his predeceſſors. And the more his ambitious thoughts were occupied about theſe wars, the leſſe he troubled himſelfe with thinking how to annoy EVROPE with his forces. H I

It was not long after the departure of Muſtapha from ERES, but that the Tartarians hauing left the fennes of MEOTIS, and the vnmountable ſhores of the Blacke ſea, and hauing paſſed ouer the rockes vpon CHOLCHIS, and ſurueyed the frozen crags of the mountaine CAVCASVS, were now arriued vpon the confines of SIRVAN, and there attended the commaundement of the Turks. Theſe Tartarians being of them that are called Præcopenſes, to the number of thirtie thouſand, conducted by their lord and captaine Abdilcherai, a yong man of great valour and fame, and of a comely perſonage, were come according to the faithfull promiſe of Tartar Chan, with a full reſolution to attempt whatſoeuer ſhould be commanded them in the name of Amurath. Now Oſman Baſſa vnderſtanding of their approch, according to the charge before giuen him by Muſtapha the Generall, enuited them to enter into SIRVAN, and by encreaſing of the Turks forces to further theſe beginnings of Amurath his glory, and theſe his conqueſts (or more truly to ſay, theſe magnifical & famous tearms of victory.) All which was moſt diligently put in execution by Abdilcherai: who hauing entred the yron gates where DERBENT ſtandeth (which by the Turks at this day is called Demir Capi, and ſignifieth the gates of yron) & ſo from thence paſſing into the countrey of SIRVAN, there ſtayed, and thereof gaue aduertiſement to Oſman, as was by him appoynted. Ares Chan late gouernour of SVMACHIA, who for feare of the great armie of the Turks, had abandoned the citie the chiefe place of his charge, and betaken himſelfe to the ſafegard of the mountaines, hearing of the departure of the Turkiſh Generall, reſolued with the other Gouernours of ERES and SECHI (who following his example, had in like manner fled) now to return againe to their forſaken country, and to make proofe if he could by any meanes take reuenge of the iniurie done vnto him by the Turks. So paſſing vnder SVMACHIA, and hauing put to the ſword certaine of Oſmans ſtragling victuallers that were gone out of the citie, hee encamped with all his people a little from SVMACHIA, and by good fortune ſurpriſed certaine meſſengers ſent from Abdilcherai the Tartar, to certifie Oſman Baſſa of his arriuall, and to know his pleaſure what he ſhould put in execution. Theſe Tartarians brought before Ares, after much torture diſcloſed the letters they caried: which the Perſian captaine read, and conſidring the great number of the Tartarians that were come (for the letters made mention of thirty thouſand) he reſolued not to ſtay any longer in thoſe quarters, but preſently raiſed his camp, and retired towards Canac, meaning from thence to certifie the king of theſe nouelties, & vpon the K L M

A banks of the ſaid riuer to attend the kings anſwere. The Tartarian captaine comming to SVMACHIA, was appointed by the Baſſa to paſſe ouer the riuer of Canac into GENGE, the countrie of Emanguli Chan, with the ſpoyle thereof to enrich himſelfe, and by all meanes to make his arriuall vnto the Perſians moſt terrible. With this charge the Barbarian departed, thirſting now for nothing more than for the bloud and ſpoile of the enemie: and with poſting iournies came to Canac, where Ares Chan was yet encamped: whom he vpon the ſudden moſt furiouſly aſſaulted, and like a deuouring flame diſcomfited all his hoaſt. And taking him aliue, ſent him to SVMACHIA to Oſman, who forthwith cauſed him to be hanged by the necke out of a lodging in the ſame ſtatehouſe where he had not long before ſate as Gouernor. The Tartarian after that, ſwimming ouer the riuer, and courſing a little aboue GENGE, found Emanguli Chan with his wife, and
B all his familie, and a great part of the nobilitie of GENGE in a valley hunting the wild bore; and aſſailing him, put him to flight, tooke from him his wife, all the ladies, and many ſlaues, and ſlew many of the reſt that were come thither to ſee the ſport: and after that rode on to GENGE, which he tooke, and yeelded it wholly to the furie and luſt of his barbarous ſouldiors, who left no maner of inhumane crueltie vnattempted, in ſatisfying their immoderat and barbarous affections. And ſo being loaded with the ſpoiles, & wearie with the ſlaughter of their enemies, they returned merrily toward SIRVAN: and paſſing againe ouer Canac, came to the higher ſide of ERES into certaine low champaigns, enuironed about with hils, and there hauing pitched their tents, without any feare ſetled themſelues to ſleepe and to reſt their wearie bodies.

Ares Chan hanged at Sumachia.

In the meane time, and long before theſe actions, were newes come to the Perſian Court of C all the Turkes proceedings: whereupon the Perſian king hauing gathered new forces, had diſpatched Emir Hamze Mirize his eldeſt ſonne with 12000 ſouldiours to paſſe into SIRVAN, to ſee what hurt the enemie had done, and to attempt the reuenge of the forepaſſed iniuries; but aboue all things to puniſh the villanie of them of SECHI, and the other cities of SIRVAN, that not induced with any neceſſitie, had ſo voluntarily yeelded themſelues to follow the obedience and religion of the Turkes. The Perſian prince departing from CASBIN, accompanied with his mother Begum, who would needs follow her beloued ſonne, was on his way towards SIRVAN, vnder the guiding and gouernment of Mirize Salmas, chiefe of the Sultans; and had now left behind them the countries of ARDOVIL and CARACACH, when he was certified by the aduertiſements come from Ares Chan, of the arriuall of Abdilcherai, with his great number of Tarta-
D rians; and was thereby at the firſt ſtrucken into a great quandarie, and almoſt out of comfort: yet prickt forward with an honourable deſire of glorie and reuenge, he proſecuted his intended enterpriſe for SIRVAN, and haſtening his iourney, came to ERES long before the king his father thought he could haue ſo done. This his notable celeritie ſerued him to great purpoſe, for that Caitas Baſſa was boldly gone out of the fortreſſe, and went ſpoiling the countrie, carrying away with him whatſoeuer he met withall, and committing ſuch inſolencies as hungrie ſouldiors beyond all honeſtie vſe to doe in ſtrange and fruitfull countries. But when he was in the middeſt of theſe ſpoyles, and leaſt feared the enemie, he was ſuddenly aſſailed by the prince; and hauing no meanes to eſcape his furie in this extremitie, after a fierce and bloudie battell (wherein the Turks although in number few, yet ſhewed many effects of valour) he was there ſlaine with all his ſol-
E diors, leauing the fortreſſe, the ſpoyles, and the countrie committed to his cuſtodie, free to the pleaſure of the victor: which the Perſian prince hauing once againe gotten into his poſſeſſion, tooke away the two hundred pieces of artillerie that were left in the fort by Muſtapha, and preſently ſent them to CASBIN to his father.

Eres recouered by the Perſians.

The prince encouraged with ſo happie a beginning, leauing his mother at ERES, followed on his iourney toward SVLACHIA, but by the way deſcending the hils, he diſcouered where the Tartarians lay encamped. Whereupon he ſtood in great doubt, whether to aduenture vpon ſo mightie an enemie, or to content himſelfe with the victorie he had alreadie gotten, and ſo to returne into PERSIA: to returne he thought it too great a ſhame, and choſe rather to aduenture himſelfe to moſt manifeſt peril. And therefore deſcending the hill, and drawing nigh the enemie,
F he perceiued that the armie was all laid down to reſt, and that their horſes were ſome couched, ſome ſtanding, but all vnſadled: whereupon without any ſtay ſetting ſpurs to his horſe, he pricked forward with all his hoaſt, and moſt terribly aſſaulted the Tartarians, now buried in their ſpoiles & ſleep; and hauing ſlaine their firſt and ſecond watch, although with ſome loſſe, among the tumultuarie ſouldiors he made an vniuerſall confuſion and ſlaughter, putting ſome to flight, killing others, and taking diuers of them captiues. Among whom was their Generall Abdilcherai, who was taken aliue, and sent to the king. G

Sumachia beseiged by the Persian prince.

After these victories the Persian prince scoured to SVMACHIA, and compassed the citie round about, wherein the Turkish Bassa Osman sat as Gouernor, to the reproch of PERSIA: and there encamping himselfe, sent word to Osman, That if he would yeeld himselfe, he would let him depart with life and goods: otherwise, if he would obstinately hold it out, and not yeeld the citie, which he so vniustly possessed, he should be constrained to surrender it by force, and his life withall. Osman who as then knew nothing of the Tartarians ouerthrow, but still hoped of their returne, thought it best to entertaine the prince with faire words vntil their comming, and therefore gaue him courteous answere, that he was very readie to yeeld vp the citie: but withall entreated him, that he would stay but for three daies, and graunt him time to put all things in readinesse, that so he might freely depart, as it had pleased him in courtesie to offer. The prince glad of such an answere, supposing it to haue proceeded of a sincere meaning, expected of the Turke the performance thereof. But Osman meaning nothing lesse, than to commit himselfe to the faith of his enemie, & seeing that the Tartarians, whom he looked for, appeared not, he resolued to saue himselfe by secret flight; doubting, as he had good reason, that if he should longer stay, to be betrayed by the inhabitants of the citie themselues: and therefore somewhat before the assigned tearme of the three daies appointed for the surrendring of the citie, he by the helpe of a darke night, and the couert of the high & rough crags, with great silence withdrew himselfe out of SVMACHIA, carying away with him all his substance, and so in safetie arriued at DERBENT. H

Sumachia yeelded vnto the prince.

The next morning the inhabitants of SVMACHIA opened the gates of the citie to the prince: who seeing their infidelitie, first by giuing of entertainment to Osman, and now by helping him to escape, without giuing him any knowledge therof, did put in execution the effect of his wrath and indignation, which euen in CASBIN he had conceiued in his mind against them; and with great crueltie did punish the miserable and vnfortunat citisens, laying their houses euen with the ground, rasing both the old and new wals of that citie, of late so desired a receit for the Turkes. But when he was to depart thence, he stood in doubt, Whether to goe on to DERBENT, or to returne to PERSIA: the strength of that citie, the approch of Winter, and the long iourney he was to take homeward, perswaded him to lay aside the enterprise for DERBENT, whereupon he resolued to returne to CASBIN: yet first to make his returne by them of ERES and SECHI, and vpon them as vpon rebels to inflict well deserued punishment. So making his present repaire thither, spared neither sex nor age, nor any condition of persons, but vpon them all poured forth his furious indignation, without exception. Which done, he with his aforesaid mother Begum, and his armie, though somewhat diminished, yet victorious and triumphant, returned to CASBIN. I K

Abdilcherai beloued of the Persian queene.

Yong Abdilcherai the Tartarian was kept safe in the kings pallace at CASBIN, but with such easie imprisonment as was agreeable to his calling: which was day by day so inlarged, as that he seemed not to liue as a prisoner, but rather as a companion of those of the Court, and as it were in apparant libertie. By which occasion hauing insinuated himselfe into the loue of Begum the kings wife, he spent his time in courting of her, and she againe in entertaining of him in all secret and couert maner. Yet these their mutuall affections and interchangeable fauours passed not so secretly, but that in the Court and all ouer the citie it was a rise report, That the shamelesse ladie, prodigal of her honour, had participated both her bed and her selfe with the Tartarian prisoner. Howbeit neither the king nor the prince knew any thing of it. But the king perceiuing the yong gentleman to be generally commended, valiant, courteous, and of a comely feature, & withall nobly borne (for he gaue it out that he was the brother of Tatar Chan) perswaded himselfe, that it would stand with the great good of his state, of a captiue to make him his sonne in law, by giuing him his daughter in marriage: whereby he was in good hope there might grow such an amitie and vnion betweene the Tartarian Præcopenses and himselfe, as that they would from thenceforth not only refuse to fauour Amurath in those warres, but also become enemies vnto him, and in the fauour of PERSIA turne their armes and affections against him. Which his deepe and considerat purpose so displeased the Sultans of CASBIN, that they sought by all meanes they could possibly deuise to auert the king from that so strange a policie: but all in vaine, for the king being fully resolued, and now vpon the point to make a conclusion of the mariage: the Sultans entering into the pallace with their followers, and finding there the vnfor- L M

It is reported, that the queen was then alſo murdered by them: certaine it is, that the poore ladie neuer after that day ſaw the light of the Sunne: but whether it was put in execution by the appointment of the king her huſband, or that the Sultans did it for the publicke intereſt, is not certainely knowne. Vpon theſe murders ſprung vp many troubles, and much ciuile diſſention, threatning the vtter confuſion of the Perſian kingdome, to the ſingular benefit of Amurath. All which tumultuous diſorders the king by brideling his owne affections, and the motions of his ſonne Emir Hamze Mirize, well appeaſed, procuring at laſt a perfect vnitie, as then moſt neceſſarie for the defence of his kingdome.

B VAN) ceaſed not with all carefulneſſe to deuiſe what he poſſibly could, for the aſſuring of that countrie (of late woon, and now againe almoſt loſt) vnder the gouernment of Amurath. For the better eſtabliſhing whereof, togither with his owne ſafetie, he thought it good to enter into friendſhip with old Sahamal the Georgian, lord of the mountaine of BRVS. With this man did Oſman practiſe many tokens of good will, & he againe interchangeably towards Oſman: whereupon there aroſe great friendſhip betweene them, at leaſtwiſe in outward apparance: whereunto in ſhort time there was added a ſtraight knot of alliance: for that Oſman took to wife a daughter of the ſaid Sahamals, the greateſt ſigne of his ſincere loue towards him. Neuertheleſſe ſhortly after Oſman vpon ſome reaſonable coniectures began to ſuſpect (as indeed the truth was) that Sahamal for all the faire ſhew of friendſhip he made towards him, might for all that receiue ſome
C ſecret order from the Perſian king, to betray him, & to free the citie from the Turks, and ſo to reduce all that prouince vnto the ancient deuotion: in which iealous ſuſpition he was fully confirmed by the ſpeeches of his wife, the daughter of Sahamal; who rauiſhed with the honour, valour, and riches of her husband, could not conceale any thing that ſhe knew deuiſed againſt him, but frankely told him, That her father being ſecretly reconciled to the Perſian king, held friendſhip with him, and that letters went betweene them of great matters, and particularly of the affaires of SIRVAN. Hereupon the Baſſa perſuaded himſelfe, that all the friendſhip of Sahamal was but deepe diſſimulation, and the marriage of his daughter nothing but a meane to procure his death. Neuertheleſſe he made ſhew vnto his wife, as if he had made no ſuch reckoning of it as indeed he did, but kept it in ſtore to his owne ſafetie and the deſtruction of Sahamal, D whom for all that he ſtill entertained with all honour and kindneſſe due vnto a moſt louing father in law. But to preuent the malitious purpoſe of Sahamal, hauing inuited him according to the cuſtome to a certaine ſolemne feaſt, he acquainted certain companies of his moſt truſtie and valiant ſouldiors with his determination, enioyning them, that as ſoone as Sahamal was entered into his court, euen in the very diſmounting from his horſe they ſhould all fall vpon him, cut off his head, and put all his retinue to the ſword. Which his cruell commaund was by him accordingly at Sahamals comming put in execution, he in lighting from his horſe being ſlaine, and all his followers murdered, when forthwith were ſent forth by Oſman two thouſand horſemen to ſpoyle and ſacke all the countrie of the ſaid Georgian lord, to the great maruell & aſtoniſhment both of far and neere. The Perſian king hearing of theſe newes, tooke the matter grieuouſly, as E foreſeeing that the recouery of that countrie and prouince of SIRVAN would proue a matter of great difficultie, and fearing greatly that it would ſtill remaine (as indeed it doth) in the poſſeſſion of the Turkes. This was the end of the Turks attempts againſt the Perſians in SIRVAN this yere 1578, wherein they loſt aboue ſeuentie thouſand men, deuoured partly with the ſword, & partly with famine, and the other miſeries of warre. And ſo Winter comming on very ſharply, euery man withdrew himſelfe from the field, wholly attending the keeping of that they had alreadie gotten, vntill the comming on of the next Spring.

Amurath aduertiſed by letters from Muſtapha of all that had happened in the late expediti- The conſultati- on againſt the Perſians, vpon theſe proſperous ſucceſſes (which the Baſſa had for the aduancing ons of Amurath.
of his owne credit deſcribed to be far greater than indeed they were) began to caſt many deui-F ces in his head touching ſuch matters as were to be attempted the next yere. And firſt he thought it neceſſarie to ſend his forces againe into SIRVAN, to recouer ſuch places as were firſt conquered by Muſtapha, but afterward againe ſubdued by the Perſian, ſo to eſtabliſh his gouernment in that countrie. But vpon better conſideration he ceaſed further to thinke of that matter, for the great hope he had conceiued of the aid that was promiſed him by Tatar Chan, who had faithfully assured both him and Osman, that he would ouerrun that prouince anew, and do great G matters in furtherance of the Turkes deſignes: all which for all that fell out to be but windie words: yet in reſpect of this hope he laied SIRVAN aſide, and commited the defence thereof to the falſe promiſes of the Tartarian, and the valour of Osman. And pleaſing his ambitious de-ſires with more haughtie thoughts, he began to deuiſe with himſelfe, for ſending his army directly to TAVRIS, there to erect a fortreſſe; which being ſtrongly fortified and furniſhed with a gar-riſon of moſt valiant ſouldiors, ſhould neuer be againe ſubdued by all the power of PERSIA;

and by this meanes to keep in ſubiection all thoſe great countries betweene TAVRIS and ER-ZIRVM. Which his conceit being of great weight and importance, was much increaſed by the perſuaſion of others, very inward with him; euery man being almoſt of opinion, That it was an eaſie matter for ſo great an hoaſt in few daies to performe that ſeruice, and to pierce not onely H into TAVRIS, but further to paſſe whether ſoeuer he would deſire. Yet after he had more deeply conſidered of an enterpriſe of ſo great importance, & with more indifferent iudgement compared his owne forces with his enemies, he began to find many difficulties and dangers, which in the heat of his ambitious deſires he at the firſt ſaw not: For beſide the length and tediouſnes of the iourney, he doubted that in ſending his armie for TAVRIS, it might be on the one ſide aſſailed by the Georgians (of whoſe obedience he had as yet no great aſſurance) & on the other ſide by the Perſians, and ſo brought into great danger; which he was alwaies to feare, whenſoeuer he ſhould haue occaſion to ſend new ſupplies vnto the fortreſſe by him intended at TAV-RIS. Whereupon laying aſide all his former conceits, as too eagre and perrillous, he reſolutely concluded with himſelfe, firſt to make ſure his owne borders, and afterwards by little and little I to enter into the enemies countrie, ſtill fortifying in conuenient places as he went, and ſo ſurely, although but ſlowly, to triumph ouer his enemies; rather than by thruſting his armie headlong vpon vncertainties into places ſtrongly fenced both by nature and the power of moſt mightie enemies, to be inforced with ſhame to abandon the enterpriſe ſo haſtily begun.

Muſtapha carefull to put in execution Amurath his command.

Of this his reſolution he aduertiſed Muſtapha by writing, giuing him in charge, againſt the next Spring to prouide all ſuch things as ſhould be neceſſarie for the building of certaine forts vpon the way that leadeth from ERZIRVM into GEORGIA: that hauing made thoſe waies ſafe, and brought the people vnder his obedience, he might afterwards attempt greater matters.
Whereupon Muſtapha preſently directed forth preceptsto the cities of ALEPPO, of DAMASCO, CARAEMIT, and other places of SORIA and MESOPOTAMIA, for the taking vp of cunning K workemen, of pioners, and ſuch like, to the number of twentie thouſand: and likewiſe wrot to all the countries, out of which he had raiſed his armie the laſt yeare, That all their ſouldiours (yea and in greater number alſo) ſhould be in readineſſe againſt the next Spring, to returne to the warres. The rumour whereof he cauſed to be ſpread euen as far as ÆGYPT. He commaunded alſo the taxes and tenths of thoſe countries to be collected, & further vſed the chambers of ALEPPO, and other places, for ſuch maſſes of mony as he thought neceſſarie for theſe purpoſes.

In this while the two Georgian brethren, Alexander and Manucchiar, ſent (as we haue before ſaid) by Muſtapha to Amurath at CONSTANTINOPLE, in doubtfull hope, expecting the end for which they were ſent vnto the Court, were both examined, and exhorted to embrace the Maſted onely, That he might but as a priuat man go and liue in his countrie, there to be buried amongſt his anceſtors. Which his requeſt the Turkiſh emperor referred to the diſcretion of Manucchiar, to do therein as hee ſaw good: who conſented thereunto. Hereupon Manucchiar was circumciſed, and the name of Muſtaffa giuen him, with the title of the Baſſa and Gouernour of ALTVNCHALA, and of all his mothers and brothers countries: and being thus created a Turke, had his brother Alexander a Chriſtian committed vnto him, and ſo both returned into their own countries. M

Emanguli Chan taketh vpon him the defence of Sirvan.

Now in the Perſian court at CASBIN, were many conſultations had for the repreſſing of the inuaſions of the Turks. And among others carefull of thoſe matters, Emanguli Chan Gouernor of GENGE, doubting to looſe his honourable gouernment, by reaſon of the late ſacke of his ci-tie, and ſpoile of his countrie by the Tartarian; by thoſe plots that were daily in contriuing for

A the ſending of men into SIRVAN, to impeach the deſignements of Oſman Baſſa, and (if it were poſſible) to driue him out of DERBENT; tooke occaſion to offer vnto the king, vpon paine of his head to defend SIRVAN, and not to ſuffer Oſman the Turke to attempt any new fortifications, or further conqueſts in that prouince. Of which his offer the king accepted, and thereupon the gouernment of GENGE, and guarding of the country of SIRVAN againſt the forces of Oſman, was frankly committed vnto him. And commandement giuen to the Gouernours of TAVRIS, REIVAN, and NASSIVAN, and to diuers other captaines that were neereſt, to bee readie at all times with their power to aſſiſt Emanguli Chan, if it ſhould fortune either the Tartarians, or Turks, with any great power to enter into SIRVAN: which order ſo taken, was thought ſufficient for the ſecuritie of that prouince.

B But how to protect the Georgian countrey, was thought to bee a matter of greater importance, euery man being almoſt of opinion, That ſome great power of the Turks ſhould be ſent thither, for the more aſſurance of the conqueſt thereof alreadie begun; and for the ſuccour of the fortreſſe at TEFLIS, which muſt needs otherwiſe fall againe into the hands of the Georgians. This matter ſo troubled the Perſian king, as that he ſeemed to haue bent his whole counſels and thoughts thereupon: when Simon a Georgian, a famous captaine (ſometime priſoner with Iſmahel the late king, at CAHACA, and by the familiaritie hee had with him, ſeduced from the Chriſtian faith; for defence whereof hee had in the time of king Tamas choſen to liue depriued of his libertie and ſtate) thinking it now a fit time to obtaine at the kings hand ſuch help as he had long deſired, for the recouery of his dominion vſurped by Dauid, otherwiſe called Daut
C Chan his yonger brother (who for the obtaining therof of king Tamas, had voluntarily renounced his Chriſtian religion) offered now vnto the king his faithfull ſeruice, for the defence of that part of the Georgian countrey wherein TEFLIS ſtood (being in right, part of his owne inheritance) againſt the Turks: reprouing by way of diſgrace, his yonger brother of cowardiſe, and promiſing the performance of great matters in himſelfe, both for the defence of that euil defended countrey, and further annoying of the enemie. With great contentment did the Perſian king conſent to the requeſt of Simon, and named him Chan of all that kingdome, which he poſ- Simon with Aliculi Chan ſent for the defence of Georgia.
ſeſſed before whileſt he was a Chriſtian: and ſent with him Aliculi Chan into GEORGIA, with ſiue thouſand horſemen, and certaine pieces of artillerie taken at ERES, when Caietas Baſſa was ſlaine. Simon afterwards comming to GEORGIA, was ioyfully receiued of his countreymen, D and there preſſed about three thouſand ſoldiors of his own and of his neighbors; excuſing himſelfe that he was become a Perſian, not becauſe he preferred the Mahometan ſuperſtition before the chriſtian religion, but only ſo to be deliuered from his long impriſonment, & by that means to maintaine his eſtate. And in this order were the affaires of GEORGIA aſſured, and ſtrengthned in the beſt manner that might then be.

Now began the Spring to approach, and euery man prepared himſelfe to the diſcontinued 1579 trauels of the wars begun: and now were met together at ERZIRVM, out of all the wonted pro- The meeting together of the Turks army at Erzirum.
uinces, all the Turkes forces, with all things neceſſarie for the intended warre. With this armie in all things equall with the firſt, Muſtapha ſet forward, and in twelue daies came to CHARS, not E perceiuing in his ſouldiors any ſigne of diſcontentment at all. And foraſmuch as here they were to ſtay, and to fortifie both with wals and ditches that ruinated citie, and that with as great ſpeed as was poſſible; there was no remedy, but that beſide the pioners & enginers that were brought for that purpoſe, many of the Spaoglani, yea and of the Ianizaries alſo muſt bee ſet to worke. Whereupon they all ſuddenly in a tumult, began with bitter proteſtations to tell the Generall, That their ſtipends wherewith it pleaſed the Sultan to fauour them, were not beſtowed vpon them to employ their forces and vertues in ſuch ſeruile workes; but onely with their ſwords and other weapons to exerciſe that force and hardineſſe for which they were eſteemed worthie of that honour. Whereunto the Generall anſwered in moſt haughtie tearmes, and not yeelding one jot to their inciuilitie, but vſing all meanes of authoritie and terror, brought them to worke Chars fortified in 23 dayes ſpace.
ſo much as he deſired. So that within the ſpace of twentie three daies, the towers and wals were F erected, the ditches digged, the artillerie orderly planted vpon the wals, and the water brought round about it. Many inconueniences happened in the armie while they were buſie in this worke; and namely vpon the 25 day of Auguſt, when they had almoſt euen finiſhed the whole Snowes at Chars in Auguſt.
building, the ſouldiors endured a moſt ſudden cold, by reaſon of the ſnow that then fell in great aboundance.

CHARS thus fortified, the Generall resolued to send succours into GEORGIA to TEFLIS; G without which it was most certaine, that the fortresse would be yeelded to the Georgians: but in what sort to relieue it, he remained doubtful. To send part of his army with some valiant captaine, seemed dangerous: and to go himselfe with all his forces, would sound (as he thought) to his discredit with his great lord and master; whom he had already made beleeue, that he had subdued all the Georgians, and brought all that prouince to his obedience & deuotion. In this am-biguitie, the desire he had to preserue his credit with Amurath preuailed: and so he made choise Hassan Bassa sent with 20000 to the succouring of Teflis. of Hassan Bassa of DAMASCO, sonne to Muhamet principall Visier of the court, a gallant gentleman and of great valour, to whom he deliuered betweene eighteene and twentie thousand soul-diors; ioyning vnto him one Resuan captaine of certaine aduenturers, that voluntarily offered themselues to follow the forces of Hassan; assigning vnto him likewise sortie thousand duckats, H and many loads of meale, rise, and barley, with other things necessarie both for diet and war, and so sent him away for TEFLIS.

Hassan with this charge set forward, fully resolued to put these succours into TEFLIS, or to lose all: and at length came to the famous strait of TOMANIS, where the ouergrowne woods on the one side, with the deep vallies and craggie rocks on the other, would astonish a right constant beholder. When vpon the sudden, the Persians and the Georgians (vnder the conduct of Aliculi Chan, and Simon) at vnawares set vpon the Turkes, and ioyned battell with them. For these two valiant captaines remaining for the most part in the borders of TEFLIS and TOMA-NIS with eight thousand souldiors, waiting for some opportunitie to annoy either them of the fort of TEFLIS, or else such as should come to their succours; vnderstanding by their espials of I the comming of Hassan with this aid, had scattered themselues all alongst the said strait, in hope there to assaile the Turks; and holpen by the aduantage of the place, to driue them headlong into the deepe valley, and at once to bereaue them both of their goods and life. But Hassan carefull of nothing more than how to auoid that danger, chose rather to make his iourney through the thicke woods, and so as he might to escape the ambush that the enemie might lay for him vpon that straight passage. And so entring with his armie into the wood, which hee was to haue left The Persians assaile the Turks and make of them a great slaughter. vpon his left hand, to discouer what might be plotted against him, he was hardly charged by the enemie, and constrained to fight with a thousand windings and turnings in and out, through a thousand crooked paths and doubtfull cranks, in a most confused medley, with great slaughter of his men: who not accustomed to this kind of fight, nor acquainted with the situation of the K place, were in the skirmish driuen so farre, that downe they fell, and being not able to recouer themselues, were presently slaine. And thus with much adoe, hee at length passed the strait of TOMANIS. Hassan deeming himselfe much disgraced, by suffering his enemies in number so farre inferiour, to haue done him so much harme, and so to haue escaped his hands: and farther, considering that in such places, sleights and stratagems more auaile then open forces; burning with desire of reuenge, would needs stay neere vnto those straights, as if it had bin to refresh his wearied armie; but in deed to trie if the Persians would aduenture againe to trouble him, or no:
and appoynted Resuan Bassa with certaine bands of the souldiors of GRECE, and of his owne aduenturers, to lie in ambush within the couert of the strait, attentiue to euery stirre of the ene-mie. Two dayes the Turkes armie lay thus diuided, and were now resolued the third day to re- L moouе thence towards TEFLIS: when as the Persian captaines, Aliculi Chan and Simon, vainly imagining that this stay of the Turks was for feare of the Persians, foolishly returned, and gaue giuing a signe to Resuan, with all speed compassed in his enemies, and straightning them on both sides, tooke some of them aliue, cut in pieces othersome, and put the rest all to flight. Among others that were taken aliue, was Aliculi Chan the Persian captaine, who ouer rashly charging vpon the face of Hassan, fell into his hands. The next day following (being the eleuenth day after Hassans departure from CHARS) he ioyfully arriued at TEFLIS, where he found among the poore besieged Turks, many miseries; whereof some were alreadie dead, and some yet sicke:

sed the time: whom Hassan at his arriuall comforted with gifts and good words, exhorting them to persist constant in the seruice of their king, whose honour (as hee said) was neuer more than there to be respected. And for as much as the souldiors of the fort did with one voyce request

Hassan

A Haſſan to appoint them a new Gouernour, becauſe they did all miſlike Mahamet Baſſa, who the laſt yeare was left by the Generall in that fort; Haſſan remoued the ſaid Mahamet, and put Amet Baſſa in his place: and ſo after he had filled vp the places of the dead ſoldiors with a new ſupply, and ſet all things in good order, hee tooke his leaue, recommending the charge and cuſtodie of that fortreſſe to their truſt and valour. Haſſan returning from TEFLIS, and being without any trouble come to the ſtrait of TOMANIS, was aduertiſed by his ſcouts, that it was ſo ſtrongly poſſeſſed by the enemie, and ſo ſhut vp with artillerie, as that it was not to bee paſſed through: for Simon thinking (as indeed it fell out) that Haſſan would returne that way, had ſo belayed that ſtrait, as that the Turks could not without moſt aſſured loſſe paſſe the ſame: which thing much troubled the Baſſa, and filled his head with many conceits, how he might make his iourney ſome
B other way, and decline the danger prepared for him. Thus perplexed, and altogether doubtfull what to doe, or which way to turne himſelfe: Aliculi Chan the Perſian (who to purchaſe his libertie could haue been content to haue done any thing) offered Haſſan to ſhew him a ſhort and ſafe cut, whereby he might without danger paſſe with his armie out of that troubleſome country; yet couenanting before, that he ſhould promiſe him to ſet him at libertie for his ſo good ſeruice. Which his requeſt the Baſſa did not ſticke in large manner to promiſe, although he afterwards to his great diſhonor performed not the ſame: ſo bending his iourney on the right hand, he was guided by Aliculi through ſtrange and vncouth wayes out of thoſe woods and dangers, not meeting ſo much as with any one of his enemies. But when the Perſian duke well hoping for his libertie put the Turk in mind of his promiſe; he with deep and faigned ſighs proteſted, That
C he was right ſorie that he could not performe what he had promiſed to do for him, for as much as it lay not in his power to ſet any man at libertie, that was taken in battell by the ſouldiors of his great lord and ſoueraigne: yet gaue him his faith, that ſo far as his intreaties and fauors with the Generall Muſtapha could preuaile, he would vſe all the moſt earneſt meanes he could to procure his libertie and returne to his owne countrey.

Simon the Georgian perceiuing that the Turks were remoued, imagined forthwith, that they had taken this new way. But being afterward certified by his faithful ſpies, that it was ſo indeed, he ran all headlong & as it were deſperat to meet with this ſo happie an army. And all inflamed with rage for this great fortune of the Turks, he fell vpon the taile of the Turkiſh hoaſt: which D with vnmeaſurable furie he wholly deſtroied, leading away with him all the people, all the horſes, and all the treaſure of Mahomet Baſſa, which he brought from TEFLIS, and all the treaſure of Haſſan Baſſa likewiſe. As for Aliculi Chan, whom Simon moſt greedily ſought for, he was ſent away in the front of the army, & ſo not to be reſcued. Haſſan holding on his way came to CHARS in the ſpace of eight daies after his departure from TEFLIS, and there preſented vnto Muſtapha the Generall the Perſian captaine Aliculi, recounting vnto him the dangers he had endured, and whatſoeuer els had happened in that expedition. Aliculi the vnfortunat Perſian was by the commandement of Muſtapha carried to ERZIRVM, and there in the caſtle committed to priſon. Not long after Muſtapha returned himſelfe alſo to the ſaid citie of ERZIRVM, with his armie ſore weakened and diſcontented, which was there preſently by him diſcharged.

Muſtapha returneth to Erzirum, and there diſchargeth his armie.

About the ſame time that theſe things were in doing, Amurath to make a ſafer and more eaſie paſſage for his forces into GEORGIA, ſent Vluzales his Admirall with a great fleet into the Euxine ſea to MENGRELIA, called in auncient time CHOLCHIS, who entring the famous riuer of Phaſis (now Faſſa) there fortified, and layed ſuch a beginning, that it is now one of the Turkes proud Beglerbegſhips, although thoſe fortifications ſhortly after the departure of the Admiral, were for the preſent againe by the Mengrelians demoliſhed. And this was the end of the ſtirres of this yeare 1579.

Of all theſe ſucceſſes Muſtapha afterwards ſent aduertiſements to the Court to Amurath, recounting vnto him the fortifying of CHARS, the deſerts of Haſſan, as well for the ſuccouring of TEFLIS, as for the taking of Aliculi the Perſian. And becauſe the ſaid Generall had the yeare before perſuaded Amurath, That the country of GEORGIA & the people thereof were brought F vnder his obedience, to the end he ſhould not maruel at ſo many loſſes and ſo many battels, and therby doubt of ſome falſe informations, he declared vnto him, That all theſe troubles were not raiſed by the natural and homebred Georgians, but by two certaine captaines Aliculi and Simon ſent out of PERSIA, who had made all theſe ſtirres: of which one of them now remained with him in priſon, for him to determine of at his pleaſure. With great delight did the Turkiſh emperour read all that Muſtapha had written, and by two of his gentlemen vſhiers ſent to Haſſan a battle axe all guilt, and ſet full of ſtones, a targuet of gold and pearle, and a rich garment of cloth of gold, in reward of his good ſeruice for which hee greatly commended him: and withall gaue order, That Aliculi ſhould be kept where he was in the caſtle of ERZIRVM, in diligent and ſafe cuſtodie. G

Theſe inuaſions of the Turks much troubled the Perſian king in his court at CASBIN, conſidering that now they had both throughly acquainted themſelues with all the paſſages into GEORGIA (in the difficultie and roughneſſe whereof conſiſted the chiefe defence of that prouince) as alſo that diuers of the Georgian princes were more than inclining vnto the Turks ſeruice: ſo that he could not but iuſtly feare, that his enemies would in time begin to pierce into the noble cities of MEDIA the greater, yea and peraduenture euen vnto TAVRIS before any of the reſt: which his care of forraine inuaſion was doubled with domeſticall feares: Mirize Salmas his chiefe Viſier, and vpon whom he moſt reſted, ſtill filling his head with a iealous ſuſpition, That Abas Mirize his ſonne (made Gouernour of HERI by Tamas his grandfather) was about (in theſe troubles with the Turke) to proclame himſelfe king of PERSIA, to the great ignominie of his father, and preiudice of Emir Hamze his eldeſt brother, the worthie and vndoubted heire of that great kingdome. This Mirize Salmas (according to his longing deſire) had married a daughter of his to the ſaid Emir Hamze with the conſent of the king his father: but yet not content with that great honour, ceaſed not continually with ambitious deuiſes, to ſeeke out meanes how to bring to paſſe that the Perſian eſtate might wholly remaine to his ſonne in law, vndeuided and entire from the participation of his brethren: and therefore little regarding the perils that might happen from the Turks, and blinded with the deſire of his owne greatneſſe, he went about to turne the king (being a man very credulous & inconſiderat) againſt Abas Mirize; either to take him and commit him to priſon, or at leaſt to bereaue him of all authoritie & commaund. And the better to perſuade the king thereunto, he diſcouered vnto him how little Abas Mirize his ſonne had reſpected him in diuers occaſions; and that in theſe late wars, he had not ſo much as ſent foorth one man againſt the Turkes, but had forbidden ſuch as were of his iuriſdiction of HERI to come to CASBIN, at ſuch time as they were ſummoned both by letters and commaundement to haue paſſed with Emir Hamze into SIRVAN; by reaſon whereof not one of them would not ſtirre a foot, anſwering, That they were enioyned ſo to doe by Abas Mirize their lord: who had not onely cauſed himſelfe to be called king of HERI, but had giuen it out, that he meant to claime the ſucceſſion in the whole kingdome. Theſe complaints much preuailed with the king, both in reſpect of the loue he bare to Emir Hamze his eldeſt ſonne, and alſo of the credit he gaue to his Viſier: eſpecially being accompanied with the crafty packing of the ſaid Viſier; who as he was verie cunning in ſuch practiſes of himſelfe, ſo did hee make them much more effectuall with the effeminate king by the meanes of diuers great ladies, and other deuiſes that were to him very familiar and vſuall. Inſomuch, that the king carried away with light beliefe, did continually bethink himſelfe how to find opportunitie to repreſſe the boldneſſe of his diſobedient ſon: not forgettiug for al that to make ſuch preparation againſt the Turks, as ſhould be ſufficient to ſtay their paſſage to TAVRIS, if they had any purpoſe ſo to doe. But leauing the Perſian king to his troubled cogitations for a while, let vs againe returne vnto the Turks Generall, the great Baſſa Muſtapha. H I K L

Muſtapha diſcharged of his Generalſhip, & called home to Conſtantinople

Hee now lying at ERZIRVM (after many troubles abroad) was ſurpriſed and almoſt ouerwhelmed with vnexpected quarrels at home, many grieuous complaints being made of him to Amurath, whereby hee was induced afterwards to take from him his Generalſhip, and to call him to the court to giue account of his actions. Which ſeemed not to bee done without cauſe, he hauing before raiſed a great diſcontentment in the mind of Amurath, by ſending ſuch a ſtrong power to the ſuccours of TEFLIS, whereby he couiectured, that the affaires of GEORGIA, were not in ſuch ſecuritie as Muſtapha had already enformed him they were; and alſo generally offended the minds of the ſouldiors of his armie, who all in an vprore accuſed him of improuidency and prodigality, for that now this ſecond yeare he had with ſo much ado gathered together ſuch a number of ſoldiors, to the trouble of the whole empire, and infinit charge of their lord, and yet performed nothing worthie the glorie of Amurath, or anſwerable to ſo great a charge. Which complaints, although they were of ſome moment, yet would the Turkiſh emperor for the great fauours hee bare vnto him his antient tutour, neuer haue conſtrued them ſo hardly againſt him, M

But foraſmuch as the courſe of time and proceſſe of the preſent hiſtorie, bringeth now forth theſe two mightie champions of the Turks togither, the enuious competitours the one of the others honours; who liuing many yeares togither, haue left the woſull remembrance of their greatnes and valour vnto the world, but eſpecially vnto the afflicted ſtate of Chriſtendome, the large wounds by them made, as it were, yet bleeding: ſtay with me a while, and without griefe if thou canſt behold the liuely counterfeits of two ſo great enemies (who both liued within theſe few yeares, and the latter of them died but the other day) as they are by the skilfull hand of the B cunning workeman moſt perfectly deſcribed, and thus to be ſeene.

R. Knolls.

This Sinan was a moſt auncient enemie to Muſtapha, and in all things thought himſelfe his match: For if Muſtapha had ſubdued CYPRVS, ſo had he conquered TRIPOLIS, GVLETTA, with the kingdome of TVNES in AFFRICKE: and if Muſtapha were a man of great courage, and reuerend for his yeres, Sinan would be his equall both in the one and the other: yea and did

A not sticke to thinke himselfe his better too, for that in the enterprise of GIAMEN in ARABIA, he performed such an exploit as Mustapha neither durst nor yet knew how to put in execution, so carrying away the glorie of that famous conquest: for which euer after there was betweene them a continual heart burning, one of them enuying at the others glorie, and both in word and deed, as occasions fell out, in all things opposing themselues one against the other. At last happens this opportunitie for Sinan: who taking the occasion of the complaints of so many against Mustapha, caused a great number of them to frame their supplications to Amurath (which hee for his part did in most malignant manner enforce and exaggerat against his old aduersarie) accusing him that this second yere he had most manifestly shewed himselfe to haue gone vnto the wars not as a worthie Generall desirous of noble and honourable enterprises, but as a man that
B would make merchandise of bloud, and of his soldiors paies; employing the most liberall prouision of corne and mony not as rewards of well deseruing men, nor to the erecting of such fabricks, as were needfull, and might haue bin built therwithall, but only to his own proper gaine; so to inrich himselfe with his peoples losses, to the great shame of his lord, and consuming of the publicke treasure: adding hereunto, that if the things done by Mustapha were well searched, it would be found, that he had neglected many good opportunities, attempted many things in vaine, and not done any good either to the emperor or his soldiors, but only to himselfe: whom rather than they would follow againe, as their Generall, all his people in an vprore shewed themselues readie and willing to aduenture themselues in any other far greater labour that by their lord and soueraigne should be commanded them.

C These and such like camplaints, with the hard opinion alreadie conceiued against him by Amurath, were the occasion why he resolued to put him from his place. Beside that, he thought it a thing dangerous to his state, to suffer one and the selfesame Generall any long time to command ouer so great armies, deeming it not so much for his honour still to imploy one man, as to shew that he had varietie and choice of subiects, worthie of so great a charge. And therefore being desirous to find out the truth of that was reported to him concerning Mustapha, he sent the chiefe of his gentlemen porters with fifteene others to bring him to the Court, with his Chancellor and Treasurer, to shew the accounts of such monies as he had receiued, and to giue vp an account of their whole office. Vnto this messenger had Amurath deliuered three diuers letters, which he should warily shew as occasion serued: one of them was so written of purpose,
D that Mustapha in the receiuing thereof might by the same messengers be strangled: in the second was the emperors warrant for the doing of that was to them commanded: and in the third was contained, that Mustapha should forthwith send his chancellor and treasurer to the Court by those messengers. Mustapha in the meane time by diuers means, but especially by the guilt of his owne conscience, venting the displeasure of the emperour towards him, and suspecting (as the truth was) his life to be by those messengers sought after, at such time as the captain porter came to his campe, found many delaies to put him off, and would not in any case be spoken withall. But when the messenger would endure no longer delay, he was at length admitted to his presence, hauing a circle appointed for him, out of which he and his companions might not stirre or approch neerer vnto him, the Bassaes guard standing in armes round about him. The messen-
E ger perceiuing the Bassaes warines, wilely pluckt forth the third letters, concerning the sending of his Chauncellor and Treasurer to the Court. Then began the craftie old Bassa to find many excuses to haue delayed the matter: but being hardly pressed by the messenger, and seeing no other remedie, he with much difficultie deliuered them both, couenanting before with the messenger to haue both their liues spared: who comming to CONSTANTINOPLE, where forthwith clapt fast into the tower called IADICVLA, as there to haue been seuerely examined of all the doings of the Bassa. But Mustapha after long delay comming at length to CONSTANTINOPLE the ninth of Aprill in the Spring following, and vsing the mightie & potent mediation
F of diuers great ladies and other his gratious friends in Court, preuailed so much in that corrupt gouernment, as that he was againe at length receiued into the fauour of Amurath, without any further proceeding against him, his chancellor, or treasurer, who by his meanes were afterwards also enlarged and set at libertie: yet was he neuer after admitted to those honours, which he persuaded himselfe were of right due vnto him, for his good and faithfull seruice of long time done to the Othoman emperors.

Mustapha by the mediation of certain great ladies appeaseth the displeasure of Amurath.

In this time that Mustapha was Generall at ERZIRVM, Muhamet the Visier Bassa was treacherously cherouſly ſlaine at CONSTANTINOPLE: after whom ſhortly after died alſo Achmet Baſſa, who ſucceeded in his place: ſo that the ſaid ſoueraign dignitie, in honour next vnto the Turkiſh emperour, was by rightfull ſucceſſion due to Muſtapha the next Baſſa; but that he was not thought worthie of it by him that might and of right ought to haue gratified him therewith, as ſhall be a little hereafter declared, when we haue briefely ſet downe the ſudden and ſtrange death of the ſaid Muhamet the Viſier, worthie in all hiſtories to be regiſtred, as a mirrour for all ſuch as adminiſter iuſtice in ſo great place, to looke vpon. G

The ſtrange death of the great Viſier Baſſa Muhamet

This Baſſa, a man of as great fame as euer was any that had gouernment in the Othoman empire, in the time that he all commanded, had for ſome light cauſes depriued a certaine ſouldiour of CONSTANTINOPLE of his yearely penſion, which with many labours and dangers hee had gotten to maintaine himſelfe, which penſion the Baſſa beſtowed vpon another ſouldiour, ſo that the other poore ſoule remained in miſerie, altogither vnprouided for. Vnto which miſerable eſtate ſeeing him ſelfe now brought, and not guiltie to himſelfe of any fault worthy ſo great puniſhment, he determined with himſelfe to reuenge the iniurie with the bloud of that great Baſſa, and to bereaue him of life that had bereft him of liuing: which becauſe he could not by any fit meanes put in execution (by reaſon of the guard of ſlaues that keepe the perſon of the Viſier, ſo that no man can come neere him that holdeth that high place) except he could by ſome meanes acquaint himſelfe in the Viſiers houſe, & ſo inſinuat himſelfe into his acquaintance; he reſolued to take vpon him the rude habit of thoſe religious which the Turks call Deruiſlars, and after their manner to preſent himſelfe euerie morning before the Viſier to aske his almes: and ſo hee did, counterfeiting withall a certaine kind of follie and lightneſſe of mind, as do thoſe Deruiſlars, to make the people beleeue, that they contemne all worldly things, as men rauiſhed onely with heauenly cogitations, which yet was by ſome that knew him thought to haue happened in him, through the griefe he had conceiued for the loſſe of his ſtipend. Muhamet not onely the firſt time, but alſo at all other times that this counterfeit hypocrite came before him, cauſed him to be comforted with his almes, and as it were with a kind or priuat ſtipend, enioyned him euery morning to come vnto him into the Diuano, and there togither with others appointed for the ſame purpoſe, to ſay his deuout prayers, and in ſinging praiſes to their wicked Prophet, to entreat God for his ſaluation: for it is a cuſtome of all the noblemen, that at ordinarie houres of prayers all their prieſts aſſemble themſelues in the Diuano, which is made readie for them, and there all togither the infidell wretches do with their vncleane mouthes mumble vp their ſuperſtitious prayers or rather moſt abhominable blaſphemies. By this meanes did this diſſembling companion ſo inſinuat himſelfe into the Viſiers acquaintance, that the counterfeit foole went in and out of the Diuano at his pleaſure, no man gaineſaying either his going in or comming out, but dayly ſat in the preſence of the Viſier, and ſo hauing ſaid his prayers, and taken his almes, with all reuerence quietly departed. At laſt when the craftie hypocrite thought that the time was come wherein he might moſt fitly execute his purpoſe, hauing vtterly reſolued with himſelfe to die, ſo that he might ſatisfie the deſire he had of reuenge, ſo long couertly foſtered in his heart; hauing conueied a very ſharpe dagger ſecretly into one of his ſleeues, he went according to his cuſtome, to require his almes, with an aſſured reſolution (when he had ſaid his prayers, and reached out his hands to receiue his wonted almes) ſpeedily to charge vpon the Viſier, and with the dagger to ſtrike him to the heart. According to the accuſtomed manner was the counterfeit hypocrit (for who would euer haue ſuſpected ſo long and ſo traiterous a deſignment) admitted into the Diuano, where Muhamet the Viſiar ſat in his houſe, to giue publike audience, and after the vſuall manner, before any of the ſuters that attended for anſwers and diſpatch of their buſineſſe ſuſpected any ſuch deceit, he was admitted neere vnto the Viſier, & ſitting right againſt him, according to his old wont poured out thoſe vain deuotions which thoſe hypocritical Barbarians vſe to mumble vp in their prayers: which being finiſhed, whileſt the Viſier ſimply reacheth vnto him his wonted almes, the trayterous villaine in receiuing it ſuddenly drew out his dagger, and once or twice ſtabbed it into the Viſiers breaſt, out of which ſo deadly wounds guſhed out his bloud and life togither. Whereupon the ſtanders by aſtonied with the ſtrangneſſe of the act, ran in, but loe the old hoarie Viſier lay all ſoyled in his owne bloud, deadly pale, and breathing forth his laſt gaſpe. The miſchieuous murtherer they preſently laied hands vpon, and bound him faſt: but the rumour of the ſtrange fact did by and by flie vnto the emperors eares: who ſuſpecting that ſome of the other great Baſſaes deſiring to mount into that high dignitie, H I K L M had

A had prouoked the traitor to doe this deteſtable act, would needes vnderſtand of the traiterous murderer, What occaſion had mooued him ſo trecherouſly to kill his Viſier. Who reſolutely anſwered him, That he did it to deliuer the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE from the tyrannie of him, by whom he was vndeſeruedly deprined of his penſion. But when he could get no other anſwere of him, he deliuered him into the hands of the ſlaues of the dead Viſier, who with moſt exquiſit torments put him to death.

Muhamet thus dead, after him ſucceeded Achmetes the next Baſſa, who (as is before ſaid) ſhortly after died alſo; ſo that it was now Muſtapha his courſe to ſucceed in that chiefe roome, for that he was the third in the order of the Baſſaes. But when he had vſed all the meanes that he poſſibly could, to haue obtained that ſo honorable a place by order due vnto him; yet could he not find
B ſo much grace in the ſight of Amurath his great lord, as to haue it granted him vnder ſeale, although in effect he made him ſit as Viſier, and all matters of ſtate were brought vnto him as chiefe Viſier: but in his ſtead the ſeale was ſent to Sinan Baſſa, who was now made Generall for the Perſian wars. Which diſgrace not a little diſcontented Muſtapha, fearing leaſt ſome other ſtrange accident ſhould in ſhort time light vpon him.

After that Muſtapha was thus diſplaced from his Generalſhip, Amurath nominated Sinan 1580.
Baſſa to be Generall in his ſtead for this expedition againſt the Perſians, and for the preſeruation Sinan Baſſa chooſen Generall for the Perſian war.
of CHARS and TEFLIS; giuing him ſoueraigne authoritie to commaund, and to ſet in order all
C ſuch preparations as he ſhould thinke neceſſary for ſuch enterpriſes as he ſhould thinke good to attempt in his firſt yere: who although by reaſon of his great fauour he grew haughtie and glorious, yet did he not foreſlow to diſcourſe throughly with himſelfe vpon all his deſignments: and namely, beſide the ſuccouring of TEFLIS, he determined to build a fort at TOMANIS, to aſſure the paſſage thither from CHARS; and withall to attempt all the meanes he could to induce the Perſian king to ſend embaſſadors for peace, with ſuch conditions as ſhould be acceptable to Amurath. With theſe and ſuch like diſcourſes did he buſie himſelfe whileſt he was yet making preparation to ſet forwards towards ERZIRVM.

Of all theſe changes and alterations was the Perſian king aduertiſed, as alſo that this new Turkiſh Generall Sinan was carefull, how this long warre might by ſome meanes be appeaſed and a good peace concluded. Vpon which occaſion, and by the perſuaſion of Leumtogli the Georgian, and of Mirize Salmas his Viſier, he was induced to ſend embaſſadors to CONS TAN-
(of ſome called Maxudes) his embaſſador, with direction that he ſhould go to Sinan, and of him to receiue guides to conduct him to CONSTANTINOPLE with letters to Amurath, & as much as lay in him to labour for the pacifying of all theſe troubles: and in any caſe to conclude vpon it, ſo that he would be content with CHARS and TEFLIS. With theſe inſtructions the embaſſador departed, and at length arriued at CHARS, and ſo came to ERZIRVM, and was from thence conducted towards AMASIA. But when he came to SIVAS, he found Sinan the Generall there
E encamped, gathering togither his armie for the execution of his deſignments: for Sinan vpon the arriuall of Muſtapha, departing from CONSTANTINOPLE the fiue and twentieth day of Aprill, was now come ſo farre on his way. Of the comming of this embaſſador, The Turks receiued great ioy, and newes thereof was in poſt ſent by Cicala Baſſa to the court. The Perſian embaſſadour enformed Sinan of all that he had to treat with Amurath on the behalfe of king Mahamet; and laboured earneſtly to perſuade him, of the equitie of the cauſe, & of his requeſt: declaring vnto him, that for as much as both the nations were conioyned vnder the law of Mahomet their common prophet (though there ſeemed ſome ſmall difference not worth thoſe troubles) it were a verie inconuenient thing for them to contend among themſelues, and to ſeeke the ouerthrow or vtter deſtruction of one another: and that therefore he was in good hope to obtaine of Amurath this deſired peace, if he had no other cauſe wherewith he found himſelfe agrieued, as in truth he had not. Wherefore he beſought the Generall, that he would with ſafe conuoy
F conduct him to Amurath, to the end that if it were poſſible theſe bloudie wars might take end; at the very report whereof the reſt of the world reioiced, and ſtood attentiuely waiting to ſee what would be the iſſue thereof.

This embaſſador, Sinan entertained after the beſt manner the rudeneſſe of his nature would affoord: and thinking that the very fame of his valour, had wrought in the minds of his enemies this reſolution to come to demand peace, granted vnto the embaſſador a ſure conuoy to conduct him to CONSTANTINOPLE; and wrote to Amurath in his letters, all that he thought G was fit to be demanded, representing vnto him what great & important matters (he hoped) might now be obtained. But before he dismissed the said embassadour, he aduised him not to goe to The admonition of Sinan the Persian embassador. Amurath, without resolution to offer vnto him some great good conditions, and to yeeld vnto him all that countrie which he by force of armes had before conquered: for he knew the mind of Amurath verie well, that he was resolued in himselfe, not to yeeld so much as one hand breadth of that ground which hee had woon with the sword. Which motion of the prowd Bassa so troubled the embassador, that fearing he should not be able to conclude any thing, he stood in doubt whether to proceed on his iourney to CONSTANTINOPLE, or to return backe againe into PERSIA: but considering better what belonged to his dutie in so waightie a businesse, and hoping to receiue more reasonable conditions from the mouth of Amurath himselfe; H he gaue large words to Sinan, and so with a safe conuoy departed from SIVAS, and by long iournies came to SCVTARI, and so passing ouer that little strait, the fourth of August arriued at CON-STANTINOPLE.

The preparations of the Persian king against the Turkes. The Persian king in the meane time, stirred vp with the report of the Turks preparations; to cause it to be noised, that he likewise intended some important matters, commaunded all the Chans and Gouernours of his kingdome, to meet togither with all their forces at TAVRIS, where he himselfe with the prince Emir Hamze his sonne met them. And after many consultations there had for the repressing of the Trukish inuasion (for as yet it was not certainly known what Sinan meant to attempt) he resolued to send souldiors into GEORGIA towards TEFLIS, whether of necessitie succours must be sent by the Turks to them of the fort: and withall, deter- I mined also to go himselfe withall his armie from TAVRIS to CARACACH, a place very commodious and neere to guard both TAVRIS and SIRVAN, being situat euen in the middest betweene the one and the other; and there to expect the remouing of Sinan, whose ambitious nature the king knowing, doubted that he to surmount Mustapha, would attempt some great enterprise, yea peraduenture to run euen vpon TAVRIS. But when it came to the point that he should send some of his captains into GEORGIA, he made choise of such as had best experience of those countries, and were neerest vnto them: with whom he sent Tocomac also, and the rest whose seruice he had before vsed against the Turks; commanding them to ioine their forces with Simon the Georgian, and by all meanes possible to annoy the enemie: whom if they should perceiue to bend for TAVRIS, they should not faile to follow him; to the end they might ioine togither K with him, and so incounter the enemies armie. All those captaines were resolute men, and led with them ten thousand souldiors; which being ioined with them of GEORGIA, amounted to the number of thirteene thousand: who arriuing at GENGE, gaue knowledge to Simon of their comming, and that in his behalfe they were readie to do great matters.

Now was the Persian embassadour with all due honour receiued at CONSTANTINOPLE, where he was honourably entertained by the great Bassaes of the court, but especially by Mustapha, who within two daies after suddenly died; of a surfeit taken of eating too much of muske Melons, and immoderat drinking of Zerbet (a kind of pleasant drinke which the Turkes vse, made of water and sugar:) but most men thought him to haue poisoned himselfe, as fearing the former indignation of Amurath to bee againe inflamed by the new complaints of the Persian L embassadour against him, for that he in the time of his Generalship had dishonourably suppressed certaine embassages sent from the Persian king; which he now fearing to bee called in question for, the former storms as yet scarce well appeased, made himself now away. After his death it was commonly reported, that if he had longer liued he should haue been vndoubtedly strangled: which to preuent, he became the worthie executioner of himselfe, that had most vniustly caused others to be most shamefully murdered. Which was the more like to be true, & the rather beleiued, for that the infinit wealth he had of long time scraped togither, was immediatly after his death taken into the kings treasures, some small portion therof being left vnto his nephews:
a most certaine token of Amuraths indignation against him. The Persian embassadour hauing M audience the seuenth of August, with many liuely reasons and much eloquence, persuaded the Turkish emperour to desist from the warre begun, as contrarie to the will and pleasure of their common Prophet Mahomet: as also to the peace, which was so roially, and with so many capi-tulations, not long before concluded between Tamas and Solyman his grandfather; and was not to haue bin broken and warres raised, but vpon some great quarrell or iniurie done; which the

Persians

A Perſians had not at any time offered, but had alwaies wiſhed vnto him all happineſſe; as they had manifeſtly declared, by ſending vnto him an embaſſage to that purpoſe by Sultan Tocomac: whereby he might plainly perceiue, the good mind and zeale the Perſian king had for the maintenance of the peace. And although in the ſhort raigne of Iſmahel, there was ſome rumor raiſed that he meant to go vnto BABYLONIA, and ſome ſuch like newes: yet that was but a youthfull part, and an effect of that heat which is commonly proper to ſuch as being kept long in ſtraight priſon cannot vſe their libertie with moderation, and had therefore receiued due puniſhment for it, by ſudden and vnexpected death. But as for the king that now is, he did aboue all others imbrace amitie with his maieſtie; and therefore did moſt earneſtly deſire, that it would pleaſe him to temper his anger conceiued, which had incenſed him to take vp armes againſt a king ſo
B much his friend, being of the ſame religion, and better affected towards him than all the reſt of the nations in the world.

This embaſſadour the Turkiſh emperour diſmiſſed without any reſolution at all; but onely gaue order, that whatſoeuer he had to ſay touching this peace, he ſhould communicat it with his Viſier. Many were the diſcourſes which happened; for that the Turk required all thoſe cities and countries, which till that time he had conquered with the ſword, or (as their prowd manner of phraſe is) wheron his Generals horſe had trod, to be yeelded againe vnto him: and the embaſſadour on the other ſide, had no warrant from his king to yeeld any more than that part of GEORGIA which is on this ſide the riuer of Araxis. Whereupon the ſaid embaſſadour began to feare, leaſt he ſhould be ſuſpected for a ſpie, and ſo be euill intreated: wherwithall he did find himſelfe
C too manifeſtly charged by the hard ſpeech that the Viſier vſed towards him. Being thus doubtfull whereupon to reſolue, perceiuing himſelfe ſtrained to the grant of theſe demands, and receiuing alſo ſome threatnings withall, he determined with himſelfe to enlarge his ſpeeches with the Viſier in diuers and ſundrie particularities, and to giue him good hope that he ſhould be able to perſuade with his king, the yeelding vp of ſo much as Amurath had and did demand. Hereupon was Maxut Chan the embaſſador in friendly maner and without any outrage ſent from CONSTANTINOPLE to CHARS, and commiſſion giuen to Sinan (then at CHARS) that without delay, and with all fidelitie, he ſhould cauſe the embaſſador to be conducted to VAN, and from thence into PERSIA, whereſoeuer he did deſire: all which was faithfully performed.

But to returne againe to Sinan the Generall, who from SIVAS had ſent the ſaid embaſſador to Sinan muſtereth his armie at Erzirum.
D CONSTANTINOPLE (as is before declared:) and being departed thence, arriued at ERZIRVM, where he tooke a ſuruey of his armie, and other prouiſion neceſſarie for this expedition: and ſo from thence was now come to CHARS, from whence he diſpatched the Perſian embaſſadour, much diſcontented that no other concluſion for peace could be wrought.

Maxut Chan at laſt arriuing at the Perſian Court, reported vnto the king all that had happened in this his embaſſage: the ſumme whereof was, That Amurath would not condiſcend to any condition of peace, vnleſſe the whole countrie of SIRVAN might be yeelded vnto him, for that he had once (as he ſaid) conquered the ſame. Neither did the ſame embaſſadour forbeare to tell the king, the ſuſpition Amurath had conceiued of him, to haue beene a ſpie rather than an em-
E baſſador; and of the large promiſes he was faine to make to the Turke, to auoid the manifeſt danger of impriſonment or death: all which for all that, now lay in his maieſties power to performe or not. The king for the preſent remained well ſatisfied with that Maxut had done, and in reward of his great trauell and expences, gaue him the charge of the chamber at TAVRIS, naming him the chamberlaine of that rich and great citie. Of which new office (though verie honourable and of great importance) he tooke ſmall pleaſure, for that one Emir Chan his auntient enemie was chiefe Gouernour of that citie, from whom he feared ſome dangerous treacherie: wherefore he appointed his deputie for the execution of the office, and withdrew himſelfe from TAVRIS to CASSANGICH, a place of his owne, there to paſſe away the time vntill it ſhould pleaſe the king otherwiſe to diſpoſe of him. But Emir Chan, who ſtill nouriſhed in his mind the ancient hatred he had conceiued againſt him, tooke this as a moſt fit occaſion to bring him into F diſgrace with the king: certifying him, That Maxut not contented with the great preferment it had pleaſed him to beſtow vpon him, had in contempt of his rewards abandoned TAVRIS, and ſubſtituted in his place a moſt baſe perſon to repreſent the kings maieſtie & to mannage his treaſure: and that he abſented himſelfe far from that citie and the court there, hauing withdrawne himſelfe into the confines of TVRKIE, no doubt for ſome miſchieuous intent, either to yeeld himselfe vnto them, or els to haue intelligence with them, and was like ynough to be guiltie to himselfe of the great errour he had alreadie committed, by offering SIRVAN vnto the Turkish king; and making promise of so large conditions, whereby he had obtained such a sure and safe conuoy to conduct him; when as he had before discouered himself to be a fauorer of the Turks, and a traitor to his owne king: and that therefore it were good to make triall of his inclination, and so peraduenture to decline some great mischiefe, tending to the danger of the Persian state. This malitious accusation slily contriued, so wrought in the mind of the suspitious king, that he commanded Emir Chan secretly to apprehend Maxut, and to bring him to the Court, and (if he could not by other meanes) than by torture to wrest from him the truth of all those matters. Glad was Emir to haue his enemie thus put into his hands, and thought it long vntill he had brought this shame vpon Maxut: who hauing alreadie heard some inckling thereof, resolued with himselfe to doe any thing, rather than to fall into the power of his hatefull enemie. And therfore at such time as fifteen tall fellowes were for that purpose sent vnto him from Emir Chan, who in the kings name summoned him to the Court, he without making any shew that he took the matter otherwise than well, entertained them courteously, and made them great cheere: but when he perceiued them to be ouercome with sleepe, which crept vpon them by reason of the excesse wherwith they had ouercharged themselues, he caused them to be straightly bound, and with long cords hanged them down into a deepe well, and there shut them vp, secretly couered. Then gathering togither the most pretious things he had in his house, and setting his wiues, his children, his brethren, and nephewes on horsebacke, fled with all his familie in the euening, and the next day arriued at SALMAS, and was there friendly entertained by the Trukish Bassa, and from thence conueyed to VAN, where he was also courteously welcommed by Cicala Bassa, and honourably accompanied, sent to Sinan the Generall, who very glad of his comming, sent him with all diligence to CONSTANTINOPLE to Amurath. And this was in effect the end of the first enterparlance of peace betwixt the Persians and the Turks.

Sinan remained at CAARS eight daies, and there againe surueyed his armie and prouision, and afterwards set forward towards TOMANIS, with resolution there to build a fort. But being come thither, he could by no means put that his designement in execution, by reason of the immoderat raine, which continually by the space of eight daies fell in such abundance, as that neither did the Sunne appeare, or the skie cleare. Beside that, Sinan greatly feared least the enemie taking the opportunitie of this raine, of the straight, and of the building, should assault his armie, and finding it in euill plight and out of order, greatly endamage it: Wherefore casting off his former determination for fortifying at TOMANIS, he remoued thence, to carrie succours to TEFLIS. But as soone as he was risen with his armie, and past the strait, Tal-Ogli captaine of the Ianizaries of DAMASCO, and Homar Sanzack of SAFFETO, hauing receiued secret intelligence that hard by a little out of the way, was good store both of corne and cattel, resolued with themselues to go thither to fetch in that bootie: and so with two thousand souldiors greedie of prey they set forward. Now Simon the Georgian and the Persians, following the Turkes armie afar off, had diuided his souldiors into all such places as where there was either corne, or water, or any such thing as might allure the Turks to scatter themselues from the campe: and perceiuing these hungrie Turks carelesly to run headlong to lay hold on this desired bootie, he suddenly fell vpon them, and cut them in pieces, being disordered, so that of those two thousand escaped but Tal-Ogli the captaine of the Ianizaries only, Homar the Sanzacke, and all the rest being left dead vpon the ground.

Sinan commeth to Tefis.

Sinan holding on his way, in two daies came to TEFLIS, where presently he called a counsell of all the chiefmen of his armie, taking order, That euery man vpon his oath should depose the truth touching the greatnesse of TEFLIS: which he did only in reproach of Mustapha the great Bassa, who most vntruly had informed Amurath, That it was as great and populous as DAMASCO; whereas in truth it was not in any respect to be compared vnto that so famous a citie. After that he diuided the treasure and succours he had brought, amongst the souldiours of the fortresse, chearing them vp with good words and promises of great matters. And because the souldiors there in garrison complained greatly against the Bassa their captaine, he caused a bill of complaint to be framed against him, & finding him guiltie that he had conuerted the souldiors pay to his owne vse, he condemned him to the restitution thereof, and so immediatly discharging him of his office, placed in his roome Guisuf Bey, a lord of GEORGIA, who for the antient

A tient enmitie betweene him and Simon, had yeelded himselfe to the Turkes, and was of them so welcommed, that Sinan trusted him with the custodie of that fort, which with so many dangers had been maintained and defended till that day.

All things thus set in order at TEFLIS, Sinan with his armie departed thence, and hauing againe passed the strait of TOMANIS, there came vnto him Mustaffad Bassa, afterward Gouernour of ALEPPO, declaring vnto him, That not farre off was great store of corne and cattell, and no body but only a few Georgians to keep the same, and therfore wished him to send forth some to fetch it in: whereof (though it had been much more) his armie then stood in great need. Sinan was well affected vnto this Mustaffad, and therefore the easilier enduced by him to send for the aforesaid bootie: but moued with the fresh remembrance of that which had happened to Tal-Ogli and Homar, he gaue order, That to fetch in this corne and cattell there should goe out ten thousand horsemen and their seruants, among whom was also the same Mustaffad as their Generall. Now stood Tocomac, Simon, and the other Persian captaines in secret ambush, waiting when any of the Turkes should come to fetch in this bootie. Whereupon the aforesaid souldiors being now come, as they desired, and hauing almost charged all their mules and horses with that which best pleased them to make choice of: the hidden Persians all on a sudden issued out of their lurking places amongst them, and with great slaughter put them to flight, and with such fury pursued the victory, that they slew of them seuen thousand, carried away many prisoners aliue, and the mules and horses laden with the stolne bootie. Mustaffad was the first that fled, and the first that brought the vnhappy news of that ouerthrow to Sinan: which was forthwith confirmed by the report of such as had by speedy flight escaped the fury of the enemy. Wherupon Sinan dispatched away the Bassa of CARAMANIA with a great power, charging him whersoeuer he should find the enemie, to set vpon him: and presently rising himselfe with his whole campe, followed the said Bassa. But all too late, for the Persians after the aforesaid victory, without staying had withdrawn themselues into their strong places, knowne onely to such as were well acquainted with the difficult passages of GEORGIA: and hauing there disposed of their prey, were now returning to await some fresh occasion of new slaughter. But when they descried the whol armie of the Turks vpon the rising of a certaine hill, they were afraid to meet them, yea & stood in some doubt also, lest Sinan should descend from the hill, and so assault them: for which cause they retired themselues againe into the strength of the mountaines: yet not with such speed, but that the Turks ouertooke some few of them, and slew about fiftie or threescore of them, whose heads in signe of triumph they caried a good part of their way vpon the points of their speares: and tooke prisoners about threescore and ten moe.

Seuen thousand Turkes slaine by the Georgians and Persians.

At last Sinan with all his armie hauing passed these dangerous places of GEORGIA, arriued at TRIALA, where it was told him, That the Persian king in person himselfe being alreadie departed from TAVRIS, with an exceeding great army was comming to bid him battell. At which news he caused proclamation to be presently made thorow all his army, That euery man should put himselfe in readinesse for the voyage to TAVRIS, whether he himselfe meant to go to meet with the king his enemie. In the meane time (as is reported) hee dispatched certaine posts to the Persian king, then at CARACACH, to entreat him to send another embassadour to Amurath for peace, thinking by that meanes (as some doe coniecture) to remoue the king from the resolution of comming to assaile him, if he had any such meaning. After this proclamation made, he descended into the open and large plains of CHEILDER, where presently he mustered his whole armie, and gaue it out, That before he would set forward toward TAVRIS, hee would make triall of the readinesse and nimblenesse of his souldiors, in such sort, as if they should presently ioyne battell with the enemy: which without further delay he put in execution the next morning, formally raunging his whole armie in order of battell; and then sending out some few others, to shew themselues vpon the tope of certaine hils, as if they had bin enemies that came to seize vpon his army; he caused all his artillery to be discharged, and commanded euery man to skirmish and bestirre himselfe, altogether after the same manner as if the enemie had beene there present before them: where the thundering of the great and small shot, the thicke stormes of arrowes, with the brightnesse of the armour and weapons, yeelding foorth lightnings as if it had beene fiery beames, and the noise of drums and trumpets and other instruments of warre, with the ensignes of blew and yellow flying in the wind, made such a medly of all things, as if it had beene the turmoile of a very battell indeed. In the end he caused the retreat to be sounded: and then

Theſe counterfeit ſhewes of war thus finiſhed, yet did he not ſet forward toward TAVRIS, as he had giuen it out, but loytered eight daies in thoſe plaines of CHIELDER. At which time there arriued out of PERSIA, one Aider the Aga, as an embaſſadour from the king, who was by Sinan with great ioy entertained. Diuers were the things by this embaſſadour propounded, ſuch as had Muxut Chan before: but the concluſion of all was, that the Perſian king would be content voluntarily to relinquiſh CHARS and TEFLIS, and ſo remaine (as hee did before) in amitie with Amurath, and ſo deſired Sinan to conclude a peace with his maſter, if it might be: as for himſelfe, this meſſage done, hee was preſently to returne into PERSIA. For this peace Sinan promiſed to deale with Amurath, ſo H that the Perſian king would ſend another embaſſadour to CONSANTINOPLE. Vpon which concluſion the ſaid Aider returned into PERSIA, and at TAVRIS declared to the king what hee had ſeene, what promiſes he had receiued of Sinan, and withall exhorted him to ſend a new embaſſadour vnto the Turkiſh Court. After this, when the publike rumour of the comming of the Perſian king, was found to be falſe, Sinan in ſtead of going to TAVRIS, returned to CHARS, where he idlely ſtayed a whole moneth with the generall marueiling and murmuring of all his armie, aſtoniſhed to ſee themſelues (to the great charges of their king, and the diſturbance of his whole kingdome) brought foorth not for any honourable conqueſt, but as it were onely of purpoſe to make a vaine ſhew of warre.

Sinan commeth to Erzirum, and there breaketh vp his armie. At laſt he departed from CHARS, for that now Winter was come on, and the froſtes and I ſnowes did his armie great harme: and ſo comming to ERZIRVM, there preſently diſmiſſed euery man to goe and winter in his owne countrey, but remained ſtill himſelfe in the ſame citie: from whence hee by ſpeedie poſts diligently enformed Amurath of the ſuccours he had left at TEFLIS, of the loſſes he had receiued from the enemy, of all that which was by Muſtapha miſreported, of the comming of the Perſian embaſſadour to him, of the promiſe made vnto him touching a new embaſſadour; and to be ſhort, of all his whole actions. Beſides all this, he aduertiſed Amurath, That the enterpriſe of PERSIA was a verie hard, long, and difficult matter, and ſuch a one as needed another manner of preparation than had been as yet appoynted for it: and that if he deſired to ſubdue PERSIA, it were then very neceſſarie that hee ſhould ſpeake with him at large, and diſcourſe vpon many particularities, which could not ſo well without exceeding tedi- K ouſneſſe be declared by writing. After that he ſent other meſſengers alſo to ſollicit Amurath for his returne to CONSTANTINOPLE, continually telling him, That it was not poſſible for him to ſignifie by writing what hee purpoſed to report to him by word of mouth, for the better accompliſhing of the enterpriſe begun. Nothing in the world did Sinan abhorre more than this warre, hauing his mind altogether bent againſt the affaires of the Chriſtians in EVROPE, and therfore ſought by all meanes poſſible for the diuerting of thoſe warres from the Eaſt into ſome other quarters. At laſt he wrought ſo much, he entreated ſo much, hee writ ſo many letters, and ſollicited the matter ſo earneſtly, that Amurath was perſuaded to ſend for him to CONSTANTINOPLE, as ſoone as euer he was certified of the arriuall of the new embaſſadour from PERSIA, of whom Sinan had before aduertiſed him: for he was reſolued either to grow to a peace with L the ſaid embaſſadour, if he came with honourable conditions; or if he came not, or that after his cõming they could not agree vpon the peace, then to put in execution thoſe his conceits wherof he muſt needs in particular talke with Sinan by word of mouth. At length the promiſed embaſſador called Ebraim Chan, a man of great eloquence, and highly honoured in PERSIA, came to Sinan, whereof Sinan gaue preſent intelligence to Amurath, beſeeching him againe to permit him to come to CONSTANTINOPLE: which his requeſt Amurath then graunted. Whereupon Sinan forthwith returned to the Court, where he attended the vniuerſall gouernment of the whole empire. At his firſt comming to the preſence of Amurath (wherein he diſcourſed not with him of any thing, but of the comming of the Perſian embaſſadour) the conditions were ſet downe, which they were to require for the reducing of the capitulations of this peace to a good M end. After which agreement the embaſſadour (being now come, and moſt magnificently receiued in CONSTANTINOPLE) had audience: at which time hee with much glorious ſpeech laboured to perſuade Amurath, That his king had a moſt ardent deſire to bee reconciled vnto him, and to ioyne his forces with his againſt the enemies of the Mahometan religion, and that for that purpoſe

A poſe he was now eſpecially come thither: which his good purpoſe, if it were anſwered with like zeale on his part, there would thereof enſue the greateſt vnitie and friendſhip that euer was between any Mahometane princes. Whereunto Amurath gaue him no other anſwere, but that he ſhould therof talk with his Viſier, and with him entreat of all matters concerning the peace: and ſo he was by Amurath entertained and diſmiſſed, both at one time.

Now had Amurath called to CONSTANTINOPLE his eldeſt ſonne Mahomet, (who afterward ſucceeded him in the empire) being then about ſixteen yeres old, to circumciſe him according to the cuſtome of the Turkes; following therein the inueterat law of the Hebrewes. Vnto which ſolemnitie, many Chriſtian princes were ſolemnly inuited; who accordingly ſent thither their embaſſadours with great gifts and preſents, in token of peace and confederacie, B namely, Rudolphus the emperour, Henrie the third the French king, Stephen king of POLONIA: the State of VENICE, the king of PERSIA, the Moore kings of MAROCCO and FES, the princes of MOLDAVIA, VALACHIA, and others. With all triumph and ioy was the circumciſion of this young prince ſolemniſed, by the ſpace of fortie daies & fortie nights, in the great market place of CONSTANTINOPLE, where all the embaſſadours aforeſaid had their ſcaffolds prepared and furniſhed according to their degrees & ſtates, and receiued ſuch entertainment as might be ſhewed at ſuch a kind of barbarous ſpectacle: Only the Perſian embaſſadour, who had alſo his ſcaffold ſeuerall to himſelfe, but not regarded as the reſt, reioyced not at theſe feaſts and triumphs: for among ſundry other wrongs and ſcorne done by the commandement of Amurath vnto the Perſian nation (as by hanging vp of certaine counterfeit pictures of Perſians made of C laths and ſticks, and then burning them, and in many ſcornfull ſorts abuſing them) the Turk, for the great diſpleaſure he had conceiued for the harme done to Oſman Baſſa and the Turks in SIRVAN much about that time, and for the diſdaine hee had taken againſt Ebraim Chan (as one not condiſcending to the conditions of peace which he expected, nor yeelding to any more than the other embaſſador had done before, ſeemed to haue come as a ſpie to marke the Turkiſh affaires, or to mocke Amurath, rather than to put in execution any good matter to pacifie the mindes of the two mightie princes) commaunded the ſtanding before appointed for him, in diſgrace of him to be caſt downe, and himſelfe with all his followers to bee ſhut vp as cloſe priſoners in the houſe of Mahamet Baſſa at CONSTANTINOPLE: where he was ſo ſtraightly kept, that though an hundred of his followers there died of the plague, which ſhortly after began to wax hoat in D the citie, yet could he not obtain ſo much fauor as to be remoued to ſome other place, but there was enforced to tarry it out, vntill that afterward order was taken, he ſhould be caried thence as priſoner to ERZIRVM. To end theſe ſolemnities, Mahomet the young prince was circumciſed, not publikely, but in his fathers chamber, by Mechmet one of the inferiour Baſſaes, ſometime the emperour Solymans Barber.

Io Leuncl. ſuppl. Annal. Turc. pag. 82.

Now whileſt Sinan as great Viſier ſat commaunding in CONSTANTINOPLE, the garriſons in CHARS and TEFLIS (kept in by the enemie, and hauing receiued none other reliefe than a little which Sinan before his departure from ERZIRVM had by good hap cauſed to bee ſecretly conuaied vnto them) were thought to be driuen to great wants. Which thing Sinan right well knew, and fearing leaſt thoſe two places which had with ſo much adoe beene both gained and E maintained, ſhould for want of new ſuccours fall againe into the hand of the enemie: he both boldly and freely counſelled Amurath, to ſend a new garriſon to VAN for the ſafetie of the countrey thereabouts; and then vnder the conduct of ſome valiant captaine, to ſend ſuccours to TEFLIS. Vpon which point Amurath asked Sinan his opinion, and willed him to bethinke himſelfe of ſome fit man. Hereupon Sinan propounded diuers vnto him, but none of them pleaſed him; for why, hee was before reſolued, in deſpight of Sinan and of his counſell, to beſtow this charge vpon Mahamet Baſſa, nephew to Muſtapha the late Baſſa, and for his ſake hated of Sinan. This Baſſa Mahamet he ſent to ERZIRVM, with the title of the Baſſa of that prouince; honouring him withall with the name of Generall of the armie for TEFLIS. And preſently gaue com- F maundement to Haſſan the Baſſa of CARAEMIT, to Muſtaffa ſometime called Manucchiar the Georgian, to all the Sanzackes, the Curdi, and the ſouldiors of ERZIRVM, that they ſhould reſort to the ſtanderd of Mahamet their Generall, and ſo to follow him to TEFLIS. Whereupon there aſſembled together out of all the ſaid places about fiue and twentie thouſand ſouldiors, with all things neceſſarie for the reliefe of the diſtreſſed garriſon in TEFLIS. Commandement was alſo giuen to the Baſſaes of ALEPPO and MARAS, to repaire to VAN with all their ſouldiors,

ſouldiors, and there to abide till Winter: which they accordingly did, not moleſted nor troubled by any enemie. G

In the end of Auguſt Mahamet Baſſa departed from ERZIRVM, with the Baſſa of CARAMIT, and all his armie, carrying with him money, corne, and all other things needfull for the reliefe of TEFLIS, and in eight daies came to CHARS, and from thence to ARCHELECH, not troubled by any. At ARCHELECH he found Muſtaffa (otherwiſe called Manucchiar the Georgian) with all his ſouldiors, whom the Generall moſt ioyfully entertained, and honoured with gifts: and withal admoniſhed him to continue in his obedience to Amurath, and to conduct him with his armie the ſhorteſt and ſafeſt way to TEFLIS: for that ſome were of opinion, that it were beſt to go by TOMANIS, and ſome other by the way of Muſtaffa his countrey: wherein Muſtaffa did readily reſolue him, that the eaſieſt and ſhorteſt way lay through his owne countrey, being H alſo in his opinion the ſafeſt. This counſel of Muſtaffa pleaſed Mahamet greatly, ſo that he made choiſe of him to be the guide of his armie, repoſing himſelfe wholly vpon his good direction: and ſo departed thence towards TEFLIS, paſſing through ALTVNCHALA, and CARACHALA, both belonging to the ſaid Georgian, abounding with all things neceſſarie for the ſuſtenance of man, neither were they euer diſturbed by any enemie. Hauing paſſed Muſtaffa his countrey, they came to a friendly caſtle called GORI, from whence they diſcouered in certaine fields a great armie of the Georgians, mingled with Perſians, but apparelled after the manner of GEORGIA: theſe were thoſe captaines of PERSIA, ſent from the Perſian king (as in other yeares before) to aid the Georgians; who ſecretly conioyned with Simon Chan the Georgian, had changed their apparel, becauſe the treatie of peace ſhould not be diſturbed, and their king accounted I vniuſt of his word; who vnder the colour of a treatie of peace, whiles Amurath attended nothing els but to ſuccor and defend his conquered countries, without purpoſe to annoy any other places, went about to procure the deſtruction of the Turkes. Theſe then as ſoone as they ſaw the Turkiſh army, and perceiued that they alſo themſelues were by them deſcried, ſent Heralds vnto them with haughtie words of defiance, and to offer them battell. With great griefe of mind did the Baſſa receiue this prowd defiance; but hauing no other purpoſe but onely to bring his ſuccours ſafe to TEFLIS, he diſmiſſed the Heraulds, and ſtudied by all meanes he could to ſhun battell. That euening hee was fauoured in his purpoſe by the great and continuall raine which then fell, and ſerued for a reaſonable excuſe of his delay: but the next day prouing faire, and the K Sunne ſhining bright, both the armies marched in ſight the one of the other all day, vntill about foure houres and an halfe before night; at what time the Turkes arriued neere to a riuer that ſeparated the one armie from the other. There the Baſſa fell in conſultation with Muſtaffa, whether they ſhould paſſe ouer the riuer before night, or ſtay on that ſide they were vntill the next morning. In which caſe Muſtaffa aduiſed him to ſtay, as fearing leſt the enemie ſhould ſet vpon the army diſordered in paſſing the riuer, and ſo annoy them. Notwithſtanding the Generall diſliked this aduiſe of Muſtaffa, hauing taken a ſtrong conceit, euen vpon the firſt diſcouerie of the enemie, that there was ſome intelligence and compact betweene Muſtaffa and the Perſians, and that to that end he had malitiouſly perſuaded him to come that way, and not by the way of TOMANIS: and therfore the Baſſa thinking, that if there were any ſuch plot laid between Muſtaffa and the enemy, to ſet it in ſome confuſion, would not in any caſe follow the counſel of the ſuſpected L Georgian, to ſtay that night; but commanded, that with the greateſt ſpeed that might be, all his ſouldiors with their treaſure & corne ſhould paſſe ouer the riuer; to the end that before night he might on the other ſide of the riuer encampe his armie in ſome good place, to the ſcorne and deriſion of his enemies. Mahamet his lieutenant, a bold young man and an hardie, was the firſt that ventured ouer, and after him the carriages of money and of corne, and then the whole armie, with ſuch ſpeed, that ſome of the confuſed multitude were drowned in the paſſage, being rather troden downe with the horſes and camels, than brought to their deaths either by the depth of the channell, or ſwiftneſſ. of the riuer.

Mahamet Baſſa refuſeth battell offered by the Georgians and Perſians.

As ſoone as the Georgians perceiued that the Turks had paſſed the riuer, without any ſtaying M vntil they might ſettle themſelues in any good order, they in great haſt and fury ran vpon them, and preſently aſſailed them whiles they were yet all in confuſion and out of order: by reaſon whereof, the Turks, although they turned their faces vpon their enemie, and made ſome good reſiſtance, yet in ſhort time you might haue ſeene the bankes of the riuer in many places ſtained with the Turkiſh bloud, and many carkaſes of the Turkes here and there ſcattered, without any

A apparant loſſe among the Georgians and Perſians. Amongſt them that fell in this ſlaughter, were a number of Sanzackes, of the Curdi, and Meſopotamians; which the reſt perceiuing, and by the ouerthrow of their owne, coniecturing the loſſe of others, turned their backes and fled: the like did the remnant of the Meſopotamians, and after them at laſt the whole armie: whom the Georgians preſſed ſo ſore in their flight, that many of the Turkes ſeeing no other way to eſcape, caſt themſelues into the riuer, and ſo (though hardly) eſcaped with their liues. Great was the ſhame, great was the confuſion, but greateſt was the loſſe they receiued, for that in the heat of the battell the kings money and corne was taken by the Georgians and Perſians, euery man ſauing onely ſo much for himſelfe as he could ſecretly hide vpon his owne bodie, or conuey by the meanes of ſome truſtie ſlaue, which by the help of their ſwift horſes was preſerued rather by B fortune than by valour.

The Turks diſcomfited, & the treaſure and corne taken by the Georgians and Perſians.

The Turks thus diſcomfited & ſpoiled of their reliefe, the next morning gathered themſelues together againe, one with another curſing the heauens, their king, and their aduerſe fortune: ſome of them alſo threatning the Georgian renegate Muſtaffa, as though all this miſchiefe had happened through his treacherie, and ſecret intelligence with the enemie. Notwithſtanding, when they found that they had ſtill remaining ſo much money and other eaſements as might ſuffice to comfort the afflicted minds of the ſouldiors beſieged in the fort, they reſolued to hold on their way towards TEFLIS, and in their iourney vſed ſuch ſpeed, that the day following they arriued there in the euening. But when they of the fort ſaw their friends, whom they had ſo long expected, arriued in ſuch bad ſort, and ſo euill furniſhed, they were aſtonied, and wonderfully
C grieued at this common loſſe, and all in a confuſion proteſted to Mahamet, That they would abandon the place, if they had not forthwith neceſſary prouiſion made for them. But the General after he had with large promiſes mitigated their firſt furies and inſolencies, preſently in the morning cauſed a Diuano or counſell to be called in the caſtle, where hauing gathered together all the chiefe men in his armie, he ſpake vnto them in this manner:

For as much as it hath pleaſed God, that ſo great and important an occaſion of victorie, which was offered vnto vs for the honour and glorie of euerie one of vs, is now fallen out ſo vnfortunately, that it hath not onely not miniſtred vnto vs any matter of triumphing ouer our enemies, as wee ſhould haue done, but rather hath made them (I know not how) to carrie away from vs both the triumph, and alſo
D our armour, our horſes, our ſlaues, and our ſpoyles; yea and (the remembrance whereof doth moſt grieuouſly trouble and afflict mee) our Sultans money, and our publike munition and forces ſolemnely deliuered to our conduct, is now become a bootie and a prey vnto them; that the honour which might haue made euerie one of vs famous among noble and valourous ſouldiors, is now fallen from our foreheads, and to our great detriment doeth adorne the heads of ſtrangers, or rather of our enemies; and that notwithſtanding all this, wee are now come to thoſe couragious ſouldiors, which with their great valour haue defended this fort, euen in the middeſt of their enemies weapons and treacheries: and to whom we ſhould yeeld that aid and reliefe, which the vertue of euerie one of their minds doeth deſerue, and which king Amurath had put into our hands to bring hither vnto them: there is now no remedie, but to reſolue vpon ſome good meanes, that wee fall not wholly into the vtter diſgrace of our lord and king, and
E that is, To maintaine theſe ſouldiors in the cuſtodie and defence of this fort: and though it bee with all our owne wants and all our owne diſhonours, to comfort theſe that haue ſo long time looked for vs, and ſo well deſerued all manner of releefe. Wee cannot excuſe our ſelues, that our enemies were better than wee either in number or inſtruments of warre, for both in the one and the other we were farre beyond them; neither yet can wee ſay, that they ſet vpon vs by night, or at vnawares: for when wee ſaw their number, their weapons, their horſes, and finally their approach, and their manner of aſſault, yet wee would needs paſſe ouer the riuer, and ioyne battell with them: which we now know hath fallen out verie lamentable to vs, becauſe wee were more readie to take our flight, than to endure the fight, and to vſe our feete than to occupie our hands. And therefore it is verie requiſit, as well to ſatisfie the rigour of F iuſtice, as to performe the dutie of ſouldiors, that we ſuffer not our lord and king to looſe his money, which hee truſted into our hands, and which wee haue loſt, not by greater ſtrength, nor by any treacherous ſtratageme of our enemies, but by our owne too too important feare, and too baſe a regard of our liues, before which it was the dutie of euerie one of vs, to haue preferred the care of honour. For if by fighting and courrgious ſuſtaining the aſſaults of our enemies, though they had beene ſtronger and better armed than wee, this misfortune had happened vnto vs, and that we could in any ſort haue repreſented to the king and the world an honourable and bloudie battell, wee ſhould not now haue had any need to ſeeke G meanes how to repay this loſſe, and to reſtore the thing that violently was taken from vs by ſuch as were more mightie than our ſelues, and theſe honourable ſouldiours alſo ſhould more eaſily haue diſgeſted with vs this lamentable calamitie. But wee haue loſt that money, and in verie deed hauing as it were willingly beſtowed it vpon the Georgians and Perſians to redeeme our liues, and to ſaue vs from their furie, are bound to repay it, or elſe for euer hereafter to bee challenged as lawfull debtors to the king for it. And therefore my good friends and companions, if you will take a good courſe, let euery one of vs, without further conſultation, put his hand into his priuate purſe (if hee haue not fooliſhly caſt that alſo into the hands of the rauenous enemie) and with our owne money let vs ſuccour the neceſsitie of theſe men, and haue regard to the honour of our king. So ſhall wee make our flight leſſe blame worthie, wee ſhall iuſtifie our actions more honeſtly (and that which is of greateſt importance) wee ſhall better pacifie the wrath H of Amurath, which hee might moſt iuſtly conceiue againſt vs. I my ſelfe before you all am moſt ready to diſburſe foure thouſand duckats towards it: if it ſhall pleaſe you all to follow me accordingly, wee ſhall deliuer theſe ſouldiors from their great neceſsitie, and acquite our ſelues from the intricat bonds of moſt troubleſome diſpleaſures.

The Turkes among themſelues make a purſe of 30000 duckats for the releefe of the garriſon of Teflis.

There might a man haue ſeene a thouſand countenances changed a thouſand manner of wayes; for one ſoftly whiſpered many a curſe and ſhame vpon the king, vpon Mahamet, yea and vpon God himſelfe, another denied to diſburſe any thing, another determined priuily to ſteale away, and ſome ſaid one thing, and ſome another; but in the end euery man was induced to follow the example of Mahamet: and therupon hauing made a purſe according to euery mans abi- I litiy, there was collected thirtie thouſand duckats among them. And preſently after, word was ſent to Leuent Ogli at Zaghen, to ſend thither graine, muttons, and other neceſſarie prouiſions, that they might the better continue the defence of the fort.

Two dayes onely ſtayed Mahamet in Teflis, and hauing changed ſuch ſouldiors as deſired to be diſmiſſed, and alſo appoynted Homar Baſſa Gouernour of Teflis in ſtead of Giuſuf, that there gouerned before, he departed. But before his departure, conſultation was had, Whether they ſhould keepe the way of Tomanis, or the way they came through the countrey of Muſtaffa the Georgian: and in the end they reſolued to keepe the way of Tomanis, and thereupon order was taken, that they ſhould all paſſe the riuer. The Curdi were the firſt that went ouer, and had already pitched their tents vpon the further ſide of the water, when the Generall K began to reuoke his former order, & ſent them word, That they ſhould returne, becauſe he was now determined to go backe the ſame way he came. At which meſſage all the Sanzackes were in a rage, and in plain tearmes ſent him anſwere, That theſe mutabilities beſeemed not them, being men accuſtomed to war, but to be rather childrens play, than manly reſolution, and that for their parts they were not minded to change their iourney, but would goe on the ſame way they had begun: and ſo forwards they went (ſay the Generall what he could) and by the way of Tomanis arriued at Chars long before Mahamet, who was much grieued at this their ſo great diſobedience: but ſeeing no other remedie, he with the Baſſa of Caraemit, and Muſtaffa the Georgian, put themſelues on their iourney euen by the ſame way they came to Teflis. At laſt Mahamet arriued at Altvnchala, the chiefe caſtle of Muſtaffa the Georgian, and burning L with the deſire of reuenge of thoſe loſſes which he thought himſelfe to haue receiued by the trecherie of Muſtaffa; or (as ſome thought) ſeeking by this meanes to make Amurath beleeue, that in truth all the forepaſſed miſchiefs had happened, not through their cowardiſe, but through the trecherous and malitious deuices of the Georgian, and ſo to make their receiued loſſes ſeeme more pardonable; he deuiſed with himſelfe, how to find out ſuch a plot, as that Muſtaffa might vpon the ſudden be taken away, as guiltie of ſo foule a treaſon: and that he had deuiſed was in this ſort. To call a counſell into his owne pauillion, as if he had receiued ſome commandement from the court, and hauing cauſed Muſtaffa to come into that roome, whiles the ſaid counterfeit commandement ſhould be in reading, to cauſe his lieutenant with thoſe chiefe of his band that ſtood about him, to fall vpon him, and preſently to cut off his head. This pretended counſel was M accordingly called, wherein ſate the Baſſa himſelfe, and with him the Baſſa of Caraemit, certaine Sanzackes ſubiect to the iuriſdiction of Erzirvm, the Capigi Baſſa or chiefe gentleman vſhier, and the Generals lieutenant; with whom he had vpon their ſolemne oathes for ſecrecie communicated his entended deceit. The Georgian Muſtaffa was alſo called accordingly: who

A both becauſe he was beloued of mo than one,and had alſo vſed all diligent circumſpection,but eſpecially hauing heard in the armie ſome priuie whiſperings of ſuch a matter,knew full wel of all that was deuiſed againſt him,and therefore prouided alſo for his owne defence. But as touching his going to the counſell,he thought he might not denie ſo to do, leaſt by his abſence he might ſeeme guiltie of the fault whereof hee was(peraduenture not without cauſe) ſuſpected; and thereby to leaue his cities for a prey to their enemies,now in the heart of his countrie.And therefore reſoluing to goe, he deuiſed how ſo to do with moſt ſafetie; and ſo, as if need ſhould be,he might be able to turne the miſchiefe intended againſt him vpon the head of the Generall himſelfe.And therefore hauing choſen out fiftie of his moſt faithfull and reſolute ſouldiours,he commaunded them to follow him to the counſell appointed in the Generals pauillion: and be-
B ing come thither,to ſtay there readie and attentiue at his firſt and one only call, ſuddenly and forcibly to ruſh into the pauillion with their weapons,& rather than any wrong ſhould be done vnto him,to ſhew their valour againſt the Turks, without exception of any perſon whatſoeuer. Theſe men by nature enemies vnto the Turks,vnderſtanding wel his meaning,ſetled themſelues vpon the execution: and taken vnto them ſome other alſo of their faithfull and truſtie friends, followed him euen to the pauillion of Mahamet: where Muſtaffa entring into the place of counſell,deſired of the Generall to know what his pleaſure was;who preſently cauſed the counterfeit commaundement to be read; whereunto Muſtaffa gaue an attentiue eare. But when the other Baſſaes and Sanzackes began to ſit downe (contrarie to the maner of the Turks, who whenſoeuer any commaundement of the emperours is in reading,vſe alwaies to ſtand vp,and not to ſit
C down vntil it be full read) the Georgian tooke his leaue,promiſing to be euer readie to perform not only that order of the kings, but alſo whatſoeuer els he ſhould commaund. And ſo being about to depart,the Capigi Baſſi(or great vſher) of Mahamet came vnto him,and plucking him by the ſleeue,would haue forced him to ſit downe. Then Muſtaffa crying out aloud, drew his ſword,wherewith he ſtrucke Mahamets lieutenant, that was right againſt him, and with his left hand hauing raught the roll from his pate, with his right hand ſuddenly (to the great aſtoniſhment of all that were preſent) at one onely blow parted his head, his necke, and his breaſt in twaine,euen to his very ſtomacke; ſo that he died(a ſtrange ſpectacle to behold) being thus cut in ſunder,with his cleft head and two ſhouldiors hanging down vpon their ſeuerall ſides. After this firſt, he redoubled his ſecond ſtroke, aiming at the head of the Baſſa of Caraemit: but it
D being defended with the wrythen rolls of the turbant,it ſlipped downe by his eare; yet ſo,that with a piece of the ſaid turbant it carried his eare quite away, with a little alſo of the fleſh of his cheeke: and all enraged,eagerly aſſailed Mahamet Baſſa the Generall(who now all in confuſion was riſen vp in the tumult)and wounded him with fiue mortall wounds; which were yet afterwards by cunning hand healed,when they had brought him euen to deaths dore. At the crie of this Georgian all his people ruſhed in togither: vpon whoſe confuſed tumult,and the feare that Muſtaffa through his furie had ſtrucke into the Turks,the campe was preſently raiſed:and euery man with all ſpeed departing thence,put him ſelfe on his way towards Chars,whether alſo were brought the two wounded Baſſaes & the reſt that were ill handled and greatly ſcared with theſe ſudden and vncouth ſtirres.

Muſtaffa notably reuengeth himſelfe of the trecherie intended againſt him by Mahamet the Generall.

E Of all this treacherie entended againſt him, Muſtaffa ſent preſent information to the Turkiſh emperour, finding himſelfe greatly grieued at the falſe ſuſpition that Mahamet had wrongfully conceiued againſt him, to his great diſhonour: and wrought ſo cunningly, that Amurath in token of his good liking and contentment ſent him both cloth of gold and a battleax all gilt. Mahamet on the other ſide entermedling here and there with all the art that poſſibly he could deuiſe, all hatefull and iniurious tearmes,ſent large aduertiſements of all the misfortunes that had happened, and aggrauated to the king both the treacheries of Muſtaffa, and alſo the ſlender ſecuritie of thoſe waies and countries.

As ſoone as Amurath vnderſtood the calamities of his ſouldiors,the loſſe of his mony, the great diſhonour of his people.and the apparant danger wherein the fort of Teflis ſtood,when F it was like to be abandoned: all inflamed with rage and anger,he called vnto him the Baſſaes of his court(among whom ſat as chiefe the prowd and haughtie Sinan) and rated them all exceedingly,reprouing their lewd counſell, and recounting the loſſes that he had from time to time receiued,as if they had happened through their defaults, and eſpecially Sinan, as the principall occaſion of all theſe miſchiefes: Who like an improuident foole(as he ſaid)would needs relin-quiſh the charge of his armie,and like a king ſit idle at CONSTANTINOPLE, ſtanding (as it G were)at ſome publicke triumph to behold and heare the miſeries and misfortunes of others:hauing before in the time that Muſtapha was general,moſt vainly boaſted,with the like power that he had to fetch the Perſian king out of CASBIN, and to deliuer them in bonds to Amurath, but had in deed performed nothing worth the remembrance. Sinan could doe no leſſe but make anſwere to the wrathfull king, yet not with ſuch mildneſſe and modeſtie as in ſuch a caſe hee ſhould peraduenture haue done,but in prowd and peremptorie maner, without any reuerence

The proud answer of Sinan to Amurath. or regard, told him plainly: That as the laſt yeare a little before his returne to CONSTANTI-NOPLE,ſuccours had been conuaied to TEFLIS without any loſſe or trouble(as in truth they were)euen ſo had they been this yeare alſo, if he had put his aduiſe in execution as much as he deſpiſed and contemned it: for he did then giue him to vnderſtand, that Mahamet Baſſa could H not be a fit man for ſo great a charge,& that it was neceſſarie to haue choſen in his roome ſome other captain of valour & diſcretion; but ſeeing he would needs make choiſe of the ſame vnfit man,he was not now to blame any other for this errour, but onely himſelfe. As for his com-ming to CONSTANTINOPLE,it was a thing long before thought moſt needfull, not only for his aduiſe how the matter of peace might be brought to ſome good paſſe;but alſo becauſe if that treatie came not to the deſired iſſue, then he had to talke with him how he might compaſſe the ouerthrow of his enemie: which thing as yet he had no fit time to declare vnto him, but was now readie to reueale it it,if it were ſo his pleaſure. Wonderfully was Amurath grieued with this ſullen anſwere,when he conſidered that a ſlaue of his own,ſhould ſo arrogantly and manifeſtly reproue him of follie and improuidence. Notwithſtanding,being deſirous to know of him what I that ſecret and important matter was,which he had to reueale vnto him for the eaſie compaſſing of his commenced enterpriſe,he diſſembled his diſcontentment conceiued againſt him,& commanded him to diſcloſe thoſe his deuiſes which he had to vtter. Sinan in briefe,of all his aduiſes,propounded theſe two things: firſt his counſell was,not to proceed in this warre as they had hitherto done, by ſeeking with forts and fortreſſes to hold and keepe the enemies countries; for that their treaſures were not able to yeeld ſuch ſtore of money, as was ſufficient for the maintenance of ſo many and ſo great garriſons:contrarie to the opinion of Muſtapha(of late dead)who with great pertinacie had perſuaded that dangerous,chargeable,and difficult manner of warre.
His ſecond aduiſe was,that the true meanes to bring this war to wiſhed end,conſiſted eſpecially in the reſolution of Amurath himſelfe,who if he would go in perſon himſelfe,& againſt ſo migh- K tie a king oppoſe the perſon of a king,then might he moſt aſſuredly promiſe vnto himſelfe all ſpeedie and honourable victorie: for that at the only name of his comming, the Perſians would eaſily come to any agreement; or if not, he might then proceed in his wars, & ſo obtaine moſt glorious conqueſts. This his aduiſe ſo little pleaſed the effeminat king, that in ſtead of the great opinion he before held of him, he now conceiued an enuious affection againſt him: and a further ſuſpition(foſtred by the great ladies of the court,eſpecially Amuraths mother) That Sinan had thus counſelled the king himſelfe to go in perſon,not for any good could come therof, but only that ſo he might find meanes for the prince his ſonne to make himſelfe king, and to driue out his father. Which ſuſpition was in ſuch ſort nouriſhed in the mind of Amurath, eſpecially being aſſured of the great affection which the prince carried towards Sinan, and he likewiſe to- L wards him,that he reſolued to rid him out of his ſight; and ſo depriuing him of all charge, pre-ſently baniſhed him the court,and out of CONSTANTINOPLE to DEMOTICA(a citie of THRACE) Sciaus Baſſa made Viſier in Sinans place. from whence afterwards he by moſt humble ſupplication obtained to be remoued to MARMARA a little beyond SELYMBRIA. And into his place of Viſierſhip was preferred Sciaus Baſſa(who had married Amurath his ſiſter)an Hungarian borne,a goodly perſonage,and of honourable iudge-ment: but aboue all men a ſeller of iuſtice and preferments, and yet a great friend to the peace with the Chriſtian princes,which Sinan had alwaies moſt wickedly maligned

1582 The Perſian captaines in the meane time, with their ſpoyles and diuers of their enemies enſignes, were with great ioy receiued at home in PERSIA: but when the diſcord that fell out betweene Mahamet Baſſa and Muſtaffa the Georgian was alſo reported, the former ioy M was redoubled; euerie man being of opinion, that theſe diſcords might bee great impediments vnto the Turkes further attempts into PERSIA, which it was feared they would the next yeare attempt, to the great danger of NASSIVAN and TAVRIS. Vpon which occaſi-ons,the Perſian king perceiuing that he could not haue a fitter opportunitie to imploy himſelfe againſt

A againſt Abas Mirize,his ſonne (then with him in diſgrace) determined with himſelfe, to leaue the matters on this ſide of his kingdome in their preſent ſtate, and to march toward HERI: whereunto he was earneſtly ſolicited by his elder ſonne Emir Hamze Mirize, but eſpecially by Mirize Salmas his Viſier. Vpon which reſolution,committing the defence of REIVAN,NASSIVAN,and that ſide of his kingdome, to Emir Chan Gouernour of TAVRIS; he ſet forward himſelfe with his armie towards CASBIN, and ſo marching through diuers prouinces, arriued at length at SASVAR, being on that ſide the chiefe of all the cities ſubiect to the iuriſdiction of HERI: which citie he tooke by force,and without delay cauſed the Gouernor thereof to be beheaded,although he alleadged a thouſand excuſes for himſelfe,and obiected a thouſand accuſations moe againſt the ſeditious Viſier. The king after this departing thence,and hauing alſo put
B to death certaine captaines and Sultans,that were accuſed by the Viſier to be confederats in the rebellion of his ſonne,he arriued at laſt at the deſired citie of HERI. Very ſtrong is this citie,by ſituation compaſſed about with a good wall,& watered with deep channels of running ſprings; conuaied into it by Tamerlaine their founder, or reſtorer: beſides that, there was in it many valiant captaines,enemies to Mirize Salmas, readie to lay downe their liues in defence of themſelues and of Abas their lord; ſo that the winning therof, could not but proue both long and difficult. As ſoone as the king approched the citie, he felt in himſelfe many troubled paſſions ariſing of griefe and pietie, it grieued him to thinke that hee ſhould beget ſo graceleſſe a ſonne, who in ſtead of maintaining his ſtate and honour, ſhould ſeeke his ruine and deſtruction: it grieued
C him alſo to remember the bloud of his ſubiects, before ſpilt vpon ſo ſtrange an occaſion; and ſcarcely durſt he enter into the cogitation, thenceforth to ſhed any more of the bloud of his people. Neuertheleſſe,being ſtill more and more ſolicited by his Viſier,he attempted to vnderſtand the mind of his ſonne,and(if it might be poſſible) to get him into his hands. .But whiles the king trauelling with theſe thoughts lay with his armie before HERI, Abas Mirize in the meane time,writ diuers letters to his father and to his brother, wherein he beſought them, That they would make knowne vnto him the occaſion of this their ſtir: For if deſire of rule had moued them to ſeeke the depriuation of him, being their ſonne and brother, from the honour he lawfully poſſeſſed, and which his father himſelfe procured for him of his grandfather Tamas; they ought to abandon their imagination,for that he was alwaies readie to ſpend his wealth and D his bloud togither with his eſtate in their ſeruice, and acknowledged his father to be his good father and king: But if they were not induced hereunto for this cauſe,but by a deſire to reuenge ſome treſpaſſes that he had committed to the preiudice of the crowne of PERSIA,or his fathers honour;he was moſt readie to ſubmit himſelfe to any amends,and with all reaſon to yeeld vnto them the kingdome, yea the whole world, and euen his owne life, the rather to ſatisfie their minds with a more full contentation. With twiſe and thriſe reading ouer, were theſe affectionat letters conſidered and digeſted: and at laſt both the father and the brother perceiuing in them ſuch liberalitie of words,and ouercome with pitie,or if not with pitie yet with great admiration and contentment,they determined to put the matter in practiſe,and moderating their deſire of reuenge,to attempt the reducing of the young mans mind to ſome good paſſe. Whereupon
E they wrote backe vnto him, That no greedie deſire to vſurpe his gouernment,had induced them to make ſo great a voyage, to trouble ſo much people, and to ſhed ſuch abundance of bloud; but onely his diſobedience and preſumption,in that he had cauſed himſelfe to be called the king of PERSIA; and had not ſent ſo much as one captaine to aid them in the late wars againſt the Turkes. Glad was Abas the young prince,when he vnderſtood the accuſations that were laied againſt him,hoping to make it manifeſt before all men,how the king and his brother were miſinformed in theſe particularities: and therefore incontiuently did write backe vnto them, That if they would faithfully promiſe him,honourably,& without any outrage to receiue his embaſſadors,he would ſend vnto them ſuch euident matter,and ſo cleare information touching thoſe
F his accuſations,as that they ſhould not only clearly perceiue that there was neuer any ſuch kind of thought in him,but alſo that he had alwaies deſired and laboured the contrarie: and would moreouer open vnto them ſuch matter, as in reſpect of other men,and not of himſelfe, might cauſe their comming to proue profitable and commodious to all the kingdome of PERSIA. Which his requeſt they both ſolemnly promiſed faithfully to performe,being verie deſirous to vnderſtand what thoſe ſtrange nouelties ſhould bee. Whereupon Abas Miriſe ſent vnto them two of his chiefe counſellors, men of great account and reuerence both for their yeres and wiſe-dome, with full inſtructions: Who after many ſpeeches, in the end ſwearing (according to their G cuſtome) by the Creatour that ſpread out the aire, that founded the earth vpon the deepes, that adorned the heauen with ſtars, that powred abroad the water, that made the water, and briefly, of nothing brought forth all things, ſwearing by the head of Ali, and by the religion of their prophet Mahomet, that ſuch peruerſe thoughts neuer entred into the head of Abas Mirize: they alleaged many teſtimonies and manifeſt proofes, that moſt loyally in all due time, as well when he was aduanced to the kingdome of PERSIA, as alſo in his battels againſt the Turkes, his ſonne had alwaies cauſed deuout prayers and ſupplications to be made to God for his proſperitie, neither euer deſired to heare any other but happie and fortunat ſucceſſe of him. They brought with them a thouſand and a thouſand precepts and loyal letters, which the young man had cauſed to be written, as occaſions required to the Gouernors that were his ſubiects, for the gouern- H ment of the State, wherein he neuer named himſelfe king of PERSIA, but onely, Your king and Gouernour of HERI. They prayed the king alſo, to cauſe a diligent proceſſe to bee framed againſt his ſonne, and if there ſhould be found in him any ſigne or ſhadow of ſo wicked a ſuſpition, then to take from him his eſtate and libertie; offering themſelues to remain as hoſtages for him. But when all this ſhould be done, and Abas found altogither free from theſe vniuſt accuſa-tions, then (falling euen to the earth and kiſſing it) they beſought him, and as it were coniured him, not to leaue the matter thus imperfect, to the preiudice of his bloud, but returning to his counſellor, to take information likewiſe vpon what mind and conſideration he had aduiſed the king to take vpon him this vnorderly and dangerous voiage; where no doubt hee ſhould find nothing in him, but malignant, ambitious, and wicked affections; and ſuch as euen deſerued, I that with his bloud there ſhould bee reuenged all the bloud of thoſe which till that houre had been brought to their vnworthie and vndeſerued deaths. And for as much as nothing remained, whereof the Viſier had enformed the king againſt his ſonne, but the commaundement that was giuen by Abas Mirize to the Gouernors vnder him, That they ſhould not go to the wars againſt the Turks: they confeſſed in truth that ſuch an order was taken, but not to that wicked and traiterous end and purpoſe as was reported to the king by his great counſellor, but only in reſpect of an inuaſion iuſtly feared in thoſe quarters by the Tartarian Ieſſelbas; who by diuers inroads had alreadie done great harme in the countrie about HERI, and put young Abas and his counſellors in ſuch a feare, that they durſt not diſfurniſh their cities of their guards and forces: and therefore had commanded the ſaid Gouernours, not to go to war againſt the Turks, but to ſtay K and expect further direction. And that all this was by writing ſignified vnto the Viſier himſelfe: which he of a malicious mind had concealed, only to trie, if in theſe common troubles he could bring to paſſe, that Abas Mirize and the king might be taken away, and Emir Hamze ſucceed in his place; and ſo he himſelfe remaine the Superintendent of his ſonne in law, and Moderator of that moſt famous kingdome. Of which ſo treacherous a purpoſe they (for all that) thought Emir Hamze the young prince altogither ignorant (knowing his honouroble diſpoſition and loue towards his owne kindred) but imputed it only to the immoderat and ambitious deſire of the wicked traitor Mirize Salmas.

Of theſe graue ſpeeches of the embaſſadours, Mahamet the father (by nature credulous) began to make great conſtruction; and deepely to conſider of their ſo earneſt and important re- L queſts, which ſeemed vnto him ſo vpright and equall, as that he could not chuſe but hearken vnto the ſame. And therefore calling vnto him the Gouernours, the captaines, the iudges, and treaſurers of all the cities that were ſubiect to HERI: he demanded of them, how and in what ſort they eſteemed of Abas Mirize, and in what degree of honour he deſired to be eſteemed of them: and of them all receiued one anſwere, That they held him for their lord and lieutenant to the king of CASBIN, and that he himſelfe had alwaies deſired to be ſo taken and thought of: for proofe whereof, euery one of them brought in diuers letters, precepts, and orders, wherein hee neuer cauſed himſelfe to be honoured with any other title, but only, Your king of HERI. He demanded further, whether any ſuch warres were attempted by the Tartarian Ieſſelbas or no: wherof he receiued a large and ſolemne information, that ſo it was, to the great detriment of all M thoſe territories. And thus the king was throughly perſuaded of the innocencie of his ſonne; who before was noted vnto him by his Viſier, to be an obſtinat rebell. Vpon which occaſion only, although he may iuſtly haue put him to death, as authour of ſo great troubles and bloudſhed; yet becauſe he would be better enformed of the truth of the accuſations laid againſt him by

A the embaſſadours, he reſolued to make a curious and diligent inquiſition thereof: and therefore firſt of all, in great ſecreſie he examined Emir Hamze his eldeſt ſonne, wherefore he had aduiſed this iourney againſt his brother Abas, whom he had found guiltleſſe of all thoſe crimes that were obiected againſt him? whereunto the prince anſwered, That he had no other certaintie of the pretended euill behauiour of his brother, but onely that which proceeded from the great credit that he alwaies gaue to his father in law Mirize Salmas, to whom as to a chiefe counſellor, his father in law, and protector of the kingdome, he had alwaies yeelded aſſured credence: and ſo diſcharged the whole tempeſts of all thoſe miſchiefes vpon the Viſier. Touching whom the king made diligent inquiſition, as well among thoſe of the court as of the armie; and thereby found him guiltie of all that the embaſſadours of HERI had accuſed him: and that being al-

B waies acquainted with the true occaſions which reſtrained the Gouernours of HERI (ſubiect to Abas Mirize) from going to the warre againſt the Turkes, he had moſt maliciouſly concealed the ſame, of purpoſe to hatch ſuch a ſtrange and dangerous diſcontentment, as had wrought the vnworthie death of many great men, and almoſt defiled the hands of the father with the innocent bloud of his guiltleſſe ſonne. For which ſo foule a treaſon the falſe Viſier was worthely condemned to die, and his wily head by the commaundement of the king ſtrucke from his carkaſſe. Iuſtly rewarded, with the ſame puniſhment which he vniuſtly ſought to haue conuerted vpon others; and with his owne deſtruction pacified the diſſentions and battels that were riſen betweene the two princes. And ſo the two brethren being reconciled togither, and the ſonne to the father; after that Abas had againe promiſed his wiſhed obedience (which he afterwards

C moſt dutifully performed) king Mahamet returned with the prince towards CASBIN: where by reaſon of new and vnexpected motions of the Turkes, he had now beene long looked for and deſired.

Mirize Salman the Viſier found guiltie of treaſon and beheaded.

Amurath through the rough ſpeeches of Sinan, was more and more ſetled in his purpoſe for the continuing of the Perſian warre; accounting it ſo much the more to his owne glorie, as it ſhould in happie ſucceſſe fall out contrarie to the opinion of many: and thereupon began to bethinke himſelfe whom he might chuſe for his Generall, to whom he might commit ſo great a charge. Among the Baſſaes of the court there was one Ferat, a man of ripe yeares, but yet fierce of courage, tough in opinion, in counſell as hardie as might beſeeme his age, readie for all ſudden and ſtrange aduentures, but aboue all a vaſſall moſt deuoted to the king: Of this man, at laſt

D he was reſolued to make choiſe to haue the leading of his armie: and therfore calling him apart, declared vnto him what he had in himſelfe purpoſed, encouraging him to take the charge vpon him, with a firme reſolution to performe all things anſwerable to ſo worthie an enterpriſe, with the opinion he had conceiued of his valour. Verie willingly did Ferat accept of this new office, and thought himſelfe (as indeed he was) highly fauoured by the king: and thereupon made him a large promiſe, to employ his ſtrength, his wit, and vttermoſt deuoire, to put in execution whatſoeuer ſhould be offered vnto him, either by occaſion, or by his royall commandement.

Ferat Baſſa choſen Generall of the armie in Sinans place.

At firſt Amurath had no other purpoſe to imploy him any further, but only to aſſure the paſſage to TEFLIS, and ſo into all GEORGIA; and to haue deſtroyed the country of Muſtaffa the Georgian, who had ſo audaciouſly iniured the lieutenant of Amurath, and put his whole army

E in confuſion: but being certainly aduertiſed of the troubles in PERSIA betweene the king and his ſonne, he changed his purpoſe, and commaunded Ferat to employ all his forces to erect a fortreſſe at REIVAN, a place belonging to Tocomac, and to aſſure the paſſage from CHARS to REIVAN; for ſo they ſhould be reuenged of many harmes they had receiued by him, and lay open the way to the citie of TAVRIS, to the great glorie of Amurath. As for Muſtaffa the Georgian, although he had well deſerued to be chaſtiſed for his raſh attempt againſt Mahamet Baſſa, being then his Generall, yet he willed Ferat to diſſemble his euill opinion of him, and (if it were poſſible) ſo to worke, as to vſe him as an inſtrument to conuay treaſure and ſuccours to TEFLIS: for by this meanes the paſſage being made ſafe, all GEORGIA would without any mo fortreſſes be ſubdued, and then the next yeare they might attempt the enterpriſe for

Highly did Ferat commend the deuiſes of Amurath his lord, and ſhewed himſelfe readie for any attempt. And ſo the time being come wherein it behooued them to ſet on foot their important deſignments, in the beginning of the yeare 1583, commandements were ſent out to all the cities of the empire, which were wont to make their appearance at theſe warres, That vpon 1583

freſh ſummons, they ſhould be readie to returne againſt the Perſians, and to put in execution that ſhould be enioyned them by their new Generall. The fame whereof flew as farre as SORIA, IVRIE, PALESTINE, MESOPOTAMIA, BABILONIA, to BALSARA to SIVAS to MARAS, to al BITHYNIA, CAPADOCIA, CILICIA, ARMENIA, yea and beyond CONSTANTINOPLE to the borders of HVNGARIE and GRECE, and in briefe to all the regions that were wont to come to this warre: all which ſent their captains and ſouldiors accordingly. And ſo at the laſt Generall Ferat departing from CONSTANTINOPLE, and paſſing ouer to SCVTARI by the way of AMASIA and of SIVAS, came to ERZIRVM, where he tooke a view of all his armie and prouiſion: and from thence in eight daies arriued at CHARS, conducted by the Perſian fugitiue Maxut Chan: and from CHARS ſet himſelfe on his way towards REIVAN. Three daies before he came to REIVAN, of certaine ruines of an old caſtle which the Turkes call AGGIA CHALASI (or the caſtle of ſtrangers) he erected a new fortreſſe, and left in it a garriſon of foure hundred ſoldiors, with a Sanzacke, and certain pieces of ordinance, and then went to REIVAN. This countrie is diſtant from TAVRIS eight or nine daies iourney; between which two places are ſituat NASSIVAN, CHIVLFAL, MARANT, and SOFIAN, all enriched with goodly gardens and pleaſant greenes: but in the way are many craggie mountaines to be climed, and ſundrie hard paſſages either for armie or traueller.

Generall Ferat departeth from Conſtantinople.

He commeth to Reiuan.

Ferat in the ſpace of fifteene daies buildeth a fort at Reiuan 750 yards about

Here then did Ferat incampe himſelfe with his armie, and taking aduiſe of his chief captains where he ſhould build the fort, they all with one conſent aduiſed him, to ſeize vpon the houſes and gardens of Tocomac, and there to fortifie. Which he accordingly did, encloſing the gardens with ſtrong walls and deepe ditches round about, whereinto he conueied water from a certaine riuer, that comming downe from the mountaines, ran into Araxis. Which worke was performed with ſuch expedition, that within the ſpace of fifteene daies the fortreſſe was finiſhed, being in circuit ſeuen hundred and fiftie yards. It grieued Tocomac exceedingly thus to loſe his countrie and dwelling, and ſo much the more, becauſe it happened ſo ſuddenly, and as it were vnlooked for. Hee himſelfe as ſoone as he vnderſtood that the Turkiſh armie was comming to that coaſt, hauing withdrawne himſelfe and his men of warre out of the citie hee could not keepe, ſought by all meanes to be reuenged, if not altogither, yet in ſome part of this ſo great an iniurie. And therefore he wrote vnto the king at CORAZAN, to Emir Chan at TAVRIS, to Simon in GEORGIA, he gathered ſoldiors out of the villages, and vſed all his poſſible endeuour to enable himſelfe to annoy the enemies armie: But from none of theſe places could he receiue any help, the king being ſo far off in wars againſt his ſonne, the Georgian being buſied by hindering any reliefe to be brought to the beſieged in TEFLIS; as for Emir Chan (who by ſolemne promiſe vnto the king before his departure to HERI, had vndertaken the defence of that ſide of the kingdome againſt the Turkes) he either would not, or could not ſtir; neither ſent ſo much as one ſoldior, hauing as ſome ſuppoſed ſecret intelligence with Generall Ferat, not to diſturbe him in this his worke. So Tocomac deſtitute of all other helpe, and not able of himſelfe to doe much againſt ſo mightie an enemie; yet ceaſed not to lay ſuch priuie ambuſhes for the Turks as he could, killing of them ſometimes 100, ſometime 150, and ſometimes mo, as they fell into his danger. And to eaſe his ſtomacke againſt Emir Chan (who ſitting ſtill at TAVRIS as it were to behold his miſerie, would not ſo much as ſhake a ſword againſt theſe ſpoiling Turks) he ſpared not to diſpatch certaine horſemen in haſt to the king at CORAZAN, and by eloquent letters to amplifie the cowardiſe of Emir Chan; intermedling withal ſome cauſes of ſuſpition, that he had ſome intelligence with the Turkiſh Generall.

Ferat hauing thus built this new fort at REIVAN, as Amurath had commanded, and furniſhed it with artillerie, and all other things needful for the defence thereof; appointed Sinan Baſſa (the ſonne of Cicala a renegat of GENVA, and by Selymus the late emperor, in the flowre of his youth created Aga or captaine of the Ianizaries) with a garriſon of eight thouſand ſouldiors to keepe the ſame. And ſo departing thence, by the way of AGIA CHALASI, in ten daies arriued with his armie at CHARS.

Ferat had not long ſtayed at CHARS, but ſtrange newes were brought thither, That Muſtaffa the Georgian (to whom Amurath had ſent thirtie thouſand duckats, by two of his Capigi and two of his Chiaus, to haue by him beene conueyed to TEFLIS for the reliefe of them in the fort) was reuolted from the Turkiſh obedience, and being now become a rebel, had left that fortreſſe in manifeſt danger to yeeld, if by ſome other meanes it were not relieued. Which ſtrange

A nouelties exceedingly troubled the generall: who to know the certainetie thereof, called before him all such as were the messengers of this misfortune: by whom he was certainly enformed, That Mustaffa, the two Capigi, and the Chiaus, hauing put themselues vpon their way towards TEFLIS with the treasure, guarded with a conuoy of fiue hundred of his souldiors, in the mid way had met with his cousin Simon the Georgian, by whom he was perswaded to returne againe to his ancient faith and religion, which he had to the great peril of his soule so prophanely abandoned, and to shake off the seruice of Amurath, which would yeeld him no other recompence than an hard and infamous captiuitie, and in the end some fraudulent and trecherous death: and that his perswasion had so preuailed with Mustaffa, that he caused the two Capigi and the Chiaus to be apprehended and presently beheaded; and diuiding the treasure, with his said cousin
B had with him and his other kinsmen vowed a solemne and perpetuall confederacie: and so hauing withdrawne themselues to their wonted passages, lay there in wait for such succours as should by the Turks be brought to TEFLIS.

When Ferat vnderstood these and such other particularities, he all in a furie swore that he would not returne to ERZIRVM vntill he had put all the countrie of Mustaffa to fire and sword: yet first he thought it needfull to relieue TEFLIS, which would otherwise be in danger to be yeelded to the enemie: and for that purpose made choise of Hassan Bassa, who in the last yeare of the Generalship of Mustapha had most couragiously conueyed the like succours, and taken Aliculi Chan. Vnto him therefore did the Generall assigne fortie thousand duckats, with other prouision necessarie for that seruice, and for the more suretie appointed him fifteen thousand of C the most choise and valiant souldiours in all the armie to conduct the same. In ten daies space Hassan Bassa went and came from TEFLIS, hauing in his iourney too and fro had many skirmishes with the Georgians, wherein he lost some few men, without any other losse worth the remembrance.

After this the Generall sent one Resuan Bassa with six thousand souldiours to spoile the countrey of Mustaffa the Georgian the late renegate, but now become a rebell to the Turke: which Resuan, without any long stay ouerran all his territorie, burnt his townes, and committed most vncouth outrages, which extended euen vnto the poore insensible trees, and carried away with him many captiue soules, with much corne and cattell, like a raging tempest destroying whatsoeuer came in his way. Now was the Generall also retired to ARDACHAN, whether came Resuan
D to meet him with his foresaid bootie. But because they had now performed what they had before intended, and the approch of Winter perswaded their returne, they remoued from ARDACHAN, and by the way of OLTI retired to ERZIRVM, from whence all the souldiors were licensed to depart to their seuerall places of abode, and a memorial sent vnto Amurath of all the actions had beene performed; and especially of the good seruice done by Hassan Bassa, who for the same was now once againe honoured by the king with cloth of gold, a battleaxe and targuet all gilt.

Ferat commeth to Erzirum, and there breaketh vp his armie.

About this time one Podolouius a gentleman of POLONIA, sent by Sthehen king of POLONIA to CONSTANTINOPLE, by the leaue of Amurath to by certain horses in ANATOLIA; returning homewards with foure and twentie goodly horses which he had bought, was notwithstanding the E great Turks Passe, by his commandment stayed vpon the way, all his men (in number foure and thirtie) slaine, excepting one boy, who getting into a wood escaped, & Podolouius his head struck off. The horses brought backe to CONSTANTINOPLE, were by the appointment of Amurath some bestowed into his owne stable, and the rest giuen among the Bassaes, oftentimes pointed at with the fingers of the Turks in derision of the Polonian king. This Amurath commanded to be done in reuenge of an outrage done by the Polonian Cossackes against the Turks, whereof newes was but euen then brought to the court.

The death of Hama Chadum, Amurath his mother.

The nine and twentieth day of Nouember of this present yere 1583, died Hama Chadum, the widdow of the late emperor Selymus the second, and mother of this Amurath, and lyeth buried by her husband Selymus and his fiue sonnes, strangled by their brother Amurath.

F All the rest of this yeare 1583 Ferat spent at ERZIRVM, and afterwards sent out his ordinarie commandements to all the accustomed cities, to summon the souldiors against the next Spring in the yeare 1584, gathering togither a greater number of pioners and engineers than euer had beene gathered in these warres heretofore: and with all gaue it out, That he would go to NASSIVAN, and there doe great matters. At which report the Persians were much mooued, and began

Ferat raiseth a new armie.

gan to caſt many things in their heads about it: but aboue all others the king, who vnderſtanding at CASBIN of all that had before happened at REIVAN, and of the new preparations of the Turkes, began to feare that they would this yeare paſſe to TAVRIS, or at leaſt as was reported to NASSIVAN, and in thoſe places build new fortreſſes to the great danger of the Perſian empire: and therfore retaining ſtill ſuch forces as he brought with him from HERI, and commanding as many moe as he could out of all the cities that were ſubiect vnto him, to follow him to TAVRIS, he arriued there with his armie not long after the arriuall of Ferat Baſſa at ERZIRVM. This vnexpected comming of the Perſian king with ſo great an armie to TAVRIS, filled the world with expectation of great matters to haue beene done by him againſt the Turkes: inſomuch that Ferat the Generall, before he would proceed any further, thought it good to aduertiſe Amurath of the matter: declaring vnto him, That his deſire was to goe to NASSIVAN, and there to build a fortreſſe, according to his commaundement, ſo to lay open the paſſage to TAVRIS; but hauing receiued certain intelligence, That the Perſian king was come to TAVRIS with an huge armie, and full reſolution to encounter him, he thought it his dutie not to put in execution his aforeſaid determination, without his expreſſe commaundement. Vnto whom Amurath preſently wrote back, That the matter ſo ſtanding, he ſhould not goe to NASSIVAN, but only employ his forces to aſſure the paſſage to TOMANIS and LORI, that ſo the fort of TEFLIS might the yeare following be relieued by ſome ſmall band, without ſending of any great armie for the conueying of ſuccours thither. This new commaundement of his lord, Ferat kept ſecret to himſelfe, cauſing the rumour of his going to NASSIVAN to be more and more increaſed, of purpoſe to feed the opinion that the Perſians had before conceiued of his comming thither; and ſo deluding them, with leſſe danger to build the forts he had entended, for the quieting of thoſe moſt dangerous paſſages of LORI and TOMANIS.

Vpon this reſolution Ferat hauing gathered together his people, with all things neceſſarie for his purpoſe, remoued with his armie from ERZIRVM toward CHARS, where he ſtayed ten dayes, to take a new ſurucy both of his ſouldiors and prouiſion. And ſo departing thence, ſet forward toward LORI, ſending before him Haſſan Baſſa with fiue thouſand light horſemen to ſcoure the countrey euen to TOMANIS, and to learne what he poſſibly could of the enemies purpoſes, and the ſtate of GEORGIA. Which thing Haſſan dutifully performed, ſpeedily ſcouring ouer all the woods, and diſcloſing all the paſſages from thence to LORI, and ſo to TOMANIS, without meeting with any vpon whom to aſſay his valour, more than certaine robbers vpon the high way, whom he cauſed to be ſlaine (as men altogether ignorant of the Georgian and Perſian affaires) and their heads to be ſet on the tops of their launces, and ſo returned againe to LORI: where hauing ſtayed one day, he met with the Generall, to whom he recounted all that had happened in that his excurſion. Ferat being come to LORI, there encamped his armie. This place did ſometime belong to Simon the Georgian, well ſtrengthened with an high caſtle, compaſſed about with very deep ditches and a thick wall, almoſt a mile in circuit, but was then ſomwhat weakned with time: it is diſtant from TEFLIS about two daies iourney, of a carriers pace. Vpon this caſtle Ferat ſeized, and hauing repaired the wals, and ſtrengthened the breaches, he placed therein Ali Baſſa of GREECE with ſeuen thouſand ſouldiors for the defence thereof, and planted vpon the walles two hundred ſmall peices of ordinance. And ſo when hee had ſet all things there in good order, departed thence with his armie towards TOMANIS; hauing before commaunded Ali Baſſa at ſome conuenient time to fortifie SAITAN CHALASI, a caſtle about ten miles diſtant from LORI, and therein to place a conuenient garriſon of ſouldiors and artillerie.

Ferat cutteth downe a thicke wood at Tomanis, & buildeth a fort vpon the ſtrait.

Foure dayes were they going from LORI to TOMANIS, being ordinarily but one dayes worke from the one place to the other: but now the Generall would needs ſo make it, to take the ſpoile of thoſe rich fields, abounding with corne, cattell, & fruit, and to leaue vnto the countrey people a lamentable remembrance of his being there. At laſt being come to TOMANIS (in times paſt a caſtle of Simons, but by reaſon of theſe warres, by him then abandoned, he began to conſult with the other captains, how and where the fortreſſe ſhould be erected, for the aſſurance of that countrey. But after many diſcourſes, it was at laſt concluded not to fortifie in that caſtle, as being too farre from the ſtrait, to make that dangerous paſſage ſafe and ſecure; but to go a little further, and to build a fortreſſe vpon the very mouth of the ſtrait. So the armie marching forward a few miles, at the very entrance of the narrow paſſage found the ruines of another caſtle, and

A and neere thereunto ſtayed themſelues. This ſteepe headlong caſtle was ſo compaſſed round about with a thicke wood, which hindered all diſcouerie a farre off, that it was not conuenient to found ſuch a caſtle there, from whence their ordinance could neither auaile them to whom the defence thereof ſhould be committed, neither endomage thoſe that ſhould come to offend it. And therfore the general commanded, that euery man with all his endeauors ſhould lay to his hand for the cutting downe of that thicke wood, and making way through thick & thin to lay it for an open champaigne, that was before the receptacle of a thouſand dangerous treacheries. In very ſhort ſpace were the trees laied along on the ground, the place made lightſome & open, and a very commodious ſituation prepared for the foundation of a caſtle. The plot of the old ruined caſtle was compaſſed about with a wall of a thouſand and ſeuen hundred yards, & in the
B middeſt thereof was erected a ſtrong keepe, ſundrie lodgings and chambers builded, and two hundred pieces of Ordinance diſtributed vpon the new wals. After that, the Generall ſent Reſuan Baſſa and the Baſſa of CAIRAEMIT with twentie thouſand of his moſt choice ſouldiours, to conuey ſuccours to TEFLIS: who marching cloſely togither in the direct way, in one day arriued at the ſaid fort; wherein they beſtowed their ſupplies, and changing the Gouernour thereof, ſubſtituted in his roome one Bagli, being then vpon this occaſion only called a Baſſa. Whileſt Reſuan yet lay thus encamped vnder TEFLIS, Daut Chan the brother of Simon, who in the beginning of theſe wars, at the comming of Muſtapha the Turkes Generall into GEORGIA, had fled out of TEFLIS, came now with all his familie, offering himſelfe as a ſubiect and deuouted vaſſale to the Turkiſh emperour; whom Reſuan entertained with great promiſes and large aſſu-
C rances of all good ſucceſſe, according to his deſire.

The compaſſe of the caſtle built at Tomanis by Ferat.

In the meane while newes were brought to Simon, That Generall Ferat ſlaying at the ſtraits of TOMANIS with his armie, had ſent Reſuan Baſſa with a farre leſſe number than indeed he had, to ſuccour TEFLIS: Vpon which report hee tooke courage to encounter Reſuan, and to giue him battell. Vpon which reſolution without further delay being accompanied but with foure thouſand Georgians, partly ſubiects of his owne, and partly of Manucchiars, he with all ſpeed poſſible went againſt Reſuan. But whileſt Simon was going thitherwards, Generall Ferat fearing the worſt, had alreadie by chance diſpatched away the two Baſſaes of CARAMANIA and MARAS, with ten thouſand ſouldiours, to the end that ioining themſelues with the ſouldiors of Reſuan, they ſhould at all aduentures be ſo much the ſtronger. Now Simon going reſolutely
D on, found Reſuan encamped with ſix thouſand ſouldiors onely at the foot of an hill, on the back ſide whereof lay all the reſt of the armie, and preſently gaue a charge vpon him, when the ſoldiors behind the hill being aware of his approch, were readie all at once with their weapons to receiue him. Who now perceiuing his error, repented himſelfe to haue ſo raſhly aſſaulted his enemies, ſeeing now no other remedie but to be vtterly vndone. But ſeeing that he had now ſo far engaged himſelfe, as that he could not by flight but encreaſe his griefe and make the iſſue more lamentable, with theſe few ſouldiours which he had he endured the furie of the great armie of Reſuan, ſo that on both ſides there was ioyned a moſt cruell battell: wherein the ſtrang and vnuſuall valour of thoſe few Chriſtians was much to be wondred at. Yet in the end the huge number of the Turkiſh ſwords and ſpeares ſo preuailed vpon that ſmall number of the Georgians,
E as that they were brought to great extremitie: yea Simon himſelfe hauing his horſe ſlaine vnder him, fell downe headlong to the ground, and in his fall was very neere to haue beene taken priſoner, as was his lieutenant and many other his followers, had he not been relieued by an vnexpected and maruellous chance: for whiles the battell was euen at the greateſt heate betweene them, Reſuan diſcouered the two Baſſaes of CARAMANIA and MARAS, who (as is before ſaid) were newly ſent by Generall Ferat to ſuccour him; but both by the ſaid Reſuan and alſo by the reſt of his armie were indeed thought to be Perſians; whereupon they were incontinently ſurpriſed with a ſudden feare, inſomuch that they now became very doubtful of the victorie, wherof they thought themſelues before aſſured. In this ſuſpence and doubtfulneſſe of mind the battell was alſo intermitted, and the victorie by the ſight of thoſe their friends diſturbed: whereby F the Georgians, and eſpecially Simon, whoſe ſtate was almoſt deſperat, tooke the oportunitie to eſcape and ſaue themſelues, leauing behind them moſt ſure ſignes of their valour among the Turkes; of whom many remained their ſlain, many wounded, and many filled with great maruell and vnexpected feare. Thus eſcaped poore Simon with the remainder of his followers into his known places of refuge, there to bewaile the death and captiuitie of his ſubiects. But Reſuan afrer he had diſcouered the Baſſaes approching towards him, to be his knowne friends and well willers, fretted in himſelfe exceedingly, that Simon had ſo eſcaped his hands: yet holding on his way to TOMANIS, he arriued there in great triumph, drawing the ſtanderds of Simon all along the ground, and cauſing many of the heads of the Georgians to be carried vpon his ſouldiors launces, to the great ioy of Generall Ferat; to whom he deliuered all the priſoners taken in the battell, and wicked Daut Chan, who hauing in times paſt renounced his firſt faith, was become a Perſian, and now againe deſpiſing the vaine ſuperſtition of the Perſians, had yeelded himſelfe to the vanitie of the Turkes, and made himſelfe a voluntarie ſlaue to Amurath. G

Now was the yeare ſo farre ſpent, that euery man began to feare the Winters approch, and therefore the Generall determined to remoue thence, and to withdraw himſelfe into places of more ſafetie. And ſo hauing ſet all things in order in the new fort, he appointed Haſſan to be the Baſſa of TOMANIS, and left with him eight thouſand ſelect ſouldiors, choſen out of all the armie for the defence of that fort, and the countrie thereabout. Deepely had Ferat laied vp the outrage committed by Muſtaffa the Georgian (being now returned to his old name of Manuchiar) in taking away the kings treaſure, and killing the two Capigi and the Chiaus: and therefore he reſolued with himſelfe not to returne to CHARS or ERZIRVM, vnleſſe he had firſt paſſed into the countrie of the ſaid Georgian, and in moſt cruell manner reuenged thoſe notable iniuries before receiued. In three daies he arriued at TRIALA, and there encamped. But lying there ſuch an vnwonted dearth and ſcarcitie of all things riſe in the armie, but eſpecially of victuals, that euerie fiue buſhels and a halfe of Wheat was ſold for fiue hundred duckats, to the vniuerſall calamitie of the whole armie. H

A wonderfull dearth in the Turkes armie at Triala.

From this place the Generall was minded to go on forwards towards the countrey of Manuchiar, but whiles he was vpon the raiſing of his tents, one Veis Baſſa of ALEPPO, came vnto him and told him, That it was not good now to ſpend the time in wandering about thoſe countries, for that there were three verie great enemies confederat togither, to make this enterpriſe very difficult, and almoſt impoſſible and deſperat: one was the ſeaſon of the yeare, being now full of ſnowes, froſt, and tempeſts; another was, the want & ſcarcitie of all things neceſſarie, eſpecially of victuall; the third was, the people of GEORGIA, who by a common vniting of themſelues togither, and peraduenture aided by the Perſians, might worke ſome notable miſchiefe againſt the armie. This ſpeech of Veis ſo much offended the Generall, that he moſt ſharpely rebuked him, and with bitter tearmes reproued him, telling him flatly, That he well perceiued he was brought vp among mountains and villages, and of a villaine (as he was) vpon ſome ſuperfluetie of grace, or fooliſh importunitie, aduanced to the honour of a Baſſa; & that therfore he ſhould not haue preſumed ſo much as to think it lawfull for him, ſo impudently & malapertly to come and giue him ſuch aduertiſements; wheras it had bin his dutie rather to haue held his peace, and to haue harkned vnto the commaundments of his betters and ſuperiors, yeelding himſelfe obedient and deuoted with all his power to performe the ſame. With this rebuke the General paſſed on to ARCHELECH, burning and in a maner deſtroying the countrie before him, though indeed it was in amitie and confederacie with the Turkes. But the inhabitants of ARCHELECH vpon the comming of the Turks had abandoned the citie, and for feare withdrawne themſelues into the mountaines. In ARCHELECH Ferat encamped, & ſtaied the ſpace of foure daies among the rockie crags and in a barren ſoile, yeelding neceſſarie ſuſtenance neither for man nor beaſt; ſo that euery man there endured vnſpeakeable miſeries: yet for the ſpace of foure daies the ſoldiors with patience endured this ſo great a calamitie. But in the end the fall of an huge ſnow being added to theſe extremities, did ſo greatly increaſe their griefes, that all the Ianizaries and Spaoglans of CONSTANTINOPLE aroſe in a tumult, and comming before Ferat, in deſpightfull and contemptuous maner with very haughtie and reſolute tearmes ſaid vnto him: K L

And how long ſhall we endure this thy tedious and inſolent gouernment? Where is the due commiſeration that thou oughteſt to beare toward the vaſſales of thy Soueraigne, thou ruſticall and vnreaſonable captaine? Doeſt thou thinke happilie, that wee keepe our harlots as thou doeſt vnder thy ſumptuous pauillions, all fat and in good plight, with delicat viands, whileſt others liue in miſerie? Doeſt thou beleeue that wee haue, as thou haſt, our daintie ſugars, ſpices, and conſerues, whereby to reſtore vs, in the common calamitie of others? And that we haue at commaund meat and pretious wines, which thou mingleſt with thy cleare and pleaſant water, partly prouided for thee by the art of the cunning M doctors,

A doctors, and partly brought to thee from farre places? From this day forward it will be no longer endured, that ſo much people ſhould continue in this famine, afflicted with nakedneſſe, and many other inconueniences: and therefore get thy ſelfe vp, and returne toward ERZIRVM, otherwiſe we ſhall bee enforced to doe that which will breed more diſpleaſure vnto thee, than to any man aliue.

The Generall in a great agonie preſently called a counſell, wherein it was concluded, That they ſhould all ſend their ſtrong ſumpter horſes to ARDACHAN, and the reſt to follow him into Manucchiars countrey, whither he had appointed to goe, onely to make an inrode, and with the ſpoile and bootie of that country, to refreſh the minds of his ſouldiors afflicted with the miſeries both paſt and preſent. This commandement of the Generals they all readily obeyed, as well be-
B cauſe hee promiſed them a ſpeedie voyage, as alſo for that euerie man deſired the ſacke of ALTVNCHALA, and other the territories of Manucchiar. So Ferat holding on his iourney through certaine low vallies betweene the high and craggie mountaines, continually accompanied with great famine and ſcarſitie, at length brought his armie to CLISCA, a place belonging to Manucchiar, but as then for feare of the Turkes quite abandoned and forſaken by the inhabitants; who with their wiues and children and all the beſt ſtuffe they had, were fled into remote and ſafe places, vntill the furie of the enemie were ouerpaſſed. In the fields neere vnto this place (abounding with corne and cattell & plentie of fruit) the General refreſhed his whole army, and hoping that all the ſouldiors would like it wel to ſtay a while in ſuch good eaſe, determined with himſelfe to C erect a fort in that place. And with this reſolution gaue commandement to Reſuan Baſſa to go vp to the tower, and in the top thereof to ſet vp an enſigne with a proclamation and publike report, That he would in the name of Amurath there erect a fort, and fortifie it as he had the other forts before. Reſuan accompanied with Amurath the Baſſa of CARAMANIA, according to the commaundement of the Generall, in the top of the tower ſet vp an enſigne or two: which as ſoone as the ſouldiors had eſpied, the forenamed Ianizaries & Spaoglans, thinking themſelues too much abuſed by their Generall, ariſing againe all in an vprore, repleniſhed with fury and indignation, ran vp in a rage to take downe the enſignes that were ſet vp vpon the tower, and taking them in their hands, tapt the ſaid Reſuan once or twiſe about the pate, diſcharging withall a thouſand iniurious and deſpightfull words vpon him, and ſharply rebuked him. And then re-D turning to the Generall (who was now come thither himſelfe to countenance the action of Reſuan) with geſtures full of deſpight, contempt, and diſdaine, reuiling him with many ſhameſull and ſcornfull tearmes, they proteſted vnto him:

That they were not come to the warres, to exerciſe the occupation of maſons and dawbers, and to bee employed in ſuch vile and diſhonourable offices, but onely to mannage their weapons, and thereby to demerite their ordinarie wages, and to purchaſe to themſelues glorie and renowme at the kings hands. And therefore if he loued his head, and would not ſee thoſe armes turned againſt himſelfe which hitherto had bene the reuengers of the enemies iniuries, he ſhould reſolue with himſelfe to leaue theſe new buildings and theſe vnſeaſonable deſignements; and giuing place to the contrarie ſeaſon of the yeare, to haue due care of their common deſires and neceſſitie. The mutinous ſouldiors againe threaten their Generall.

Whiles they were yet thus expoſtulating the matter with him, one more bold than the reſt, and more forgetfull of his duetie, did not ſticke to aſſault the Generall, and to threaten him to wreake his furie vpon him: which in that tumult had happily been done, had not the Baſſa of CARAMANIA lent the Generall his owne horſe, and ſo conducted him to his pauilion. Yet was he neuertheleſſe ſtill purſued by the tumultuous ſoldiors, and againe ſharply accuſed for the ſtay that he made there, and for not reſoluing preſently to remoue thence: and at laſt after many reproachfull ſpeeches told expreſſely, That if he did not the next morning remoue out of thoſe quarters, without all faile, he ſhould loſe his life for it. For all that, Ferat diſdaining to yeeld to them that ſhould of dutie haue been ready and obedient at euery beck of his, and ſeeking by all
F meanes (notwithſtanding all this ſtirre) to ſtay there ſo long time as ſhould be ſufficient to build a fort, that would ſo much offend Manucchiar, anſwered them againe.

That hee made no account of their threatning him with his life, which hee had alwayes offered to lay downe for any ſeruice of his king. But if they had no care to ſerue their ſoueraigne in this new buil- The ſtout anſwer of Ferat.

ding, ding, they might goe their wayes; as for himselfe, hee was resolutely minded to obey his lord in whatsoeuer hee had commaunded him, for the honour of whom, euery one of them ought to thinke their liues verie well bestowed. G

Vpon this answere there followed diuers raylings and cursings against the king, against the Generall, and against them all; and in this confused tumult euerie man betooke himselfe to his weapons: in euery corner was heard grumlings and whisperings, full of wrath and indignation: so that there was a great feare of some dangerous euent, but greater was the suspition of the Generals life. And now euery man had withdrawne himselfe to the guarding of such things as he esteemed most; when suddenly and in a trice you might haue seen the pauilions of all the Bassaes and captains fall down flat to the ground, all the cords therof being cut in sunder by the wrathfull souldiors: and as it were in a moment, all the muttons and other cattell which the Generall and Bassaes led with them for their ordinarie vse, were seized vpon by the same souldiors, and guarded with all diligence possible. And so farre was it off that any man durst challenge or reuenge this their insolency, that they themselues turning afresh vpon their General (being now in a maze and deadly feare) began now the third time to threaten him, That if he did not forthwith remoue from those countries, and turne his iourney towards ERZIRVM, those vallies and fields should without all faile become the sepulchres of the Bassaes, and those hils retaine the eternall memorie of so bloudie a day. The souldiours ouerthrow the Generals tents and threaten to kill him. H

With a little liberalitie might the Generall haue done with this people whatsoeuer hee had listed, but being loth to gratifie them with any thing, he was enforced to performe their prowd and arrogant demands, and to his great shame to obey them whom with right vsage hee might haue made obedient to himselfe: and therefore to auoid their despightfull threats, to his exceeding great reproach, he was glad euen as they had commanded to remoue out of those quarters. The first day he arriued at ARDACHAN, with the great trouble of all his souldiors: for whereas the iourney was wont to bee two dayes worke ordinarily, as well in respect of the length of the way, as the difficultie of the passage, the Generall would now needs haue it done in one, the rather thereby to grieue his souldiors. But of this his wilfulnesse, he receiued euen the same day the iust reward; for that the chariots wherein his women rode, were conuaied away, together with the eunuchs that were their keepers: some say by the Georgians, that lay in wait for such a prey; some others say by the Ianizaries, who the more to dishonour their Generall, wrought him this iniurie. I K

Great was the reproch that Ferat receiued in the armie, but farre greater at CONSTANTINOPLE, when these newes were there known: but there was no remedy, he must now perforce endure it, and discontented as hee was, keepe on his way towards ERZIRVM. In ARDACHAN he tooke a suruey of his army, and there gaue his souldiors leaue to depart: himselfe afterwards arriuing at ERZIRVM, hated of all his souldiors, enuied by his captaines, derided for the losse of his women, and fallen into the disgrace of euerie man. No lesse than the rest was the Turkish emperor discontented with him also: first for that he had done nothing worth the speaking of, in reuenge of the shamefull iniury done by Manucchiar the Georgian, and yet so mightily discontented his souldiors: and secondly, for that without any care he had suffered Aliculi Chan the Persian prisoner to escape away; about whose flight it was thought he could not chuse but haue some intelligence. For Ferat, after hee was by new order from the court to diuert his iourney from NASSIVAN to the straits and narrow passages of GEORGIA, being desirous to be throughly enformed of those dangerous wayes; in this second yeare when hee remoued from ERZIRVM, took Aliculi Chan out of prison, of purpose to vse him as his guide in those dangerous straits, and therefore carried him vnder a guard (whatsoeuer it was afterwards) of his most faithfull vassals, still intreating him well, and taking such order as that hee wanted nothing: at last being come to the straits of TOMANIS in GEORGIA, where the castle (as wee haue before said) was erected, he from thence secretly escaped into PERSIA. The manner of his escape is diuersly reported: some say that Ferat in discharge of his promise, for his good direction had gratified him with his libertie: others say, that Ferat corrupted with money, gaue him opportunity to escape: some others (with more probabilitie) that this escape was made, neither for money, nor discharge of promise, but by the onely vigilancie of Aliculi himselfe, and the sleepinesse of his keepers; and that watching the opportunitie of the night (a friend to all escapes) hee started away. Howsoeuer Ferat at Ardachan breaketh vp his armie. L M

A euer it was, in fine he was deliuered from his long captiuitie to the diſcredit of Ferat, and returned into PERSIA, to performe ſuch enterpriſes againſt the Turks, as ſhall be hereafter declared.

General Ferat (before his departure out of GEORGIA) had commanded Aly the Baſſa of GRÆCIA (whom he left, as is before declared, in the new caſtle of LORI) to fortifie a certaine caſtle called SAITAN CHASI (in our language, the Caſtle of the Diuell) which he with great diligence performed, and left therein fiftie pieces of artillerie, and a thouſand ſouldiours vnder the charge of a Sanzacke: and ſo quieted the paſſages from fort to fort, as that all the waies from REIVAN to CHARS, and from CHARS to TEFLIS, were made eaſie and ſafe, and all the meanes taken away whereby the enemie might be able to plot any new treacherie vpon thoſe paſſages: which was

The Perſian king in the meane time lying at TAVRIS with his armie, vnderſtanding that the Turks had changed their purpoſe from NASSIVAN to GEORGIA, ſo that there was no further need to imploy his armie againſt them for the defence of TAVRIS or NASSIVAN: at laſt reſolued with himſelfe to licence his ſoldiors to depart, and to applie himſelfe to more priuat reuenges. For calling Emir Chan vnto him, whom he had left Gouernor of TAVRIS, and Generall for that part of his kingdome; he required of him the occaſion, why he had not performed the great promiſes which he had made to him before his departed to HERI, nor done his endeuour to hinder the Turks Fabrik at REIVAN: and why he went not out with other ſouldiors appointed for that purpoſe, and namely with the Turcomans (as he had promiſed) to reuenge ſo great
C an iniurie, and in beſt manner he could to haue endomaged the Trukiſh forces? Sundrie excuſes did Emir Chan alledge for the coloring of his manifeſt default, but none ſufficient to cleare him of the crimes obiected againſt him by the king and the Sultans: wherefore he was by the king adiudged to haue his eies burnt out with an hoat yron; and ſo depriued of his ſight, to be deſpoiled of all his goods and ſhut vp in cloſe priſon. Which heauie doome was without further delay accordingly put in execution: whereof within the ſpace of a few months, the wicked Chan (but yet a famous ſoldior) miſerably dyed in priſon. Whoſe death ſo highly offended the Turcoman nation (who had him alwaies in great eſtimation) that they abſolutly denied their defences for the crowne of PERSIA: and the more, when they heard that the king had beſtowed the roume of Emir Chan vpon Aliculi; who although he had in many reſpects deſerued all preferD ment, yet for that he was an ancient enemie to certaine Turcoman captaines, they would not in any wiſe endure that he ſhould be exalted to ſo great an honour. And therfore they waxed more diſdainfull and ill affected towards the king, wherby the Perſian forces became the more weakned and diuided. Emir Chan hauing his eyes put out, dieth miſerably in priſon.

The Turks notwithſtanding the league yet in force between Amurath and Rodolph the Chriſtian emperor that now is, did many times make incurſions into the vpper part of HVNGARIE, burning the countrie villages, and carrying away the people into captiuitie: but in their return, they were oftentimes cut off by the emperors ſouldiors, and ſlaine. Which being reported at CONSTANTINOPLE much moued the Turkiſh tyrant: but when he vnderſtood that his men had without any cauſe made thoſe inrodes into the territorie of the Chriſtians, and ſo receiued
E the foreſaid loſſes, he was againe appeaſed, and in the beginning of this yeare 1584, renewed the league betwixt him and the emperor for eight yeares more.

Ferat from ERZIRVM aduertiſed Amurath of all that had happened in his late expedition, deſiring him to commaund what he would haue taken in hand the next Spring. But beſides this information from him, there wanted not many others which did the like alſo, although in another manner: declaring vnto the king (and that in an odious ſort) the whole proceedings of Ferat, the eſcape of Aliculi Chan, the ſhamefull loſſe of his women, his quarrels with the Ianizaries, his falling out with Vies Baſſa, a man well regarded of Amurath himſelfe, the diſorders of his whole campe for his want of diſcretion; and to be ſhort, the particularities of all ſuch actions as had not altogither ſo honourably been by him performed that yeare: cauſes of themſelues ſuffiF cient to induce the king to remoue the ſaid Ferat from his Generalſhip. To which occaſions, were alſo added ſundrie other ſecret reſpects: for euer ſince the laſt departure of Ferat from ERZIRVM, Amurath had ſtill in his head, the next yeare following to attempt the enterpriſe of TAVRIS, and thereby to ſtirre vp through the world a famous report of his conqueſt correſpondent to his greatneſſe. Now among the captaines whom he eſteemed to be worthie men, to whom he might with truſt commit this ſo great an enterpriſe, he bethought himſelfe of Oſman Baſſa, left at SYMACHIA in SIRVAN by Generall Muſtapha in the firſt yeare of this warre: who hauing in that poruince remained euer ſince, had without any helpe of the Tartarians, by his owne induſtrie and valour, to the great contentment of Amurath, brought that large countrie into a reaſonable obedience to the Turkiſh empire: and that which moſt of all pleaſed the Turkiſh emperor, had in a countrie ſo farre diſtant maintained his armie, wherewith hee had done all this without any expences at all to his king; hauing now a good while leuied his ſoldiors ſtipends vpon the lands and territories of that region; and ſtill exerciſed a kind of gouernment and ſoueraigntie ouer thoſe places. Of all which his good proceedings, he had cauſed intelligence from time to time to be ſent vnto the court: by which meanes, and other fauourers which he had about the king, there was foſtered in the mind of Amurath a wonderfull good opinion of him; ſo that now without delay he reſolued to ſend for him to CONSTANTINOPLE; and for that purpoſe, before Ferat was arriued at ERZIRVM, he had diſpatched certaine Capigi and Chiaus to call this famous warriour vnto him: yet wanted there not ſome (and thoſe not of the meaneſt ſort) that went about to hinder both his comming to the court, and alſo theſe deſignments of ſo great importance. For Sciaus the chiefe Viſier (who rather for the comelineſſe of his perſon and alliance with the king, than for any other his vertues, was mounted to that high roome) did greatly feare leaſt Oſman, whoſe courſe it was to ſit next vnto him in the order of the greateſt Baſſaes, partly for his experience in matters of warre, and partly for the good affection the king did beare vnto him, ſhould at his comming to CONSTANTINOPLE perſuade the king to what he liſted, and ſo peraduenture take from him the chiefeſt office, and get into his hands the whole gouernment of the empire, whereby ſo great wealth was to be gained. Wherefore to rid himſelfe of theſe feares, he caſt about by all means to keepe him from comming to the Court: but becauſe that to attempt the ſame openly, might proue a matter both difficult and dangerous, he thought it better to make triall of a more commodious and ſecret meanes. This Sciaus in conſideration of many gifts beſtowed vpon him by Mahomet the Cuman Tartar king, had many times excuſed him to Amurath of diuers accuſations which Oſman by his letters had laid to his charge, For not aiding him in the ſubduing of SIRVAN, as he was both by promiſe and duetie bound: and for all his ouerſights alleadged ſuch reaſons in his behalfe, as if they did not altogither perſuade Amurath to be kind vnto him, yet at the leaſt not to carie a mind of reuenge againſt him: and had ſo far proceeded in countenancing this Tartarian king, that there was betwixt them confirmed an interchangeable amitie and mutual confederacie. Him Sciaus imagined to find willing and readie by all meanes poſſible, to hinder the comming of Oſman his enemie to the Court, if he were but made acquainted with the matter. And therefore Sciaus, as ſoone as he vnderſtood the certaine reſolution of Amurath to call Oſman to the Court, ſecretly wrote to the Tartar king, who lay encamped neere to the hauen of CAFFA vpon the Fens of MEOTIS, certifying him, That Oſman was to come to the Court, & that therefore it were good for him to call to mind, how great an enemie he had beene to him, and how much he had endeuoured by letters to Amurath, to turne all his hatred and diſpleaſure againſt him: and withal, That if he was able to do ſo much by letters, as if Sciaus had not defended him with verie reaſonable excuſes, the king had executed his wrathfull indignation vpon him to his great danger; he ſhould then imagine with himſelfe, what Oſman ſhould be able to do when he ſhould come in perſon to the preſence of Amurath, and without any mediator, between themſelues determine of all matters what they ſhould thinke conuenient. Theſe, and peraduenture worſe letters which Sciaus wrote to the Tartar, miniſtred matter enough vnto him to reſolue to do what he might, not to ſuffer ſo pernitious an enemie of his to arriue at CONSTANTINOPLE: and eſpecially perceiuing that Sciaus, in whoſe breaſt he repoſed all his hope and all his protection, did ſo greatly feare his comming. Wherefore he rid himſelfe of that feare, hee commaunded twelue thouſand ſouldiors, that changing their weapons and apparrell, they ſhould go and lie in wait for Oſman in the borders betweene COLCHIS and IBERIA, towards the Tartarian Nomades, by which way he was to come; and ſo making an aſſault vpon him, to bereaue him of his life. Hoping that ſuch an outrage once done could not, or would not be imputed to his procurement, but rather to the Tartar Nomades, or to the Mengrellians, or to the Georgians, or to the Moſcouites, or to the robbers by the high way; and to bee ſhort, rather to any bodie elſe than to him. This commandement of the Tartar king, was accordingly by the ſouldi-

A ors put in practise: who without further stay ioyned themselues togither, and so rode towards the place appointed.

And now were the messengers sent from Amurath, come to Osman, who presently put himselfe on his way towards CONSTANTINOPLE, hauing left behind him at DERBENT and SVMACHIA two Bassaes, thought to bee the most sufficient men in SERVANIA: hauing also appointed very good orders in the same, and an assured establishment of all those countries and places which Mustapha first had subdued, and he himselfe had afterwards maintained vnder the obedience of Amurath. He had also prouided for the safetie of his own person, in passing those troublesome and dangerous passages through which he was to trauell, by chusing out foure thousand souldiors which he had tried in diuers battels, and brought vp vnder his owne discipline; through whose
B valour he doubted not safely to passe through the treacheries of the Albanians, and the populous squadrons as well of the Tartarians as of the Mengrellians.

Thus departed he from DERBENT, and coasting along the rockes of CAVCASVS (that at all times of the yeare are all white and hoarie with continuall snowes) leauing on his left hand MEDIA, IBERIA, and CHOLCHIS, and on the right hand the famous riuers of Tanais and Volga, euen at his first entrance vnto the shores of the Euxine sea, he was by the abouenamed twelue thousand Tartarians, being apparrelled like theeues that lie vpon those waies, suddenly assailed and fought withall. But like as an huge rocke lying open to tempest and waues, standing fast and vnmoueable in it selfe, resisteth the thundrings and rushings of the great and fearefull billowes:
C so stood Osman fast and firme, & couragiously sustained this trecherous assault, turning the bold countenances of his resolute souldiors against the rebellious multitude of those traiterous squadrons: who as is their maner in the beginning vsed great force, but finding so stout resistance in those few, whom they had thought with their onely lookes and shoutings to haue put to flight, they began at length to quaile. Which Osman quickely perceiuing, couragiously forced vpon them, and in a verie short space and with a verie small losse of his own, put those Tartarians to flight, killing a number of them, and also taking many of them prisoners: by whom Osman was afterwards informed (as the truth was) that their king for feare that he had conceiued, least when he came to CONSTANTINOPLE he would procure his destruction from Amurath, had sent this armie to seeke his death. Of which treason Osman caused a perfect processe to be made, togi-
D ther with the depositions of the Tartarian prisoners, which he sent the shortest way he could deuise to Amurath at CONSTANTINOPLE; with letters declaring all that had passed, enflaming him to reuenge so dangerous an iniurie and so wicked a practise. Amurath receiuing these aduertisements from Osman, according to the necessitie of the matter tooke order that Vuzales his Admirall with certaine gallies well appointed, should passe ouer to CAFFA to fetch Osman; and withall to carrie with him Islan, a brother of the Tartar kings, commaunding Osman by letters, that he should (to the terror of others) put to death the trecherous king, and place his brother in his rome.

Osman assaulted by twelue thousand Tartars.

Osman ouercommeth the Tartars.

This Tartar king was one of those mightie princes, who basely yeelding to the Othoman power, led vnder them a most vile and troublesome life, as their tributaries and vassals, alwaies at command: whose younger brother Islan (presuming of the sufficiencie of himselfe & the fa-
E uour of the people) going to CONSTANTINOPLE, became a suter vnto the Turkish emperour, to haue his eldest brother thrust out of his kingdome, as a man for his euill gouernment hated of his subiects, and to be placed himselfe in his roome. Which his sute was so crossed by the embassadours of the king his brother, who spared for no cost in the behalfe of their master, that the ambitious youth was sent from the Turkes court to ICONIVM, and there clapt fast vp in prison: where apparelled like an Eremit, he led his life altogither conformable to his miserie, with such a kind of externall innocencie, as if he had been void of all hope or ambitious desire of a kingdome, but rather like a forlorne and vnhappie wretch with vaine affliction and impious deuotion to prepare himselfe to a laudable and honourable death. But whilest he thus liued, sequestred
F from all worldly cogitations, vpon the discouerie of the king his brothers rebellion hee was in more than post hast sent for to CONSTANTINOPLE, and put into the gallies bound for CAFFA, with letters to Osman of the tenour aforesaid. Now in the meane time Osman had by cunning meanes got into his hands this Tartar king, being as is reported betraied by his owne counsellours, corrupted by the Turkes gold: whom with his two sonnes Osman vpon the receit of the aforesaid letters from Amurath, caused to be presently strangled with a bowstring, and Islan his younger

This ſhamefull death, the vſuall reward of the Turkiſh friendſhip, was thought iuſtly to haue happened vnto his Tartar king, for that he not long before, ſupported by Amurath, had moſt vnnaturally depoſed his aged father from that kingdome, iuſt reuenge now proſecuting his ſo great diſloyaltie. G

Oſman embarked himſelfe at the forenamed gallies at the port of CAFFA, paſſing ouer the Euxine ſea, and entring into the Thracian Boſphorus, arriued at CONSTANTINOPLE, where he was receiued with great pompe and ſingular ſignifications of good loue. But with moſt euident and expreſſe kinds of ioy was he ſaluted by Amurath himſelfe, when by his owne ſpeech and preſence he declared vnto him euerie particularitie of the matters that had happened in his long and important voiage, and in liuely manner repreſented vnto him the perils & trauels that he had paſſed, and the conqueſts that he had made in SIRVAN. After all which diſcourſes Amurath who longed after nothing more than to ſee the Perſian king ſomewhat bridled, and the famous citie of TAVRIS brought vnder his own ſubiection, began to enter into conference with Oſman about that enterpriſe, and in the end would needs know throughly of him, what iſſue he could promiſe him of this his deſire, and in what ſort by his aduiſe & counſell the forces ſhould be imploied, and the armies diſpoſed for the ſubduing of that citie, which ouer all the nations of the world was ſo famous and ſo great an honour to the Perſian kingdome. To all which demaunds his anſwere and reſolution was, That for ſo much as the matters of GEORGIA were now well ſetled, the trecherous paſſages by the new built forts aſſured, and the prouince of SIRVAN vnder his obedience eſtabliſhed, there was now no cauſe why he ſhould any longer foreſlow ſo famous an enterpriſe, but by the conqueſt of TAVRIS, & erecting of a fort in that prowd citie, to bring a terrour vpon all PERSIA, and to raiſe a glorious renowne of ſo mightie a conqueſt among the nations of EVROPE: for the accompliſhment whereof, he thought that either the ſame armie, or at the moſt a very little greater would ſuffice, ſo that it were raiſed of the beſt and choiſeſt ſouldiors. H I

Amurath demãdeth Oſmans opinion concerning the enterpriſe of Tauris.

Oſmans reſolution.

By reaſon of one of the letters which Sciaus Baſſa had written to the late Tartar king, and by the inſtigation of the young Sultan Mahomets mother (iealous of the neere alliance of the great Baſſa with her huſband, as preiudiciall and dangerous to her ſonne) Amurath had in the open Diuano depriued the ſaid Sciaus from the office of the chiefe Viſier, and hardly pardoning him his life, at the interceſſion of his wife, being his ſiſter, had baniſhed him the court, ſo that he liued afterwards about CALCEDON, vpon the borders of ASIA, not far from CONSTANTINOPLE, in a cloſe pallace he had there built for his owne pleaſure: in whoſe roome he appointed Oſman to be chiefe Viſier; and to honour him the more, nominated him the Generall of his armie againſt the Perſians. Such power hath vertue, that euen from the very ſcum of the raſcall ſort, and out of the ruſticall rout of mountaine peaſants (which notwithſtanding cannot be truly iuſtified of this Oſman, his father being Beglerbeg of DAMASCO, and his mother the daughter of the Beglerbeg of BABILON) it doth oftentimes in the courſe of this variable world draw diuers men into princes Courts, and aduance them to the higheſt dignities. Truth it is, that from a priuat ſouldior, though well borne, he by ſundrie degrees grew vp to the higheſt honour of that ſo great an empire, and was at one inſtant created the chiefe Counſellor and Generall of the Othoman forces. Great was the ioy that Oſman conceiued hereat, and great was the deſire hee had to make himſelfe worthie of ſo honourable fauours; and the greater confidence he perceiued that Amurath had repoſed in him, the more eagarly was hee ſpurred on to doe any thing poſſible whereby he might ſhew himſelfe to haue deſerued the ſame. And therefore aduiſing with himſelfe, that for as much as the greatneſſe of the enterpriſe required a greater armie than was leuied in former yeares, ſo it was neceſſarie alſo for him the ſooner to ſend out his aduertiſements into all his ſubiect prouinces, and by his owne example to ſtir vp the other captaines and ſouldiors euen in the Winter (though it were as yet ſomewhat troubleſome) to paſſe ouer to SCVTARI, and from thence to ANGORI, to AMASIA, to SIVAS, and there in thoſe territories to driue out the time, vntill his ſoldiors which were ſummoned were all gathered togither. And becauſe vpon this his great ſpeed it might peraduenture fall out, that the enemie miſdoubting his purpoſe for TAVRIS, might prouide a greater armie than they would otherwiſe, he cauſed it to be giuen out, That he muſt goe for NASSIVAN; to the end, that the Perſians ſo beguiled, ſhould not regard the gathering of ſo mightie an armie as they would haue done if they ſhould haue heard of the Turkes comming to TAVRIS: and ſo the generall couſening rumor flew, not only K L M

Oſman Baſſa made chiefe Viſier and Generall of the army through

A through all the cities ſubiect to the Turkes, but into the countries of the Perſian alſo: who notwithſtanding being very iealous of the citie of TAVRIS, and fearing that the matter would fall out, as indeed afterward it did, ceaſed not to make moſt curious and diligent inquirie about it. And although the diſgrace offered to his embaſſador at CONSTANTINOPLE, diſſuaded him from ſending any other for treatie of peace: yet to ſpie out the ſecrets of the Turks, and to vnderſtand the certaintie of their purpoſe for NASSIVAN or TAVRIS, he ſent diuers meſſengers to Oſman, as if he had meant to feele his mind touching a peace, but in very deed for nothing els but to ſound his deſignements: which for all that he could not with all the cunning he could vſe poſſibly diſcouer, but ſtill remained doubtfull as at the firſt, the fame ſtill running for NASSIVAN.

B In the beginning of this yeare, now growing towards an end, Amurath ſent one Muſtapha, one of the meaneſt of his Chiaus, vnto Stephen king of POLONIA, to excuſe the death of Podolonius (ſo ſhamefully murthered as is before declared) as if the ſame had happened by the inſolencie of certaine ſoldiors, and not by his commandment: who the better to colour the matter, had brought with him two baſe fellowes, as authors of that outrage, for the king to take reuenge vpon; but were indeed no ſuch men as they were pretended to be, but rather (as it was thought) men before condemned for ſome other fact worthie of death, and now ſent thither to ſerue that purpoſe: for whom the Chiaus (in proud and threatning maner in the name of his maſter) required to haue preſent reſtitution made of all ſuch goods as the Polonian Coſſacks had not long before taken from the Turks, and the captaine of the ſaid Coſſackes to be deliuered alſo vnto
C him, to be caried to Amurath: and ſo hardly vrged the matter, that (notwithſtanding the vnworthie death of Podolouius and his followers, and the taking away of his horſes) all the goods taken by the Coſſackes, were forthwith reſtored: which the Chiaus almoſt in triumphant maner preſented vnto Amurath at CONSTANTINOPLE.

This Summer alſo Amurath diſporting himſelfe with his Muts, was almoſt dead. Theſe Muts are luſtie ſtrong fellows, depriued of their ſpeech; who neuertheleſſe by certain ſignes can both aptly expreſſe their owne conceits, and vnderſtand the meaning of others: theſe men for their ſecrecie are the cruell miniſters of the Turkiſh tyrants moſt horrible commaunds, and therefore of them had in great regard. With theſe Muts mounted vpon faire and fat but heauie and vnreadie horſes, was Amurath, vpon a light and readie horſe, ſporting himſelfe (as the manner of D the Turkiſh emperors is) riding ſometime about one, ſometime about another, & ſtriking now the horſe now the man at his pleaſure; when ſuddenly he was taken with a fit of the falling ſickneſſe, his old diſeaſe, and ſo falling from his horſe, was taken vp for dead: inſo much, that the Ianizaries ſuppoſing him to haue bin indeed dead, after their wonted maner fell to the ſpoiling of the Chriſtians and Iewes, & were proceeding to further outrages, had not their Aga or captaine to reſtraine their inſolencie, to the terror of the reſt hanged vp one of them taken in the manner, and certaine others in the habit of Ianizaries. Neuertheleſſe, Amurath ſhortly after recouered againe, and to appeaſe that rumour of his death (openly vpon their Sabbath, which is the Friday) rid from his pallace to the temple of Sophia; where I with many others ſaw him (ſaith Lewnclauius) his countenance yet all pale and diſcoloured. Io. Leunel. ſup. Annal. Turcicorum, pag 91.

E This yeare alſo happened ſuch a chance as had like to haue raiſed new warres betwixt the Turks and the Venetians: which for as much as it is worth the reporting, I thought it not good in ſilence to paſſe ouer. The widow of Ramadan Baſſa, late Gouernor of TRIPOLIS in BARBARIE, with her ſonne, her familie, and a great number of ſlaues of both ſorts, being about to depart from TRIPOLIS to CONSTANTINOPLE, had rigged vp a faire gallie for the tranſporting of her ſelfe & her ſubſtance, reported to be worth eight hundred thouſand duckats: vpon which gallie for her more ſafetie ſhe had ioyned two others, as conſorts. Thus embarked, ſhe came to the mouth of the Adriaticke, where ſayling by CORFV, ſhe was by force of tempeſt driuen into the gulfe of the Adriaticke. At which time one Petrus Emus, one of the Venetian Senatours, F with certaine gallies had the charge for the keeping of that ſea againſt pyrats, and all other enemies whatſoeuer. He hearing of the Turkes comming into the gulfe, without delay ſet vpon them, and being too ſtrong for them, tooke them all: and hauing them now in his power, exerciſed moſt barbarous crueltie, as well vpon the women as the men: for hauing ſlain the men, in number two hundred and fiftie, and the ſonne of Ramadan in his mothers lap, he cauſed the women, being before rauiſhed, to haue their breaſts cut off, and afterwards to bee caſt ouerbourd A moſt barbarous outrage committed by Petrus Emus a Venetian.

into the ſea, being in number about fortie. The brother of Emus chancing vpon a beautiful virgine, was by her moſt earneſtly entreated to haue ſpared her honour; and the rather for that (as ſhe ſaid) ſhe was a Chriſtian, taken priſoner about twelue yeares before in CYPRVS, ſince which time ſhe had liued in moſt miſerable captiuitie among the Turkes, & being now fallen by good hap into the hands of a noble Venetians, was in good hope to be ſet at libertie inuiolated: which ſhe moſt humbly beſought him for the loue of God to doe, and not to embrue his hands with her guiltleſſe blood, or to diſhonour himſelfe by forcing of her. But all ſhe could ſay preuailed nothing with the cruell & vnbridled youth, who after he had at his pleaſure abuſed her, caſt her with the reſt into the ſea. It is thought that Emus ſuffered this ſo great an outrage (and ſo farre vnbeſeeming the honor of the Venetians) to be done, to the intent that none ſhould be left aliue to bewray the greatneſſe of the bootie, or of the villanie there committed: which was neuertheleſſe (God ſo appointing it) reuailed by one of the Turkes, who ſaued by a ſurgion of CRETE, which knew him, and afterwards comming to CONSTANTINOPLE, openly declared the ſame. With the odious report whereof, the Turks were ſo enraged, that in euery corner of the citie a man might haue heard them threatning vnto the Venetians moſt cruell reuenge: yea they had much adoe to hold their hands from the Bilo or Gouernour of the Venetian Merchants in CONSTANTINOPLE, and to forbeare to ſpit in his face, as he went in the ſtreets. At that time was one Io. Franciſcus Maurocenus (or as they commonly called him, Moreſin) Bilo at CONSTANTINOPLE: who vnderſtanding that Amurath in his rage was about to ſend one of the great gentlemen of his Court, whom the Turkes call Zauſij (the great Turkes vſuall embaſſadours) to VENICE about that matter, found meanes to haue him ſtaied at CONSTANTINOPLE, and another of leſſe authoritie ſent to expoſtulate the matter with the Senat, and in the name of Amurath to require to haue the offendor puniſhed, and the gallies with the ſlaues and goods reſtored: ſo ſhould the league betwixt him and them continue firme, whereas otherwiſe he ſhould be conſtrained by force of armes to reuenge the wrongs done to his ſubiects. This meſſage being by the ſaid meſſenger deliuered at VENICE, the Senators after diligent examination of the matter, returned this anſwer: That the widdow of Ramadan with her familie comming to ZACYNTHVS, an iſland of theirs, was there honourably entertained, and preſented with certaine courteous preſents; but departing thence, and comming to CEPHALENIA, another of their iſlands, her people running on land, contrarie to the conditions of the league, made ſpoile of whatſoeuer they could light vpon, ſparing neither man nor beaſt: Of which their inſolencie their Proueditour vnderſtanding, and making after them, found them in armes within the gulfe; and comming neere vnto them, was neither by them ſaluted, as the manner at ſea is, neither was any top ſaile ſtrucke, in token that the commaund of that ſea belonged vnto the Venetians, all which they ought by the league to haue done: for which their outrages and proud contempt their Proueditor had taken ſo ſharpe a reuenge: neuertheleſſe, they promiſed in that caſe to do what beſeemed them in reaſon and iuſtice to do, for the ſatisfying of his deſire. With which ſo reaſonable an anſwere Amurath ſeemed to be well contented, but being indeed loth to intangle himſelfe with wars againſt that mightie State at ſea, his wars againſt the Perſians being not yet finiſhed: yet ſhortly after Emus was for his diſhonorable and cruell dealing with the ladie and her familie worthily condemned and beheaded, and the gallies with all the goods and ſlaues reſtored. This great woman had in thoſe gallies foure hundred Chriſtian ſlaues, all which vpon the taking of the gallies were (as the manner is) ſet at libertie, for whom the Venetians made reſtitution of as many others of the Turks.

The villanie diſcouered.

Io. Leunel. ſup. Annal. Turcicorum, pag. 92.

Ramadan Baſſa the huſband of the aforeſaid great ladie, was Gouernour of TRIPOLIS in BARBARIE and of the countrie thereabouts: who hauing warres with one of the barbarous kings of the Moores, went out againſt him with all his forces, wherein were certaine companies of Ianizaries, ſent by Amurath from CONSTANTINOPLE. Now in this countrie, as in many other places of AFFRICKE, are great and deſart ſands, ouer which whoſoeuer is to paſſe, muſt prouide himſelfe both of victuals and skilful guids, without which they are not without danger to be paſſed: Ramadan with his armie vnprouided both of the one and the other, hauing entred theſe deſarts, was at length brought to that caſe, that he could neither go forward, neither without loſſe of his men returne. Yet at length he retired, and got home, but not without the loſſe of ſome of his people, and the manifeſt danger of his whole armie: for which his improuidence the Ianizaries fell into ſuch a rage, that not reſpecting the honour of the man, or regarding the diſplea-

Ramadan Baſſa ſlaine by the inſolent Ianizaries.

A displeasure of their soueraigne, they fell vpon him and slew him. At which their insolencie, if Amurath did winke and passe it ouer vnpunished, let no man maruell: for why, the auntient obedience of those martiall men is not now as it was in former times, when they were with a more seuere discipline gouerned; but now growne proud and insolent (as the maner of men is, liuing in continuall pay) with weapons in their hands doubt not to do whatsoeuer seemeth vnto themselues best, be it neuer so foule or vnreasonable. Which although it be in many places of this Historie to bee seene; yet for the more manifestation thereof I thought it not amisse heere briefly to set downe an example or two of their notorious insolencie.

Not many yeares before, the Ianizaries in CYPRVS with like insolencie slew Achmetes Bassa Gouernor of that island: pretending for the colour of so foule a fact, that he had defrauded them
B of their pay, and oppressed them of the countrey with intollerable exactions. Amurath highlie offended with this their disloialtie in killing their Generall, whom they had neuer before complained of; thought it much to concerne the maiestie of himselfe, and the repressing of the like insolencie in others, not to suffer it to go vnpunished: and for that purpose sent another new Gouernour into CYPRS, with ten gallies furnished as well with other necessary prouision, as with such a conuenient number of souldiours, as might suffice to chastice the insolencie of the chiefe offendours. This new Gouernour arriued in CYPRVS, dissembling the secret commandement he had for the executing of the transgressours, by certaine trustie men gaue it out among the Ianizaries, That Amurath was so farre from being angrie with the death of Achmetes, as that hee
C thought him worthily slaine by the Ianizaries for defrauding them of their wages, and oppressing of his other subiects: which report the new Gouernour had of purpose giuen out, to put them in securitie, and without farther trouble to bring them into his danger. Hereupon the Ianizaries cheerfully and with al due reuerence receiued their new Gouernor: but shortly after to be sure, they by an vnexpected guile when as nothing was lesse feared, compassed in all the new come souldiors, and slew them euerie mothers sonne; and not so contented, seized also vpon the gallies that brought them. Which second outrage, though Amurath tooke in euill part as seeing his maiesty therein contemned, yet was he content to passe it ouer, being loth to adde domesticall troubles to the great warres he had in hand with the Persian.

Achmetes Bassa Gouernour of Cipres slaine by the Ianizaries.

Another insolencie of the Ianizaries.

But to end this matter with the opinion of one of their own greatest Bassaes concerning these D masterfull men: It fortuned, that whilest Busbequius embassadour for Ferdinand the emperour vnto Solyman, lay in the Turkes campe (at such time as Solyman in person himselfe was gone ouer the straight in ASIA, to countenance his eldest sonne Selymus against his younger brother Baiazet) that vpon a light quarrell (though heauily taken) betweene the followers of the said embassadour, and certaine Ianizaries washing themselues at the sea side; the embassador for the quieting thereof, was glad to vse the helpe of Rustan the great Bassa, Solyman his sonne in law; who vnderstanding the matter (by a messenger sent of purpose) aduiseth the embassador to cut off all occasion of contention with those most naughtie fellowes: asking him farther, if hee knew not that it was now the time of warre, in which time they so raigned, as that Solyman himself was not able to rule them, but stood in feare of them. Which speech fell not rashly from Rustan, a E man right well acquainted with his Lord and Masters griefe: for that most notable prince feared nothing more, than least some secret and dangerous treason should lie hidden among the Ianizaries, which breaking out vpon the sudden, might worke his finall destruction; whereof he needed not to seeke for any farther example, than to his grandfather Baiazet. For, as true it is, That great are the commodities of a perpetuall armie of a princes owne; so are the incommodities also not smal, if they be not carefully met withal: but especially for that the prince is euer in doubt of rebellion; and that it is still in the power of those armed souldiors, at their pleasure to translate the kingdome to whom they list. Whereof there haue bin many great examples, although there are many waies for the remedying of the same.

Busbequius legationis Turcicæ, epist. 3.

But now that we haue by occasion of the occurrents of that time a little stept out of the way,
F let vs returne againe vnto the warres of PERSIA, the chiefe obiect of Amuraths hautie desires. Now according to the commandements gone out through all the cities of the empire, the souldiors of all sorts began to flock together: and all those that were either desirous to be established in their former charges and gouernments, or ambitiously sought to be now promoted, repaired to Osman as vnto a king, and the soueraigne moderator of the Turkish empire, presenting him verie large and liberall gifts, whereby he gathered together a huge heape of infinit treasure: and so ſo entertaining them with all affable courteſie, and promiſing both rewards and honors to ſuch G as would follow him in his purpoſed expedition, hee leuied a wonderfull great number both of men and monies. And now was the time come that called him away to go towards ERZIRVM, where hee was greatly expected of his huge armie there aſſembled together. And notwithſtanding the great dearth of victuall that commonly raigneth in thoſe quarters, yet thither he muſt, where he arriued about the latter end of the moneth of Iuly, in the yeare 1585: and there taking a view of his whole armie, and of all the prouiſion neceſſary for ſo important and famous an en-terprice, he daily laboured to haſten his departure. In this citie of ERZIRVM were met together all the ſouldiors of the prouinces that were wont to ſend helpe, but yet in a greater number than euer was gathered by any Generall before: for that euerie man forſooke his owne priuate buſineſſe, and vpon aſſured hopes of new rewards and vnwonted honours, were all induced to H follow the fame of this their new Viſier and Generall: onely the people of EGYPT and DA-MASCO were buſied with other more priuat quarrels at home, whereof becauſe they were both of great importance, and alſo fell out at this verie inſtant (leauing Oſman with his armie for a while at ERZIRVM) I will in as few words as I may make a briefe rehearſall.

Haſſan Baſſa the Queenes Eunuch ſent to Caire to gouerne there.

Amurath had heretofore taken Haſſan Baſſa the Eunuch out of the Serraglio, from the charge
he had there to ſerue in the Queenes Court, and at her inſtance ſent him as Baſſa to CAIRE the great citie of EGYPT. Which great office, beſide the honour belonging vnto it, is alſo be-neficiall to them whoſe good hap it is to be aduanced thereunto: the riches, the multitude of people inhabiting therein being ſo great, that it ſeemeth not to bee one citie, but rather to containe within the large circuit thereof many cities. This man being exceeding couetous, and therfore I deſirous to handle the matter in ſuch ſort, as that he ſhould little need to ſeek for any more ſuch grants at the kings hands, ſought by all manner of meanes to oppreſſe the whole nation, and by all importunities to wring and extort from them rewards and bribes, without regard of honeſty or reaſon. By which his ſiniſter and corrupt dealing, he had now made himſelfe ſo odious and intollerable to the people in generall, that they in great number, and many times, began to go to CONSTANTINOPLE, and with humble petitions to requeſt the king to take from them ſuch a cruell and vniuſt Gouernour; ſo that generally in the Court there was no talke but of the villanies and miſchiefes that were reported of the couetous Eunuch. At laſt Amurath ſeeing that theſe publike exclamations went daily ſo farre, as that he could not for ſhame let them goe any K further without due puniſhment, he reſolued with himſelfe to call him to the Court; and hauing ſent vnto him certaine meſſengers, admoniſhed him ſundrie times to returne home. But the Eu-nuch loth to leaue ſo fit an occaſion to enrich himſelfe, did ſtill delay his returne, alleadging di-uers faigned excuſes for his longer ſtay. Which thing when Amurath vnderſtood, thinking himſelfe thereby deluded, he determined to prouide for ſo great a diſorder, and by puniſhing of the miſchieuous Eunuch, to ſatisfie in ſome part the diſcontented mindes of his oppreſſed ſub-iects in CAIRE.

Ebrain Baſſa in ſpeech to marrie Amuraths daughter.

There ſat at that time among the chiefe Baſſaes of the Court one Ebrain (or as moſt call him, Ibrahim) by nation a Sclauonian, a young man of the age of two and thirty yeres or therabouts, of verie faire conditions, and of a reaſonable iudgement: vpon whom Amurath himſelfe had determined to beſtow his owne daughter to wife, and ſo to make him his ſonne in law. And L therefore being now minded to remoue the Eunuch from his office, and to ſatisfie the citie; and being alſo willing withall to giue meanes to his ſaid ſonne in law to enrich himſelfe: he reſolued to ſend him as generall Syndic, and ſoueraigne Iudge into EGYPT, giuing him in particular charge, to remember how wickedly his predeceſſour had dealt before him. And ſo this new Baſſa tooke his iourney towards EGYPT, although there ran before him a great rumour of his comming, and of the great authoritie wherewith he was ſent. At which report, as the Egyptia-ans reſted content and ioyfull, ſo the Eunuch waxed verie ſad and ſorrowfull: perſuading him-ſelfe, that this alteration could not but engender ſome ſtrange iſſue and effect againſt him.
Whereupon aduiſing himſelfe, to prouide better for his owne affaires and the ſafetie of his life, M he reſolued not to ſtay the comming of the new Gouernour: but departing out of EGYPT, with great care and circumſpection for feare of meeting with Ebrain, hee trauelled towards CON-STANTINOPLE in hope to appeaſe the kings wrath, or at leaſt by mediation of bribes, and by the interceſſion of the Queene to find him more fauourable, than hee ſhould find Ebrain; who without doubt would not haue ſpared any extremitie or crueltie, to haue bereft him both of his

A goods and life together. Amurath aduertised from Ebrain of the sudden flight of the Eunuch Bassa out of EGYPT, and hearing withall that he kept not the high way from CAIRE to CONSTANTINOPLE, began to feare, least when hee came into SORIA, he should flie into PERSIA to the king, and so worke him double and treble domage; as one that had already gathered a huge treasure, and hauing long liued in the Court, knew the most secret affaires thereof, and had learned all the priuie deuises and fashions of the Serraglio. Whereupon he with all diligence dispatched his Imbrahur Bassi (whom we may call Master of his horse) with fortie of his Capigi (all gentlemen Vshers, and officers of most secret & neerest roomes about him) with charge and commaundement, that if they met him, they should bring him to the Court; vsing all the aid and assistance of his people that might bee requisit: and for that purpose deliuered vnto him
B verie effectuall and large letters, after the best manner of the Court. This messenger with his appointed traine departed, and without any extraordinarie enquirie found the Eunuch in SORIA, encamped in the plaines neere vnto the citie now called AMAN, but in times past APAMEA, the principall citie of that countrey. As soone as the Eunuch vnderstood of the comming of the Imbrahur himselfe, he gaue order to his guard of slaues, which in great number with speares and arcubuses did ordinarily keepe his pauilion, that they should not grant entrance into his tent to any, but onely vnto the Imbrahur himselfe, and if neede were, by force to keepe the rest of the Capigi from comming in. Which order was in verie good time giuen; for as soone as the kings officer had discouered the tents of the fugitiue Bassa, in all hast he ran towards the same, and seeking out the greatest among them, went presently thither to haue entred with all his follow-
C ers: but the slaues being in armour opposed themselues against them, and permitting only the Imbrahur to enter in, entertained the rest of his traine without. The Imbrahur being come in, read vnto him the commaundement which he had from the king to bring him to the Court, and most instantly moued him, that without any further resistance hee would quietly goe with him. To whom the warie Eunuch answered: Behold, how without any calling of the king, or conducting by you, I come of my selfe, well assured to find not onely pardon and pitie, but also fauour and grace in the sight of my Lord; whose vpright and mild nature, the wicked treacheries of my false accusers cannot abuse, to the preiudice of me an innocent. And so without more adoe they went all to CONSTANTINO-PLE: the Eunuch yet still standing vpon his guard.

The warinesse of the craftie Eunuch.

The pollitick and craftie Eunuch had in this meane time dispatched diuers posts with letters
D to the Sultan ladies, certifying them of his comming, and principally beseeching the queene to protect him, and to appease the kings wrathfull indignation, that happily he might haue conceiued against him: and so at length they arriued at SCVTARI. As soone as Amurath vnderstood of his comming thither, he caused all the treasure which hee had gathered to be taken from him, with all the rest of his priuat substance, and the wretch himselfe to be clapt vp in prison in the Iadicula, or seauen Towers. Where after he had languished many daies, still fearing some deadly blow, he at length receiued from the queene, an vnexpected, but most welcome aduertisement, That he should be of good cheere and quiet himselfe, for that his wealth had already saued his life, and that she hoped in short time to procure him also his libertie: Which indeed she brought to passe; for she her selfe made earnest petition to Amurath her husband, that for as much as he
E had bereft her Eunuch of all his goods, hee would yet at least deliuer him out of prison, and restore him vnto her againe. Which request of the queenes was granted accordingly, and the Eunuch enlarged: but the treasure that he had so vniustly scraped together in EGYPT, that remained still among the gold and other iewels of the kings.

The Eunuch cast in prison at Constantinople, and his euill gotten goods confiscated.

But Ebrain Bassa with his new commission now arriued in EGYPT, had in short space by far more sinister deuises than had the Eunuch before him, scrapt together such an infinit heape of riches, as was able onely of it selfe to make him worthie of his promised wife, and therefore he was called home to the Court to accomplish the intended marriage. With this commaundement to returne to CONSTANTINOPLE, he receiued also in charge, to make his iourney through the people of DRVSIA; and such as he should find loyall, to confirme them in their due obedi-
F ence, and to make them pay their antient duties; but such as he should find stubborne and disobedient, he should quite root them out and destroy them. This commaundement Ebrain presently put in execution, & hauing packt vp together all the riches he had gathered in the time of his gouernment, and raised good store of souldiors in that prouince, he tooke with him thirteen Sanzacks, that were ordinarily accustomed to sit as assistants vnder the gouernment of the Bassa

in the ruling of the populous territories of CAIRE: and so set forwards towards GAZA, G passing ouer those vast and huge wildernesses of sand that lie betweene CAIRE and GAZA.
From GAZA, ioyning the Sanzacke thereof with him, he went to IERVSALEM: and from thence causing the Sanzacke there also to follow his traine, he turned by SAFFETTO, by LEZIVM, by NAPLOS (called in times past SAMARIA) still taking with him the Sanzackes of all those places, and at last turned himselfe towards DAMASCO: so that before hee ioyned with the band of DAMASCO, he had gotten together eighteene Sanzacks, with all their squadrons of souldiours and slaues. Besides these, hee had also his owne priuat Court, which was wonderfull populous, and two hundred Ianizaries of CONSTANTINOPLE, whom Amurath would needs haue him to take with him at his departure from the Court, so that he had in his army almost twelue thousand horsemen. From DAMASCO, Vies the Bassa was come as farre as IERVSALEM to meet H him, with all the souldiors vnder his gouernment, in number about two thousand persons. Besides that, there came vnto him by the way of SIDON the Aga of the Ianizaries of CYPRVS, with all the band of that desolate and destroyed iland: which captaine with his souldiors was transported ouer into the maine in those gallies that by the kings appointment were sent to fetch Ebrain: who now strengthened with all these souldiors, had purposed the vtter ruine of the disobedient Drusians, and the raising of his owne glorie, by triumphing ouer them.

The Drusian people what they are.

These Drusians, against whom these great preparations were now made by this new captaine, and of whom the Turkish emperour is so suspitious and doubtfull, are supposed to bee by descent, Frenchmen, the reliques of those that with great deuotion did in times past fight those memorable and Christian battels in IVRIE, and recouered the holy citie: but being afterwards I brought low, partly by the plague, and partly by the furie of the Barbarians, mingled their seed with the circumcised nation, and so together with their authoritie and commaund lost also their first faith and religion: yet so, that they grew into an hatred of the Turkish superstition, and abhorring the circumcision of the Iewes, betooke themselues to a new prophet of their owne called Isman, whose doctrine they follow. The right Drusians liue vncircumcised, neither do they forbeare wine as doe the Turks: they make it lawfull among them (most vnlawfully) to marrie with their owne daughters: the Turkish gouernment they haue sought by all meanes to eschue, and notwithstanding all the endeuors and attempts of the Turkish tyrants, but especially of Se- lymus the second, yet haue they alwayes beene subiect to their owne naturall princes, and would neuer admit any captaine or gouernour of the Turks within the counties which they possessed. K
They are a people very warlike, stout, resolute, and religious obseruers of their owne superstition: in battell they vse the arcubuse and scimitar, yet some of them at this day do serue with launces and darts: they are apparrelled after the manner of the Easterne people, with a turbant on their heads, and breeches they neuer weare, but in stead thereof they couer those parts with their coat, which reacheth downe to their knees, buttoning it vp before. Their feeding is grosse, and of mountaine meats. They inhabit all the countrey that is enuironed within the confines of IOP-PA, aboue CÆSAREA and PALESTINA, and within the riuers of Orontes and Iordan, stretching it selfe euen to the plaine of DAMASCO, neere to the hils that compasse it about vpon the coast of mount Libanus. They were all in times past good friends and confederats, so that they were greatly esteemed: but now being at variance, through greedinesse and couetousnesse, they L were deuided among themselues, one seeking the destruction of another. At this time they were gouerned by fiue chiefe captaines or gouernours: one of them was called Ebne-man, and of the Turkes Man-Ogli; another Serafadin; the third Mahamet Ebne-mansur; the fourth Ebne-frec; and the fift Ali-Ebne-Carfus, by the Turkes called Ali-Carfus-Ogli. Vnder these, who indeed carrie the title and authoritie of an Emir (that is to say, King or Chiefe) there are diuers their lieutenants or deputies, whom they call their Macademi or agents. Ebne-man or Man-Ogli inhabited the mountaines and fields that are contained vnder the iurisdictions of CÆSAREA, of PTOLE-MAIDA, of TIRVS, and of SIDON, and had his residence for most part vpon the hill, in a towne called ANDERA: he was very mightie in men and armour, and since the time that by treachery M his father was murthered by Mustapha then Bassa of DAMASCO, alwaies a deadly enemy to the name of the Turkes. Ebne-frec, Ebne-carfus, and Ebne-mansur, were alwayes great friends, but now especially at the comming of Ebrain Bassa they shewed themselues more straightly confederated together. Serafadin and Man-Ogli were euer opposit against them: so that the one side procuring the ouerthrow of the other, they lost their strength, and left no means to defend them-

A ſelues againſt the Turkes, who had long lien in wait for their libertie. Now as ſoone as the newes came among them, That Ebrain being departed from CAIRE, was comming into SORIA to ſubdue them; the three confederates aboue named reſolued among themſelues to goe and meet this great Baſſa, and to ſubmit themſelues vnto him, of purpoſe to turne all the intended miſchiefe vpon Serafadin and Man-Ogli, their enemies. And ſo hauing packed vp great ſtore of money, cloth of ſilke, cloth of woollen, and cloth of gold, with many loades of ſilkes, and other things of exceeding value, euerie of the three being accompanied, one with ſome two thouſand, another with ſome three thouſand men, they put themſelues vpon their iourny towards Ebrain, and met him at IERVSALEM, where he was already arriued. This their comming Ebrain tooke in wonderfull good part, and courteouſly accepted thoſe their rich and great preſents which they
B brought him; and by the offers of their fidelitie, and the grieuous accuſations they made againſt the other two Druſian lords their enemies, began to conceiue great hope of his entended enterpriſe: for why, he ſaw that nothing could more eaſily compaſſe their ouerthrow than this their diſcord. Being thus accompanied, hee came by the way of DAMASCO to the champaigne of BOCCA, and there encamped. This was in the moneth of Iuly this yeare 1585. The whole army that was with Ebrain, reckoning alſo the ſouldiors of the three Druſian lords, was about the number of twentie thouſand horſmen ſtrong. In this place there came people out of all quarters thereabouts with preſents to honour the Baſſa, to whom hee likewiſe yeelded ſuch ſmall fauours as his couetous nature could affoord them.

Three of the Druſian lords meet Ebrain at Ieruſalem with rich preſents, and a great traine of men.

From this place alſo Ebrain preſently ſent letters to Serafadin and Ebneman, whereby he inui-
C ted them to come vnto him, to acknowledge their obedience vnto the Sultan: for that otherwiſe they might aſſure themſelues to be in ſhort time depriued both of their eſtates and liues. For all that, Man-Ogli would not by any meanes come in. But Serafadin being poore both in wealth and forces, reſolued to come, in hope by rich preſents to purchaſe his attonement with the great Baſſa. And therefore hauing packed vp together diuers loades of ſilkes, great ſtore of money, and many clothes of good value and beautie, and alſo attended vpon with diuers of his ſubiects, he arriued at laſt at the pauillion of Ebrain with theſe his rich preſents; which were there readily receiued, and hee himſelfe with great attention heard: whoſe ſpeech in effect tended to no other end, but onely to perſuade the Baſſa, That he had alwaies beene a deuoted vaſſale vnto Amurath, and that he had carried a continuall deſire to be employed in any his ſeruice: and that now
D being led by the ſame affection, and aſſured of his fauour, by the friendly and courteous offers made him in his letters, he was come to ſhew himſelfe vnto him to be the ſame man, and ſo profered him whatſoeuer lay in his ſlender power to performe. Whereunto Ebrain made no anſwer at all, but onely asked him the cauſe why he liued continually in diſcord and brawles with the three Emirs (who alſo ſat at that time in the ſame pauillion.) Whereunto Sarafadin anſwered, That it was not long of him, who as one deſirous of peace, had not at any time taken vp armes but in the iuſt defence of himſelfe, againſt the iniuries of thoſe his enemies; who becauſe they were more mightie than he, ſought continually to oppreſſe him. Hereat the three conſpirators aroſe, and with their grim lookes bewraying their inward hatred, falſely charged him to haue beene euer the author of thoſe brawles: adding moreouer, That his inſolencie was at that time
E growne ſo great, as that no ſtrange veſſell durſt for feare of him arriue at the Ports of SIDON, TIRVS, or BERITO, nor any marchant or marchandiſe paſſe ouer the plaines: but that thoſe countries, as though they were a prey and ſpoyle to the theeues of ARABIA, were generally ſhunned of all trauellers both by ſea and land; to the great hinderance of the Sultans cuſtomes. Serafadin would hereunto haue gladly replied, but preuented by Ebrain, and ſurcharged with many iniurious words, was committed to the cuſtodie of the two hundred Ianizaries of CONSTANTINOPLE. And ſo being by them brought into a rotten tent that was appointed for him, was euery night from thence forward put in the ſtockes faſt chained, and continually guarded with a truſtie guard of the ſame Ianizaries. In the meane time came the anſwere of Man-Ogli, who wrote backe vnto the great Baſſa Ebrain as followeth:

Serafadin commeth with preſents to Ebrain.

A letter of Man-Ogli to Ebrain Baſſa.

To the Lord of Lords, Soueraigne aboue the great ones, the mightie, the noble captaine, couſin to the graund Lord, and the worthieſt among the elect of the Prophet Mahomet, the noble and famous Lord, Ebrain Baſſa, God giue good ſucceſſe to his haughtie enterpriſes, and proſperitie in all his honour. I wiſh (euen as thou doeſt louingly inuite and exhort mee) that I might come before thee, and follow thee,

thee, and ſerue thee alwaies in any occaſion that it may happen thee to ſtand in need of my helpe. For G
I know that thou wouldeſt reſt aſſured of the reuerence that I beare towards thy lord, and of the moſt feruent deſire wherein I liue to ſerue him, and to employ both my ſubſtance and my life in his ſeruice:
whereof I haue alſo giuen ſome teſtimonie, though but ſmall, in the managing of his cuſtomes that I haue receiued: wherein I haue alwaies ſo carried my ſelfe, as that I am not his debtor of one Aſpre;
a thing iwis that Ebne-Manſur (who is now with thee) hath not done. For although by his comming to meet thee euen as farre as IERVSALEM he would make a ſhew of his fidelitie, yet doth he vſurpe more than two hundred thouſand duckats of the kings, which he doth moſt vniuſtly detaine from him of his cuſtomes. But my hard fortune will not graunt me the fauour that I may come vnto thee: for there are at this preſent with thee three of mine enemies, who (I know well) being not contented to haue alwaies diſquieted and troubled my eſtate, doe now ſeeke to bring me into ſo great hatred with H thy heart, that if thou haddeſt me in thy hands, thou wouldeſt without any conſideration bereaue me of my life. And I am aſſured, that this ſending for mee importeth no other thing, but onely a deſire thou haſt to impriſon mee, and ſo to kill mee. For I know how much thou art giuen to great enterpriſes.
Beſides this, my comming is alſo hindered by mine auncient oath that I tooke: when being as yet but a child, I ſaw mine owne father ſo villanouſly betrayed by the murthering ſword of Muſtapha, be- ing at that time the Baſſa of DAMASCO: who vnder the colour of vnfeigned friendſhip got him into his hands, and traiterouſly ſtrucke off his head. For in truth I carrie the image of my fathers re-uerend head, all pale, and yet as it were breathing, imprinted in my mind, which oftentimes preſenteth it ſelfe vnto mee, as well ſleeping in the darkeneſſe of the night, as alſo waking in the light of the day, and talking with mee, calleth to my remembrance the infidelitie of the murthering tyrant, and ex- I horteth mee to keepe my ſelfe aloofe from the hands of the mightie. And therefore I neither can nor may obey thy requeſts, and in that reſpect it grieueth mee, that I ſhall ſeeme diſobedient vnto thee, being in any other action and in all my cogitations wholly addicted to doe any ſeruice not onely to thee, who art moſt worthie to be reuerenced of farre greater perſons than I am, but alſo to euery the leaſt vaſſals of Amuraths. Thou wilt pardon me I hope, and thou ſhalt well perceiue, that if there be any thing neere me that may be acceptable to thee, all that I haue whatſoeuer, though in reſpect of thy ſelfe it may ſeeme vile and baſe, yet is it thine, and is now reſerued wholly for thee, and not for me. Farewell, and commaund me, and hold me excuſed vpon theſe iuſt cauſes which thou heareſt, for my being ſo backward in comming to honour thee, as my dutie requireth.

The poore and the leaſt among the ſlaues of the graund Lord,

The Sonne of Man.

Ebrain burneth 24. townes of Man-oglies.

Ebrain perceiuing by this letter the reſolution of Man-ogli, reſolued alſo in himſelfe to goe vpon him with all his armie, and either by force or ſleight to get him into his hands; or at leaſt to draw from him ſo many arcubuſes, and as great gifts & tributes as poſſibly he might: and therfore riſing with his campe, and turning himſelfe toward the countrey of Man-ogli, he burnt and deſtroyed foure and twentie of his townes; and ſo mounting vp certaine rocks of LIBANVS, vpon the top of a large hill (that ſtandeth ouer ANDARA and other places belonging to Man- L ogli) he encamped himſelfe. But whiles the armie was thus marching forward, Veis Baſſa of DAMASCO with a great part of his people, and his ſonne the Sanzacke of IERVSALEM, with his ſouldiers likewiſe, to the number of fifteene hundred perſons, hauing ſeparated themſelues from the reſt of the armie, in manner of a rereward; as they were buſie in raiſing their tents, vpon the ſudden were furiouſly aſſaulted by a great band of Druſians, of the faction of Man-ogli, and diſcomfited. Which victorie the Druſians ſo proſecuted, that they became lords of the pauillions, the wealth and armour of the Turks: and leading away with them their horſes and their carriages, put to the ſword fiue hundred perſons, and ſcarce gaue any leaſure to eſcape either to the Baſſa the father, or the Sanzacke his ſonne, who fled ſtraight to IERVSALEM, and neuer returned againe to Ebrain; but Veis his father ſtill followed the armie with thoſe few which he M had left, and was thought worthie of all men to be pitied.

Veis Baſſa and his ſonne diſcomfited by the Druſians.

Vpon the hill aforeſaid Ebrain continued foure and twentie daies togither, with aboundance of all things neceſſary for victuall: during which time he attended nothing elſe, but to trie all deuiſes how he might draw money and preſents from Man-ogli, or how he might traine him into his

A his hands. For the compaſſing whereof, he diſpatched one Gomeda (Ebne-Manſurs Agent) to Man-ogli, being in ANDREA; to tell him, That for as much as he would not giue credit to the promiſe which was made him, nor aduenture himſelf into the hand of his friend, he ſhould ſend vnto him all the arcubuſes he had: for that the Sultans pleaſure was, that his people that went not to the wars in his ſeruice, ſhould not be furniſhed with ſo great ſtore of weapons, to the danger of their neighbours, and of the ſubiects themſelues. With great griefe of mind did Man ogli behold the meſſenger, as the man whom he wel knew to be the Agent of his deadly enemie; yet in regard of him that ſent him, he forbeare to do him iniurie, or to giue him any reproach; telling him, That all his people and weapons were diſperſed abroad ouer his territorie, ſo that he could not tell what arcubuſes to ſend him: with which cold anſwere Gomeda returned. Which
B thing when Aly Baſſa of ALEPPO vnderſtood, he offered himſelfe to the Generall, that hee would go vnto him, and that to ſome better purpoſe. Many reaſons did Aly Baſſa vſe to perſuade the warie Druſian to come and yeeld his obedience to Ebrain, ſwearing that no harme ſhould be done vnto him: and withall promiſing him great and honourable fauours. But neuer could he remoue the reſolute and prouident mind of Man-ogli, or win him to yeeld himſelf into the hands of a man, whom he thought to be ſo murtherous: yet a laſt with much adoe he preuailed ſo much with the Druſian lord, that in ſigne of the reuerence he did beare towards the Generall, and of his obedience towards Amurath, he was content to ſend a preſent to Ebrain. And therupon gaue him three hundred and twentie arcubuſes, twentie packs of Andarine ſilks, and fiftie thouſand duckats to carrie to the Baſſa for a gift, and to reconcile him vnto him. For
C the better effecting whereof, he ſent his owne mother to the great Baſſa, who in the behalfe of her ſonne performed a verie worthie meſſage, excuſing him as well in reſpect of his enemies that ſat there ſo neere vnto him, as alſo in regard of his oath which he had ſolemnely ſworne, That for the trecherie of Muſtapha he would neuer commit himſelfe into the hands of a Turke: and therefore beſought him to accept of the gifts that were ſent him, and withall, a mind and heart moſt readie to ſerue and obey the king in all occaſions; and that he would hold him excuſed, for that his excuſes were both iuſt and reaſonable. Wherunto the Turke replied, That although ſhe had found ſo foule a fault in Muſtapha, who vnder the aſſurance of his promiſe and fidelitie had betraied her huſband: yet for all that ſhe ought not to feare any ſuch wicked or infamous act at his hands, who ſtood vpon his honour and the word of a ſouldior: And ſo by oath pro-D teſting all faithfull and conſtant friendſhip towards him, in token of his ſincere meaning he caſt a white vaile about her necke, and put another vpon himſelfe, and the third he gaue her in her hands: willing her to report to her ſonne the oaths he had made, and to carrie him that vaile and bring him with her, proteſting no otherwiſe to intreat him, but as a friend and a brother. The peaceable old woman went her way accordingly, but ſhe neither could nor would go about to alter the purpoſe of her ſonne, but returned to Ebrain ſuch anſwer as did not greatly pleaſe him. After which time, he ſought more than euer he did before, to get the warie Druſian into his hands, or at leaſt without regard of ſhame to draw from him mo preſents and weapons. And therfore once againe he ſent the craftie Gomeda, to exhort him vpon the faith and promiſe giuen, to come vnto him: but for all the craft and lying ſpeeches that the trecherous meſſenger could
E cunningly vſe, he could obtaine nothing of the Druſian lord, but good words onely. Yet at laſt after much fineneſſe he preuailed ſo much, as that Man-ogli was contented by him to ſend another preſent to Ebrain, with an expreſſe condition notwithſtanding, that he ſhould cauſe Ebrain to depart out of thoſe quarters, and that he ſhould not himſelfe returne any more to requeſt any thing farther of him. Which he verie largely promiſed, only deſiring him to ſend a good number of arcubuſes, thereby to content the Baſſa fully: ſo he gaue him fiftie thouſand duckats more, and foure hundred and foureſcore arcubuſes, with a thouſand Goats, an hundred and fiftie Camels, an hundred and fiftie Buffes, a thouſand Oxen, and two hundred Weathers. With this rich preſent came Gomeda to Ebrain, declaring vnto him that this he had got from him, vpon promiſe that he ſhould not moleſt the Druſian any more. For which promiſe ſo made, Ebrain
F ſharply reproued Gomeda, and threatned to make him know what it was to take vpon him ſo dangerous a libertie: and for the greater deſpight both to the one and to the other, Ebrain would needs haue Gomeda himſelfe to returne againe with like meſſage to trouble the Druſian. Whereunto although he went in great feare of ſome miſchiefe by the hands of Man-ogli, yet was there no remedie but needs he muſt follow the command of him, in whoſe power it was to take from him both his honour and life; and therefore on he went. But as ſoone as Man-ogli ſaw Gomeda G (thinking as truth was, that he came againe about his wonted requeſts) hee was with the very ſight of him ſo farre moued, as that he was euen at the point to haue throwne a dart at him, and ſo to haue diſpatched him, had not the regard of more dangerous effects ſtaied his furie; yet ſpared he not with ignominious words and deadly threats to diſburden his choller. Notwithſtanding Gomeda could doe no leſſe but accompliſh the effect of his fraudulent requeſts, and ſo wrought with him, that hee drew from him foure burdens more of arcubuſes, ten ſwords and ten guilt daggers, certain ſiluer belts, ten packs of ſilke, and ſome few pence: cauſing him withall to proteſt vnto him, neuer to ſuffer himſelfe to be perſuaded to come againe vnto him; for if he did, he threatned to kill him, happen afterward what might of it. With exceeding ioy and triumph did Ebrain receiue this preſent, and thinking now with himſelfe that he had gotten a ſuf- H ficient bootie from him, hee determined to riſe with his armie, and to ſacke all the reſt of Man-oglies countrie. Which he performed accordingly, and being conducted by Emir Ebne-frec, burnt ANDREA the place of Man-ogli his reſidence, and in two daies burnt and deſtroyed nine-teene other of his towns, with vnſpeakeable crueltie committing all things to fire and ſword. After all this ſacking and raiſing, Ebrain ſent diuers meſſengers to Man-ogli, to trie whether hee would yet be perſuaded to come vnto him, but nothing could moue the reſolute Druſian to commit himſelfe into his hands, but rather encreaſed his conſtancie to auoid a moſt certaine death. Now the great Baſſa ſtill thirſting after bloud and reuenge, vnderſtanding by a ſpie, that Emir Ebne-frec entiſeth Man-ogli his Macademo or lieutenant to come to Ebrain.

the captaine of ANDREA (being one of the factors of Man-ogli) with three hundred and fiftie ſouldiors was got vp to a certain hill, into a place of great ſecuritie, he ſent Emir Ebne-frec to en- I tice him, and to tell him, That ſeeing his lord Man-ogli would not come and yeeld himſelfe, hee ſhould come vnto him; which if he would doe, he would aſſuredly in deſpight of Man-ogli make him a Sanzacke of ſome of thoſe places which he moſt deſired. The ambitious & vnheed-die Macademo ſuffered himſelfe to be eaſily perſuaded, and being accompanied with his three hundred and fiftie followers, went with the ſaid Ebne-frec, and came at laſt to the pauillion of Ebrain, hauing firſt cauſed his aforeſaid men to ſtay behind in a valley two or three miles off. But Ebrain would not ſo much as ſee the Macademo, although both in reſpect of the nimblenes of his perſon, and alſo the fierceneſſe of his lookes he was worthie to be looked vpon: but commanded him to keepe in a ſeuerall place from Serafadin, and in the meane time deuiſed how he might with leaſt loſſe of his own men, put to death thoſe three hundred and fiftie the Maca- K demoes followers: which was by training them, by means of the ſaid Ebne-frec, into a certaine vineyard, & ſo hauing brought them into a ſtrait, ſuddenly to ſet vpon them & kill them. Which was accordingly performed: for being by the treacherous Emir brought into the place appointed for their ſlaughter, fearing nothing leſſe, they were ſuddenly encloſed by the Turks Sanzackes or Ianizaries, and ſlaine euery mothers ſonne. This maſſacre thus finiſhed, Ebrain commaunded the Macademo to be brought before him, and without delay to be ſtripped and flaid quicke: who being come, ſtoutly vpbraided Ebrain with his promiſe and his oath; and amongſt other ſpeeches which he vttered whiles they ſtripped him, ſaid: Cut me off my members, and firſt putting them into the priuities of that infamous Ebrains wife, put them afterwards into the mouth of himſelfe: for ſo (I trow) he will be contented and ſatisfied with my fleſh. And to them L that were the executioners of his painefull death, he ſaid: It is your great good fortune indeed, that with ſuch violence and needleſſe deformitie, yee are now able to ſpill my bloud, and to take my life from mee: whereas none of you all had bin able, or once durſt man to man to haue drawn one drop of it from me, no nor to haue endured my countenance. But go to, proceed in your wicked and vnſatiable deſire of my bloud, and fulfill the cruell commaund of your Viſier: for in the end there will alſo light vpon you the iuſt reward of this ſo villanous a fact. With theſe and other ſuch like ſpeeches the miſerable wretch was ſtripped, and three great flaſhes made on his backe, where they began to flea him; he in the meane time not ceaſing to blaſpheme their religion, and to curſe their king, and their falſe prophet alſo. But the barbarous ſouldiors proceeding in their cruell action, made other like gaſhes vpon his breaſt and ſtomacke; and ſo drawing the skin downward, could not bring it to his na- M uell before he was with the extremitie of the paine dead. After this, Ebrain cauſed the followers of Serafadin (in number about 150) to be cruelly ſlaine, and all his countrie to be moſt miſerably waſted: he himſelfe ſtill remaining in chaines.

Whileſt the fire and ſword thus raged in the Druſian countrie, Ebrain by ſpeedie poſts ſent

to

A to SINON, where his gallies lay at rode, commaunded, That disbarking foure thousand soldiors, they should sacke all those countries alongst the sea coast euen as far as CAESAREA in PALESTINE, sparing neither age nor sex, nor any person of condition whatsoeuer. Which his cruell commaund was presently put in execution, and three thousand soules brought away captiues, great boories made of much rich merchandise, many townes burnt, sundrie castles rased and laid euen with the ground, and to be short, all the whole countrie of Kerfudin and Mancgli laid vtterly wast and desolate.

Ebrain was now in readinesse to depart for CONSTANTINOPLE, where he was by Amurath expected, as well for his gold as the accomplishment of the marriage. But bethinking himselfe, that whatsoeuer hitherto he had done would be accounted either little or nothing, vnlesse
B he prouided in some sort for the quieting of those people vnder the Turkish obedience, he determined to nominat one of the three Drusian Emirs that came to him to bee VISALEM, to be Bassa of all those regions. And because Emir Ebne-carfus was the richest and most obedient of them all, he thought good to commit that charge vnto him, and honoured him with that dignitie; yet not without a bribe, but for the price of an hundred thousand duckats. Wherefore he apparelled him in cloth of gold, gaue him a horsemans mase, and a sword all guilt, and deliuered vnto him the kings commission, causing him withall to sweare faith and obedience to Amurath. And so hauing (at least to shew) set in order the affaires of those mountaines, which an hundred of the Turks great captaines had in former time vainely attempted, he returned to C DAMASCO, where he staied twelue daies, by shamefull shifts extorting mony from diuers persons. At last hauing no more to doe in those parts, he turned himselfe towards GEZIR and BARVTO, places vnder the gouernment of Ebne-mansur, where he arriued with all his armie, and found the gallies which he had left in the port of SINON, now in the hauen of BARVTO as he had before commanded. Now vpon a certaine hill aboue BARVTO neere vnto the sea, Ebrain hath pitched his owne tent only and none other, and hauing sent all the rest of his best & goodly things which hee meant to carrie with him to CONSTANTINOPLE aboord the gallies, shrow-ded himselfe only vnder that narrow and base tent. Thither he called Ebne-Mansur, and in pleasant maner told him, That now it was time for him to make payment of the debt of an hun-

D dred and threescore thousand duckats, which he ought the king his lord for the custome of TRIPOLI and BARVTO: for that he could not longer stay in those those quarters, but was to returne to CONSTANTINOPLE, which he knew not how to do vnlesse he carried with him the discharge of that debt. Whereunto Ebne-mansur made answere, That it would not bse long before his Macademoes would come with his monies, and that then he would without farther delay make payment. Which thing Ebrain well knew to be but an excuse, and therefore determined with himselfe to thurst him into the gallies; and because he could not carrie the mony vnto the king, yet at the least to bring him his debtor. But for as much as he doubted to put this his determination openly in execution, for feare of some insurrection amongst the people, as well for that he was within the territories of the said Ebne-mansur, as for that he saw him greatly beloued and fauoured of the other two Drusian lords, Ebne-free and Ebne-carfus: he therfore thought it bet-
E ter policie by concealing this his purpose, to shew him in his outward actions all good countenance, and by secret and subtile meanes to take him prisoner. Whereupon he deceifully told him, That for as much as he was to stay there for his businesse that night, and was resolued the next day to make a road into the countrie of Mancgli, he therefore prayed him to doe him the fauour to be his guide: and for that purpose, when he should send for him at midnight, that he would come vnto him verie secretly, because he was minded to depart without any stirre, onely with fiue hundred men in his companie. The Drusian lord verily beleeued the matter that so it was, and withall was in good hope by that means to find some way to escape his hands. Wher-

upon being called vp at midnight, he readily went to the tent of Ebrain, who presently charging him (whom all men thought he had especially affected) with many abhominable and foule
F tearmes, caused a chaine to be cast about his necke, and his armes, and so fast bound to be caried into the gallies. And yet not so contented, tooke the spoile of all his countrey, whereby there was leuied such a prey as was maruellous to behold: for besides mony (wherof there was a very huge summe) the store of cloths of silke and gold was such & so great, as might better beseeme some great prince, than such a mountaine rusticall lord as he was. When the Bassa had conueied all this into his gallies he sailed to TRIPOLI, where he found Serafaden in the custodie of Pelo Bassa and Aly Bassa: and hauing staied there some few daies, wherein hee committed sundrie villanous and abhominable robberies, he caused the said Serasadin to be put into the gallies, with all his silkes and other wealth, and so departed for CONSTANTINOPLE: where at such time as he entred into the channell of the citie, accompanied with foure and twentie gallies, hee was encountred and receiued by a wonderfull number of his friends and fauourits, and saluted with an honourable peale of artillerie out of the Seraglio. Iohn Thomas Minadoi the best reporter of this historie, as also of the late warres betwixt the Turkes and the Persians, being then at CONSTANTINOPLE, and hauing (as he reporteth of himselfe) good means to see the bountifull and beautifull presents which the spoiling and rauenous Bassa gaue the Turkish king, reporteth the summe thereof to haue beene a million of gold, besides the yearely reuenue of CAIRA amounting to six hundred thousand duckats, with threescore horses most richly garnished, of singular beautie, but especially of the Arabian race, a liue Elephant, & a liue Giraffle (which is a beast like a Cammell and a Panther) two great Crocodiles dead, a chaire of massie gold richly set with pretious stones, a casket also beset with pretious stones & gold, many packs of most fine clothes, woollen and silkes, certaine other cloths with fringe of gold & siluer and the Barbarian embroderie, most fine linnen of ALEXANDRIA, and all the arcubuses taken from the Drusians: besides sundrie rich presents giuen by the prowd Bassa to the great laides of the court, reported by Leunclauius to haue bin worth two hundred thousand Sultanines.

The rich presents giuen to Amurath to Ebrain.

Io. Leuncl. sup. Annal. Turcicorum, pag. 95.

But now for as much as we haue before made mention of the Sanzacke of IERVSALEM, and his flight, it shall not be altogither impertinent to our historie (though somewhat out of time) in few words to declare what passed between him and the Arabians of PALESTINE, a little before the comming of Ebrain the great Bassa into those quarters: by which little, the desirous Reader may easily perceiue the wofull and troublesome state of that sometime most blessed and fruitfull but now most miserable and barren land of IVRIE, and of those places in holie Writ so much renowned.

The land of Iurie much troubled with the Arabian theeues and robbers.

In the confines of SODOME, and in the places that lie not only between the lake ASPHALTITES and DAMASCO, but also in the plaines and in the vallies of IERICHO, and of SAMARIA, and in other places about BETHLEHEM, EMAVS, BETHANIE, BETHFAGE, CAPHARNAVM, NAZARETH, LEVIR, BETHSAIDA, NAPLOS, and other townes of name thereabouts, there doe haunt and liue certaine Arabian captaines; who spreading themselues euen as far as RAMA and IOPPA, ouerrun at their pleasure all the countries there round about, and continually commit grieuous outrages as well against the said cities as also vpon the goods and wealth not only of the inhabitants there, but also of strangers: yea and their insolencie oftentimes groweth so great, that they dare to assault the fenced cities, beside the spoiling of trauellers, that by reason of their businesse haue occasion to passe from one citie to another. They are good horsemen, but vse no armour: their horses are very swift to run, and spare of diet, and are themselues bold and aduenturous theeues. These Arabians hauing had intelligence, that the aforesaid ambitious youth, appointed Sanzacke of IERVSALEM, was in mind to raise all the Sanzackes thereabout; and ioyning himselfe with them, and his father the Bassa of DAMASCO, to restraine their insolent libertie, and to worke their destruction; resolued with themselues not to stay vntill he and his confederats were readie, but rather by sundrie inuasions vpon him, euen vnto the gates of IERVSALEM, to prouoke him to come out into the field. And the rather to induce him so to do, they compacted with a certaine Subbassi of BETHLEHEM, their friend, to encourage and animate the Sanzacke thereunto, by promising vnto him good successe and prosperous euents. The ambitious young man, seduced with the glorious persuasions of the false Subbassi, of whom he made good reckoning, and prouoked by their insolencies, resolued (as they had wished) to issue out of the citie into the open field: and thereupon hauing armed an hundred of his vassals, and raised all the horsemen that were vnder his gouernment, to the number of six hundred, he made a rode towards IERICHO, sending before defiance vnto them: against whom the Arabians came accordingly, and with their arrowes and Indian canes ouerwhelmed his arcubuses, as if it had bin a raging floud, wrought him great wo: when in the very nicke the battel yet being at the hoatest, the traiterous Subbassi fled towards BETHLEHEM, and left the souldiors of IERVSALEM in the hands of the Arabians, who put most part of them to the edge of the sword, and scarcely gaue libertie to the Sanzacke to saue himself by flight. The Sanzack certainly informed oft his fraud of the dissembling Subbassi, to bee reuenged vpon him, began also in like manner to dissemble with

A with him, faigning that he would once more trie his forces againſt the ſame Arabians; and ſo vſed the matter, that the Subbaſſi arming himſelfe, came vnto him, without any ſuſpition of the miſchiefe intended againſt him. But as ſoone as he was come, the Sanzacke tooke him aliue, and preſently cauſed him in moſt cruell manner to be ſlaine quicke. The ſubbaſſi of Bethlehem ſlaine quicke.

Thus hauing paſſed ouer the troubles that ſtaied the people of Æ GYPT and DAMASCO and the countries thereabouts, from reſorting to Oſman the Turks great Generall at ERZIRVM: let vs againe returne thither where we left him, taking a view of the preparations againſt the Perſian; and proſecute thoſe affaires, which of all others moſt exerciſed the forces of the two mightieſt Mahometane Monarchs, and with the expectation thereof filled the world from the Eaſt to the Weſt.

B The ſtraight commaundement from Amurath, together with the fame and reputation of Oſman the Generall, had drawne together ſuch a world of people of all ſorts to ERZIRVM, as that it ſeemed not the power of one king alone, but rather the vnited forces of many kings. Wherefore Oſman perceiuing that he had gathered together too great a number of people and too huge an armie, and that it might ſo fall out that he might want victuall for ſo great a multitude; neither ſo greatly fearing his enemies forces, as that he needed to lead ſo populous an armie againſt them; determined to diſcharge a great number of ſuch as he thought moſt weake, and leaſt able to endure trauell: ſo that out of this great multitude hee drew out about fortie thouſand perſons, who liberally according to euery mans abilitie redeeming the ordinarie perils of the warres, returned home to their owne dwellings. And ſo in Oſmans armie remained the C number of an hundred and foureſcore thouſand perſons or thereabouts. With this multitude the Generall departed from ERZIRVM (about the eleuenth of Auguſt this yeare 1585) towards TAVRIS, continuing for all that the ſpeech for NASSIVAN. But he had ſcarce marched two dayes, when diuers ſouldiors of GRÆCIA and CONSTANTINOPLE preſented themſelues before him, vpbraiding him with great improuidencie, and telling him that they began alreadie to feele the want of victuall, by wanting the ſame day their ordinarie allowance of corne for their horſes: ſo that if in the beginning, and as it were in the enterance of ſo long a iourney they felt ſuch want, they could not tell with what iudgement or diſcretion he meant to lead ſo great a companie ſo farre as NASSIVAN, nor by what cunning conceit he had preſumed to ſuſtaine ſo great an armie in the ſeruice of their lord. Oſman quietly heard their complaints, and pre-
D ſently prouided for them, by cauſing ſuch ſtore of barley to be deſtributed among them, as they deſired; and ſeuerely puniſhed the officers that had the charge for the allowance of corne, who moſt couetouſly began to make marchandiſe of the cõmon prouiſion, by conuerting it to their own priuat vſes. And hauing thus quieted their troubled minds, he proceeded on his iourney, and by the way of HASSAN CHALASSI and of CHARS arriued vpon the Calderan plaines, famous for the memorable battels there fought betweene Selymus and Hyſmaell. In theſe plaines he tooke a generall review of his armie, wherein there wanted a number, that by reaſon of ſickneſſe being not able to continue the iourney were enforced to ſtay behind, ſome in one place, ſome in another. Remouing thence, he tooke the way not to NASSIVAN, as he had ſtill hitherto giuen it out he would, but now directly to TAVRIS. Which ſo ſudden an alteration of the iour-
E ney, as ſoone as the ſouldiours of GREECE and CONSTANTINOPLE heard, they fell into a great rage, and comming againe before the Generall, reuelled with him in this ſort to his face. The number of Oſmans armie.

And what are wee thou villaine, thou Turke, thou dolt, whom thou handleſt in this ſort? Wee are neither oxen nor ſheepe of the mountaines, for the leading of whom thou thinkeſt thou art come out: neither can wee brooke theſe thy lies and deceits. If thou haſt publickly profeſſed to lead vs to NASSIVAN, and by that ſpeech haſt trained vs from the furtheſt bounds of GRÆCIA, to what end now after thou haſt wearied vs ſo much, doeſt thou deceiue vs with ſuch vanities, and prolong our iourney, and ſet before vs ſuch ſtrange and important dangers as our minds neuer once thought on? But if this was thy firſt purpoſe and intent, and that now not fooliſhly or by chaunce, but vpon premeditation and good aduice thou changeſt thine opinion, why diddeſt thou diſmiſſe ſo many ſouldiours, as might haue
F made the armie more terrible and ſtronger for the enterpriſe of TAVRIS? Doeſt thou thinke that by ſuffering others to redeeme their liberties, and ſo to increaſe thy riches, thou ſhalt ſet our liues to ſale, and to make vs ſlaues to the Perſians? The moſt inſolent ſpeech of the ſouldiers of Conſtantinople and Greece vnto Oſman their Generall.

At theſe arrogant ſpeeches the Generall was exceedingly troubled; ſeeing his good meaning, and the earneſt deſire he had to aduance the maieſtie and glorie of his king, taken in ſo euill part, and Oſman wiſely appeaſeth his mutenous ſouldiers.

and thoſe his beſt ſouldiours ſo highly offended. And although he could indeed haue readily G vſed the ſharpeſt and hardeſt prouiſions and remedies for it, that in ſuch occaſions are ordinarily applied: yet vpon good aduice he forbare ſo to doe, and in ſtead of rigour and puniſhment reſolued to worke by more eaſie meanes. Whereupon cauſing many of the captaines and chiefe men amongſt thoſe ſeditious ſouldiors to come before him, he firſt perſuaded them: That the former ſpeech for NASSIVAN was not raiſed at all by him, nor that he was minded at that time to goe for TAVRIS: but all that was done, he had done to fulfill the commaundement of the Sultan, who had charged him ſo to doe, to the end to leſſen the Perſian preparations; which they would vndoubtedly haue made farre greater, if the ſpeech had beene giuen out at the firſt for TAVRIS. Which his princely care of their ſafetie they for their parts ought willingly to further, for that in ſo doing they ſhould ſtill preſerue that great opinion, which both the king and the world had conceiued of their H valour and fidelitie. Neither needed they to feare, that the ſouldiors which were diſmiſſed might weaken the armie, for that they themſelues were not onely ſufficient to pierce into TAVRIS, and to open the way vpon the enemies, but to daunt them euen with their lookes: and that thoſe which were diſcharged, had but purged the hoaſt of all cowardiſe, and left nothing in it but vertue and courage.
By this mild anſwere of the Generall the tumultuous ſouldiours were ſufficiently pacified, but much better apayed and contented they were, as ſoone as he put his hand to the common purſe, and beſtowed among them all a ſmall quantitie of monies: for by this his kind vſage all their ſtomacks were ouercome, and they themſelues became ſo willing and ſo couragious, that now they durſt venture not to TAVRIS only, but to CASBIN, yea euen to the furtheſt parts of all the Perſian kingdome. I

Theſe important outrages thus appeaſed, the Generall turned himſelfe with all his armie towards COY, a citie ſituat beyond VAN, in the middeſt betweene TAVRIS and the Martian Meere, where he refreſhed his armie with all things he could deſire. From COY he paſſed to MA-RANT, a citie ſubiect to the Perſians, plentifull alſo of all things needfull for man or beaſt. From thence he leaned downe towards SOFFIAN, a fruitfull place, ſubiect alſo to the Perſians; from whence he began to diſcouer TAVRIS. Great was the ioy of the whole campe, and now the
The Turks re-ioice vpon the diſcouerie of Tauris. mutinous ſouldiors of GREECE and CONSTANTINOPLE could highly commend the aduice of the Generall, or rather of Amurath himſelfe, in giuing out the rumour of NASSIVAN for TAVRIS, as the onely meanes whereby they were in quiet come ſo farre, the Perſians being wholly occupied (as they ſuppoſed) about NASSIVAN: inſomuch that euery man being waxen K couragious, & repleniſhed with ioy, without any feare at all began prowdly to plot vnto themſelues nothing but ſackings, pillings, taking of priſoners, rauiſhments, robberies, and all thoſe inſolent & outragious actions that vſe raſhly to proceed from the greedie affections of thoſe barbarous victors; eſpecially they of the vauward, who being deſirous of bootie, and to diſcouer the enemies countrey, deſcended downe toward certaine pleaſant gardens full of all ſorts of trees, ſprings, & fruits: where hauing ſatisfied their appetites, they withdrew themſelues to a certain little riuer neere to a bridge called The Bridge of ſalt water, and there ſtayed at pleaſure atten-

the ſhade, the greene graſſe, and other delights of the place, the Perſian prince Emir Hamze, king Mahamets eldeſt ſonne, who with ten thouſand good ſouldiors had cloſely couched himſelfe, L watching ſtil when ſome of the enemies bands ſhould come downe to thoſe reſting places, ſuddenly ſet vpon them with ſuch ſpeed, courage, and furie, that as if it had beene a lightening and in a manner without any reſiſtance he ouerran all thoſe Turks, and diſperſed them, putting to the ſword about ſeuen thouſand of them. And ſo leading away with him many priſoners, hor-ſes, ſlaues, with ſundrie enſignes and Turkiſh drums, he withdrew himſelfe backe towards his blind father, who lay then encamped about 12. miles from TAVRIS with fiftie thouſand ſouldiors or thereabouts; Aliculi Chan Gouernour of TAVRIS being left in the citie with foure thouſand ſouldiors onely. A greater armie than this, not exceeding the number of threeſcore and foure thouſand men, was not the Perſian king able to leuie; the principall occaſion whereof was the death of Emir Chan, for which the Turcoman nation being waxen rebellious and diſobedient, M would not by any meanes be brought to defend that citie, whereof Aliculi Chan their capitall enemie was now Gouernour: and from GHEILAN and HERI there came not ſo much as one ſouldior to relieue the neceſſities of PERSIA. So that with theſe ſmall forces in compariſon of the enemies, the Perſian king had no ſtomacke to meet the Turkiſh armie in plaine battell, but ſought

A ſought how he might with as little loſſe to himſelfe as poſſibly he could, make triall of his forces, and by all politike meanes to weaken and annoy his ſtrong enemie.

Oſman vnderſtanding of this diſcomfiture of his vauward, forthwith diſpatched Sinan Baſſa, the ſonne of Cicala, and Mahamet the Baſſa of CARAEMIT, with fourteene thouſand ſouldiors to purſue the victorious prince: who in their purſuit vſed ſuch expedition, that at length they ouertooke him in the way towards his fathers campe. But as ſoone as the prince ſaw the Turkes ſo neere him, that without a ſhamefull and dangerous flight he could not auoid the battell, couragiouſly he turned his face, and ioyned with them a moſt bloudie conflict: which being begun two houres before night, was moſt fiercely maintained, vntill that the darkneſſe of the night bereauing them of the vſe of their weapons, enforced both the one ſide and the other to retire.

Oſman ſendeth two Baſſaes with 14000. ſouldiors to ouertake the Perſian prince.

B Which was done with the notable loſſe of the Turkes, who in this ſecond conflict (as it was commonly reported) loſt ſix thouſand men: and had (as it was thought) ſuffered a generall ſlaughter, had not the night interrupted ſo vncouth an action, well worthie of a thouſand daylights. So that hitherto the Turkes ſuſtained the loſſe of more than ten thouſand ſouldiors, and yet had ſcarce diſcouered or ſeene the citie which they ſo greedily longed after.

The next morning the Turkes campe remoued and came within two miles of TAVRIS, where they encamped. But whileſt they were ſetting vp their tents, Aliculi Chan iſſuing out of the citie with all his garriſon, and ſuch of the citiſens as were fit to beare armes, ſet vpon the face of the vauward being now renewed, and with many cunning turnings and windings ſo charged them, that with great loſſe he forced them to retire euen vnto the maine battell: where after hee

C had eſpied the great artillerie, he without hurt withdrew himſelfe againe to the citie. The confuſion of the Turks in this skirmiſh was notable, for in a verie ſmall time the vauward was diſordered, and almoſt three thouſand ſlaine. But Aliculi not ſo contented, in the ſhutting in of the euening ſallied out of the citie the ſecond time, and ſwiftly running along that ſide of the army that lay towards TAVRVS, ſlew the Baſſa of MARAS, and did great hurt in that quarter: which done, without any ſtay he fled to the kings campe, and forſooke the defence of that ſorrowfull citie which he could not hold. Neuertheleſſe the Tauriſians (as many of them as remained in the citie) gathered themſelues together to the gates of the citie, well armed, prepared to make a bloudie entrance for the Turkes whenſoeuer they ſhould come. All the night was ſpent in watching without reſt on either ſide, and yet nothing attempted: but vpon the breake of the day, a

D great multitude of the ſeruile ſort of the Turkes, and of the common raſcall rout, without any order from their captaines, armed with corſelets, ſpeares, and ſwords, went to the city with reſolution to haue ſacked it, and ſo to haue enriched themſelues with the ſpoile and pillage of that wealthie citie. But when they came to the guarded gates of the citie, they found there contrary to their expectation, a terrible reſcue, and were enforced there to ioyne an hard and mortall battell; ſo that the wals, the entrance, yea all the ground thereabours was bathed with bloud, and as it were couered with weapons and dead carkaſes. And yet for all that, though the Perſians ſtood faſt and firme at the arriuall of this ſeruile rout; at the laſt they were conſtrained to yeeld the entrance, being ouercome by the multitude of them that out of the campe flowed in vpon them like a floud; and retiring into the citie, now aſtonied and amazed on euerie ſide, they fortified

A great ſlaughter in the gates of Tauris.

E themſelues in their houſes vnder the ground, and in the corners and winding turnings of the ſtreets: from whence with their arrowes and ſome few arcubuſes, they did the Turks that entred great harme. Yet were they not able to kill and deſtroy ſo many of their enemies, but that at the laſt they were too mightie for them, and wrought many grieuous miſchiefes in that wofull citie. And ſo a great number of this raſcall people that remained aliue, returned to the Turkiſh camp, carrying away with them too manifeſt tokens of the poore oppreſſed citie: wherein the miſerable women and impotent ſoules ſtood embracing and ſtraining the doores and poaſts of their houſes, and kiſſing their natiue ſoile, with prayers, mournings, and complaints, bewailing their preſent miſerie, and yet fearing worſe to come. Oſman the Turks Generall now made acquainted with theſe calamities, cauſed proclamation to be publiſhed, That no man ſhould be ſo har-

F dy as to moleſt the Tauriſians, and in the meane time went himſelfe about the citie, viewing throughly the ſituation of it, and ſurueying the place wherein he might both encampe himſelfe ſafely, and with better foundation and greater ſecuritie erect a caſtle or fort, for the more aſſurance of that conquered countrey.

The citie of TAVRIS is ſeated at the foot of the hill ORONTES, about eight daies iourney from from the Caſpian ſea, and is ſubiect to winds, cold, and ſnow: yet of a verie wholeſome ayre, G abounding with all things neceſſarie for mans life: and wonderfull rich, with perpetuall concourſe of merchandiſe brought thither out of the Eaſt, to be conuayed vnto the Weſt; and alſo of others brought out of theſe Weſterne parts, to bee diſperſed into the Eaſt. It is verie populous, ſo that it feedeth almoſt two hundred thouſand perſons: but yet open to the fury of euery armie, without wals, and vnfortified. The buildings (after the manner of thoſe of the Eaſt) are of burnt clay, and rather low than high. For all things it carrieth the name, and was the place of the Perſian kings reſidence, vntill ſuch time as that the late king Tamas remoued his ſeat from thence farther into his kingdome to CASBIN: neuertheleſſe both before and ſince, although it had been ſundrie times moleſted by the inrodes and furie of the Turkiſh emperors, yet was it ſtil in great eſtimation and renowne. H

Of this citie Oſman Baſſa hauing taken diligent view, cauſed his tents to be pitched on the South ſide thereof, where was a ſpatious garden all flouriſhing and beautifull, repleniſhed with ſundrie kind of trees and ſweet ſmelling plants, and a thouſand fountaines and brooks deriued from a pretie riuer, which with his pleaſant ſtreame diuided the garden from the citie of TAV-RIS: and was of ſo great beautie, that for the delicacie thereof, it was by the country inhabitants called Sechis Genet (that is to ſay) the eight Paradiſes: and was in times paſt the ſtanding houſe of their kings, while they kept their reſidence in this citie, and after they had withdrawne their ſeat from thence to CASBIN, became the habitation and place of abroad for the Gouernors of TAV-RIS. Of theſe gardens and places Oſman made choiſe to build his caſtle in; whereof he gaue the modell himſelf, and commaunded that all the whole circuit of thoſe pleaſant greenes ſhould be I enuironed with wals, & trenches digged round about them to conuay the water from the fore-ſaid riuer. Which was accordingly begun with the greateſt care that poſſibly might bee: the foundation of the embatteled wals laid, the ditches digged fourteen foot broad, & a mans height in depth; and in the ſpace of ſixe and thirtie daies the whole worke finiſhed and brought to an end: great ſtore of artillerie mounted vpon the walles, and diuers bathes, lodgings, and ſuch other houſes neceſſarie for the Turkiſh vſes built within the caſtle, The firſt day of this building Oſman fell ſicke of a feauer with a bloudie flix, which happilie was the cauſe both of the ſlowneſſe of the building, and of manie other loſſes that afterwards happened, as ſhall be hereafter declared.

The caſtle of Tauris built in 36. daies.

Eight Ianizaries with certaine Spagolans found ſtrangled in a bath at Tauris.

Fiue daies after the building of the caſtle was begun, newes was brought into the Turkiſh K camp, That eight Ianizaries and diuers Spaoglans were ſeene ſtrangled in a bath within the city of TAVRIS. Whereupon the Zaini, Spahini, and Ianizaries came preſently vnto the Generall, declaring vnto him, That although he had with too much clemencie giuen order, that no man ſhould hurt or moleſt the Tauriſians, and that according to his pleaſure euery man had vſed modeſtie towards them and obedience to him: yet the Tauriſians themſelues had moſt audatiouſly ſtrangled in one of their baines eight Ianizaries, and certaine Spaoglans, which iniurie and inſolencie (they ſaid) in their iudgement was not to be ſuffered. This outrage ſo moued the Generall, that without any farther delay hee commanded the citie to bee ſacked, leauing it wholly to the pleaſure of his ſouldiors: who forthwith ſo vſed the matter, not as if they would haue reuen-ged an iniurie, but rather at once haue brought an vtter deſtruction vpon the whole citie. Eue- L rie place was filled with ſlaughter, rauiſhment, rapine and murther; virgines were deflowred, men-children defiled with horrible and vnſpeakable ſins; younglings ſnatched out of their parents armes, houſes laid euen with the ground and burnt, riches and money carried away; and in briefe, all things ruinated and waſted. Neither were theſe miſchiefes committed once onely, but the ſecond followed worſe than the firſt, and the third vpon that worſe than the ſecond: ſo that it was a miſerie almoſt inexplicable, to behold that citie ſo populous, ſo rich, ſometimes the court and pallace of the Perſian kings, and honour of that empire, now ſubiect to the furie of the Turkes, plunged in calamitie and vtter deſtruction.

The wofull aduertiſement hereof ſore troubled the Perſian king, but the young prince his ſonne much more; who moued with the paſſions of moſt inward griefe, diſdaine, and diſpaire, M and deſiring nothing more then reuenge, reſolued to attempt any thing whereby to requite ſo great a wrong. In which reſolution hauing confirmed his armie, he commaunded fiue hundred of his horſemen to preſent themſelues euen to the verie ſight of their enemies tents, and as it were to dare them to battel: which thing they performed accordingly, and made a gallant ſhow

A of themſelues. At the diſcouerie whereof, the Turkes imagining that the Perſians were come in great number to aſſaile the armie, order was giuen by the ſicke Generall, that Cicala Baſſa, and Mahamet the Baſſa of CARABMIT, with the people of GRÆCIA, and all their owne forces ſhould goe to encounter the enemie: who preſently with their enſignes diſplaied vnder which there ſtood about foure and thirtie thouſand ſtrong, beſides a number of ſeruile people, yet men exerciſed in labours and perils, in all well neere fortie thouſand, ſet forward. Now the fiue hundred Perſians, with a maruellous cunning kind of skirmiſhing dallied with the Turkiſh ſouldiors, and drew them forward for the ſpace of eight miles and more: and being brought ſo far on, and now forwearied with the skirmiſh, were luſtily aſſailed by the Perſian prince, who with part of his army (to the number of about twenty thouſand perſons) courageouſly ſet vpon the two
B Baſſaes, and ioyned with them the deadlieſt and cruelleſt battell that euer was written of. Wherein the Perſians hauing giuen a moſt perilous onſet, and done great harme, it was thought that they would haue contented themſelues with ſo luckie an encounter, and ſo retired: which the Turks minding to preſent, and not to returne without a notable victorie, hardly preſſed vpon them, hoping in the end to put them to flight, and ſo to giue them a bloudy and deadly ouerthrow. But the Perſians hauing quietly and with great aſſurance for a reaſonable ſpace endured their charge, at laſt as if they had bin freſh men, made head vpon them afreſh, and began a moſt terrible battell anew: wherein the Baſſa of CARAMMIT (aboue named) was put to flight, and being wholly diſmaied and diſcomfited, fled backe againe to the campe, carrying with him the moſt manifeſt tokens of the vnhappie iſſue of the battell. Cicala the other Baſſa notwithſtanding
C valiantly and with great cunning ſtill ſuſtained the furie of the Perſians, labouring by al meanes to encourage his ſouldiours, and to haue reſtored the battell: but when hee had done what hee could, ouercome at laſt by greater valour, he was enforced to betake himſelfe to flight alſo; and ſo altogether diſcomfited, came to the campe without any enſigne, hauing left behind him 8000 of his ſouldiors dead vpon the ground. Eight thouſand Turkes ſlaine.

The Perſian prince encouraged with this ſo fortunat a victorie, by ſpeedy heraulds ſent to the ſicke Viſier (whom he thought notwithſtanding to haue been in health) and gaue him to vnderſtand, that if he were willing to fight he was readie for him, and in what ſort ſoeuer it pleaſed him to accept of battell, to make him good account of his valour; and to cauſe him to know, not only that Amurath his maſter had moſt vniuſtly raiſed this warre, but alſo that it had been good
D for himſelfe not to haue taken the ſame in hand. Of this offer Oſman accepted, but being not able himſelfe to goe and anſwere the prince in perſon hand to hand, by reaſon of his ſickneſſe which euerie houre mortally encreaſed, hee ſent out all his captaines with his armie to dare him battell.

The prince lay ten miles, or therabouts diſtant from the campe of Oſman, towards whom the Turkes ſet forward in this manner: The maine battell was guided by the Baſſa of CARAEMIT and Sinan Cicala, with all the ſouldiors of ASSIRIA and BABYLON: the left wing was led by the Baſſa of NATOLIA, with the band of GRÆCIA; and the right wing was conducted by Amurath Baſſa of CARAMANIA, with the people of SORIA, to the number of threeſcore thouſand: beſide ſuch as were left behind at TAVRIS, with the truſty guard of the Ianizaries, and the E artillery, for the ſafegard of the ſicke Viſier. In this order they confronted the Perſian pince, who was himſelfe in the middeſt of his armie. with all his people in verie good order: hauing on the one ſide the ſouldiors of PERSIA and HIRCANIA, and on the other them of PARTHIA and ATROPATIA, in all to the number of fortie thouſand. The Turkes feared nothing more, than that the Perſians fetching a great compaſſe about, ſhould with all celeritie and furie ſet vpon their tents, and the riches they had laied vp together in their pauillions: and therefore at euery motion of theirs, they continually feared this ſudden outroad; whereof they had ſuch eſpeciall care, that retiring themſelues as much as they might, and faigning as if they had giuen place to the Perſians, it wanted not much but that they had brought them euen within the iuſt leuell and marke of the artillerie. Which the Perſians perceiuing, without any further dallying hard-
F ly began to aſſaile the maine bodie of the battell. The prince himſelfe being entred amongſt the ſouldiors of the Baſſa of CARABMIT (who as Generall ſuſtained the place of Oſman) and preſſing into the middeſt of the battell, diſpatched euerie man that came in his way; and hauing ſingled out the Baſſa from the reſt, ſmote off his head, and gaue it to one of his followers to carrie vpon the top of his launce. Which being openly deſcried, brought a great terrour vpon the Turkes, The Baſſa of Caraemit ſlaine by the Perſian prince, and his head cut off.

Turkes, and exceedingly encouraged the Persians; who embrued with the bloud of their ene- G mies, and intermingling themselues more and more among them, made of them a most confused and generall slaughter: wherein beside the Bassa before named, there died also the Bassa of TRABSZONDA, the Sanzacke of BRVSIA, with fiue other Sanzackes, and as it was commonly reported twentie thousand Turkes moe. It fell also to the lot of Amurath Bassa of CARAMANIA to be there taken prisoner, with diuers other common souldiours. But night comming now on, and the Persians being come somewhat too nigh the Turkish artillerie, they gaue ouer the fight, and withdrew themselues backe to the place where the king lay encamped with the rest of his armie.

But now were diuers dayes spent, wherein the new fortresse at TAVRIS (as we haue before said) was fully finished, when the souldiers of GRÆCIA and CONSTANTINOPLE wearied to H see their friends and fellowes thus slaine before their faces, and hauing also safely layed vp in their owne custodie such preyes and booties as they had gotten in the sacke of the city, resolued with themselues to procure their owne departure, and so much the rather, for that the winter was now fast comming on. And for as much as the Generall was through the immoderate flux of bloud brought weake, and in despaire of life, and quite abandoned of all hope by his phisitions, and therefore not to be spoke withall; they were faine by the mouth of such as were their trustie friends about him, to represent vnto him the necessitie of their returne, and withall after many reuerent entreaties caused it also to be signified vnto him, That if he stood obstinate, and would needs stay dallying out the time in those dangerous places where no such need was, they should be enforced to withdraw themselues, and to forsake him. Osman, who had now nothing else to I doe in those countries, but onely to leaue some conuenient garrison in the new fortresse at TAV-RIS, liberally promised to satisfie their requests, by departing thence the next morning. So calling vnto him Giaffer the Eunuch Bassa of TRIPOLIS, a man of a crafty and cruell nature, made him gouernor and keeper of the new built fortresse at TAVRIS. And the more to encourage him to take that charge vpon him, he gaue him freely for the space of three whole yeares not onelie
the office and authoritie, but also the rents and reuenewes of the Bassa of CARAMIT, lately slaine by the Persian prince, and withall honoured him with the title of a Bassa of the Court: so that hauing finished his three yeares office of CARAEMIT, he was then to goe and sit among the soue-raigne seates of the Bassaes of the Porta. The Bassa seeing so faire and so high a way for him to K mount to those high honours (greater than which there is none in the Turkish empire) readily accepted the offer, and dispatching his lieutenant for CARAEMIT to the gouernment of those countries in his absence, with an hundred of his owne followers; setled himselfe in the said fort with a garrison of twelue thousand souldiors, furnished with all necessarie prouision vntill the next spring. The General hauing thus set all things in order, and carefully prouided for the safe-tie of the fortresse, departed according to his promise, and the same morning, which was the fourescore and seuenth day after his departure from ERZIRVM, came to a place called SANCAZAN seuen miles distant from TAVRIS.

The Turkes were now vpon the point of their encamping in a confused disorder and hurly-burly, when those that were hindermost in the armie heard the neighing of horses, and the noise of drums and trumpets, as if it had beene the comming of an armie. Which when the whole L campe vnderstood, they ran all headlong, and disordered as they were to the rescue, on that side where the noise of the horses and warlike instruments was heard. But whilest the Turkes were thus intentiuely busied on that side to expect the comming of the enemie, the Persian prince without any signe or token of battell, with eight and twentie thousand horsemen was readie vp-on them on the other side: who hauing discouered the cammels and other carriages whereupon their bootie, their spoiles, and their riches were laden, which they had taken in TAVRIS, beside much of their prouision for victuals for the sustenance of the armie, he turned vpon them, and with a prouident and safe conuoy had taken for a prey eighteene thousand of the cammels and mules, well loden with the same booties and victuals; which the prince sent presently away M with six thousand of his souldiors, and hee himselfe with his two and twentie thousand Persians entred into the Turkes armie, who now to withstand his assault, had on that side also made head against him. A gallant thing it was, and terrible withall, to see what a mortall battell was made, what singular prowesse shewed euen presently in the forefront of the battel; for in a mom̃et you might haue seene the tents and pauillions turned vpside downe, and their encamping lodgings reple-

A repleniſhed with dead carkaſſes and bloud, victorious death raunging and raigning in euery corner. The Turkes themſelues were aſtoniſhed and maruelled to ſee their enemies (ſo few in number, and intermingled among ſo populous an army of warlike people) more like fatall miniſters of death, than mortall men, to brandiſh their ſwords ouer them, as if it had lightened, and to make ſo generall a ſlaughter; and doe to this day with great admiration recount the valour and proweſſe of the Perſians. But they all now doubting leaſt the enemie in this furie ſhould forcibly haue entred the very lodgings of the ſicke Viſier, it was commaunded not by himſelfe (for he lay now at the laſt gaſpe) but by him who at that time commaunded in his name, That without delay the artillerie ſhould be vnbarred, and diſcharged: which in that medley and confuſion of both armies, without any exception or diſtinction of perſons, ouerthrew both friends and
B foes, and did perhaps more harme among the Turkes themſelues than among the Perſians: for at the firſt thundering noiſe thereof the prince with all ſpeed retired, after whom preſently followed all the reſt; ſo that the Turkes which remained behind were more annoyed with the deadly ſhot than were the Perſians, who flying away could not feele the dammage, but that the Turkes muſt firſt be well payed for their labour. The Turkes purſuing the flying Perſians, made ſhew as if they would gladly haue ouertaken them: but night comming on, they feared to proceed any further than they might without danger returne. In this battell of SANCAZAN were ſlaine twentie thouſand Turks, without any notable loſſe of the Perſians.

Twentie thouſand Turkes ſlaine.

Among the reſt in the ſame place died the Viſier Oſman, General of the late dreadful, but now deſolate armie; not by the hand of the enemie, but conſumed by the vehemencie of an ague and
C a flux of bloud. Whoſe death notwithſtanding was kept ſecret from the whole army, euery man verily thinking, that it was but onely the continuance of his ſickneſſe, becauſe the chariots wherin he lay, were ſtill kept cloſe: and in his name Cicala Baſſa (for ſo hee had appointed in his will) gaue out anſweres and commaundements to the whole army. Neuertheleſſe it was diſcloſed to the Perſians, by meanes of three young men, who in the life of Oſman hauing charge of his iewels and treaſure, were with the beſt thereof and the faireſt of his horſes fled to the Perſian king, to whom they reuealed the death of the Generall. The Perſians who before had thought it not poſſible for ſo great cowardiſe, and diſhonourable kind of fighting and ordering of an armie to haue proceeded from the vertue and valour of Oſman, of whoſe worth they had too manifeſt a triall and experience in times paſt; now vnderſtanding of his death, were thereby encouraged
D to attempt the vtter ouerthrow of the Turkiſh remnant, and ſo to giue them an honourable farewell. Whereupon the Perſian prince with foureteene thouſand men followed the Turkes, who had now raiſed their campe, and were remooued to a certaine riuer of ſalt water, not farre from SANCAZAN; where the prince cauſed a few tents to bee pitched, about foure or fiue miles diſtant from the Turkiſh campe, the aforeſaid brooke running in the middeſt betweene the two armies. Now the prince had purpoſed to haue aſſailed the Turks in the morning, whiles they were loading their carriages, hoping in that confuſion to haue wrought them ſome notable miſchiefe: which his deſignement was reuealed vnto the Turks by one of his ſpies whom they had caught. And therefore they did neither riſe ſo early in the morning as their manner was, nor load their ſtuffe vntill ſuch time as they were all armed, and on horſeback readie to receiue their enemies.
E By which their wary and vnuſual maner of riſing, the Perſians perceiued, that their purpoſe was by ſome meanes diſcouered. And yet conſidering that if they ſhould looſe this occaſion, they ſhould find no other good oportunitie to annoy them before the next Spring, they vtterly reſolued to aduenture the aſſault: and hauing obſerued, that the enemies artillerie was on the right ſide of the armie, they in the ſight of euerie man began to enter on the left. But the Turkes preſently ſo vncouered and vnbarred their artillerie againſt the aſſailants, as was to their great loſſe and danger. Howbeit they were ſo nimble and ſo quicke to ſhrowd themſelues vnder the enemies armie, and to auoid the miſchieuous tempeſt, that being come now very neere the Turkes ſquadrons, they muſt needs ioyne battell with them. The Perſians had purpoſed before as ſoone as they ſaw the Turkes begin to ſtirre, to retire, and ſo to draw them on into a very filthie and F deepe mariſh; which being then drie, was not feared or doubted of any, but onely by thoſe that were acquainted withall, or borne thereabouts. Which their policie the rebell Maxut Chan, and with him Daut Chan (as being wel acquainted with thoſe places) perceiuing, gaue notice thereof to Cicala Baſſa: who preſently cauſed a great compaſſing wing to be made, commanding them to ſet vpon the Perſians, and to charge them home: which was forthwith put in execution, ſo that that their forefront opened it ſelfe with very large and ſpacious corners vpon the prince: who G

no ſooner ſaw this their vnwonted order of comming on, but by and by hee perceiued that his purpoſe was diſcouered. And thereupon without any ſtay he began to retire, calling his people after him: which could not ſo readily bee done, but that three thouſand of them remained behind, all miſerably ſtifled, ouertroden in the mire, with very little loſſe to the Turks: and this only battell of fiue that were fought vnder TAVRIS, and in thoſe quarters, was leſſe hurtfull to the Turkes, than to the Perſians.

The Prince returned to the king his fathers campe, recounting vnto him the whole action, together with the departure of the enemie. And ſo the Turkes came to SALMAS, where the death of the Generall was publiſhed: from SALMAS they went afterwards to VAN, where they took a ſuruey of their army, and found wanting therin about foureſcore and fiue thouſand per- H ſons, or as ſome ſay more. At VAN all the ſouldiors were diſmiſſed: and Cicala from thence gaue
The Turks army diſcharged at Van. notice to Amurath at CONSTANTINOPLE of all that had happened. Where firſt was publiſhed the death of Oſman the Generall; for whom were made many ſignes of great ſorrow: and together with his death were blazed the bloudie and mortall actions that were in that expedition performed: ſo that the whole citie ſeemed to bee greatlie diſcomforted, and in many places were heard much ſecret railing vpon the king, many curſes of this warre, and inſolent maledictions of theſe manifold miſchiefes. After that, was diſperſed the great fame of the new fortreſſe erected at TAVRIS, of the ſacking of the citie, and of all the loſſe that had happened therein: and a general edict publiſhed in the kings name, That through al the cities of his empire they ſhould make ſolemne feaſts, with other expreſſe tokens of ioy and reioycing: which was accordingly I done both in CONSTANTINOPLE and other places. There was alſo word ſent to the embaſſadours of HVNGARIE, of FRANCE, of VENICE, and of other countries, that they ſhould do the like: but they all with one accord anſwered, That it was neuer the cuſtome of embaſſadours to make any ſuch ſigne of reioyſing, but onely when the king himſelfe in perſon returned from the like victories.

In the meane time conſultation was held at VAN for the ſending of ſuccours to TEFLIS in GEORGIA: vnto which important ſeruice, Daut Chan to deſerue ſome reward at Amuraths hand, offered himſelfe: vnto whom Cicala Baſſa deliuered thirtie thouſand Cecchini to be conueyed to the fort at TEFLIS. Which piece of ſeruice the renegate performed, and without trouble relieued the ſouldiors in the fort: which was ſo well accepted of Amurath, that he for the K ſame good ſeruice honoured him with the dignitie of the Baſſa of MARAS. Maxut Chan alſo the other Perſian rebell, that guided the Turkiſh armie to Reiuan, and afterwards to TAVRIS, was in like manner by the ſame Amurath honoured with the great rich office of the Baſſa of ALEPPO.

The miſeries the Turkes armie endured at Tauris. The miſeries the Turkiſh armie endured in this expedition for TAVRIS, beſide the loſſes before rehearſed, were wonderfull: for as the Sanzacke of AMAN, a citie of SORIA (called in antient time APAMEA) preſent in all this action, reporteth in a letter which he wrote to Ali Baſſa of ALEPPO, there was ſuch a dearth in the Turks army, that they were enforced to giue their cammels bisket and rice, and when that failed, they gaue them their pack-ſaddles to eat, and after that pieces of wood beaten into pouder, and at laſt the very earth: which dearth endured vntill they L arriued at VAN. And at TAVRIS whileſt the fortreſſe was in building, they were of neceſſity conſtrained to giue their horſes their dung in very drie pouder. By reaſon whereof there followed a grieuous mortalitie of horſes, cammels, mules, and men, and the ſtinke which grew of this mortalitie became ſo great, that euery man was faine to carie a piece of a ſtrong ſmelling onyon ſtill vnder his noſe, to auoid the heauineſſe thereof.

The fort ſo lately built in the royal city of TAVRIS exceedingly grieued the Perſians in generall, but eſpecially the king and the prince his ſon: to let it alone, they reckoned it too great a ſhame, and how to demoliſh it they well knew not, finding themſelues not only deſtitute of artillerie, but alſo of ſuch ſufficient ſtrength as was requiſit for the performance of ſo great an enterpriſe: yet prickt on with deſire of glorie and the neceſſitie of the cauſe, they determined euen M in the ſharpeneſſe of Winter to gather new forces, and with trenches of earth to approach the ditch. and to trie if they could aduance a countermure as high as their wals, and ſo to attaine to the conqueſt thereof. But in the gathering of their men they diſcouered new difficulties, for, to hire any ſouldiors either from HERI or GHEILAN, was denied them by Abas and Amet Chan;

A and their Turcoman nation, which might haue bin the readieſt and the neereſt at ſuch a need, for the late death of Emir Chan, and for the ſucceſſion of Aliculi, were grown verie contumatious: ſo that neither the king, nor the prince, nor the preſidents and gouernors of the kingdome, could tell which way to turne themſelues. At laſt for the common ſafetie they determined to draw the Turcomans to a reconciliation, hoping that by promiſing them any honeſt ſatisfaction for the wrong wherwith they challenged themſelues grieued for the death of their captaine, they would become more tractable to do them ſeruice in their common neceſſities. Whereupon the king ſent kind letters to the heads and captaines of thoſe nations, & principally to Mahamet Chan, and to Caliſe the Sultan, declaring plainly vnto them the perils of his ſtate, & of the libertie of the whole kingdome, with the confidence he had in their valour: and that therfore for-
B getting all that was paſt, as done not in ſhame or ſcorne of their nation, but only for zeale and loue to the kingdome, they would demaund ſuch ſatisfaction as they deſired, and that he would be readie to agree to any iuſt requeſt they ſhould make. To which letters they readily anſwered, That they would come vnto him, to put in execution whatſoeuer he ſhould for the common neceſſitie or the honour of his State commaund. Now they had craftilie among themſelues alreadie concluded, not to ſuffer any other to ſit in the roome of Emir Chan their late Gouernor, but onely young Tamas the kings third ſonne. Which concluſion they had plotted to themſelues, with a reſolution in the end to cauſe him to be accepted for king at CASBIN, in deſpight of the king himſelfe and of the prince Hamze: nothing regarding, that by this action far greater troubles would ariſe in PERSIA than euer were yet heard of, but only being wholly bent to C reuenge the death of one only Emir Chan. With this malitious and fraudulent reſolution, they to the number of ten thouſand (vnder the conduct of two captains, Mahamet and Caliſe) went to the king, in all reuerence offering themſelues with all readineſſe to be imployed in the enterpriſe whereunto they were called. The old credulous king, not ſuſpecting any miſchiefe plotted by theſe ſecret rebels, was greatly comforted at their comming: and although by ſome of his Sultans that had felt ſome inkling of his conſpiracie, he was aduiſed to deale circumſpectly and warily with them, and not commit any matter of importance to their truſt, yet did he thinke euerie houre a thouſand vntill he had offered them ſatisfaction: promiſing them, that what captaine ſoeuer they would deſire in the roume of Emir Chan, if it were poſſible they ſhould haue him. Whereunto the diſſembling Mahamet Chan made anſwere, That their deſire aboue all D things, was to doe him pleaſure and ſeruice; not doubting but he would appoint them ſuch a Chieftaine, as ſhould be valorous, noble, and acceptable vnto them. The king could ſtay no longer, but frankly declared vnto them, That to aſſure them of his good will, and to giue them an hoſtage in pawne thereof, he had made choiſe of young Tamas his ſonne to ſucceed in the roume of Emir Chan their late Gouernour. As ſoone as Mahamet Chan heard this reſolution of the king; who beſide all expectation voluntarily of himſelfe yeelded them the meanes to put in execution, what they had malitiouſly before contriued againſt the peace and libertie of the kingdome: he became more iocund than he was wont to be, and outwardly ſhewed himſelfe readie for whatſoeuer the king would command him: and in the names of the reſt yeelded alſo large promiſes of fidelitie and obedience, ſo that the matter might be performed for which he
E had now giuen his word.

Ten thouſand Turcomans offer their ſeruice vnto the Perſian king.

The king, who deſired nothing more than to ſee the fort of TAVRIS raſed (which could hardly be done without the helpe of thoſe Turcomans) contrarie to the aduiſe of the wiſeſt of the Sultans, and of the prince, ſecretly & as it were by ſtealth gaue his young ſonne Tamas into the hands of Mahamet, as chiefe of all the Turcomans. Who to nouriſh the good opinion and credulitie of the king, and to ſecure the prince and the Sultans, gaue a luſtie beginning by the helpe of his followers, with trenches and rampiers to approch the fort. Neither was there any great time ſpent therein; for they had now almoſt made their trenches and mounts euen with the enemies wall, and the ditch it ſelfe was almoſt filled vp with earth, ſo that there wanted but little more labour to begin the deſired aſſault: when contrarie to all mens expectation, the falſe
F and wicked traitor Mahamet Chan with all his Turcomans, leading away with them the child Tamas, departed in the night time and vpon a ſudden, from ſo noble and honourable an enterpriſe. And blinded with deſire to put in execution his ill hatched purpoſe, couertly and without any noiſe remoued from the beſieged wals, and put himſelfe on his way towards CASBIN: ſtill tearming Tamas by the name of the king of PERSIA, and ſundrie waies abuſing and mocking the poore old king and the prince. This ſo ſudden and ſo dangerous a rebellion, whereby not G only ſo honourable and ſo neceſſarie an enterpriſe was to be abandoned, but the whole ſtate of the kingdome like to be indangered, exceedingly grieued all good men, but moſt of all the old king and the prince his ſonne: who no leſſe carefull of his rightfull ſucceſſion, than was the aged king of his preſent eſtate, both now hazarded by this rebellion; wholly incenſed with grief and anguiſh of mind, began to caſt a thouſand deuiſes in his troubled head, what courſe to take, and what to reſolue vpon. To abandon the ſiege it grieued him aboue meaſure, and to ſuffer ſo pernitious a rebellion to go forward, ſeemed too dangerous for the ſtate of PERSIA: and to pro-uide for both theſe miſchiefes at once, was altogither impoſſible. In theſe huge waues of contrarie thoughts, he reſolued at laſt to turne himſelfe againſt the Turcomans, and to ſuppreſſe that rebellion as moſt dangerous to the ſtate. And ſo with twelue thouſand ſouldiors, and a H part alſo of the kings ordinarie guard, all couragious and hardie men, he followed after the rebellious Turcomans; and marching directly toward CASBIN, he ouertooke them at a place called CALISTEZA, a daies iourney on this ſide CASBIN, and there ioyned battell with them.

Wherein many of them being ſorie for that they had done, would not ſo much as draw their ſwords againſt the prince: many others fled alſo away for feare, ſo that he eaſily obtained a wi-ſhed victorie ouer them. The ſeditious Mahamet Chan was taken priſoner, and by the princes of this peſtilent conſpiracie. Young Tamas was alſo taken, & by the direction of the prince ſent to the caſtle of CAHACA. Fiue thouſand Turcomans of the late followers of the rebell Maha- met, fled out of the battell towards BABYLON by the way of SIRAS, and yeelded themſelues to I Solyman Baſſa of that citie; who afterwards repenting themſelues of their follie, ſought to return againe into the fauour of their king, but all in vaine: ſo that being become rebels to the one, and ſuſpected to the other, they did at on time looſe their countrie, their libertie, their honour, & the fauour of all men as well friends as foes. The prince after this victorie held on his way to CAS-BIN, and there ſtaying, laboured to gather the diſperſed Turcomans, eſpecially thoſe that moued with the honeſtie of the cauſe, would not beare armes in ſo vniuſt an action; intending afterwards to returne to TAVRIS, to attend the beſieging and conqueſt of the fort. This was the end of this dangerous rebellion, the chiefe cauſe that TAVRIS was not againe recouered out of the hands of the Turks, to the great weakning of the Perſian kingdome.

Giaffer Baſſa ſendeth to Cicala Baſſa for aid. Now Giaffer the Eunuch Baſſa Gouernor of the caſtle of TAVRIS, fearing leaſt the Perſian K prince would with a greater armie againe returne to the ſiege: perceiuing himſelfe to wax euery day weaker & weaker, by reaſon that many of his men ſecretly fled from him, beſide them that periſhed with ſickneſſe, and others ſlaine in aduenturing too boldly to go abroad to ſeeke for victuals; ſent aduertiſement therof to Cicala Baſſa at VAN, ſignifying farther vnto him by writing, That if the prince ſhould againe returne to aſſault the fort, he ſhould of neceſſitie be enforced to yeeld it: and that therefore as he tendered the honour of his Sultan, he would be carefull to ſend him ſuccour, whereby he might be able to maintaine the fort: adding moreouer, That now it was moſt eaſily to be done, becauſe there was no forces of the enemies in thoſe quarters, ſauing onely a few which remained about the king, lying twelue miles off from TAVRIS. Cicala moued with the importance of the enterpriſe propounded, and withall deſirous to gaine ſome L credit of glorie and renowne with his king, entertained the aduiſes of Giaffer, and getting him to horſe with a traine of three thouſand harquebuſiers and good ſtore of munition, ſet forward toward TAVRIS. The Perſian king aduertiſed thereof, ſent out ſpies to learne what way they held, meaning to meet them and to ſet vpon them: but theſe ſpies comming neere to SALMAS were apprehended by the forerunners of Cicala, and being put to torture, reuealed at laſt how that their king was in armes, and on his way towards SANCAZAN. At which newes Cicala was greatly aſtonied, as well for the danger whereinto the forces and munition which he had with him were likely to fall, as alſo for that by any loſſe which his troups ſhould ſuſtaine in this expedition, the citie of VAN (being indeed the greater and moſt noble frontier towne in all thoſe countries) muſt needs be in hazard to be loſt, hauing left in it but his lieutenant with a verie few M ſouldiours. Whereupon he determined to relinquiſh this dangerous enterpriſe, and to withdraw himſelfe backe to the defence and preſeruation of the citie committed to his truſt and go-uernment. But although theſe expected and deſired ſuccours were not conuaied to TAVRIS as was intended, yet had Giaffer as good fortune as he could wiſh: for the preparations of the prince

A prince were ſo long and troubleſome, and his returne ſo much prolonged, that there was time enough yeelded vnto the Turks great Generall now newly choſen (as by and by ſhall be declared) to go with a ſtrong armie into thoſe quarters, and ſo to preſerue all that which the only expedition and celeritie of the enemie might haue put in great hazard, and almoſt haue brought to a deſperat caſe.

In the meane time, Amurath the Turkiſh emperor was greatly troubled at CONSTANTINOPLE in making choiſe of a new General: on the one ſide Oſman Baſſa hauing by his laſt will left Sinan Cicala to be his ſucceſſor, as a man of approued valour, and the many dangers he had run through in the late ſeruice about TAVRIS, with the great fauours he had in the Court, did not a little encline the king to his election: on the other ſide, he heard of a publike rumor ſpread
B amongſt the ſouldiors, that they could by no meanes endure to be commanded by ſo young a captaine, and that ſome in plaine tearmes ſhould ſay, That they would not obey him: which cauſed Amurath to doubt, that ſome dangerous diſcord might thereof inſue in the armie, if he ſhould proceed to make choiſe of him. Then there was alſo Ferat Baſſa, the ſame man which had alreadie ſuſtained that charge before Oſman; who now verie ambitiouſly ſought againe for this honour, hauing of late performed ſome good ſeruice to the good liking of the king. Of any other to make better choiſe he had none, ſo that he ſtood in great doubt what to doe. In the end, becauſe he was in good time to prouide for his affaires, he made choiſe of Ferat Baſſa, the ſame man whom he had before made proofe of: a man of great fidelitie, of an honourable cariage, and alreadie experienced in the leading and commaunding of ſuch an armie, to whom he
C granted the ordinarie authority, to mannage at his pleaſure ſuch affaires of the empire as concerned his iourney. Vpon this reſolution generall precepts were ſent out to all cities within the kingdome, to the Baſſaes and other Gouernours with ſpeciall commaundement, That all their ſouldiours, togither with their taxes, tenths, munitions, victuals, armour, artificers, and to be ſhort, all their neceſſarie furniture & prouiſion ſhould be readie and in order, vpon the firſt warning ſhould be ſent them the next Spring. Great prouiſion of money was made, and in SORIA (beſides the ordinarie ſumme that is beſtowed vpon the yearely pay of ſouldiors in REIVAN ERZIRVM, LORI, TOMANIS, TEBLIS and CHARS, which ſwallow vp all the reuenue of that couutrie, and of the citie of TRIPOLI, amounting to the ſumme of ſix hundred thouſand duckats) there was taken vp in preſt of priuat merchants in the citie of ALEPPO only, the ſumme of three-
D ſcore thouſand Cecchini, to be repaied vnto them with the firſt monies that ſhould be receiued by the officers of his cuſtome houſes. A matter that moued an extraordinarie grudging among the people, for that it ſeemed to euery man a very ſtrange and intollerable exaction, beſide ſo many grieuances laid vpon them, for corne, for carriages, for poiners, and for workmen, to endure this burden alſo of lending their mony without hope of reſtitution therof: yea and indeed euery man did greatly wonder how they were thus ill aduiſed, to make it known to the Chriſtian princes what ſcarcitie and want of mony they had. The Generall had alſo with him foure hundred pieces of artillerie, and did beſide ſo worke the matter, as that Maxut Chan (who was appointed Baſſa of ALEPPO) was granted vnto him to be the guid of his armie, as he had bin of Oſmans; and that Cicala Baſſa of VAN (ſcarce his good friend) was remoued from thence, and ſent farther
E off out of his way as Baſſa to BABILON.

The returne of Soria ſix hundred thouſand duckats.

And thus hauing put all things in readineſſe, he departed from CONSTANTINOPLE in the month of Aprill, in the yeare 1586; and paſſing ouer the ſtrait into ASIA, came to SIVAS ſomething latter than he ſhould haue done, being hindered partly by the plague which then raged exceedingly in CONSTANTINOPLE, and partly by other occaſions incident to ſuch actions. At SIVAS he ſtaied ſo long for the comming togither of his armie, and in muſtering men, that it was the latter end of Iuly before he departed thence; ſtaying indeed the longer at SIVAS, by reaſon of the exceeding dearth and want of victuals at ERZIRVM: which dearth was alſo ſo great in ALEPPO, that a VENICE buſhell of wheat was ſold for twelue Cecchini. 1586

Ferat departeth from Conſtantinople and commeth to Sivas.

Ferat yet making his aboad at SIVAS, but readie to depart, was aduertiſed by certaine poſtes F ſent from Gaiffer the Baſſa of TAVRIS, how that the Perſian prince was hourely expected with a great armie, and that if he did foreſlow to ſend ſuccours, and to preuent the comming of the prince, and ſo to giue him time & leaſure to aſſault the caſtle, he doubted greatly how he ſhould be able to hold the ſame. Vpon which aduertiſement Ferat preſently remoued, and ſo haſted his iourney, that about the beginning of Auguſt he was at ERZIRVM: and ſtil hearing more and more of the princes comming, ſtayed not there, but haſted to VAN: where hauing gathered to- G gither all his ſoldiors, and taken a new ſuruey of his armie, he departed thence; and being pre-ſently come into the open and large champaines, to make proofe of the readineſſe of his ſoulddiors, he marſhalled them in ſuch ſort as if he ſhould forthwith haue ioined battell with the ene-mie, and ſo in ſeemely order marched on.

The Turkiſh Generall continually feared leaſt the Perſians ſhould come vpon him with ſome ſudden aſſault: beſides that, the conſtant report of the princes comming to TAVRIS with his armie, much increaſed his troubled thoughts. But on the other ſide, he repoſed great confidence in the conſpiracie that was now plotted againſt the life of the prince, with the priuitie of Aluculi Chan the protector and champion of Abas Mirize of HERI: who vnder colour of accompanying the prince to aſſiſt his forces, had reſolutly concluded with himſelfe, and abſo- H lutely promiſed Abas (hauing alſo giuen intelligence thereof to the Turkiſh Generall) to rid the prince Hamze of his life; or at leaſt (which he thought might more eaſily be brought to paſſe) in the ſundrie reuolutions & variable chances of the battell at ſome time or other to make him fall into the hands of Ferat, and ſo to ſettle his lord and maſter Abas in his eſtate. Vpon theſe trecheries Ferat grounding himſelfe, began with greater confidence to diſpoſe his deſignments, and ſomewhat leſſe to feare the fame of the huge preparations of PERSIA againſt him. Which preparations in truth as by moſt wicked deuices and malicious conſpiracies they were turned quite contrarie from that end whereunto the prince Hamze had continually appointed them: ſo if they had been employed with ſuch faith and fidelitie as ſo righteous a cauſe required, without all doubt the writers of our time ſhould haue had matter ynough in this foureſcore & ſixt yeare I to ſhew & repreſent vnto the world ſuch accidents as ſhould be nothing inferior to thoſe of the yeare before going. But for as much as rebellion and diſcord, the two infernall miniſters of the diuell, haue for the vtter vndoing & ouerthrow of the glorie of PERSIA continually fauoured the Turks armie, no maruell it is that the Perſian nation cannot vaunt of any reuenge taken for the indignities offered them by their enemies; and that our writers cannot chuſe but write of the true and vndoubted victories of the Turks, & the bare ſhaddows of the Perſian exploits; which notwithſtanding many Chriſtians vainly beleeue, becauſe they moſt earneſtly deſire them to be true although they do ſee to the contrary the manifeſt proſpering and euident conqueſts which the Turkes haue in diuers their ſtates and countries.

The glorie of the Perſia kingdome ouerthrown by rebellion and diſcord

The Perſian prince about the latter end of Iuly arriued at TAVRIS with the greateſt part of K his armie, where he (contrarie to the opinion of all men) ſtaied not, for what cauſe is vncertaine.
But vnderſtanding that Zeinel Baſſa of SALMAS, by nation a Curdo, lay encamped before the ci-tie, who of a Perſian was become a Turke, and had done great harme againſt the ſtate of PER-SIA; he determined ſuddenly to ſet vpon him, and to chaſtiſe him for his rebellion. According to which reſolution, being accompanied with twelue thouſand ſouldiours, he rode to SALMAS, where finding Zeinell with all his people encamped as he had beene before enformed, hee gaue him the aſſault. Zeinell more readie to flie than to fight, and his ſoldiors as readie as he, fled pre-ſently, and fel before the Perſians, ſo that the Baſſa himſelfe with a few others had much adoe to eſcape and ſaue themſelues in the cloſeſt corners thereabouts, leauing the citie committed to his charge, for a prey vnto the angrie enemie: who entering into the ſame, ſacked and ſpoiled it, ex- L erciſing thereon all ſuch cruelties, as partly the naturall deſires of ſouldiors vſe to practiſe, and partly ſuch as the Turkes themſelues ſhewed vnto them in that miſerable and moſt lamentable ſacking of TAVRIS the laſt yeare. The like ſpoiles did the Perſian armie in all thoſe quarters round about, and ſo would haue peraduenture returned to TAVRIS, but that certaine ſpies arri-ued vpon them, with aduertiſement, That the Baſſa of REIVAN being iſſued out of his fortreſſe with fifteene hundred harquebuſiers, had committed the like outrages in the villages and fields thereabouts, as the prince had done about SALMAS. With which newes the prince was greatly moued; and immediatly riſing with his armie, and marching towards REIVAN, not farre from the citie encountred the Baſſa: who diſcouering the enemies forces afar off, began in great diſ- M order to flie and retire into his fort, leauing the greateſt part of his ſoldiors (making not ſo much ſpeed in flight as himſelfe) to the furie of the prince, who put them all to the ſword, and did what harme he poſſibly could in all the places thereabouts.

At the very ſame time great troubles aroſe in the Druſian countrie for Man-ogli the valiant Druſian (of whom we haue before ſpoken) in reuenge of the iniuries done vnto him & his people

A ple by Ebrain Baſſa, and by a violent kind of reſtitution to recompence himſelfe of all thoſe bribes and preſents which by ſo many ſhifts and ſubtilties were by the couetous Baſſa wrung from him (as is before declared) had now taken vp armes, and hauing waſted and ſacked all the territorie of Ebne-manſur and of his other enemies who had yeelded their obedience vnto the Turkes, without let forced all that countrey with ſudden inuaſions and inrodes, euen very neere vnto the cities of BALBECKE and TRIPOLI, and did there exceeding harme. For redreſſe whereof, Amurath was glad to diſpatch away from the Court Ali Baſſa borne at ALEPPO, with the title of the Baſſa of DAMASCO, and with authoritie to muſter freſh ſouldiors, and ſo wholly to attend the vtter ſubuerſion of Man-ogli. But comming thither, he found all againe quiet, ſo that his preſence in that countrie ſerued rather for a reconciliation and peace making amongſt
B them, than for the proſecuting of any further war; which at that time was moſt neceſſarie for the Turks to be auoided, as well for want of mony in the common treaſurie, as for the exceeding ſcarcitie of victuals.

Now the Perſian prince hauing made an end of the outrodes and ſpoiles before mentioned, retired himſelfe to TAVRIS, and ſo towards his fathers campe, where the reſt of his armie was now arriued, to the number of about fortie thouſand: of whom the prince diſpatched away the ſouldiors of HERI to the number of eight thouſand, vnder the conduct of the traiterous Aliculi Chan their Generall; and part alſo of the Turcomans, vnder the leading of Emanguli Chan; with ſpeciall charge, That they ſhould by the way in places of moſt aduantage meet and receiue the enemies armie, and in thoſe narrow and trobleſome paſſages to doe them what miſchiefe they
C poſſibly could. Which the prince thus appointed, thinking by this meanes to weaken the enemies forces, and ſo at their arriuall at TAVRIS to come vpon them with all his power, and ſo vtterly to deſtroy them.

Both theſe captaines departed accordingly, making ſhew that they would with all affection accompliſh the commaundement of their prince: yet neuer was there heard any ſeruice of moment put in execution by them: For Aliculi full of treaſon, after their departure began to alledge many forced reaſons and excuſes, Why they ſhould ſurceaſe from meeting with the Turks: and Emanguli as yet vtterly ignorant of the wicked purpoſes and miſchieuous trecherie of Aliculi, ſuffered himſelfe to be miſſe-led by him alſo. By the delaies and negligence of theſe two Perſian captaines, the Turkiſh Generall tooke leiſure without any loſſe or hinderance at all to arriue at D TAVRIS, and to put the deſired ſuccours into the fort: at what time the Perſian prince by good hap had got knowledge of the treacherie of Aliculi, and of the deſignments which many of the Sultans had lately contriued, for the betraying of him aliue into the hands of the Turkiſh Generall. Of which ſuſpition he being greatly afraid, durſt not onely not truſt himſelfe to performe thoſe battels that he had before determined to haue performed; but quite abandoning this noble and honorable enterpriſe, wholly imploied all his care and ſtudie for the ſaferie of his own perſon, and ſo left the triumph of the matter in the power of the Turkes. And thus thoſe great hopes and expectations which the Perſians had conceiued of great exploits to haue been done againſt the enemie, did not onely proue vaine and come to no good iſſue, but contrariwiſe by this diſcouery were conuerted into moſt ſtrange diſturbances, and all PERSIA therby endured
E ſundrie alterations and reuolutions of moſt important conſequences. For both Aliculi Chan and his complices were purſued by the prince, as rebels and traitours: and alſo Abas Mirize of HERI was manifeſtly diſcouered for a wicked and treacherous contriuer of his brothers death: whereby the common miſchiefes were encreaſed more than euer they were before, and the publike calamities yeelded greater hopes vnto the Turkes than they had euer before conceiued in all the courſe of theſe wars.

Aliculi and Emanguli Chan perform nothing againſt the Turks, as was by the prince expected.

Ferat putteth ſuccors into the fort at Tauris.

When Ferat had thus relieued them in the caſtle of TAVRIS, leauing for the cuſtodie thereof Giaffer the Baſſa with his former companies, hee returned towards ERZIRVM: hauing firſt cauſed a fort to be erected at CVRCHIVE TAVRIS, a place neere vnto TAVRIS, another at COY, and the third at CVM: in euery one of which forts he left a conuenient number of ſoul-
F diours, with all things neceſſarie and ſufficient for their maintenance, and defence of the places they were to keep. He ſent alſo ſuccours to the fort at TEFLIS in GEORGIA, which they had long expected, and now moſt ioyfully receiued. But the Perſian prince hauing hunted Aliculi Chan out of the quarters of TAVRIS, thought himſelfe now wholly deliuered from the great feare of treaſon and rebellion, wherin he of late liued: and therfore in as great haſt as he could, put himſelfe selfe on his iourney towards GENGE: in which place hauing gathered togither a good number of souldiours, he determined to remoue thence: to intercept the succours that were by the Turkes to be brought to TEFLIS. Now he had alwaies found Emanguli Chan to be both faithfull and wise, and in him he reposed an assured confidence for performing any enterprise that he had in hand, & communicated with him euery deuice that he had conceiued in these wars. And therefore he made head and ioyned with him; and lodging most familiarly in his citie, he staied there for the setting in order and disposing of his foresaid designement, being very desirous not to let such an oportunitie to ouerslip, without signification vnto the world of some notable noueltie, which might be correspondent to the fame that of matters passed and performed the yere before, was now spread and published abroad ouer all the world. But when he was euen at the very faireſt to haue put this his desire in execution, and least of all feared any treacherie or treason, vpon a sudden in the night time as he slept vpon a pallet he was miserably strucken through the bodie, by an Eunuch of his that attended vpon him: and so the most resplendent and bright lustre that euer shined in PERSIA, was vtterly extinguished. What was the occasion therof, and who procured his death, diuers and sundrie are the opinions of men. Some thinke, that his brother Abas Mirize of HERI, who had before conspired to haue had had him betraied into the hands of the Turkish Generall, had now by force of mony and gifts enduced the wicked Eunuch thereunto. Others deemed it not to haue beene done without the priuitie of his father, as more desirous to preferre Abas Mirize his other sonne vnto the kingdome. Diuers others doe diuersly reason of the matter; so that to affirme of a certaintie, that thus or thus the death of so worthie a prince was procured, were great rashnesse: and therefore we leaue it, with the further processe of the Persian state, vnto the further discouerie of Time, the auntient mother of trueth.

Notwithstanding the league betwixt the Christian emperour Rodolph the second and Amurath the great Turke, many sharpe skirmishes oftentimes fell out betwixt the Christians and the Turks vpon the frontiers of their territories and dominions, especially in HVNGARIE, CROATIA, and STIRIA: as now in the latter end of this yeare 1586 in the moneth of December, the Turks after their insolent manner making an inrode into the borders of CROATIA, receiued a notable ouerthrow by the Christians, being in number much fewer: where amongst others the Bassa of BOSNA with his brother was slaine; whose head with certaine prisoners was sent to VIENNA to Ernestus Archduke of AVSTRIA, the emperours brother. This Bassa of BOSNA and his brother, slain in this conflict (as we haue said) are reported to haue bin the sonnes of Muhamet the late great Visier, by one of the daughters of Selymus the second, Amurath his sister. For diuers yeres following Amurath did no great matter worth the rememberance, contenting himselfe (as it should seeme) with that he had alreadie got from the Persians: and holding his league in some reasonable sort with the Christians: yet not so, but that many a bloodie broile tending at last euen to the breach of the league passed betwixt the Turkes and the Christians, which for the continuation of the historie we will briefely set downe, as they are vnto vs by the writers of our time reported.

1587 In Februarie the yeare following, which was the yeare 1587, the Christians prouoked by the often outrages of the Turkes, setting vpon the castle of KOPPAN, not farre from the lake of BABYLON, being then frozen, by good fortune surprised it. There was at that time in the castle three of the Turks Sanzacks, and about a thousand Turkes, of whom an hundred and ninetie of the better sort, with seuentie women, besides diuers of the meaner sort, fell into the hands of the Christians; the rest sauing themselues by flight, or by creeping into secret corners. An hundred horses for seruice were there taken also, and so much bootie as was esteemed to be worth fortie thousand duckats. Of the three Sanzackes that were there present, Alis Sanzacke of KOPPAN was taken, and brought first to VIENNA, and afterward presented to the emperour: Another of them standing vpon his defence in a vault vnder ground, was there smothered: The third escaped by flight, but was afterwards the same yeare taken, with diuers others, as shall be forthwith declared.

The castle of Koppan in Hungarie surprised by the Christians.

The eight of August following, foure of the Turks great commanders in HVNGARIE, viz. the Bassa of ZIGET, the Sanzackes of MOHAS, of QVINQVE ECCLESIÆ, and the new Sanzacke of KOPPAN, with fiue thousand souldiors brake into the borders of the Christians, and in most cruell manner destroyed seuenteen countrie villages about LIMBACH: carrying away with them

A them all the miſerable countrey people, with the ſpoyle of the countrey. Whereof George Countie Serinus (ſonne to that moſt valiant Countie Nicholas Serinus ſlaine at ZIGET) commander of the garriſon of CANISIA vnderſtanding, with as much ſpeed as was poſſible raiſed ſuch forces as he was able out of his territorie betwixt the riuers of Drauus and Mura: and calling vnto his aid the Countie Nadaſti, the Lo. Bathianius, and ſome other valiant captaines that had the charge of thoſe frontiers, with ſuch diligence tooke the ſtraits and paſſages wherby the Turkes muſt needs returne amongſt the mariſhes, that the Turkes comming backe againe that way with a very rich prey and many priſoners, being in the breake of the day hardly charged by thoſe moſt expert and reſolute ſoldiors, in thoſe ſtraight and troubleſome paſſages about a mile from CANISIA, were at lengh diſcomfited and put to flight; with ſuch a miſerable ſlaughter, that
B many of them yeelded vp their ſcimitars, pitifully crying for mercy; otherſome fled backe into the woods and forreſts, and many running headlong into the mariſhes, there periſhed, or ſticking faſt in the deepe mud, cried together for mercie and helpe of their enemies. In this conflict Mahamet the Sanzack of QVINQVE ECCLESIÆ (ſonne to Hali Baſſa ſlaine in the battell of LEPANTO) was taken priſoner. Sinan Beg Sanzacke of MOHAS, thinking to eſcape thorow the mariſh, ſtucke faſt with his horſe, and was ſhot through the head with a ſmall ſhot, and there died. The Baſſa of ZIGET with Chaſan the new Sanzacke of KOPPAN, ſeeing all deſperat and loſt, fled betimes out of the battell: but he of KOPPAN, wandring vp and down in the woods, was the next night after the battell, with others taken: the Baſſa of ZIGET almoſt ſpent with hunger & griefe of mind, eſcaped on foot ſeuen daies after to BRISENZA. There were taken of the Turks a thou-
C ſand three hundred, of whom many died afterwards of their wounds. In this battell there was ſlaine of the Turkes, with them that periſhed in the mariſhes and woods, about two thouſand: and of the Turkes horſes were taken aboue fifteene hundred. All the prey before taken by the Turks with the miſerable captiues, was againe recouered. The number of them that performed this notable ſeruice, was in all but fifteene hundred foot and fiue hundred horſe: of whom there was but eleuen ſlaine, but moſt of the reſt wounded. Foure hundred heads of the ſlaine Turkes were (after the manner of thoſe bordering ſouldiors) caried for ſhew to CANISIA, with fiue hundred priſoners. The Chriſtian ſouldiors with the helpe of the countrey people, ceaſed not for certain daies to hunt after the Turks that were fled into the woods, as after wild beaſts; of whom they found a great number: diuers others alſo ſeeing no meanes to eſcape, came forth of their D lurking places, and yeelded themſelues.

Amurath vnderſtanding of all theſe troubles that had ſo happened, commanded Aly the Baſſa of BVDA to be ſtrangled, for that he had broken the league, and not reſtrained the inſolencie of his Sanzacks, whom he might haue commanded: and in his ſtead placed Sinan Baſſa, whom before in diſgrace, he had now at the requeſt of his wife againe receiued into fauour, and reſtored to his former dignitie. About this time alſo, Sigiſmund (the king of SVVEDEN his ſonne) now after the death of king Stephen choſen king of POLONIA, and Maximilian the emperonrs brother reiected: euen in the beginning of his raign ſought to renew the league, which Stephen his predeceſſor and other the Polonian kings had before made with Amurath, and his predeceſſors the Turkiſh Sultans. And to that purpoſe writ vnto him as followeth.

Aly baſſa of Buda ſtrangled by the commandement of Amurath.

Sinan Baſſa againe receiued into fauour.

Sigiſmund the third, King of Polonia; vnto Amurath the third, Emperour of the Turks, ſendeth greeting.

The Almightie long keepe and preſerue your Maieſtie in health and honour. Moſt mightie prince, our beſt beloued friend and neighbour, after that wee by the grace and goodneſſe of God were choſen to gouerne the kingdome of POLONIA, and the embaſſadours of that kingdome had ſignified ſo much vnto vs: wee prouiding vs of neceſſaries, came to DANSKE the 18 of October, from whence wee ſend Iohn Zamogil our Secretarie, to giue your Maieſtie to vnderſtand of this our comming. For being told by the Polonian embaſſadours, that wee were choſen vnto the gouernment of that kingdome
F vpon condition, That according vnto the cuſtome of our predeceſſors the Polonian kings, wee ſhould keepe loue and friendſhip with the moſt excellent * Muſſulman emperours: we promiſe vnto your ſoueraigne Maieſtie, that wee are willing with the like or greater zeale and deuotion, to continue that amitie and friendſhip with your moſt excellent Maieſtie, and the Othoman emperours your ſucceſſours. For confirmation whereof, ſo ſoone as wee ſhall come vnto CRACOVIA, the regall citie of POLONIA, Sigiſmund the Polonian king his letter vnto Amurath.

* The Turks deſire to be called Muſſulman, which in their language ſignifieth a right beleeuer.

LONIA, and there bee crowned; wee will forthwith ſend our great embaſſadour vnto your maieſtie. G
In the meane time we moſt earneſtly requeſt your maieſtie, that our kingdome may on your maieſties behalfe reſt in ſafetie and peace: which we perſuade our ſelues you will eaſily grant. So wiſhing vnto you all health and happineſſe, we bid you farewell, from DANSKE the 18 of October, in the yeare 1587, and of our raigne the firſt.

Vnto which the kings requeſt and letters, Amurath not long after returned this anſwere in writing.

Amurath the third, Emperour of the Turkes, vnto Sigiſmund, King of POLONIA, greeting.

H

Amurath his anſwer vnto the letters of Sigiſmund.

I take it well, and as a token of your loue, that your Embaſſadour Iohn Zamogil came with your letters vnto our moſt high and glorious Court, the refuge of diſtreſſed princes: wherein you haue giuen vs to vnderſtand, how that in ſtead of the moſt excellent and famous king Stephen of worthy memorie, late king of POLONIA; you, deſcended of the ſame noble ſtocke and race of the Polonian kings, are by the free election of the whole State of the famous kingdome of POLONIA, and the great kingdome of LITHVANIA, choſen king of POLONIA: and being ſent for by lawfull embaſſadours, by the fauour and goodneſſe of God, to be come vnto the citie of DANSKE, and from thence to bee about to goe vnto CRACOVIA, the chiefe citie of the kingdome of POLONIA. And when you are there arriued, to ſend your great embaſſadour vnto our moſt high and glorious Court, to confirme, preſerue, and eſtabliſh the league and amitie commodious and neceſſarie for both our kingdomes, honoured and kept by I your auncient predeceſſours, with our grandfathers and great grandfathers; yea and that with greater zeale and deuotion than any your noble anneſtors. And therefore your embaſſadour in your name requeſteth, That no inuaſion on our behalfe be made into the borders of the kingdome of POLONIA, or any harme there done: and that the moſt noble Tartar prince Iſbam Gerai (whom God bleſſe) ſhould bee warned and reſtrained, that he neither make nor ſuffer any incurſion to bee made into the confines of the kingdome of POLONIA. All which things in your letters contained, with the reſt which your embaſſadour hath by word of mouth deliuered, are with ſpeed orderly by vs conceiued. Know you therefore our moſt ſtately and magnificent Court to be alwayes open vnto ſuch as reſort thereunto, and that from thence neuer man had repulſe, neither ſhall hereafter haue: wherefore it beſeemeth you, as ſoone as theſe our letters ſhall bee brought vnto you, to open your eyes, and to beware that nothing be on your part done againſt K
the maieſtie of our Court, and the league; and that our peace and amitie bee neither in much or little diſturbed, but as beſt beſeemeth, well and ſincerely kept: and ſo perſuade your ſelfe it ſhall on our part alſo be moſt inuiolatly obſerued. Our letters are alſo directed vnto the moſt excellent Tartar prince Iſbam Gerai, whom God bleſſe, ſtraightly charging and commanding him, not to make or ſuffer any incurſion to bee made into the borders of POLONIA. In briefe, the league and amitie ſhall on our part be religiouſly kept: and whoſoeuer ſhall preſume to doe any harme vnto the kingdome or confines of POLONIA, ſhall therefore without faile receiue from vs due puniſhment. So on your part alſo it is requiſite that the ſame bee done, and that in declaration of your loue, you forget not oftentimes to intimate vnto our moſt high and glorious Court, ſuch certaine occurrents and newes as ſhall happen in thoſe parts, which ſhall bee L vnto vs a ſigne of your ſincere loue and friendſhip. So know you, and giue credit vnto this our ſeale from CONSTANTINOPLE.

Neither was king Sigiſmund vnmindfull of this his promiſe before made for the ſending of his embaſſadour: but being poſſeſſed of the Polonian kingdome, ſent Chriſtopher Dziercius (his Secretary) embaſſador vnto Amurath for the confirming of the league: which he hath euer ſince ſo firmely kept with the Turke, as that he could neuer by any intreatie of the emperor, or of the princes electors, or others, or in reſpect of the common danger, be drawn into the fellowſhip of this long and religious war, ſo hardly maintained by the emperour, and ſome few other Chriſtian princes his confederats; firſt againſt Amurath whileſt he liued, and euer ſince againſt Mahomet his ſonne, which now raigneth: the iſſue whereof, God grant it proue not as well vnto the Polo- M nians as others farther off, in fine lamentable.

1588 Gonze taken by Ferat.

The yeare following, Ferat (yet the Turkes Generall in PERSIA) tooke the citie of GENOA, being before for feare of the Turks quite abandoned and forſaken by the inhabitants; who yet vpon his faith giuen for their ſafetie returned again, yeelding to pay vnto the Turke a yerely tribute

A bute of fiue thouſand duckats. But when he would haue gone farther into the enemies countrie, hauing part of his armie cut off by the way, hee was by his mutinous ſouldiors fouly intreated, wounded, and enforced to retire. Cicala Baſſa alſo paſſing ouer the riuer Euphrates, had in thoſe quarters diuers bloudie skirmiſhes with the Perſians, ſometime carrying away the better, and ſometime the worſe, as the fortune of the field ſerued. Vntill at length Amurath himſelfe, no leſſe wearie than his people of that long and chargeable warre, and the Perſian king alſo enclining to peace; he by the perſuaſion of Sinan Baſſa (but lately before receiued into fauour) was now contented to be entreated to hearken vnto the ſame: moued thereunto as well by reaſon of new troubles then in other places ariſing, as for the great famine & plague then raging in CONSTANTINOPLE. And conſidering withall what a great territorie he had woon from the Perſians,
B and how neceſſary it was for him by peace to confirme himſelfe in thoſe his new conqueſts, and by the building of certain ſtrong forts for the ſuccour of one another, and by the placing of his Timariots therein to aſſure the ſame vnto him: all which without peace hee could not poſſibly do, as the old Baſſa right wiſely told him. For which reaſons he yeelded to peace; and ſo embaſſadors paſſing too and fro, a peace was at length agreed vpon betwixt theſe two great Mahometan princes: the Turke couenanting to keep vnto himſelfe the places he had already gained, namely, TAVRIS, GENGE, SIRVAN, and CHARS, with all the profits thereof ariſing, for the maintenance of his garriſons and Timariots there. Whereof it was thought new ſtirs would eftſoones ariſe; the Turks grown inſolent of their late victories, being not able to content themſelues with
C the conditions of the league; and the Perſians not willing to liue in continual feare of the Turks, eſpecially ſeeing themſelues to be daily by them more and more oppreſſed; and withall doubting leaſt the Turkes after they had taken faſt footing in thoſe new conquered countries, and ſo growne ſtrong, and gotten better knowledge of the paſſages, ſhould (after their ambitious manner) ſeeke to poſſeſſe themſelues of the reſt; not keeping the couenants agreed vpon betwixt them, not at all regarding the capitulations of the league. Which was neuertheleſſe (as we ſaid) on both ſides for the ſpace of ten yeres orderly confirmed, with all due circumſtances and ceremonies in like occurrents by the great potentats of the world vſed: and for the more aſſurance thereof, one of the Perſian kings ſonnes (or as ſome others ſay, one of his nephewes) giuen vnto the Turks in hoſtage, as Amurath required.

D Theſe long warres thus ended, ſhortly after a great ſedition was raiſed at CONSTANTINOPLE by the ſouldiors of the Court, which returning out of PERSIA, with great inſolencie demanded their pay. For the ſatisfying of whom, by the conſent of the great Sultan himſelfe, the value of the coyne was enhaunſed; and a new kind of ſubſidie for leuying of money impoſed vpon the ſubiects in generall, none excepted: who ſtanding vpon their ancient liberties and priuiledges, refuſed to pay it, eſpecially the Ianizaries and other ſouldiors of the Court. Wherefore their Aga (or captaine) was commaunded to appeaſe them, and to perſwade them to pay the demaunded tribute: in attempting whereof he was in danger to haue been ſlaine by the inſolent Ianizaries, and yet neuertheleſſe for preuailing no more with them, was in diſpleaſure thruſt out of his office, and another placed in his roome, that ſhould haue married Amuraths daughter; of whom for all that the Ianizaries would not accept in any caſe, but threw ſtones at E him, and threatned to kill him. The next night a great fire aroſe in the citie, for the quenching whereof, the Ianizaries were commaunded (as their duetie was) to put to their helping hands: which they not only moſt obſtinatly refuſed to do, but alſo kept back others that brought water for the quenching therof, & together with the other ſouldiors of the court did what they might to make it burne the faſter. With the rage of this fire were conſumed ſeauen of their temples, fiue and twentie great Innes, fifteene thouſand houſes, with many warehouſes and ſhops. To appeaſe this dangerous ſtirre, and to preuent farther miſchiefe, commaundement was giuen to the Beglerbeg of GRÆCIA, and Dauid Paſſy a Iew, the firſt authors of this new impoſition, that they ſhould either gather the aforeſaid tribute by them deuiſed, and pay the ſoldiors, or by ſome
F other meanes to giue them contentment. But heere began the prieſts publikely to diſſwade the people from paiment of this new tribute, or any other ſuch like; perſuading them in any caſe to defend their auncient liberties and cuſtomes: whereupon the churches were by the prieſts ſhut vp, publike prayers for the health of the Sultan intermitted, the Baſſaes houſes aſſaulted, and all the citie on a new hurly burly. For the appeaſing whereof, Amurath was glad to yeeld vnto the Ianizaries, to pay the ſouldiors out of his owne treaſurie, to reuoke his mandates giuen out for the

the exaction of the new tribute, and to deliuer the two perſuaders thereof to the pleaſure of the Ianizaries; who drew them vp and down the ſtreets at horſes tailes, and afterwards cutting off their heads, in ſcorne toſſed them from hand to hand on to another, as if they had beene tenniſe balls. G

Sinan Baſſa of Buda inuadeth the vpper part of Hungarie.

About the latter end of September Sinan Baſſa of BVDA hauing with the aſſiſtance of the Sanzacks about FILLE, raiſed an armie of eleuen thouſand ſouldiors, with purpoſe to haue ſpoiled all the vpper part of HVNGARIE, came the ſixt of October before the caſtle of PVTNOC, and gaue therunto ſummons: but finding them in the caſtle better prouided and more reſolute than he had before ſuppoſed, he departed thence, and paſſing the riuer Sqhayo, came to SIXO, a town of about fiue hundred houſes, which after a ſore batterie hee tooke, and burnt it downe to the ground. In the meane while Claudius Ruſſell, Generall for the warres in that part of HVNGARIE, H hauing aſſembled his forces, came vpon him, and after an hard fight put him to the worſe, when he had ſlaine of his Turks about two thouſand fiue hundred, beſides three hundred other drowned in the riuer Schayo. Shortly after, the Chriſtians in like maner breaking into the frontiers of the Turks, tooke from them the caſtles of BLAVENSTIEN, GESTES, with ſome other ſmall forts thereabouts in the vpper part of HVNGARIE.

1589 Sinan for that he had contrarie to the league, and without commandement from Amurath, ſo vnfortunatly attempted warre in HVNGARIE, was the next yeare in great diſpleaſure ſent for to CONSTANTINOPLE, and Ferat Baſſa of BOSNA (late Generall of the Turks armie againſt the Perſians, and now but newly come home) placed in his roome at BVDA.

Amurath before not ignorant of the great preparation that Philip the king of SPAINE had made, I and of the inuincible Armado (as it was tearmed) by him ſet forth for the inuaſion of ENGLAND (the fame whereof had long before filled a great part of the world;) as alſo of the euill ſucceſſe thereof the laſt yeare, viz. 1588; and of the purpoſe her Maieſtie of ENGLAND had for the troubling of his rich trade, eſpecially into the Weſt Indies, and for the relieuing of Don Anthonio, by him driuen out of PORTINGALL: writ vnto her about this time concerning thoſe and ſuch like matters as had been mooued by her Agent as followeth.

Nicholaus Reuſnerus epiſt. Turcic. lib. 12. pag. 42.

Amurath his letters vnto the Queen of England.

Amurath the third, Emperour of the Turkes, vnto Elizabeth, Queene of ENGLAND, FRANCE, and IRELAND, greeting. K

Moſt honourable Matrone of the Chriſtian Religion, mirrour of chaſtitie, adorned with the brightneſſe of ſouereignetie and power amongſt the moſt chaſte women of the people which ſerue Ieſu, Miſtris of great kingdomes, reputed of greateſt maieſtie and praiſe among the Nazarites, Elizabeth queene of ENGLAND, to whom wee wiſh a moſt happie and proſperous raigne. You ſhall vnderſtand by our high and imperiall letters directed vnto you, how that your Oratour reſiant in our ſtately and magnificent Court, hath preſented vnto the throne of our Maieſtie a certaine writing, wherein hee hath certified vs, how that about foure yeares agoe you haue made warre vpon the King of SPAINE, for the abating and breaking of his forces, wherewith hee threateneth all other Chriſtian princes, and purpoſeth to make himſelfe the ſole Monarch both of them and all the world beſide: as alſo how that the ſame King of SPAINE hath by force taken from Don Anthonio, lawfully created king of PORTINGALL, his L kingdome: and that your intention is, that his ſhips which goe and come into the Indies, may from henceforth bee embarred and ſtaied from that nauigation: wherein are yearely brought into SPAINE, pretious ſtones, ſpices, golde, and ſiluer, eſteemed worth many millions, wherewith the aforeſaid king as with a great treaſure enriched, hath meanes to moleſt and trouble all other Chriſtian princes: which if hee ſhall ſtill proceed to do, hee will make himſelfe daily ſtronger and ſtronger, and ſuch an one as may not eaſily bee weakened. After that your aforeſaid Oratour requeſted our Highneſſe in the beginning of the next Spring to ſend out our imperiall fleet againſt him, being aſſured that the king of SPAINE could not bee able eaſily to withſtand it, for that hee had now alreadie receiued a great ouerthrow by your fleet: and being ſcarce able to withſtand you alone, if hee ſhould be on diuers parts inuaded, muſt needs bee ouercome, to the great benefit of all the Chriſtian princes, as alſo of our imperiall ſtate. Beſides this, M that whereas the aforeſaid Don Anthonio is by force driuen out, and depriued of his kingdome, that wee (to the imitation of our noble Progenitours of happie memorie; whoſe graues the Almightie lighten) ſhould alſo giue the ayd and ſuccour of our magnificent ſtate, as did they vnto all ſuch as had recourſe vnto their high Courts and pallaces for reliefe. In briefe, all theſe things, with many others,

A which your aforesaid Oratour hath at large declared vnto our emperiall throne, we haue well vnderstood, and laied them vp in our deepe remembrance. But for as much as we for many yeares past haue made warres in PERSIA, with a full resolution and intent vtterly to conquere and subdue the kingdome of that accursed Persian heretike, and to ioyne the same vnto our auncient dominions; and now by the grace of God, and helpe of our great Prophet, are now vpon the point for the satisfying of our desire: that once done, due prouision shall bee assigned vnto all such things as you haue of vs requested or desired. Wherefore if you shall sincerely and purely continue the bond of amitie and friendship with our high Court, you shall finde no more secure refuge or safer harbour of good will or loue. So at length all things shall goe well and according to your hearts desire in your warres with SPAINE, vnder the shaddow of our happie throne. And for as much as the king of SPAINE hath by fraud and deceit got whatsoeuer he hol-
B deth, without doubt these deceitfull deceiuers shall by the power of God in short time bee dispatched and taken out of the way. In the meane time wee exhort you not to loose any opportunitie or time, but to bee alwaies vigilant, and according to the conuentions betwixt vs, fauourable vnto our friends, and vnto our enemies a foe. And giue notice here to our high Court of all the new warres which you shall vnderstand of concerning the said king of SPAINE, for the behoofe both of your selfe and vs. To bee briefe, your embassadour after he had with all care and diligence dispatched his embassage, and heere left in his place one Edward Bardon his Deputie and Agent, now by our leaue maketh his returne towards your kingdome, being for the good and faithfull seruice he here did, worthie to be of you esteemed, honoured, and before others promoted: who when hee hath obtained of you all those his deserued honours and preferments, let him or some other principall embassadour without delay bee appointed to our emperiall Court, to continue
C this office of legation. This wee thought good to haue you certified of vnder our most honourable Seale, whereunto you may giue vndoubted credence. From our imperiall pallace at CONSTANTINOPLE *the 15 of the blessed moneth * Ramazan* 1589. * September.

Yet for all these faire shewes it may seeme vnto him that looketh more neere into the state of the Turkish affaires at those times, and that which hath ensued since, that Amurath glad of the discord of these two so great Christian princes, and not yet well assured of his new conquests in PERSIA, had no great mind to the inuasion of SPAINE, as too farre from the strength of his empire, an enterprise not to be so easily managed by sea, as were the warres hee shortly after vndertooke against the Christian emperour Rodolph by land: wherewith for all that (God be thanked)
D he found his hands ful all the remainder of his life, as hath his sonne Mahomet that now raigneth after him, euen vnto this day.

About this time also the Polonian borderers (whom they call Cossackes) a rough and warlike kind of people, after their wonted manner making an inrode vpon the Turkes and Tartarians, vpon the sudden surprised KOSLAVV, a port towne within a daies iourney of CAFFA, where they had the spoile of many rich warehouses of the Turkes marchants, and the rifling of certain ships lying there in harbour; and hauing taken their pleasure, burnt the rest, and so with a great bootie returned to their lurking places. With which iniury the Tartars prouoked, & set on by the Turks to the number of fortie thousand brake into PODOLIA, and the prouinces neere vnto POLONIA, and resting in no place, but burning the country before them, slew the poore country peo-
E ple without mercie; and making hauocke of all that they light vpon, beside the spoile, carried away with them many thousands of most miserable captiues: the greatest part whereof for all that, the Polonians rescued, with the notable slaughter of the enemie, surprised in his returne. Whereupon such vnkindnesse rise between the Turkish emperour and Sigismund the Polonian king, that it was thought it would haue broken out out into open warres, had not the Polonian by his embassadors, and the mediation of the Queen of ENGLAND wisely appeased the angrie Turke, and so againe renewed his league.

The Polonian Cossacks inuade the Tartarians and Turkes.

Amurath now at peace with the world, from which he by nature abhorred not, and sitting idle and melancholy at home, was perswaded by the Bassaes his counsellors to take some new warre in hand. For that great empires (as they said) could not without the continual vse of armes long
F stand or continue: as appeared by the Romane state, which so long as it was at wars with CARTHAGE, or their great captaines and commaunders occupied in armes against their neighbour princes, still remained triumphant, and commanded ouer a great part of the world; but giuing it selfe to ease and pleasure, and the martiall men not after their wonted manner employed, it in short time by ciuil discord fell, and of the mistresse of the world became it selfe a prey euen vnto the the baſeſt nations. Which old Cato in his great wiſdome foreſeeing, cried out in the Senat, That G the ſouldiors and men of warre were to be kept ſtill buſied in armes farre from home; for that in ſo doing, all ſhould goe well with the ſtate, and the glorie thereof encreaſe. Wherunto the Otho- man emperors, his noble progenitors, hauing reſpect, propounded not peace as the end of their warres (as do other weak princes, hauing their own forces in diſtruſt) but as inuincible conque-rours ſtill ſowed warres vpon warres, making one victorie the beginning of another: whereby they not onely brought that their empire vnto that greatnes it was now of, but by ſuch continuall employment made their ſouldiors more couragious and readie, and alſo kept them from rebellions and tumults: whereunto, in time of peace and liuing at eaſe, theſe martiall men are moſt commonly enclined, learning (as all others doe by doing nothing) to doe that is euill and nought. Euery thing (as they ſaid) was by the ſame meanes to be maintained, whereby it was at H the firſt encreaſed: and that therefore great empires as they were by warres begun and augmented, ſo were they by continuall wars alſo to be from time to time eſtabliſhed; whereas otherwiſe the ſouldiors liuing in peace, and forgetting their martiall proweſſe, would for moſt part grow cowardly, as giuing themſelues ouer to the loue of their owne dwellings, of their wiues, and of their children, & other pleaſures; or els conuerting their ſtudies vnto marchandiſe or other profitable trades, would in time forget the vſe of armes, and be thereunto againe hardly drawn: vnto the great weakening of his ſtrength both by ſea and land, and the deminiſhing of the number of his great commanders and expert captaines, not to be had without the continuall vſe of warre.

With theſe and ſuch like reaſons, the great Baſſaes of the Court perſuaded Amurath, That he muſt of neceſſitie take ſome new expedition in hand, and not to ſuffer his valiant ſouldiours, but I now lately returned out of Persia, to grow laſie or inſolent for lacke of employment. Which they did not ſo much for the loue of their prince, or zeale vnto the State, as for their own particular profit, eſpecially the two old Baſſaes Sinan and Ferrat, the enuious competitors the one of the others honour: who although they both much and almoſt all commaunded both in peace and warre, yet was their honours greater, and their profit farre more in commaunding of the Turkes great armies abroad, than in ſitting in the Diuano at home: vnto which no leſſe honourable than profitable preferment they both with like ambition aſpired, accompanied with the hot deſires of their great and many fauourites both at home and elſewhere. Theſe perſuaſions well pleaſed Amurath, who although he were himſelfe no ſouldior, yet was he deſirous of new conqueſts, and to encreaſe his name: accounting it no leſſe honour vnto himſelfe by his ſeruants K at his appointment to performe great things, that it was vnto his auncеſtours to doe that they
The cauſes why Amurath would not ſuddenly reſolue vpon war. did themſelues in perſon. But in this ſo ſerious a matter, and of ſo great conſequench, Amurath at the firſt could not tell what beſt to reſolue vpon; not for that he was nor deſirous of warres, but becauſe as yet certainely knew not againſt whom hee might with greateſt profit, and leaſt difficulty and danger conuert his forces. vpon which point his counſellors agreed not, but for diuers reaſons were of diuers opinions. Which for as much as they containe matters of greateſt importance of all things then in the world done, but eſpecially concerning the profit of the Chri-ſtian commonweale, I ſhall not thinke it vnworth my labour to ſet them downe in ſuch order as I find them credibly reported: hauing moreouer in them many ſecrets and moſt weighty matters not yet come to all mens knowledge: as alſo opening the deuices of the Turkiſh tyrant a- L gainſt the Chriſtian princes; a motiue not onely for them to ioyne in counſell together how to withſtand him, but for the common Chriſtian commonweales ſake to forget and forgiue all their priuat diſpleaſures, and with their vnited forces and power honorably and couragiouſly to make warre vpon him, and ſo at length by the mercie of God to ouerthrow him, together with his tyrannicall empire, the greateſt terrour of our time.

Eight ſeuerall opinions of the Viſier Baſſaes concerning the warre to be taken in hand.

The great Baſſaes concerning the intended warre were of eight ſundrie opinions: whereof the firſt was, That the warres againſt the Perſian ſhould be renewed: the ſecond, for the inuaſion of the king of Morocco and Fes: the third, for warre to bee taken in hand againſt the king of Spaine: the fourth, for the beſieging againe of Malta: the fifth, was to ſet vpon the Venetians: the ſixt, for the inuading of ſome part of Italie: the ſeuenth, for the king of Polonia: M the eight and laſt was, for warre to be made vpon the emperour and the kingdome of Hvngarie. With all the which aforeſaid princes, except the Spaniard, although the Turke were then in league, and could not with all or any of them make warre, without the notable breach of his faith and honour: yet was that neuer made queſtion or ſcruple of, but only, Which might beſt

ſtand

A ſtand with the profit of his ſtate for him to ſet vpon: his barbarous law allowing him that libertie, for the more aſſuring of his ſtate or inlarging of his empire, to breake all faith and promiſe eſpecially with the Chriſtians; not more in any thing to be pitied, than in repoſing any credit or confidence in the faith of ſuch a miſcreant.

The firſt opinion and reaſons of thē that would haue the wars renewed in Perſia.

The reaſons the great Baſſaes alleadged for the renewing of the Perſian warre, were, For that the Perſian king was of himſelfe like to breake the league ſo lately with him concluded, ſo ſoone as he ſhould know the Turkes entangled in any other warre; moued thereunto, as well for the recouerie of his countrey to his great diſhonour loſt, as alſo in reuenge of ſo many and ſo great iniuries to him of late done by the Turkiſh emperours. Beſide that, the Chriſtian princes would perſuade him and prick him forward thereunto: eſpecially the Spanyard, who for the
B neereneſſe of INDIA might without his great charge procure him ſo to doe, and alſo conueniently furniſh him with great ordinance and canoniers, which it was well knowne he of late did. The countries alſo but lately conquered, were not yet (as they ſaid) in quietneſſe or ſafetie, and the fortreſſes therein but of late built, together with the garriſons therein, to be in great danger, being for the length of the way and difficultie of the paſſage, not to be ſtill ſpeedily relieued: inſomuch, that if the Perſians did them no other harme, but onely to forrage and waſt the countrey about them, they ſhould bring the inhabitants into ſuch diſtreſſe, as that thoſe new conquered countries were againe by the defendants to be forſaken, or elſe they muſt themſelues with hunger periſh. True glorie (they ſaid) conſiſted not ſo much in conquering, as in the vſe of the C conqueſt, and the proſecution of the happie victorie: and that therefore Amurath ſhould take heed, that he prouoked not the wrath and indignation of the Great prophet Mahomet againſt him; who hauing by his good fauour and guide obtained mo victories than any of his predeceſſours againſt the enemies of his religion, ought as a religious and deuout prince ſeuerely to reuenge the wrong by them done both to God and man. Vnto which religious warre Vsbeg Han the Tartar king, as alſo the prince of GEILAN offered their readie helpe: as for the euent of the victorie now as good as in his hand, he was to iudge by the ſucceſſe of his former warres. Neither that he need to feare the Perſian horſemen, although they vſed Arabian horſes, being by his men many times ſhamefully put to flight: or yet to doubt leaſt the Georgians in fauour of the Perſians ſhould take vp armes, for that many of them were alreadie vnder his obeiſance, and D ſubiect vnto the Baſſa of TEFLIS and other his commaunders; the reſt were his vaſſals, or elſe ſuch as following the fortune of their princes, Simon and Alexander, ſought after no greater matter, but contenting themſelues with their owne countrey, although but ſmall, thought themſelues well if they might keepe and defend the ſame; by nature and ſituation ſo ſtrong, as that there is ſcarce any way vnto it, by reaſon of the high and broken mountaines, the thicke woods, and ſtrait paſſages.

The ſecond opinion for making of war vpō the king of Fez and Morocco & the reaſon thereof.

The ſecond opinion which was deliuered, was for the tranſportation of his warres into AFFRICKE againſt the king of MOROCCO, commonly called the Seriphe: and that for theſe cauſes moſt, It would be a great ſhame and reproach (as they ſaid) vnto the Othoman empire, that it was not yet able to ſubdue theſe Moores and people of AFFRICKE, in number but few: neither was it leſſe ſhame or diſhonour vnto the Othoman emperours, to haue ſo ſmall a territorie
E in AFRICA, being the third part of the world, which by reaſon of the neereneſſe vnto ITALIE, had long time held wars with the Romans. Beſide that, ALGIERS and TVNES could neuer be ſafely kept by the Turks; neither that the ſubiects & pyrats which inhabited thoſe cities would euer be content or at quiet, vntill they had againe got that kingdome into their hands. The promontorie of AGVERO and port of LARACE (two ports without the ſtraits) were (as they ſaid) to be taken, as places very commodious for the Turks friends, ſeeking in thoſe ſeas after bootie, and for the ſecuring of their trade. And although the Seriphe were himſelfe a Mahometane, and held his kingdome as a tributarie vnto the Othoman empire; yet had he ſecret intelligence with the Spaniard and the knights of MALTA, whereby they not long ſince had vpon the ſudden al-F moſt ſurpriſed TRIPOLIS, he in the meane time as it were winking thereat. And that although the Spaniard poſſeſſed in AFFRICKE, MARASCHEBIR, ORAN, PEGNON, TANGER, ARZILIA, MAZAGA, CEVTE or SEPTA, places whereby he might helpe and aſſiſt the Moores; yet might his force and attempts by a ſtrong fleet be eaſily hindred, and SPAINE it ſelfe infeſted. Beſide that, the *S*paniards had yet in ſuch freſh remembrance the loſſe of TVNES, GVLETTA (places by them thought inexpugnable, and yet by Sinan Baſſa to his immortall praiſe taken)

ken) as that they would not for the Moores ſake eaſily ſeeme to attempt any thing againſt the Turks.. G

The third opinion concerning the conqueſt of Malta.

The third opinion was concerning the war to be made againſt them of MALTA, which was by a ſtrong fleet to be performed: for that the gallies of MALTA did daily great hurt, as well vnto the Turks merchants, as vnto ſuch as for deuotion ſake trauelled by ſea vnto MECHA. And that therefore the war was thither to be transferred, not onely for religions ſake and to aſſecure the paſſage thither from the incurſions of the Malteſes, but in reuenge of the old and late iniuries by them done; and eſpecially to blot out the infamie and diſgrace which the Great Sultan Solyman had incurred, at ſuch time as he had in vaine beſieged that iſland, & to requite the loſſe by him there ſuſtained. Beſide that, they alſo alledged the common complaints of the ſubiects: for that there were many which pitiouſly lamented the miſerie and calamitie, ſome of their H friends, ſome their kinsfolk, whom they knew to liue in moſt woful ſeruitude with thoſe knights, and whom they moſt earneſtly deſired to haue now ſet at libertie: complaining, his ſubiects to haue bin ſo far from ſuffering of any ſuch things from thoſe knights in the time of his anceſtors, as that contrariwiſe they themſelues were by them driuen out of the iſland of the RHODES, the ſtrongeſt bulwarke of the Chriſtian common-weale toward the Eaſt. Being moreouer worthie alſo to be chaſtiſed, for that they had holpen the rebellious Moores with all kind of munition, and had themſelues attempted to haue ſurpriſed MODON.

The fourth opinion for war to be made againſt the K. of Spaine, and the reaſons thereof.

In the fourth place were they which were of opinion, that it were beſt for him to make warre vpon the king of SPAINE. Theſe men alleadged it to be impoſſible for the Turkiſh empire to aſpire vnto the Monarchie of the whole world (whereunto all the Turks actions and deuiſes I were alwaies as at a certain marke directed) except the Spaniard his great ſtrength and power were firſt weakned, wherein he ſeemed to ſurpaſſe all other the Chriſtian kings and princes: and that there was no feare leaſt he ſhould beſiege ALGIERS, which he knew to be now much better fortified than it was in the time of the emperour Charles the fifth. And that although the Spaniards without ceaſing beſought their king for the vndertaking of that expedition, by reaſon of the new loſſes and harmes which they daily receiued from the pyrats of AFRICA; yet would he not hearken vnto their requeſt, for feare of the danger imminent both to himſelfe & his ſubiects from the enemies fleet, which he ſhould in ſo doing draw into the Spaniſh ſeas: neither would the Spaniſh gallies eaſily come into the Turkes countries in the Eaſt, for being too farre from their owne countrie, which for the moſt part ſtood in need of their helpe. And that the king of K SPAINE was with the multitude of his buſineſſe, or other his vrgent affaires ſtill ſo hindred, as that he could not ſuddenly put in execution what his counſell for the wars ſhould decree. As alſo how much it was to be gathered by that which happened not long ſince at PREVEZA and NAVARINVM, That the Spaniards ſhunned the Othoman forces: as alſo how warily the king delt in all his affaires, leaſt at length againſt his will he ſhould be enforced to enter into warres with the Turke, was moſt manifeſt; as was to be ſeene when as of late about the end of the Perſian warre, he refuſed to giue aide vnto the Perſian king whom he might haue holpen, and was ſo before wont to do. And in caſe that he would ſtand vpon his guard, and by force ſeeke to repell force; yet ſhould he ſcarce haue ſo much ſtrength as (beſide thoſe wars which he now maketh in diuers places) to be able to vndertake alſo a new warre, and to find ſo many ſouldiors, with ſo L much coine and other things neceſſarie for ſo great a war. It ſtood him in hand (as they ſaid) to defend the low countries, and to recouer againe the prouinces their loſt, which of themſelues wonderful ſtrong, both by reaſon of the ſea and the multitude of the riuers, were alſo with wonderfull courage and pertinacie defended by the inhabitants, for there libertie and religions ſake. Whereunto the Engliſh (at deadly hatred with the Spaniard) might many waies giue great helpe, if they ſhould inuade PORTINGAL, or with their ſhips lie in wait for his Indian fleet, or make incurſions into other his kingdomes, as they did not long ſince at the GROINE and CADEZ; places moſt fit to trouble SPAINE, and to hinder his traffique into the Indies or other places. Beſide that, he was at that time ſo intangled with his warres in FRANCE, as that he could ſcarce find how to diſpatch himſelfe therof, without the loſſe of his honour and credit. And ad- M mit he ſhould make peace with the aforſaid princes, in ſuch ſort as that he ſhould not frō thence forth from them receiue any harme; yet were other means to be ſought & taken in hand for his farther diſturbance; as by troubling his rich trade for ſpices & other merchandiſe, wherof he receiueth great profit; as alſo if need were, by driuing his ſhips out of the Perſian gulfe, by the help

A of thoſe gallies which ſtill lie at rode at POSSIDIVM, which we now call SVZ. And that the fortreſſes and ſtrong holds he there poſſeſſeth, were to be ſet vpon, and if it might be taken from him; as was once attempted againſt the Portingals at DIV and ORMVZ: the like whereof Alfonſus Albuquercius (the king of PORTINGAL his viceroy in INDIA) attempted, when as with his light horſemen running through that countrie, he thought vpon a ſudden to haue ſpoyled MECHA, and to haue robbed the Sepulchre of Mahomet (as had happened vnder the empire of the Sultans) and as Traian the emperour had long ſince in like manner attempted to rage and ſpoyle. Thoſe places which he poſſeſſed in AFFRICKE were (as they ſaid) to bee ſet vpon, and the coaſt of SPAINE towards the Mediterranean to bee infeſted: ſo at length to gratifie the Moores his ſubiects, who ſtill inſtantly requeſted the ſame, that ſo they might more ſafely traffique and trauell, and that ſo the Moores might at length be deliuered from the imperious command of the Spaniards: of which exploit Sultan Selymus lately before dead, was in his life time well perſuaded; but might now at this time be much more commodiouſly done, for that the Mooriſh nation was now greatly increaſed, and much oppreſſed by the Spaniards; and hauing got great wealth by the trade of merchandiſe, euen by nature or religion had conceiued a mortall hatred againſt the Spaniards: whereunto might not a little auaile the ports in AFFICKE, where into the Turkes fleet might at all times in ſafetie retire. And in briefe, that which was of greateſt importance to the better ſucceſſe of this war, the French king and the queene of ENGLAND, had of their owne accord promiſed the continuation of their wars, and that the French king ſhould inuade NAVARRE, and by force of armes recouer the right he pretended vnto that kingdome; whileſt in the meane time, the queene of ENGLAND ſhould not only trouble him in the Weſt Indies, and other places of the Ocean towards the North and the Weſt, but might alſo ſtir vp new broiles in the kingdome of PORTINGALE, where moſt part of the people with great impatiencie beare the prowd commaund of the Spaniard: as perſuaded (& that truly) all their proſperitie and quietnes to haue been loſt, togither with their laſt king their true and lawfull ſoueraigne. For he at peace with the kings of FRANCE and ENGLAND, exceedingly thereby enriched his ſubiects by traffick: whereas ſince they fell into the hands of the Spaniard, they daily complaine of their new loſſes and dangers by reaſon of his perpetuall wars. Moreouer, that there was to be found great ſtore of exiled Spaniards diſperſed here and there, which being malecontent and wearie of the Spaniſh gouernment, were fled not only out of PORTINGAL, but euen out of ARAGON & other parts of his kingdome: which now liuing in FRANCE, ENGLAND, and CONSTANTINOPLE, both ſecretly and openly liberally offered great helps: the like whereof many of the Moores alſo promiſed. All which togither ſeemed to promiſe a moſt eaſie expedition and certaine victorie, if any ſhould vpon the ſudden inuade SPAINE; for that there was almoſt no vſe of armes, the inhabitants at home ſeldome times exerciſing themſelues therein: neither in places needfull hauing any ordinarie garriſons, and but few horſes fit for ſeruice. And that in fine it was to be conſidered, SPAINE to be greatly bared of men which knew how valiantly and couragiouſly to mannage armes, for the often choiſe they make of them, which almoſt moſt daily tranſported into the Indies, ITALIE, and the low countries, whereby the ſtrength of his countrie muſt needs be exceedingly impaired: ſo that if they ſhould be inuaded with any ſtrong and mightie armie, they might ſeeme hardly able to be holpen or defended by their owne people, but ſhould need of the aid and help of the other neere prouinces ſubiect vnto this kingdom: which if they ſhould be either letted, or ſtay to come in good time, they ſhould leaue ſo much the more eaſie victorie vnto their enemies.

In the fift place were they which went about to perſuade Amurath to breake his league with the Venetians, vſing reaſons rather probable than true; although they might ſeeme vnto the Turks leſſe doubtfull, for that men eaſily and willingly beleeue ſuch things as they themſelues deſire. Theſe men went about to proue no expedition to be of leſſe difficultie than this, as iudging of things preſent by the euent of former warres paſſed; wherin the Turks had alwaies taken ſomething from the Venetians: who to redeeme their peace, were diuers waies enforced to ſatisfie the Turkes. That the Venetian common-weale was affraid of the Turks and abhorred war, was manifeſt they ſaid in that, that in all actions it had propounded vnto it ſelfe peace, as the end thereof; and after the manner of their anceſtors, neuer entred into wars, but enforced thereunto: and would happily vpon the firſt denouncing of warres, willingly depart with certaine places for feare of greater harme, or to be vtterly ouercome, as it appeared they did in the yeelding yeelding vp of CYPRVS. The power and forcewhereof was not ſo great,as that it could alone ſtand againſt the great Sultan: and to confederat it ſelfe with others,would require no ſmall delay,for the great and many difficulties which commonly vſed to ariſe in making of leagues;not being now ſo conioined with the Spaniard as in times paſt,of whoſe aid it being of late deſtitut, was conſtrained to make an hard peace with Selymus. And if ſo be the Spaniard would needs ioyne himſelfe vnto the Venetians againſt the Turkes, yet that he could by no meanes affourd vnto them ſuch aid and ſupplies as were of neceſſitie to be required vnto ſo great a war,he himſelfe being in his warres otherwiſe ſo intangled: as for all other confederation they could make without him,to be but weake and to no purpoſe. That which the Pope could do herein to be but little: for albeit he ſhould according to his duetie exhort other Chriſtian princes to giue aid,and to ſtirre them vp vnto this warre, yet that beſide ſome little ſupplie of mony hardly drawne out of his owne coffers and the eccleſiaſticall reuenues,he could ſcarcely performe any thing more; or when he had done his vttermoſt deuoire, could but ioyne fiue gallies of his owne vnto the Venetian fleet: which with the gallies of the duke of SAVOY,of the knights of MALTA,and of the Florentines, could but make a fleet of ſome twentie gallies,which was but a ſmall matter. Beſides that the Turks were perſuaded,that betwixt the Venetian ſtate and the other Chriſtian princes was no ſuch friendſhip and good agreement, as the greatneſſe of the imminent danger of that war,and as the neceſſitie of the cauſe would require: and that hitherto their treaſures had bin ſo exhauſted in paying the debt they were run into in the laſt war,and in building of fortreſſes,that happily they were not now ſo furniſhed with coyne,as was requiſit for the defraying of ſo great a war. And vnto this war againſt the Venetians, conſented almoſt all the Viſier Baſſaes, differing only in this, Where or againſt what place of the Venetian territorie this war were to be firſt begun: ſome naming one place,and ſome another (for diuers reaſons them thereunto leading) which for breuitie we paſſe ouer. G H I

The ſixt opinion for the attempting of Italie, and the reaſons thereof.

Otherſome of the Baſſaes in the ſixt place, reiecting all the former opinions concerning the warre to be taken in hand,would haue had all the forces of the Othoman empire,as well by land as ſea, to haue beene conuerted againſt ITALIE: for that otherwiſe the Turkes ſhould neuer come vnto the Monarchie of the whole would (whereunto as at a marke they had directed all their actions) except they did firſt ſubdue ITALIE. For that this countrie, as the centre of the whole world,was wont to giue both counſell and aid vnto the reſt of the limbes,whereby the deuices of others were croſſed: and that the Romanes had at length commaunded ouer all the world,eſpecially for that they held in poſſeſſion this countrey. Hereat did the Hunnes, the Alani and Gothes, the Vandales, the Frenchmen, Spaniards, and Saraſins, direct all their thoughts and cogitations. In fine they concluded, That no expedition could be taken in hand more honourable or profitable than this: for that ITALIE was as a queene amongſt other prouinces,for commodious ſituation, the wholeſomeneſſe of the aire,the plentie of all things neceſſarie for mans life,for great, faire, and moſt rich cities, for the auncient glorie and maieſtie of the Romane empire,and many other cauſes alſo. Neither that this expedition was to be deemed of much difficultie, for that ITALIE was vnder the rule of diuers princes, vnto whoſe commaund moſt of their ſubiects vnwillingly obeyed: as alſo for that the inhabitants of that countrie had now for many yeares liued in continuall peace, and were therefore the more effeminate and fearefull,and ſo vnfit for the warres: and that if that expedition were in one or diuers places taken in hand before the corne were full ripe,the Turks in that ſo fruitfull a countrie could neuer want neceſſaries for them to liue vpon; whereas the inhabitants in great number wanting the ſame,and ſhut vp within the wals and fortifications of their cities and ſtrong towns,ſhould be brought into extreame wants: which was the more euidently to bee ſeene, for that at this time wherein they were at peace, they had not corne ſufficient in the countrie for ſuch a multitude of people to liue vpon, but were glad to haue it brought vnto them from other places,eſpecially from PELOPONESVS, CONSTANTINOPLE, and the cities vpon the coaſt of the great Ocean. Furthermore,that it was to be conſidered,that moſt part of the Italians liued by no other meanes than by their handie labour,or the trade of merchandiſe; of which meanes if they were depriued,they ſhould in ſhort time be brought to that point,as to be glad to accept of ſuch conditions as the victor ſhould propound vnto them,or as tributaries to ſubmit themſelues vnto the Othoman gouernment. Neither that the ſouldiors would vnwillingly be drawne vnto that war; for that they were not to paſſe through barren regions of the enemie,froſen with yſe,or deſolat, K L M

A either by rough woods or inacceſſible mountains; but were all the way thither to trauel through their owne countrie, and as it were in the ſight of their own houſes: and if the Turks could oftentimes enter ſo far, when as they had their confines more remote, and their paſſages more difficult, that the ſame might now much more eaſily be effected, when as they had a far greater opportunitie, and their enemies ſo neere at hand.

The ſeuenth opinion for war to be made againſt the Polonian, and the reaſons thereof.

The ſeuenth opinion was theirs, which thought it beſt to haue the war transferred into Polonia, and from thence into Hvngaria and Germanie: for which they alleadged theſe reaſons, Firſt, for that they thought it a diſgrace vnto the maieſtie & reputation of the Othoman empire, That the king of Polonia had ſometime refuſed to pay his tribute due (for ſo the Turks account of all ſuch preſents as are vnto their Sultan vſually ſent by their neighbor princes, of courteſie) & that therefore he was by force of armes to be compelled therunto. Which they thought B would the more eaſily be obtained, for that there was much ſecret hatred and heart-burning amongſt the Polonian nobilitie. Neither that it would be any difficult or dangerous war to bee taken in hand: for as much as Polonia was confined with Moldavia, the Tartars, and the Sanzacks of Acherman, Bendera, and Vosia: and moreouer, for that the Turks could neuer haue any aſſured or full poſſeſſion of Moldavia or Valachia, except the inſolencie of the Polonians were repreſſed; the Vayuods of which countries, when they had enriched themſelues with much wealth, vſed ſtil to flie into the kingdome of Polonia. Beſides that, they ſhould thereby reuenge themſelues for the iniuries done them by the Coſſackes, and haue more free and ſafe trafficke into Mvscovie, and bring a terrour vpon the duke of Mvscovie, by reaſon of the C nighneſſe of the countrie: which great duke was an impediment vnto the Othoman emperour, that he conquered not the whole kingdome of Persia. And when they had by this meanes by little and little drawne vnto Germanie, happily it might ſo come to paſſe, as that the Chriſtian emperor ſhould thereby receiue ſome notable loſſe, his empire being ſtill more and more expoſed and enuironed with the Turks forces & garriſons. Polonia they ſaid to be a plaine & open countrie, neither to haue any ſtrong places for to withſtand them, and the inhabitants to haue ſmall skill in martiall affaires, for that they had now long liued in peace. For as for the war that they had with Maximilian the Archduke of Avstria, it continued not long: and king Stephen in the late wars he had with the Muſcouite, vſed for moſt part the Hungarian ſouldiors, and ended thoſe wars rather by beſieging than fighting.

The eight opinion for war to be made againſt the Emperor, and the reaſons thereof.

D They which in the eight and laſt place deliuered their opinions concerning the intended war, perſuaded, to haue it conuerted vpon the Chriſtian emperour; whom the Turks call the king of Vienna. The cauſes they alleadged for the beginning of this warre was, For that the Vſcocchi were growne ſo inſolent as to make good priſe of the Turks both by ſea and land; in ſuch ſort, as that not onely for the harmes which they did, but euen for the maieſtie and honour of the Othoman empire, their inſolencie was not longer to be ſuffered. By whoſe iniuries it was eſpecially brought to paſſe, that the merchants to their great hinderance in priuat, & the Sultans great loſſe in common, hauing left the towne of Narenta or Narona in the Turkes dominion, had remoued their mart to Salona (now called Spalato) a towne of the Venetians: and that yet for all that was not ſo ſufficiently prouided for the ſecuritie of the ſaid merchants, al- E though there were peace betwixt the emperor and the Venetians: for that theſe vnruly men for moſt part liuing vpon the ſpoyle, troubled all both by ſea and land with their robberies, driuing away mens cattell, burning the villages, and taking away the young babes out of the mothers armes and laps. Whereby it was eaſily to be ſeene, what mind they were of: and that it was not to be doubted, but that if occaſion ſhould ſerue for them to ſurpriſe any of the Turkes ſtrong holds vpon the frontires, they would with all their power attempt the ſame: which what a diſhonour and infamie (not to ſpeake of the loſſe) it would be vnto the whole Othoman empire, euery man might eaſily gheſſe. Neither that it was vnknowne how little the Chriſtian emperor had eſteemed of the Turke, at ſuch time as he was in warre with the Perſian, paying his tribute F too late at his pleaſure; an euident ſigne rather of violating than of eſtabliſhing the league. And that the good ſucceſſe of this warre was not to be deemed either difficult or doubtfull: for that the attempt might be giuen both by Croatia, Hvngarie, and Avstria, countries abounding with all things neceſſarie for the maintenance of a great armie; as alſo for that they were almoſt to trauell all the way in the Turkes owne territorie. Beſide that, the chiefe fortreſſes of Hvngarie, namely Belgrade, Bvda, and Alba Regalis, with many other ſtrong places,were alreadie holden by the Turks garrisons, whether their armies might in all cases of extremitie in safetie retire, or out of the same garrisons repaire their losses, if any should be. The Roman empire (as they said)was more desirous of peace than war;and the princes,of nothing more carefull than how to heape vp and preserue their treasures: and the people of GERMANIE for that of long they had had no wars,to be lesse fit now to beare armes, and worse to be commaunded by their captaine; alwaies hauing in distrust the Hungarians,the Italians,and Spaniards,for that those nations are not beloued,but rather hated of the Germans,being not at vnitie among themselues,but diuided,especially about matters of religion. Neither that it was to bee feared,least forreine princes should giue aid vnto the emperor in this warre: The Polonian and Transyluanian to liue now in peace with the Turke,and therfore would by no means turne the heat of this warre into their owne bosomes: as also for that the Polonians were afraid,least in so doing they should be driuen out of their countrie,and enforced to remoue themselues toward the frosen sea: and the Transyluanian hauing receiued his soueraigntie from the Turke,no lesse in feare(if he should so do)to be of him againe stript and spoyled of the same: As for the king of SPAINE, although he were of such power, as might affoord vnto the house of AVSTRIA great aid,yet that he was in other places now too much busied: and that the bishop of ROME could not in all places be readie to serue his turne: the princes of ITALIE would not spend their subiects and treasures to pleasure another man: and that the Venetian State would not rashly stir vp the Turks armes against themselues, but rather at ease expect the euent of the warre than to entangle themselues with other mens dangers. These were the chiefe opinions of the great Bassaes concerning the war to be taken in hand, not so much proceeding from any ripe or sound aduice(as commonly they do)but rather from a certaine barbarous insolencie and contempt of others,wherewith they moued,doe oftentimes vainely persuade them of the easie performance of diuers expeditions: which in proofe they find to be not only most difficult, but vnto themselues also most pernitious.

Amurath resolueth to make war vpon the emperor, with the reasons moouing him thereunto.

In this so great diuersitie of opinions stood Amurath, of long in doubt what to resolue vpon: desirous he was in all places to shew his power,and(if it were possible)to exceed the glorie of his predecessors,as he thought himselfe to haue alreadie done in PERSIA;hauing as he boasted, by his seruants there performed more than they could themselues in person with their mightie armies. Wherefore contenting himselfe with that he had alreadie done in the East, hee resolued now to turne his forces against the Christian emperor towards the West, and that for diuers respects. First, it grieued him to see the honour of the house of AVSTRIA, and that it durst to make head against him: besides that,to make warre vpon a countrie confining vpon his owne,would be a thing of farre lesse difficultie than was the Persian war, where his armies were now still to be led through his owne peaceable countries, from whence they were to be at all times plentifully relieued with victuals & whatsoeuer els they needed. In which opinion he was also confirmed by Sinan Bassa; who hauing in vaine persuaded him to haue made war against the Venetians, furthered now this warre, in hope thereby to recouer his credit and reputation, (before greatly impayred abroad by the little he did in PERSIA,as also at CONSTANTINOPLE, by the discord betwixt him and Ferat Bassa, commonly called the Blacke Serpent) as also to encrease his wealth and riches: which shortly after sorted to his desire,being by the great Sultan Amurath appointed Generall for those wars. But aboue all others, Hassan Bassa of BOSNA furthered this matter,in hope thereby to haue gained great riches(as the Turkes manner is) together with the greatest honours of the field,as hee was most vainely persuaded by his cold prophets, to whom he gaue no small credit. He therefore daily certified Amurath of the harmes which the Vscocchi and other the Archduke his seruants and subiects did vpon the frontires of his territories: telling him of their burnings, spoylings,and robbings, inciting him to begin his war in CROATIA,and so to continue the same either against the emperour, or the Venetians, or els vpon the sudden that way to breake into ITALIE,as had sometime the like beene done in the time of Mahomet, Baiazet, and Solyman, his noble progenitours: whereby to bring a great terrour vpon all the princes of ITALIE, and to enrich his souldiours with rich spoiles. By which his importunitie he(as a most mortall enemie not only vnto the house of AVSTRIA, but vnto all Christendome)got leaue to begin those stirs in the frontires of the empire, which were first fatall vnto himselfe,and haue euer since euen vntill this day notably exercised the armes of these two last Othoman emperours Amurath and Mahomet; as also the Christian emperour, with others

A others his friends and confederats. Yet vnto this leaue granted vnto the Baſſa, was this conditi" on at the firſt annexed, That he ſhould not ſeeme to do it by the commandement of Amurath but of himſelfe, vnder colour to reſtraine the Vſcocchi; who as well by land as by ſea (as he pretended) ſpoiled both the Chriſtians and Turks, by the great libertie of the princes of AVSTRIA, hauing ſmall care to chaſten them.

Now was it no great matter for Haſſan Baſſa to do what Amurath his great lord and maſter had commanded, for the diſturbing of the peace betwixt him and the Chriſtian emperour: the Turkes leagues with their neighbour princes being ſeldome ſo religiouſly kept, but that as well their ſouldiors in garriſon vpon their frontiers by land, as their aduenturers by ſea, might to keep themſelues doing, vpon a militarie inſolencie (as the Turkes tearme it) now and then at their
B pleaſures make incurſions for bootie both by ſea and land: which anſwered with the like from their neighbours ſo moleſted, there neuer wanted new grieuances and iuſt cauſes of complaint, to the ſtirring vp of greater troubles, euen amongſt the greateſt princes. The Venetians thus wronged at ſea, and their merchants robbed; by their embaſſadours complained at CONSTANTINOPLE of the iniuries done them by the Turkes pyrats, requiring to haue them called home, and iuſtice done vpon them. In like manner the emperour alſo, ſeeing many things both this yeare and the next attempted by Haſſan Baſſa in CROATIA, and the other Turkes in HVNGARIE, contrary to the league, to the great diſturbance of his ſubiects in both thoſe countries, by his embaſſadour then lying at CONSTANTINOPLE, complained of theſe outrages, deſiring to C know whether they were done by the conſent and knowledge of Amurath or not; and if not, then to require that order might bee taken for the reſtraining thereof: which was accordingly done, and thoſe incurſions for a while ſtaied, and the former peace continued. Amurath ſtill making ſhew as if hee were willing that the league agreed vpon for eight yeares, ſhould not be in any wiſe on his part infringed. At which time the Perſian kings ſonne (the league not long before concluded) died in the Turks court, where hee lay in hoſtage: whoſe dead bodie Amurath cauſed to be honorably ſent home to his father into PERSIA, with an apologie in defence of himſelfe, againſt the ſuſpition conceiued by ſome, that he ſhould haue been the cauſe of the vntimely death of that yong prince, ſtill vrging withall the confirmation of the league, which by the death of the prince was like enough to haue been broken. Whereof Amurath was the D more deſirous, for that perſuaded by his Baſſaes (as is aforeſaid) to make warres with the emperour (although hee notably diſſembled the ſame) hee was in hope thereby to adde vnto his empire the reliques of HVNGARIE, with ſome good part of the territories of the houſe of AVSTRIA alſo, and ſo to open himſelfe a way into the heart of GERMANIE. For which purpoſes hee now cauſed very great preparation to bee made, and a ſtrong armie to bee raiſed: and at the ſame time put a great fleet of gallies into the Archipelago for the ſafetie of his iſlands in that ſea.

The Perſian kings ſonne ſlaine dieth in the Turkes court.

According to theſe deſignements, the Baſſa of BOSNA, by the commandement of Amurath, with an armie of fiftie thouſand entred into CROATIA, and without reſiſtance burnt and deſtroied the countrey before him, ſparing nothing that came in his way. And not ſo contented, laid E ſiege to the citie of WIHITZ, being the metropoliticall citie of that countrey, ſtrongly ſituate as it were in an iſland, compaſſed about with the riuer Vna: Which citie, after hee had ſore battered, and twiſe aſſalted, was by the diſtreſſed defendants (now deſpairing of reliefe, and vnable longer to hold it out) yeelded vnto the Baſſa vpon compoſition, That the Germain ſoldiors there in gariſon, might in ſafetie with bagge and baggage depart; and that ſuch of the Chriſtian citiſens as would, might there ſtill remain without hurt from the Turks, either in body or goods. Which conditions the Baſſa faithfully performed to the garriſon ſouldiors, whom in number but foure hundred, he ſent with ſafe conuoy into their owne territorie: but afterwards contrarie to his faith and promiſe, exerciſed all manner of Turkiſh tyrannie vpon the poore citiſens. The emperour troubled with this vnexpected inuaſion of the Turks, ſent the lord Petzen (whom he F had many times imployed in embaſſages to the Turke) to pray ayd of the Germain princes againſt the common enemie: who according to the greatneſſe of the danger, in large tearmes promiſed their helpe. The firſt that made head, was Erneſtus archduke of AVSTRIA, the emperours brother; who with fiue thouſand ſouldiors came from VIENNA to SAVARIA, commonly called GREIS, the Metropolis of STIRIA: to whom repaired daily more ſtrength out of CARINTHIA.

In

The Christians ouerthrowne.

In the meane time, the Turks army daily increasing in CROATIA, inclosed sixe thousand foot- G men, and fiue hundred horsemen of the Christians, who had taken the mountaines, woods, and strait passages, and so straitly beset them, that of all that number few escaped with life: amongst whom many valiant souldiors and expert captaines were slaine; namely, Iames Prants, George Plesbach, and Iohn Weluerdurff. The Bassa after the barbarous maner of the Turkes, to make his victory more famous, laded sixe wagons with the heads of the slaine Christians. The Turks thus raging in CROATIA, brought a generall feare vpon all HVNGARIE, BAVARIA, BOHEMIA, STIRIA, CARINTHIA, SILESIA, and the rest of the prouinces thereabouts. Whereupon the emperour calling together the states of SILESIA and MOLDAVIA, declared vnto them the imminent danger; persuading them to ioyne their forces with the rest, for the repulsing of so dangerous an enemy, and so imminent a danger. H

After long delay, Ernestus the archduke (the tenth of August) came to the emperour his brother, with the embassador of HVNGARIE; and the seauenth day after were called together the embassadours of the kingdomes and prouinces of the empire, where it was throughly debated, how the Turkes were to be resisted, and their attempts infringed; as also from whence, forces, money, and other warlike prouision was to be raised. For now it was manifestly seene, that longer to delay the matter was dangerous: and the rather, for that the Beglerbeg (or great commaunder) of GRÆCIA, with threescore thousand select souldiors both horse and foot, of long time exercised in the Persian warres, was ere long expected; who ioyning with the rest of the Turks armie, might doe great matters both in HVNGARIE, and the places adioyning. For preuenting of which so great and manifest dangers, they sate daily in counsell in PRAGE, yea often- I times euen from morning vntil night: for the Hungarians, & especially the lord Nadasti, a most noble and valiant gentleman amongst them, instantly vrged to haue succours sent into HVNGA-RIE; for as much as the Turkish emperour, if he should get into his hands the rest of the townes and castles yet holden by the Christians in HVNGARIE, it was to be feared lest he should in short time after endanger the whole state of GERMANIE: the strength whereof the Turke feared not so much, as hee did those poore reliques of HVNGARIE. Others were no lesse carefull of the dangers of CROATIA and STIRIA, as more proper to themselues, the enemie now there raging. In these so great dangers, the Hungarians with the rest of the distressed, cried vpon the em-perour for helpe; and he likewise called vpon the princes of the empire. Diuers assemblies were made in BOHEMIA, HVNGARIE, MORAVIA, SILESIA, and the other prouinces of the emperours, and K embassadours sent from almost all the Germane princes to the emperour: all was full of consultation, but as for helpe, that came in very slowly; yet such as was to be had, was forthwith sent into CROATIA, to defend the fortresses there against the farther attempts and proceedings of the furious enemie.

Certaine vaine attempts of the Turkes.

The eighteenth of September, the Turks with all warlike prouision, vpon the sudden by night assaulted the strong castle of TOCCAY in the vpper HVNGARIE, in hope to haue surprised it: but finding it a matter of more difficultie than they had before imagined, they departed thence, and attempted the lesser COMARA, which standing in a marish ground, was also easily defended. At which time also the Bassa of BVDA, with his power entred into the frontiers of the Christians, but hauing well viewed the cities, townes, castles, and forts vpon those borders, and finding no- L thing for his purpose, he without any thing doing returned againe to BVDA.

Turopolis spoiled by the Turkes.

The six and twentieth day of September, Hassan the Bassa of BOSNA encamped with his army betwixt the riuers of Kulp and Sauus, and in the darkenesse of the night passing ouer part of his armie into TVROPOLIS, with fire and sword most miserably spoiled all that pleasant and fertile island; the lord of Bonny to whom the keeping thereof was committed, labouring in vaine to defend the same.

About the end of this moneth, the Bassa of ZIGET, with the Sanzackes of MOHAS, KOP-PAN, and QVINQVE ECCLESIÆ, and other Turkes of great name, came with a strong armie, and encamped betweene ZIGET and RODESTO. And shortly after newes was brought to the M emperours court, that KANYSIA a citie of STIRIA (not farre from the riuer Zala) was hardly besieged by the enemy, and that the Turks in comming thither had taken many christians cap-tiues, whom they had sent to be sold at CONSTANTINOPLE; and that there was in the Turkes army about an hundred & threescore thousand men. But for as much as the Christian army daily increased also, and was now growen to the number of threescore thousand, men began to hope well,

A well, that the enemies rage would be ſtaied from any farther proceeding. About the ſame time Erneſtus the archduke appointed Generall of the army, with the Marqueſſe (ſonne to Ferdinand the archduke) his lieutenant, came both vnto the armie.

In theſe preparations, about the beginning of October, heauie newes was brought vnto the Emperours Court, how that ſeauen thouſand men, whom hee but a little before had ſent into CROATIA, vnder the conduct of Thomas Artelius Beane, George Gleichſpacher, and Dionyſius Denke, to hinder the courſe of the Turks proceedings, being encamped betwixt WIHITZ and CAROLSTAT; and hauing the twelfth of September diſcouered from an high hill certaine companies of the Turks (which were indeed of purpoſe come thither to view the armie of the Chriſtians) ſent out fiftie horſmen to diſcouer the Turkes armie where it lay, and what it attempted.
B Who finding no mo of the Turkes, than thoſe whom they had before ſeene from the mountaine, returned againe vnto the armie with ſuch ſimple intelligence: whereunto the Chriſtians giuing credit, became ſecure in their tents, as men out of feare of the enemie, and ſo kept but negligent watch. But in this ſo great ſecuritie, the enemie on a ſudden came vpon them, and with an hundred thouſand men brake into their trenches: where the Chriſtian footmen for all that, for the ſpace of foure houres, maintained a notable fight, wherein many were on both ſides ſlaine. But the poore Chriſtians being beſet round, and oppreſſed with the multitude of their enemies, were there ſlaine almoſt all: yet the captaines ſeeing the danger, by ſpeedie flight ſaued their liues; for which their cowardiſe & careleſſe negligence, they were afterwards apprehended and beheaded. Almoſt all the common ſoldiors were there ſlaine: yea ſuch as fell aliue
C into the hand of the enemie, were moſt cruelly cut in pieces. The ſpoile alſo of the tents of the Chriſtians, fell vnto the enemy: wherin beſide the abundance of other things, they found ſixtie thouſand dollars, brought but two daies before from LINTZ for the ſouldiors pay. The Turkes after their barbarous manner, in oſtentation of their victory, laded fourteene wagons with the heads of the ſlaine Chriſtians, which they ſent vnto diuers of their places thereabouts. This was indeed a great victory, but gained by the Turkes with much blood: for the Chriſtians fighting as men deſperate, ſlew of their enemies aboue twelue thouſand, and died themſelues as men rather with number oppreſſed, than with true valour vanquiſhed.

The night following, the Turks vpon the ſudden in the dead time of the night, ſurpriſed the caſtle of S. George, and without reſpect of age or ſex cruelly put to the ſword all them that were
D therein, except an hundred and fiftie perſons whom they caried away captiues; and ſo ſetting the caſtle on fire, departed. At the ſame time, diuers companies of the Turkes were ſeene about SISEG, who led away with them about ſix hundred Chriſtians into moſt miſerable captiuitie. And that nothing might be wanting vnto the calamities of this ſo miſerable a waſted countrey: three hundred wagons charged with all manner of prouiſion ſent out of the prouinces thereby for the reliefe of the garriſon ſouldiors in CROATIA, were all intercepted by the Turkes, and ſo carried away.

The emperour conſidering theſe proceedings of the Turkes, and that their ſtrength daily encreaſed, gaue notice by writing to all the princes and ſtates of the empire, what incurſions the Turks had of late made into CROATIA, and the frontiers of HVNGARIE, with other places neere
E vnto them: and that the Beglerbeg of GRÆCIA, with the Baſſaes of BOSNA, BVDA, and TEMESVVAR, without regard of the league yet in force, had taken diuers cities, townes, caſtles, & ſtrong places, and ſo extended the bounds of their dominion aboue fortie German miles, hauing ſlain or caried away into captiuitie the poore inhabitants of thoſe countries; and now to be growne to that height of pride, that except their farther proceedings were with like forces repreſſed, they would in ſhort time ſet foot into GERMANIE it ſelfe, and poſſeſſing themſelues of STIRIA and CARINTHIA, would from thence daily more and more encroach vpon the empire; which to hinder was not in his power only, but required their helpe in generall: wherfore he requeſted them now at length, in ſo publike a danger to open their cofers, & to ſend out their forces againſt the common enemy. Which requeſt of the emperors, with the due conſideration of ſo great a dan-
F ger, moued not only the princes and ſtates of the empire, but others alſo farther off, to yeeld liberall contribution vnto ſo neceſſarie and generall a cauſe.

The emperour prayeth aid again of the Germane princes.

The Turkes now hearing of the great preparation of the Chriſtian princes, beſide the armie which was alreadie in the field; and that they had made a ſtrong bridge ouer the riuer of Drauus, which they had alſo fortified, thereby in ſafetie at their pleaſure to tranſport their armie:

without

without further delay furniſhed ſuch places as they had gotten with ſtrong garriſons, and ſo withdrew themſelues into their owne territorie: which they did the rather, for that the plague then raged ſore in CONSTANTINOPLE, inſomuch that there died a thouſand a day. Which contagion had alſo taken hold of the Turkiſh army: ſo that the Chriſtians for feare of infection forthwith ſlew what Turk ſoeuer fell into their hands. And thus ended the troubles of this year, being as it were an introduction for greater to enſue the yeare following. G 1593 Diuers incurſions of the Turks into the frõtiers of the Chriſtians in Croatia and Hungarie.

The Turks together with the beginning of the new yeare began alſo their wonted incurſions into the frontiers of the Chriſtians. They of the garriſon of PETRINIA (a ſtrong fort but lately and contrary to the league built by the Turkes vpon the riuer Colapis or Kulp, for the further inuaſion of CROATIA) made daily excurſions out of that new fort, and entring into the iſland TVROPOLIS, ſpoyled and burnt the towne and caſtle of BECK-VOCHORINAM, and hauing H made a great ſlaughter, carried away with them foure hundred priſoners. And in HVNGARIE, the Turkiſh garriſons to ſupply their wants, made diuers rodes vpon the Chriſtians, and did exceeding much harme; of which aduenturers ſix hundred in paſſing ouer the froſen lake, were all drowned in the midſt thereof. In another place three thouſand of them neere vnto NVHVSE, diuided themſelues into two companies, whereof the one ſhewed it ſelfe in the ſight of the townesmen, the other ſtill lying cloſe in ambuſh: They of the towne vpon the ſight of theſe Turks ſallied out, and cauſing them to retire, followed them ſo far, that they were paſt the place where the reſt of the Turkes lay: who preſently ſtarting vp, ran with all ſpeed toward the town in hope to haue ſurpriſed it, and wanted not much of that they deſired: for there was ſcarce an hundred of the Germanes there in garriſon left in the towne, who had ſcarce ſo much time as to I draw vp the bridges: which done, they with the great ordinance from the walls enforced the Turkes to retire and forſake the towne. About the ſame time alſo the Turks in garriſon at PETRINIA ſallying out vpon the ſudden, tooke the towne of MARTENIZE, which they ſpoiled; and hauing ſlaine and taken about ſeuen hundred perſons, ſet fire on the town, and ſo returned, hauing loſt in this exploit not paſt an hundred and fiftie of their owne men. Not long after, the ſame garriſon ſouldiours of PETRINIA tooke another caſtle, three miles diſtant from the riuer of Kulp, whereinto the Chriſtians dwelling round about, had for feare of the enemie conueyed all their wealth with great ſtore of victuals: all which the Turkes tooke, and hauing ſlaine ſix hundred men in the caſtle, returned with an exceeding rich bootie to PETRINIA: which they K bought with the liues of fiue huudred of their fellowes, ſlaine in taking of the caſtle. With like inſolencie did alſo the other garriſons of the Turkes rage in all the other parts of HVNGARIE. About SASSOVIA, in the vpper HVNGARIE, they carried away about three hundred Chriſtian captiues: and in the nether part of HVNGARIE they tooke the ſtrong caſtle of S. Hedwig vpon the lake of Balaton, which they ſpoyled and burnt: and ſo likewiſe the caſtle of ISNA: but attempting the leſſer COMARA, they were by the garriſon ſouldiors valiantly repulſed. They alſo fortified the caſtle of STOCKE, which they had but a little before taken, that ſo it might ſerue for a ſafe refuge for their aduenturers. Which their manifold outrages, contrarie to the league, euidently declared the deſire they had to begin that bloudie warre, which preſently after enſued: and was indeed the more ſuſpected, for that at the ſame time the emperours embaſſadour Fredericke Crocowitts was by the commandement of Amurath ſhut vp cloſe in his houſe at CONSTANL TINOPLE, and not ſuffered to ſpeake with any man, neither to write or to ſend any meſſenger to the emperour: which cauſed him the more to ſuſpect ſome great matter to be by the Turke entended, and therfore began to raiſe new forces. The Hungarians & Bohemians alſo ſeeing their townes and caſtles thus taken, their prouinces ſpoiled, infinite number of people led away into captiuitie, and the enemy daily encreaſing in ſtrength: at length agreed, vpon their owne charges to maintaine a certaine number both of horſe and foot, for the repreſſing of theſe the Turkiſh incurſions.

Now although the emperour knew right well all theſe outrages of the Turkes, contrarie vnto the league, could not be done without the knowledge and good liking alſo of Amurath; as before enformed thereof by his embaſſador from CONSTANTINOPLE: yet to ſhew himſelfe M willing to haue the league on his behalfe kept, as alſo to make a further proofe of Amurath his reſolution for peace or warre, he wrote vnto him as followeth.

Rodolph

Rodolph the second, Emperour of the Romanes; vnto Amurath king of the Turkes.

Whereas nothing is hitherto on our behalfe omitted, for the preseruation and continuance of the league and amitie betwixt your most excellent Maiestie and vs, by the renewed capitulations of peace; and that wee haue with all sinceritie and loue performed, and are hereafter ready to performe whatsoeuer is on our part to bee performed and done; and as wee haue hitherto, so for euer hereafter also make offer of the same: wee most assuredly promise vnto our selues on your Maiesties behalfe, that you in like manner will not suffer any thing on your part to bee wanting; but gladly and willingly to doe all things which shall bee B meet and needfull for the preseruation and keeping of this our mutuall loue and friendship. Vpon which good hope grounding our selues, to declare our plaine meaning and sinceritie indeed, we will cause our honourable Present (which is now readie) to be brought vnto your most royall Maiestie, at such time as shall bee agreed vpon betwixt our embassador and you: vnto whom in all such matters as he by our commandement shall haue to deale with your most excellent Maiestie, your visiers or seruants, wee request you to giue full credence. In the meane time your excellencie shall doe well to prouide, that as we haue now seuerely commanded our subiects to keepe the peace vpon our frontiers, so that your souldiors also make no incursions as enemies into our territories, nor doe in them any harme, but to endeauour themselues also to peace and quietnesse: and especially, that all such things as contrarie to the capitulations of the league haue beene there of late taken from our people, or otherwise vniustly possessed, may bee againe restored, the losses C recompensed, the new fort of Petrinia demolished, and the Bassa of Bosna and others the authors of breaking of the league punished and displaced: whereby wee shall gather your royall maiesties most noble and kind affection towards vs and our State: which as it shall be a thing most iust, so shall it be a singular confirmation of our league. But concerning these matters, and others to the same belonging, our embassadour is to declare our minde more at large, that so our prest desire for the continuance of our league and friendship with your maiestie, may more plainly be known. So wish we all health and prosperitie vnto your most royall maiestie. From Prage the eight of March, 1593.

The emperours letters vnto Amurath.

The emperour also at the same time and to the same purpose writ to Sinan Bassa in this sort.

Rodolph the second, Emperour of the Romanes; to Sinan Bassa the chiefe Visier, greeting.

We write at this present vnto your most excellent Emperour, our most honoured friend and neighbour, concerning such matters as we thought fit for the preseruation of the peace and league betwixt vs, lest happily otherwise we might seeme to haue forgotten our dutie. Now it shall well beseeme your vprightnesse and good will, which we haue at other times proued, for the high place and authoritie which you hold (and which wee reioyce to bee againe restored vnto you) to giue vnto these things such easie passage before his Maiestie, as that we may acknowledge your kindnesse and fauour, and haue occasion therefore to shew our selues vnto you thankfull. First, wee offer our selues most readie to continue the peace, and to performe whatsoeuer is according to the conuentions of the renued peace on our part to be performed: as also to send E the honourable Present (which is not as yet by vs sent) when as our embassadour shall haue with you appointed any certaine time wherein it may be sent. And we also assuredly hope so to preuaile with your Emperour, that on your part the places within our territories, by your people forcibly possessed, together with all such things as haue been wrongfully taken away, may be againe restored, and the fort of Petrinia raised. The Bassa of Bosna also (who we thinke would haue been kept within the compasse of dutie, if you had at that time held the place of the chiefe Visier) and whosoeuer els, guiltie of the wicked breach of the league, to be worthily according to their deserts punished and displaced, and your souldiors seuerely charged not to make any further incursions, nor to doe any thing that may tend to the breach of the league: as we likewise shall with new and straight commands most carefully restraine our garrison souldiors vpon our frontiers from all such excursions and enemies actions. But of these things our embassadour is more fully and at F large to entreat with you: vnto whose speech we desire such credence to be giuen, as vnto our owne; and we will so prouide, that you shall haue good proofe of our great good will towards you. From Prage the eight of March 1593.

The emperours letters vnto Sinan Bassa.

Vnto which the emperours letters Sinan returned answere as followeth.

Sinan

Sinan Baſſa, chiefe Viſier to Amurath the third, Emperour of the Turkes; vnto Rodolph the ſecond, Emperour of the Romanes, greeting.

Sinan Baſſa his letters to the emperour.

By theſe wee giue your Maieſtie to vnderſtand, That two of your Maieſties letters were brought hither before wee were choſen and confirmed chiefe Viſier in this moſt royall Court; wherein your Maieſtie excuſe your ſelfe, and ſhew the cauſes why the ſending of the wonted Preſents hath beene ſo long deferred, by laying the fault vpon the inſolencie of our garriſon ſouldours in Bosna, and the breach of the publicke peace. Which your letters being by vs read before our moſt mightie emperour, his Highneſſe in great choller burſt out into theſe wordes: And thy ſonne the Beglerbeg of Buda hath ſtill hitherto writ and giuen vs to vnderſtand, that the vſuall Preſents would certainely come: and that the king of Vienna would not in any caſe conſent vnto the breach of the league, or of the amitie betwixt vs and him: and yet for all that the preſents are not hitherto come: wherefore thy ſonnes writings and relations are not true. But now the Baſſa of Bosna hath ſent word vnto the Court, that your Maieſtie will not ſend them, and all your doings to be but meere deceit and fraud. For which cauſe our moſt mightie Emperour hath remooued my ſonne from his place in Buda, and rewarded the Baſſa of Bosna with honourable garments, whereas my ſonne is for your Maieſties ſake diſplaced. Now on our behalfe nothing is done againſt the peace, but our ſouldiours as with a bridle kept in: whereas on your Maieſties part, excurſions and harmes into the territories of our emperour neuer ceaſe, eſpecially into Bosna, whereinto your ſouldiours haue of late in warlike manner broken, although they were by our garriſons ouercome, their great ordinance taken, and brought hither vnto the Court. Wherefore ſeeing the caſe ſo ſtandeth, your Maieſtie is to reſolue vs vpon two poynts, whereof the firſt is, Whether you bee minded to keepe friendſhip with vs as beſeemeth; and to ſend hither the two laſt yeares Preſents or not? and the ſecond, Whether you will ſet at libertie our captiue Sanzackes or no? Now if your Maieſtie ſhall bee content to keepe the league, and within theſe two moneths next to ſend the two yeares preſents, as alſo to diſmiſſe our Sanzackes; the league ſhall on our part bee likewiſe vndoubtedly kept, your territories ſhall bee in no caſe moleſted, ſuch Chriſtian captiues as your Mateſtie ſhall require, bee enlarged, and a moſt firme and ſure friendſhip by vs continued. Whereas if you ſhall vpon any cauſe or excuſe longer delay the ſending of thoſe honourable Preſents, and vnto theſe our demaunds ſend vs nothing but certaine vaine and windie anſweres, let God on high bee therefore for euer praiſed: for now our moſt mightie and victorious emperour, who wanteth neither abilitie nor power, hath commaunded, That wee our ſelfe ſhould in perſon goe in this warre, and putting our confidence in the Higheſt, with the armie of the right beleeuing Turkes to come into thoſe parts: And therefore aſſure your Maieſtie, that wee will not faile there to encounter you: At which time ſhall appeare vnto the world what is by God our Creatour (whoſe holy name bee for euer bleſſed) in his deepe wiſedome preordained and ſet downe for vs. Wherefore ſeeing that all which concerneth the league, together with the ſafetie and quiet of our people on both ſides, is vnto your Maieſtie thus declared; you are to conſider the end, and to follow our good aduice: whereas if otherwiſe you ſhall bee the cauſe of the breach of this ſo wholeſome a peace and vnitie (which we hitherto haue ſo ſincerely and firmely kept) the excuſe therof both in this world, and in the world to come, ſhall lie vpon your ſelfe. Now wee requeſt of you no more, but forthwith to ſend vs anſwere of theſe our letters. As for the reſt, well may he ſpeed that taketh the right way. From Constantinople the laſt of the moneth Giuma Zuleuel, in the yeare of our holy Prophet* Mahomet 1001.

*Which is the 16. of March in the yeare of Chriſt. 1593.

Yet for all theſe faire offers of peace thus made by Sinan Baſſa in his letters, was his purpoſe nothing leſſe than to haue performed the ſame, ſeeking onely to haue drawne the two yeares Preſents from the emperour, amounting to a great ſumme of money, and ſo neuertheleſſe to haue proſecuted the intended warre, the emperour being the only man, of whom Amurath his great maſter had amongſt all the Chriſtian princes made choice of to exerciſe his force vpon. Of all which things the emperor was not ignorant, being therof (as wee ſaid) fully before by his embaſſadour aduertiſed from Constantinople.

Theſe troubles of the Spring thus paſt, enſued the Sommer much more troubleſome, for Haſſan Baſſa of Bosna, chiefe author aud deuiſer of all theſe broiles, ceaſed not for the increaſe of his credit, to worke what miſchiefe he could againſt the Chriſtians that bordered vpon him.

This

A This great Baſſa mortally hated the Gouernour, or as ſome call him the Abbot of SISEG, a ſtrong caſtle ſituat vpon the borders of that part of CROATIA, yet holden by the Chriſtians, where the riuer Kulp falleth into the famous riuer of Sauus or Saw (and was in deed the verie bulwarke of that countrey) the cauſe of which his hatred is reported to haue beene this: The yeare before, the Baſſa had ſent a meſſenger to this Abbot, to require him to deliuer the caſtle or monaſterie vnto him: which meſſenger for certaine daies the Abbot entertained with many honourable ſpeeches, learning in the meane time of him ſo much as he poſſibly could of the Baſſaes intention, with what power, in what place, and with what engines he had determined to beſiege the caſtle. In the meane time it was diſcouered, that his ſteward had long before plotted
B with the Turke to haue betraied the caſtle, and had for certaine yeares paſt receiued of him a yearely penſion. Vpon which occaſion, the Abbot cauſed both the meſſenger and his owne ſteward to be apprehended, and ſo faſt bound hand and foot, to be caſt out at a window of the caſtle into the riuer of Saw. The Baſſa ſeeing his meſſenger not to returne, ſent another to the Abbot, grieuouſly threatning him, if he did not ſend him back againe his meſſenger: whereunto the Abbot anſwered, That he had diſmiſſed him certaine daies before, and therefore maruelled if he were not as yet returned: neuertheleſſe concerning his demaund, that he was reſolued to yeeld the monaſterie vnto the Baſſa, againſt whoſe forces he ſaw himſelfe vnable to hold it: requeſting only, that it would pleaſe him to ſend ſome men of account to receiue it at his hand, for that it would be no ſmall diſhonour vnto him to deliuer it vp vnto common ſouldiors. The Baſ-
C ſa glad of this meſſage, ſent forthwith certaine principall men of great account, hoping now without any loſſe to haue that ſtrong place yeelded vnto him, which had ſo long time ſtood in his way. Three daies after certaine troupes of horſemen ſent from the Baſſa, came to the monaſterie as was appointed, and finding the gates open entred, firſt the noblemen, and after them fiue hundred others or thereabouts: who were no ſooner within the gates, but that the portcul-leis was let fall, and certaine murthering pieces (ſecretly placed in the court for that purpoſe) diſcharged: with the violence whereof, the Turkes that were alreadie entred, were moſt miſe-rably rent in pieces, their heads, armes, and legs flying in the ayre; when preſently the garriſon ſouldiors ſtarting out of their lurking places, made a quick diſpatch of all them that had eſca-ped the furie of the great artillerie. The reſt of the Turks ſhut out, hearing the noiſe and crie of them within, turning their horſes, betooke themſelues to ſpeedie flight. The great Baſſa hea-D ring of this ſlaughter of his men, and how he had been deceiued, ſwore in great rage by his Mahomet, to raſe this monaſterie downe to the ground, and to pluck the Abbots skin ouer his eares: and ſo by threatning letters gaue him to vnderſtand as followeth.

Haſſan Baſſa of Boſna, vnto the Abbot of Siſeg.

It is not to thee vnknowne, how often we haue ſent vnto thee our meſſengers with letters, declaring vnto thee our loue and good will; requeſting thee in friendly ſort, and without farther reſiſtance to yeeld vp vnto vs thy fortreſſe of SISEG, not longer to be by thee holden. Vnto which our requeſt thou E haſt hitherto moſt wilfully at thy pleaſure oppoſed thy ſelfe, not without the ſlaughter of our men; and in ſo doing, haſt giuen cauſe vnto the great Sultan to ouerthrow and raſe that thy fortreſſe, whereof thou for the Emperour wilt needs be the chiefe. Thinkeſt thou it will be for thy good, or yet well taken, that thou haſt ſo ſhamefully and perfidiouſly circumuented and ſlaine our embaſſadours and ſeruants ſent vnto thee? Nay aſſure thy ſelfe, that if Mahomet graunt vs life, we will neuer giue ouer the ſiege of that thy fort wherein thou ſo much truſteſt, vntill I haue before thy face ouerthrowne it, and (if thy God ſhall giue thee aliue into my hands) haue pluckt thy skin ouer thine eares, to the great reproach and ſhame of the Chriſtians: for I am fully reſolued, not to depart from this place, but to continue the ſiege thereof vntill I haue it. Let a little time yet paſſe, and thou ſhalt ſee thy ſelfe on euerie ſide beſieged, thy fort with mo and greater pieces of artillerie than euer, battered; and our power ſtrong enough to con-
F ſtraine thee. Thou haſt hitherto put thy greateſt hope and comfort in the Banne* Erodius, for whom by the helpe of Mahomet we are much too ſtrong. In briefe, we are of nothing more carefull than how to get thee into our power: which if we doe, looke not for any mercie at our hands.

The threatning letter of Haſſan Baſſa of Boſna vnto the Abbot of Siſeg.

 The Hungerie Bannes are noble men, in power much like vnto the Turkes Baſſaes.*

Neither was the Baſſa vnmindfull of his promiſe, or of the loſſe he had receiued, but now in the beginning of Iune with an armie of thirtie thouſand horſe and foot, came and beſieged the Haſſan Baſſa inuadeth Croatiæ.

fortreſſe of TRENSCHIN, which with continuall batterie and often aſſaults he at length tooke, G ſacked the towne, ſlew moſt part of the inhabitants, except eight hundred or thereabouts of the younger ſort, which he caried away with him into captiuitie. And being prowd of this victorie, remoued thence by a bridge which he had made, paſſed ouer the riuer, and ſo the twelfth of Siſeg beſieged by Haſſan Baſſa Iune came and encamped before the monaſterie of SISEG: and after vaine ſummons giuen to the ſame, the next day cauſed his great ordinance to be planted, and with great furie thundring againſt the wals, in ſhort time ouerthrew the new tower, in the fall whereof two of the Chriſtian canoniers periſhed. This furious batterie he maintained by the ſpace of ten daies without intermiſſion, giuing no time of reſt vnto the beſieged; ſo that it ſeemed not poſſible for the monaſterie to be any long time defended, if it were not with ſpeed relieued. The biſhop of ZAGRABIA, and Rupertus Eggenberg Generall of the emperours forces that then were at ZAGRABIA, H gaue knowledge thereof to Andrew lord Auersberg Gouernour of CAROLSTAT, crauing his aid and counſell: who calling togither his own forces, raiſed a good number of good horſe and foot, and called alſo vnto him the bordering horſemen of KARNIA and CARAINIA; who the ſeuenteenth day of Iune met altogither not far from INSTAVVITZ, and there tarried that night. The next day paſſing ouer the riuer Sauus neere vnto ZAGRABIA, they ioyned themſelues with the emperors forces, and marched the nineteenth day in good order to SCELINE, where they expected the comming of Countie Serinus. The twentieth day Peter Herdelius with his Huſſars, and the lord Stephen Graſwein came into the campe, with many of thoſe light horſemen whom the Hungarians called Vſcocchi. The one and twentieth day they lodged at GRADIVM, ſtill expecting the comming of the countie Serinus, who otherwiſe buſied, could not come. The next I day after, a ſouldiour ſent out from the beſieged, came into the campe, who gaue the captains to vnderſtand, that except they made haſt that day to relieue the diſtreſſed monaſterie, it would vndoubtedly be loſt: for that the enimie had made it faultable, and would that night giue the aſſault; and the defendants, doubting how they ſhould be able to maintain the place, began before his departure thence to thinke of compoſition with the enemie. Vpon which newes the captaines forthwith began to conſult among themſelues, what courſe to take in ſo doubtful and dangerous a caſe: where Auersberg was of opinion, That it were beſt to march on, & to giue the enemie battel; with whom alſo agreed the lord Rederen: The reſt of the captains being of a contrarie mind, for that the ſtrength of the Chriſtians compared to the Turkes, was too weak; and therefore they thought it better in time to retire whiles they yet might, than to hazard vnto moſt K manifeſt perill the liues of ſo many valiant men, at ſo great ods. At which counſell Auersberg was at the firſt much moued, but afterwards (as he was a man of great eloquence) plainly ſet before them the neceſſitie of the cauſe, and with liuely reaſons cheered vp the fearefull Croatians; notably perſuading them all in generall, to put their whole truſt & confidence in God, to whom it was as eaſie to giue victorie by few as by many: and to fight like valiant men, for their religion, their countrie, their liues, their wiues, their children and friends, and whatſoeuer elſe they held deare; againſt that cowardly enemie, whoſe valour neuer brought him into the field, but only the vaine truſt he had in his multitude; and would therfore no doubt eaſily be put to flight, if he ſhould contrarie to his expectation find himſelfe but a little hardly laid vnto. With theſe and other like reaſons hee preuailed ſo much, that they all yeelded vnto his opinion, and with L one conſent reſolued to go againſt the enemie, and to doe what they might to relieue their beſieged friends. So vpon a ſigne giuen, the whole armie (in number not aboue foure thouſand) forthwith remoued, and with great ſpeed haſted towards the enemie; and being come within a mile of the campe, put themſelues in order of battell. The Turks by their eſpials vnderſtanding of the approach of the Chriſtians, brought all their horſmen ouer the riuer of Kulp, by a bridge which they had made, and hauing put themſelues in order, came on to ioyne battell with the Chriſtians: who had in their vauntgard placed the Croatians and Huſſars; in the left wing them of CAROLSTAT, and the harquebuſiers of KARNIA; in the right wing the borderers of CRAINIA, all horſemen; in the maine battell the reſt of the ſoldiors, with the horſemen of SILESIA,

The Croatians and Huſſars in the vauntgard gaue the firſt charge vpon the enemie: but hauing for a good ſpace made a great fight, they were about to haue retired, and diſcouraged with the multitude of the enemies, were euen vpon the point to haue fled: when Auersberg (Generall of the Chriſtian armie) came on with his ſquadron, and not onely reſtored

A the battell,but ſo reſolutely charged the maine battell of the Turkes, that the Baſſa was conſtrained at the firſt to retire,and afterwards to flie,after whom all the reſt of the armie followed. The Chriſtians ſtill keeping their array, purſued them with great ſpeed, and comming to the new made bridge before them,tooke from them that paſſage,to the great diſcomfiture of the Turks, who ſeeing the miſerable ſlaughter of themſelues, and no way to eſcape,ran headlong ſome into the riuer Odera, ſome into Kulp, and were there for moſt part drowned; the reſt were all ſlaine by the Chriſtians, before determined not to take any priſoners. In the meane time, the Turkes that remained at the ſiege, vnderſtanding of the ouerthrow of their fellows, ſet fire on their pouder and other prouiſion, and ſo in great feare betooke themſelues to flight. Whoſe tents the Chriſtians immediatly after tooke, and in them nine great pieces of artillerie, & good
B ſtore of great ſhot of 44 & 45 pound waight a piece,with the ſumptuous pauillion of the Baſſa, and much other rich ſpoile,which was all carried into the monaſterie of SISEG. The number of the Turkes ſlaine in this battell,and drowned in the riuers, is of diuers diuerſly reported,but moſt agree vpon eighteene thouſand. And amongſt them was Haſſan Baſſa himſelfe, found in the riuer neere vnto the bridge,known by his moſt rich and ſumptuous apparell; and neere vnto him Mahomet-Beg, and Achmet-Beg. In other places were alſo found the dead bodies of Saffer-Beg the Baſſaes brother,of Meni-beg, Haramatan-Beg, Curti-Beg, Operd-Beg, and Goſchus, the Baſſaes chiefe counſellor and maſter of his houſhold.But of all others,the vntimely death of Sinan-Beg Amurath his nephew, his ſiſters only ſonne, ſent thither to haue learned the feats of armes vnder Haſſan the great Baſſa,was of the Turks moſt lamented.Of twenty thouſand Turks
C that came ouer the riuer Kulp,ſcarcely two thouſand eſcaped.This ſo great a victory obtained, all the armie of the Chriſtians went thrice about the monaſterie,and euery time falling all down vpon their knees,gaue vnto God moſt heartie thankes for the ſame, as by him miraculouſly giuen,and not by themſelues woon; and afterwards made all the ſhew of ioy and gladneſſe they could poſſibly deuiſe.

Siſeg relieued.

Eighteene thouſand Turkes ſlaine.

SISEG thus deliuered,and the Turks armie ouerthrown,the Chriſtians with all ſpeed laid ſiege to PETRINIA the ſtrong new fort of the Turks,which they for the ſpace of fiue daies moſt furiouſly battered: but hearing that the great Gouernor of GRÆCIA(whom the Turks call the Beglerbeg of ROMANIA) was with a great power comming to the reliefe of the fort,they raiſed their ſiege,brake vp their armie, and returned euery man to his wonted charge.

D Whileſt theſe things were in doing at PETRINIA,a poſt came from CONSTANTINOPLE to BVDA,who brought thither the firſt newes of the ouerthrow of SISEG; for the report therof was not as yet come to BVDA. Wherfore the Baſſa called vnto him the meſſenger,author of ſo bad news, and diligently examined him of the trueth thereof: who told him, That at his departure from CONSTANTINOPLE,nothing was there knowne of that loſſe,but that vpon the way as he came he met with diuers horſemen but lately eſcaped from the ſlaughter, who told him of a certaintie, that the Baſſa was ſlaine,and his armie deſtroyed. Wherunto the Baſſa of BVDA replied,That he was happie in his death,for that if he had by chance eſcaped, he ſhould for his indiſcretion vndoubtedly haue ſuffered ſome other more ſhamefull death at the court.

Newes of the ouerthrow of the Turkes at Siſeg, brought to Buda

E When newes of the aforeſaid victorie was brought to the emperour at PRAGE,he commaunded publike prayers,with thankeſgiuing to almightie God to be made in all churches: and ſent a meſſenger with letters to Amurath, to know of him how he vnderſtood theſe inſolent proceedings of his ſoldiors, and eſpecially this late expedition of the Baſſa of BOSNA and his complices,contrarie to the league yet in force betwixt them. After which meſſenger he ſent alſo the lord Popelius,with the yearely preſent(or rather tribute)he vſed to ſend vnto the Turkiſh emperour at CONSTANTINOPLE; yet with this charge, that when he was come as farre as COMARA in the borders of HVNGARIE, he ſhould there ſtay vntill the returne of the aforeſaid meſſenger: who if he brought tidings of peace from Amurath, then to proceed on his iourney to the Turkes Court; otherwiſe,to returne againe with his preſent:as he afterwards did. For Amu-
F rath enraged with the notable loſſe receiued at SISEG, and prickt forward with the teares and prayers of his ſiſter(deſirous of nothing more than to bee reuenged for the death of her ſonne) the ſeuenth of Auguſt cauſed open war to be proclaimed againſt the Chriſtian emperor,both at CONSTANTINOPLE and BVDA. The mannaging whereof he committed to Sinan Baſſa the old enemie of the Chriſtians,his lieutenant generall,and perſuader of this war: who departing from CONSTANTINOPLE with an armie of fortie thouſand, wherein were 5600 Ianizaries, was by Amurath himselfe and the great men of the Court brought a mile on his way: hauing G in charge from the great Sultan, by the assistance of the Beglerbeg, of GREECE, the Bassaes of BVDA and TEMESVVARE, and other his Sanzacks and commanders in that part of his empire, to reuenge the death of his nephew, and the dishonour receiued at SISEG.

This war Amurath with great pride denounced vnto the Christian emperor and the rest of the princes his confederats in this sort.

Amurath the third, by the grace of the great God in heauen, the onely Monarch of the World, a great and mightie God on earth, an inuincible Cæsar, King of all Kings from the East vnto the West, Sultan of BABYLON, Soueraigne of the most noble families of PERSIA and ARMENIA, triumphant victor of HIERVSALEM, Lord H possessour of the Sepulchre of the crucified God, subuerter and sworne enemie of the Christians, and of all them that call vpon the name of Christ.

The proud and blasphemous denuntiation of war giuen out by Amurath against Rodolph the Christian emperour.

We denounce vnto thee Rodolph the Emperour, and to all the Germane nation taking part with thee, vnto the great Bishop also, all the Cardinals and Bishops, to all your Sennes and Subiects: wee earnestly (Isay) by our crowne and empire denounce vnto you open warre. And giue you to vnderstand, that our purpose is, with the power of thirteene kingdomes, and certaine hundred thousands of men, horse and foot, with our Turkes and Turkish armes, yea with all our strength and power (such as neither thou nor any of thine hath euer yet seene or heard of, much lesse had any proofe of) to besiege I you in your chiefe and metropoliticall cities, and with fire and sword to persecute you and all yours, and whosoeuer shall giue you helpe, to burne, destroy, and kill, and with most exquisit torments we can deuise to torture vnto death and slay such Christian captiues as shall fall into our hands, or else to keepe them as dogs, captiues in perpetuall miserie; to empaile vpon stakes your fairest Sonnes and daughters: and to the further shame and reproch of you and yours, to kill like dogs you women great with child, and the children in their bellies: for now we are fully resolued to bring into our subiection you which rule but in a small countrie, and by strong hand and force of armes to keepe from you your kingdome, as also to oppresse, root vp and destroy the keyes and See of ROME, togither with the golden scepter thereof: and we will proue whether your crucified Iesus will helpe you and do for you as yours persuade you. Beleeue K him still, and trust in him, and see how he hath holpen his messengers which haue put their confidence in him: for we neither beleeue, neither can we endure to heare such incomprehensible things, that he can help, which is dead so many worlds of yeares agoe, which could not helpe himselfe, nor deliuer his owne countrie and inheritance from our power, ouer which we haue so long time raigned. These things ô yee poore and miserable of the world, we thought good to signifie vnto you, that you with your princes and confederats may know what you haue to do and to looke for. Giuen in our most mightie and imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, which our ancestrrs by force of armes tooke from yours, and hauing slaine or taken prisoners all their citizens, reserued such of their wiues and children as they pleased vnto their lust, to your perpetuall infamie and shame.

Sinan with his armie thus setting forward, kept still on his way towards BVDA, but the Beglerbeg of GRÆCIA with a far greater power marched towards CROATIA, as well to relieue the forts distressed by the Christians, as againe to besiege the strong castle or monasterie of SISEG: which he with his huge armie at his first arriuall compassed about without resistance, and with continuall batterie ouerthrew the wals thereof, giuing no time of rest vnto the defendants. Which breaches they for all that valiantly defended, and with restlesse labour notably repaired, the very fearefull women bringing tables, stooles, and whatsoeuer els came to hand, that might any wise helpe to keepe the enemie out, of whom a great number was in the breaches slaine. But what was that handful against such a multitude? At length the third day of September the Turks by maine force entered the Monasterie, & put to sword all the soldiors therein: amongst whom M were two hundred Germans, of whom the Turks cut some in pieces, and the rest they threw into the riuer Kulp. One religious man there found among the rest, they did flea quicke in detestation of his profession, and afterward cutting him in small pieces, burnt them to ashes. So taking the spoile of all that was there to be had; and leauing a strong garrison for the keeping of the place, they passed ouer Sauus, burning the countrie before him, and carried away with them about

A about a thouſand poore Chriſtians into perpetual captiuitie. Theſe inuaſions of the Turks cauſed the emperor to craue aid both of the ſtates of the empire, and other forreine princes farther off, which was by ſome eaſily granted, but not ſo ſpeedily performed.

About this time Peter ſurnamed le Huſſar (for that he commanded ouer thoſe horſmen whom the Hungarians call Huſſars) captaine of PAPPA, by the appointment of Ferdinand countie Hardeck gouernor of RAB, lay in wait for the Turks Treaſurer in HVNGARIE, who had the command of fiue thouſand Turks: him this Hungarian tooke at aduantage, as he was muſtering and paying certaine companies of his ſoldiors, miſtruſting no ſuch danger, & deſperatly charging him, ſlew him with diuers of his men, and put the reſt to flight, and ſo with the ſpoile and ſome few priſoners he returned againe to his caſtle, carrying with him the Treaſurer.

B Now Sinan the Generall being come with his armie to BVDA, reſolued with himſelfe to begin his warres in that part of HVNGARIE, with the ſiege of VESPRINIVM. This eſpiſcopall citie was by Solyman the great Turke taken from the Chriſtians in the yeare 1552, and againe by them recouered about fourteen yeares after, about the yeare 1566, ſince which time vntill now it had remained in the hands of the Chriſtians. Sinan without delay marching with his armie to VESPRINIVM, compaſſed the citie round, and encamping as he ſaw good, planted his batterie wherwith he continually thundered againſt the citie. The Chriſtians there in garriſon eaſily perceiuing that the citie was not long to be holden againſt ſo great a power, placed diuers barrels of gunpouder in certaine mines they had made vnder the wals and bulwarks of the towne, with traines that ſhould at a certaine time take fire. Which done, they departed ſecretly out of the ci- Sinan Baſſa beſiegeth Veſprinium.

C tie in the dead time of the night, hoping ſo in the darke to haue eſcaped the hands of the enemie: which they did not ſo ſecretly, but that they were by the Turks deſcried, and moſt of them ſlain. Ferdinand Samaria Gouernour of the citie, after he had for a ſpace valiantly defended himſelfe, fell at laſt into the enemies hand, and ſo was taken aliue, togither with one Hofkirke a Germane captain. The Turks entred the citie the ſixt of October, ſtriuing who ſhould get firſt in, for greedineſſe of the prey, when ſuddenly the pouder in the mines tooke fire, and blowing vp the very foundations of the wals and bulwarks, ſlew a number of the Turks that were within the danger thereof, and wonderfully defaced the citie.

From VESPRINIVM the Baſſa remoued with his armie to PALOTTA, and gaue ſummons to the caſtle: but receiuing ſuch anſwere as pleaſed him not, hee layed ſiege vnto it with all his Palotta yeelded vnto the Turkes

D power. Which at the firſt Peter Ornand captaine of the caſtle cheerefully receiued: but being afterward without any great cauſe diſcouraged (the caſtle as yet being but little ſhaken, & but one man ſlaine, and the reſt of the ſoldiors readie to ſpend their liues in defence therof) he ſent vnto the Baſſa, offering to yeeld the caſtle vnto him, ſo that he with his ſouldiors might with bag and baggage in ſafetie depart. Of which his offer the Baſſa accepted, and granted his requeſt. But he was no ſooner come out of the caſtle with his ſouldiors, and readie to depart, but the faithleſſe Turke contrarie to his oath and promiſe cauſed them all to be cruelly ſlain, except only the captaine and two other. After that the Baſſa without any great labour tooke in all the countrie therabouts neere vnto the lake of Balaton.

Now at laſt, though long firſt, about the middle of October the Chriſtians began to muſter

E their armie, in number about 18000, all good & expert ſoldiors: with which power they ſhortly after paſſing ouer Danubius, at the firſt encounter with the Turks put them to the worſe, ſlew a great number of them, and reſcued a number of poore Chriſtian captiues.

In the latter end of this moneth countie Hardeck Gouernour of RAB, and Generall of the Chriſtian armie in that part of HVNGARIE, departing from KOMARA with all his power, came and layed ſiege to the ſtrong citie of ALBA REGALIS, which by the force of his artillerie hee in ſhort time made ſaultable; but in aſſaulting the breaches, was by the Turkes there in garriſon notably repulſed. So hauing made ſufficient proofe both of the ſtrength and courage of the defendants, and perceiuing no good could be done without a long ſiege, for which he was not as then prouided; after conſultation had with the reſt of the captaines, he reſolued to raiſe his ſiege: Alba Regalis beſieged by the Chriſtians.

F which he did the ſecond of Nouember, remouing that day but halfe a mile from the citie, becauſe he would be ſure of all his armie. But as he was about the next day to remoue, news was brought him by his eſpials, that the enemies power was at hand, and euen now almoſt in ſight, which proued to be ſo indeed. For the Baſſa of BVDA by the commaundement of Sinan Baſſa the Generall, was come forth with thirteene Sanzacks, and twentie thouſand ſoldiors, thirtie field pieces, and fiue hundred wagons laded with victuall and other warlike prouision, to raise the siege, and to relieue the citie; & was now euen at hand, comming directly vpon the Christians: wherupon the countie, assisted by the countie Serinus, the lord Palfi, the lord Naddasti, Peter le Hussar, and other valiant captaines of great experience, with wonderfull celeritie put his armie in order of battell, and so coragiously set forward to encounter the enemie. The Bassa seeing the Christians marching towards him, tooke the aduantage of the higher ground, and from thence discharged his field pieces vpon them; which mounted too high, by good hap did them little or no hurt at all. The Christians for all that desirous of battell, and nothing regarding the disaduantage of the ground, but calling vpon the name of the Almightie, mounted the hill, and ioyning battell with the Turkes, by plaine force constrained them to flie. In this armie of the Turkes, being for most part horsemen, were about fiue thousand foot, and many of them Ianizaries, who in flying, oftentimes made stands, and wounded many, and yet neuertheless were almost all there slaine, with many others: amongst whom were three great men, the Sanzacks of STRIGONIVM, SETCHINE, and NOVIGRAD; seuen Chiaus, and many other men of marke, the most valiant captaines of the Turkes borderers. The lord Nadasti with some others taking view of the Turkes that were slaine and lost in this battell, deemed them to haue beene at the least in number eight thousand: few prisoners were saued, all being put to the sword, which caused Sinan to sweare by his Mahomet neuer more to spare any Christian. All the Turkes artillerie, wagons, and prouision became a prey vnto the Christians: many ensignes were there found, and weapons of great value. It is hard to be beleiued, how much this victorie encouraged the Christians, and danted the Turkes. Whereupon the countie with great ioy brought backe his armie to ALBA REGALIS, and encamped neere the bulwarke called STOPASEH, where the Turkes most feared to be assaulted. Palfi, Nadasti, and some others, earnestly perswaded with the countie, not to depart from the citie before he had woon it: But he considering the hard time of the yeare, the strength of the citie (which was now full of souldiors, by reason of them that were fled in thither from the late ouerthrow) with the want of things necessarie in his armie to maintaine a longer siege; and fearing also after long lying to be enforced with dishonour to forsake it, would not hearken to their persuasions, but calling a counsell, resolued to raise his siege, and to content himselfe with the victorie he had alreadie gotten, which was afterward imputed vnto him for more than an ouersight. So setting fire vpon the suburbs of the citie, he rise with his armie, and departed thence the fift of Nouember, and returned to RAB.

Sabatzka taken by the lord Teuffenbach.

Not long after, Christopher lord Teuffenbach, the emperours lieutenant in the vpper part of HVNGARIE, who lay encamped at CASSOVIA with his armie of foureteene thousand souldiours remooued thence, and marching along the countrie two daies, came and laied siege to SABATZKA, one of the Turkes strongest castles in those quarters, out of which they vsually did much harme among the Christians. This castle Teuffenbach battered in three places; and hauing at length made it saultable, tooke it by force the nineteenth of Nouember, and put to the sword all the Turkes there in garrison, in number about two hundred and fiftie, and in stead of them left a strong garrison of his owne: whereby all the countrie thereabouts was restored to great quietnesse.

Filek besieged by the Christians

SABATZKA thus taken, the Christian Generall remoued with all speed to FILEK, a strong citie of the higher HVNGARIE, which Solyman the Turkish emperour tooke from the Christians in the yeare 1560, and placed therin a Sanzacke, vnder the commaund of the Bassa of BVDA. The General encamping before this citie, the next day after planted his batterie, and in most terrible manner without intermission thundring against the wals and gates of the citie. The Sanzacke Gouernour thereof, considering the power of the Christians, got out secretly by night with a few souldiors, to acquaint the other Turkish Sanzacks his neighbours with the comming of the Christians, and the number of their armie; and further to consult with them how the citie might be relieued. The Bassa of TEMESVVARE, with the Sanzackes of GIVLA, HADVVAN, SCANTTZAG, and SCIRME, vndertooke the matter: and thereupon the Bassa sent for eight hundred Ianizaries, of late left by Sinan Bassa in garrison at BVDA and ALBA REGALIS; who all flatly refused to go to this seruice, saying, That they would not bee led as beasts to the slaughter, as were their fellowes but a little before at ALBA REGALIS: neuertheless they enforced the Armenians, whom Sinan and his sonne had brought thither, to go; but of BVDA, ALBA REGALIS, and SCAMBOTH, were sent onely fifteene hundred common souldiors. For all that, the

A Bassa with the Sanzacks his followers, firme in their former resolution for the relieſe of the diſtreſſed citie, hauing made great preparation, and raiſed an armie of eighteen thouſand ſtrong, with many field pieces, by night drew neere vnto FILEK, and ſtaied within two miles of the citie. But the Generall of the Chriſtians, with Stephen Bathor and the other captaines, vnderſtanding of their comming, with ſeauen thouſand good ſouldiors choſen out of the whole armie, went out preſently againſt them; and the one and twentieth of Nouember ſuddenly aſſailing them in their tents, ouerthrew them, and put them all to flight; whom the Chriſtians fiercely purſued with a moſt terrible execution. In this fight and flight there was ſlaine ſixe thouſand Turkes, and but few or none taken. The Baſſa himſelfe, with the Sanzacke of FILEK and many others of great name, were found amongſt the bodies of the ſlaine Turks. This victorie gained
B with little or no loſſe, yeelded vnto the Chriſtians a rich prey, many gorgious tents, and faire enſignes, much cattell, and nine and twentie field pieces, with two hundred wagons laded with victuall and other prouiſion; all which they carried into the campe at FILEK, and ſo more ſtraightly beſieged the citie than before. The ſame day the lord Palfi and Martin Laſla came to the campe with ſix thouſand ſouldiors: and forthwith three trumpetters were ſent to them of the city, That if without farther reſiſtance they would forthwith yeeld the citie, they ſhould haue leaue in ſafetie to depart with life and goods, although the Turks had of late in like caſe broken their faith with the Chriſtians at PALOTTA: but if they refuſed his grace, and would needs hold it out to the vttermoſt, then to denounce vnto them all extremities. For all this, the Turks nothing diſmaied, refuſed to yeeld: wherupon the battery began afreſh, and in more terrible maner
C than before: ſo that though the citie was moſt ſtrongly fortified both with wals and rampiers, yet had the Chriſtians in three dayes ſpace with continuall batterie made a faire breach into it, wherby they in deſpight of the enemie entred without any notable loſſe the foure and twentith of Nouember, ranſacked the citie, and burnt a great part therof. The ſame day they alſo tooke the vttermoſt caſtle, wherein the Sanzackes pallace ſtood: this caſtle ſtandeth vpon a verie high hill, ſtrengthned both by art and nature, and had in it a ſtrong garriſon of valiant ſoldiors, who ſpared not luſtily to beſtow their ſhot amongſt their enemies, of whom they ſlew a great number. Neuertheleſſe, the Chriſtians after they had for the ſpace of two daies and two nights with a moſt furious batterie ſhaken the wals, by plaine force entred the caſtle the ſixe and twentith of D Nouember, and put to ſword all the garriſon ſouldiors; except ſuch as had in good time forſaken this caſtle, and retired themſelues into another more inward. Who being in number eight hundred, with their wiues and children, without hope of reliefe, and ſeeing the canon now bent vpon them, ſet out a white enſigne in token of parley: which graunted, it was agreed that they ſhould depart with life, and ſo much of their goods as euery one of them could carrie. Vpon which agreement, the caſtle was yeelded the eight & twentith day of Nouember, and the Turks with a ſafe conuoy brought vnto the place they deſired. In this caſtle was found a great bootie, many pieces of artillerie, with much other warlike prouiſion, but of victuals ſmall ſtore. The Generall with the reſt of the captaines entring the caſtle, fell downe vpon their knees, and with their hearts & hands caſt vp towards heauen, thanked God for their victory, & for the recouery of that ſtrong city; but eſpecially for the deliuery of ſo many Chriſtians out of the Turkiſh thral-
E dome: For it is reported, that there were aboue 800 countrey villages ſubiect to the iuriſdiction of FILEK, the poore inhabitants whereof were now all freed from the Turkiſh ſeruitude, by the taking of this only citie. The Chriſtians forthwith repaired the wals, bulwarks and trenches, and ſtrongly fortified euery place againſt the enemie: and ſo leauing a ſufficient garriſon in the citie and caſtles, departed with their army, now in number about twentie thouſand, towards SODOCH, ſix miles from FILEK. But as they were vpon the way, newes was brought vnto the Generall, how that the Turkes had for feare abandoned the caſtles of DITVVIN and SOMOSKE: whereupon he ſent out certaine companies of ſouldiors to take in both thoſe places; who comming thither, found them indeed forſaken of the enemy, but yet many pieces of artillerie and other warlike prouiſion there ſtill left.

Filek taken by the Chriſtians.

F In the latter end of Nouember the Generall marched with his armie towards SETSCHINE, a ſtrong towne in the Dioceſſe of AGRIA, but the Turkes in that place had two or three daies before prepared themſelues to flie, and ſent their wiues, their children, and the beſt of their ſubſtance, ſome to HATVVAN, ſome to BVDA: and now hearing of the approach of the Chriſtian armie, ſet fire on the towne and fled. The Chriſtians immediatly entring, did what they could

Seiſchine, Blauenſtein, and Sallek abandoned by the Turks

to quench the fire, and saued a great part of the towne: so leauing there a conuenient garrison, he G hasted with speed to BLAVENSTEIN, which the Turkes did also set on fire, and betooke themselues to flight. The Christians comming thither the next day after, namely, the fourth of December, found a great part of the towne yet vnburnt, wherein they left a strong garrison: and from thence marched to SALLEK, which town they also tooke being forsaken by the enemy, and put thereinto a good garrison. The Generall was of nothing more desirous, than to haue prosecuted this so happy a course of victory: but such was the foulenesse of the winter weather, that hee could not trauell with his great artillerie, without which no great matter was to be done against the enemy, still keeping himselfe in his strong hold. And his army in that wasted and forsaken country, began now to feele the want of victuals; so that many had withdrawn themselues out of the armie vnto their dwelling places. H

At the same time time also, the lord Palfi going to DREGEL and PALANKA, and finding them forsaken by the enemie, furnished both places with garrisons of his owne men. Certaine other strong places were also this moneth recouered from the Turkes, as AINACKE, SOLLOCKE, WESTKE, and others, and so much territory gained by the Christians, as was in circuit thought equall with the lower AVSTRIA. The ioyfull newes of the aforesaid victories, with the recouery of so much of the countrey, and so many strong townes and castles, made great reioycing both at VIENNA and PRAGE: for which cause publike praiers with thanksgiuing to Almightie God were made in both places, with many other tokens of ioy and triumph, both there and in diuers other places of the empire. Yet were not the dead bodies of the Turkes slaine at ALBA REGALIS buried; whereof rise such a loathsome and noysome smell thereabout, that no man could abide I
The Turks in burying their dead, slaine by the Christians. to come nigh the place, to the great trouble of the inhabitants round about. At length certaine Turks out of BVDA and ALBA REGALIS, to the number of 350, met together, to haue buried those loathsome carkases: vpon whom it chanced a captaine of the Hussars to light with his horsemen, who fiercely assailing them, left most of them there dead for others to burie, and carried away the rest prisoners.

The Bassa of BVDA had caused Murat Sanzack of PALOTTA to be strangled, for that he suspected him to haue had intelligence with the Christians: in whose roome he placed another, who comming with 600 Turks to take possession of the preferment, was by the way set vpon by Peter le Hussar, with the garrison souldiors of PAPPA and THVRN, and slaine with most part of his followers. Fiue and thirtie of them were taken aliue, with all the Sanzacks rich furniture. To end K this yeare with all, the Turks in garrison at PETRINIA, SISEG, CASTROVVITZ, and other places therabouts, met together in number about 3000, who the 19 of December passing ouer the riuer Sauus, began to spoile the frontiers of those countries. But before they were gone farre, they were so encountred by the lord Graswin and the borderers thereabout, that 500 of them were left dead vpon the ground, diuers of good account taken prisoners, & almost all the rest drownd in the riuer; so that of all them that came ouer, few escaped with life. In the latter end of this moneth, great numbers of souldiors were taken vp in SAXONIE, and other places of GERMANIE; whereof some were sent to PRAGE, and some to VIENNA in AVSTRIA: and in HVNGARIE the Christians increased their strength with new supplies. In AVSTRIA also a new armie was raised, L and two and twentie great pieces of artillerie sent downe the riuer of Danubius to COMARA, and and new preparation made in euerie place for the next yeares warres.

1594 Amurath the Turkish emperour, going out of the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE the 11 of Ianuarie, to muster the army he had prepared against the Christians for this yeare, was suddenly
A great tempest at Constantinople. ouertaken with such a tempest of wind and raine, that it ouerthrew his tents, his chariots, yea his horses and men had much adoe to withstand it. Wherewith hee being (as with an ominous prodigie) exceedingly troubled, returned with his armie into the citie, and oppressed with melancholy, cast himselfe downe vpon his bed as a man halfe sicke. Where falling asleepe, hee Amurath dreameth. dreamed that he saw a man of an exceeding stature, standing with one of his feet vpon the tower of CONSTANTINOPLE, and the other ouer the strait in ASIA; who stretching out his armes, held the Sunne in one of his armes, and the Moone in the other: whom whiles hee wondred at, M the monster with is foot strucke the tower, which foorthwith fell downe, and in falling ouerthrew the great temple with the imperiall pallace. Amurath awaked (as hee thought) with the noise, and much troubled with the dreame (for the Turks are in such vanities very superstitious) sent for all his wisards and interpreters of dreams, to know the meaning of this his so strange or rather

A rather ſo melancholy a dreame. Who hypocritically anſwered him, That foraſmuch as he had not with all his force as a tempeſt impugned the Chriſtians, their great prophet Mahomet threatned by that dreame, to ouerthrow the tower, the temple, and the imperiall palace; that is to ſay, the religion and empire of the Turks. Which vaine and fained interpretation ſo much moued the ſuperſtitious tyrant, that he ſwore from thenceforth to turne all his forces vpon the Chriſtians, and not to giue ouer war vntill he had done what he might to ſubdue them. This the Turks dreame, with the interpretation therof, and the ſolemne vow he had made for the deſtruction of the Chriſtians, was publikely read in the Churches of TRANSYLVANIA, and many godly exhortations made vnto the people, to moue them by praier and all other good meanes, to auert that ſo threatned thraldome.

B Of the rich ſpoile taken from the Turkes in the late victorie neere vnto ALBA REGALIS, the Chriſtian captaines made a preſent for the Emperour and the Archduke Matthias his brother, which they ſent by the lords Gall and Brun: and was by them preſented vnto the emperour and his brother the 11 of Ianuarie at VIENNA, in order as followeth. Firſt went the maſter of the ordinance of RAB, on both ſides attended vpon with the other officers of the artillerie: after them were drawen thirtie great pieces of ordinance, taken in that battell. After theſe pieces followed three Turkiſh horſes, with rich ſaddles, and furniture ſtudded with gold, the ſtirrups and bridles being of ſiluer, guilt and moſt curiouſly wrought: after them were caried two and twentie of the Turks enſignes, three of them very rich, and the other right faire. Then followed the two embaſſadors aforeſaid, with each of them a guilt maſe in his hand, ſuch as the Turks Baſſaes vſe to C carie: after them were brought many inſtruments of war, guilt ſcimitars, gleaues, bowes and arrowes, targets, and ten of the Ianizaries drums. Two of the aforeſaid horſes were preſented to the emperour, and the third to the archduke. The field pieces brought to the caſtle gate, and orderly placed vpon the plaine, were all (at ſuch time as the reſt of the preſent entred the caſtle) forthwith by the cannoniers diſcharged: and there for certaine daies left vpon the plaine for the people to feed their eies vpon. The embaſſadors diſcharged of their preſent, and rewarded by the emperour with chaines of gold & other gifts, returned againe vnto the campe. Notwithſtanding that it was now deepe winter, yet many ſharpe skirmiſhes daily paſſed vpon the borders, betwixt the Turks and the Chriſtians. The fifteenth of this preſent moneth, two thouſand of the Turks aſſembled together, were making an inroad into the countrey about FILEK: whereof the D Lo. Teuffenbach hauing intelligence, lay in wait for them, and ſetting vpon them fearing no ſuch danger, ſlew and tooke of them fifteene hundred.

A faire preſent of the ſpoile of the Turks, ſent vnto the emperour.

Matthias archduke of AVSTRIA, now Gouernour of STIRIA, CARINTHIA, and the countreys therabout (by the departure of Erneſtus his brother, but a little before by Philip king of SPAINE made Gouernor of the low countries) was now alſo by the emperour appointed Generall of the Chriſtian army againſt the Turkes: who to be nearer vnto the enemy, and to further the new war, departed the ſix and twentith day of February from VIENNA to RAB, after whom daily followed the forces newly raiſed in SILESIA, MORAVIA, and HVNGARIE, with others alſo ſent from PRAGE and VIENNA. Hee conſidering to what ſmall purpoſe it would be to haue the laſt yeare taken ſo many ſtrong townes and caſtles, except the ſame alſo were well manned and furniſhed E with all needfull prouiſion; by the perſwaſion of the lord Teuffenbach, ſent Countie Schlike with a thouſand horſe to FILEK, for the more ſafetie of that place, and the countrey therabout ſo lately gained from the Turks.

It fortuned that about this time, a ſouldior of the Turks taken not farre from DREGEL, and brought into the campe; among other things wherof he was examined, confeſſed that in NOVIGRAD, a ſtrong towne and of great importance (but one mile diſtant from VACIA, and three from BVDA) was left but a weake garriſon of about eight hundred ſouldiors, who there liued in great feare to be beſieged, and that the Turks doubting ſuch a matter, had brought thither much prouiſion for the better fortifying of the towne. Vpon which intelligence the Chriſtians began F to remoue with their armie, and being come betwixt DREGEL and NOVIGRAD, vnderſtood by the countrey people, that it was true that the Turke had reported: wherefore they reſolued that night to lay ſiege vnto the towne. So forthwith ſome were ſent to DREGEL, to fetch thence certaine pieces of artillerie, whom certaine troupes of Germane horſemen went to meet: who vſed ſuch diligence, that the eight of March a little before the riſing of the Sunne, the whole armie with the great ordinance was come before NOVIGRAD. That day the Chriſtians ſpent in pitching Nouigrad beſieged by the Chriſtians.

Pitching their tents,and incamping themſelues: yet before night they had planted certain great pieces vpon an high hill,from whence they might ſee into the caſtle; whereof the maſter of the ordinance cauſed three of the greateſt(about the going downe of the ſunne)to be diſcharged againſt the caſtle, to giue the Turke to vnderſtand,that they wanted nothing for the ſiege. The ſame night alſo the Chriſtians caſt vp a great mount in the valley, from whence they preſently ſent ſix great ſhot into the caſtle: but early in the morning the ſunne being yet ſcarce vp,and all things now in readineſſe,they began to batter the caſtle,and that day out of ten great pieces diſcharged three hundred great ſhot againſt the caſtle; but to ſmall purpoſe,for the caſtle was built vpon a moſt ſtrong rocke,fortified with high and thick wals,and a deepe ditch hewen out of the maine rocke,which compaſſed the caſtle round;and for the more ſtrength therof was ſo fortified with palliſadoes made of ſtrong timber,as that there was no acceſſe vnto the wals: yet by the commandement of the Generall, certaine companies of the Chriſtians prepared themſelues to aſſault the breach,ſuch as it was;who beſides their weapons, carying with them drie fagots,and ſetting them on fire, burnt the palliſado in diuers places, and ſo opened the way vnto the wals; and encouraged with the ſucceſſe,approched neerer, and ſlew diuers of the Turkes vpon their rampiers: who diſcouraged with their owne weakeneſſe and the forwardneſſe of the enemie, faintly defended themſelues, and yet ſlew diuers of them, beating them downe from the wals with ſtones,timber,fire-workes,and ſuch like. This aſſault giuen in the night,was continued vntill foure a clocke in the morning, and ſo giuen ouer. Shortly after came the Archduke with a thouſand horſe into the campe,and cauſed the batterie to be againe renewed: whereby it chanced,that the chiefe canonier in the caſtle being a renegate German, was taken with a great ſhot, and ſlaine; whoſe death ſo diſmaied the reſt of the defendants,that they preſently ſet forth three white enſignes in ſigne of parle: which for all that the Chriſtians ſeemed not to regard,but ſtill continued their battery. The Turks then pitifully crying out,named two captaines,whom they deſired to haue ſent vnto them,with whom they might fall to ſome reaſonable compoſition. So for a while the battery ceaſed,and thoſe captaines being ſent vnto the town,brought nine of the beſt of the Turks in the citie with them vnto the Archduke: who by their interpreter declared, That they well conſidered the force of the Chriſtians, and ſeeing no reliefe to come from the Baſſa of Byda, as he had promiſed,thought themſelues to haue alreadie diſcharged the parts of good ſouldiors,and ſeeing no other remedie, were contented to yeeld the caſtle, yet ſo, as that with bag and baggage they might in ſafetie depart. Whereunto the lord Palfi taking vpon him the perſon of the Archduke(for that he himſelfe would not be knowne) anſwered, That for as much as they had not yeelded at the firſt ſummons,but holden it out to the loſſe of many of his mens liues,and his great charge,they were vnworthie any fauour,yet of his owne clemencie he would receiue them,if they would abſolutly without any further condition yeeld themſelues to his mercy. This anſwere being reported to the Sanzacke,gouernor of the towne, pleaſed him not,and therefore ſaid he would ſtill ſtand vpon his defence. Whereupon the Chriſtians were about to haue begun a freſh aſſault. But after a new parley it was at laſt agreed, That the Turks yeelding the towne vnto the Archduke,ſhould in ſafety depart with their apparel and ſcimitars onely. With which agreement two of the Turks were ſent backe into the caſtle, and the reſt detained. Foure houres the Turkes in the caſtle delaied the time, as men doubtfull what to doe: but being earneſtly called vpon by the lord Palfi for a reſolute anſwer,and ſeeing the Chriſtians ready again to aſſault them,they for feare yeelded: and ſo foure hundred and fifty of them came forth,amongſt whom was the Sanzacke gouernor of the towne,with his wife and daughter,the Sanzacke of Selendre, ſent thither to haue ayded him,and one Chiaus lately come from the court. Theſe great men brauely mounted, were commaunded to alight from their gallant horſes,and had in their ſteads other bad jades giuen them to ride vpon: and as they paſſed by,as well the women as the men were ſearched, that they carried with them nothing more than their clothes: if any thing els were found,it fell vnto the ſouldiors ſhare for good bootie. This ſtrong town of Novigrad, had continued in the poſſeſſion of the Turkes about threeſcore yeares,and ſerued as it were for a bulwarke to Pesth and Byda, which now recouered out of their hands, opened a way vnto their further harmes. The keeping of this towne was by the Archduke committed to the lord Rebei,a noble man of Hvngarie,and kinſman to Palfi,with a ſtrong garriſon and certaine troups of Huſſars.

Nouigrad yeelded vnto the archduke.

The Sanzacke of Novigrad,after he had loſt the towne, comming to Byda, was preſently apprehen-

A apprehended by the Baſſa, and laid in priſon: who although he excuſed himſelfe, by alleadging that the towne was not poſſibly to be holden with ſo ſmall a garriſon againſt ſo great a power, and that if any fault were, it was to be imputed to them of BVDA, for not ſending reliefe in time; and therfore appealed vnto the further hearing of Amurath himſelfe: yét all ſerued him not, but was by the Baſſaes commaundement in the night hanged vpon a tree neere vnto the gate of the citie, and afterwards cut in pieces.

The Sanzacke of Nouigrad hanged at Buda

Whileſt theſe things were in doing, the emperour ſent his embaſſadours to the great duke of MVSCOVIA, the king of POLONIA, and the prince of TRANSILVANIA, to prooue how they ſtood affected towards thoſe his warres againſt the Turke, and what aid he might procure from them. Into MVSCOVIE was ſent one Warkutſch a gentleman of SILESIA, who comming to
B Mvsco, found in that Court the embaſſadors of the Tartar, the Turke, the Perſian, the Polonian, and the Dane. Of all theſe the embaſſadors of the Tartar and the Turke could haue no audience, but were with contumelious words reiected, as miſcreants. The emperours embaſſadour was honourably entertained, and after the maner of that countrey, a large proportion of wine, mede, aquauita, fleſh, fiſh, and foule of ſundrie ſorts allowed him daily all the time of his abode. At length hauing audience, he declared vnto the great duke the cauſe of his comming, and in the name of his maſter requeſted his aid againſt the Turke. Whereunto the duke anſwered, That he would giue the emperour towards the maintenance of his warres againſt the common enemie, fiue hundred thouſand duckets, and allow him yearely foure hundred thouſand, during the time of that warre; requeſting him not to make any peace with the Turke, and promiſing to ſend him
C aid alſo of men in this warre, if hee ſhould ſo need. The Perſian embaſſadour alſo honourably feaſted the emperours embaſſador, and had with him great conference concerning the warres of the Chriſtians with the Turks, and in his maſters name promiſed the continuation of his warres againſt the Turk, ſo that the emperor would likewiſe promiſe not to haue any league with him, ſo to giue him leiſure to turne all his forces againe into PERSIA. This embaſſador after he had almoſt foure moneths taried in MVSCOVIA, returned to the emperor. At which time doctor Wacker, the emperours embaſſador into POLONIA, retured alſo with ioyfull newes, how that the Polonians with an armie of eight & twentie thouſand had ſtopped the paſſage of an hundred thouſand Tartars, whom the Turk had ſent for againſt the emperor; and that if he needed, he ſhould be aided with the Polonian Coſſacks: But vnto the reſt of his requeſts he could haue no anſwer
D of the ſtates of that kingdome, for that the king was then abſent in SVVEDEN, and was therefore referred to be further anſwered at his returne.

At the ſame time Countie Serinus with three hundred harquebeſiers, and certaine troupes of horſemen, and the footmen of STIRIA, and the countries thereabout aſſembled, to the number of ten thouſand, departed from CANISIA, to beſiege BRESENZA, a caſtle of the Turkes: but they vnderſtanding before of his comming, conueyed away the beſt of their ſubſtance, and ſetting the caſtle on fire, departed the three and twentieth of March. The earle comming thither, tooke the forſaken caſtle, and put thereinto a garriſon of his owne ſouldiors. In like manner he tooke alſo SIGESTA, forſaken of the Turkes, where hee alſo placed a garriſon of the Chriſtians. And ſo going on to BABOSTCHA, beſieged it: which caſtle although it was ſtrongly ſituated
E in a mariſh, and could not eaſily haue been woon, was for all that for feare abandoned by the Turks, and ſo taken by the Countie: by recouery of which places there was a ſafe and eaſie way layed open euen to ZIGET, the Baſſa whereof ſtood in no ſmall doubt to haue been euen then beſieged.

Certaine caſtles of the Turks vpon the borders of Stiria taken by the Countie Serinus.

Amurath intending by all meanes he could to vex the Emperour, had determined to ſend his fleet into the Adriaticke, to beſiege ZEGNA, a cirie of the Emperours, ſituate vpon the ſea coaſt, in the bay QVERNERO, called in auntient time FLANATICVS SINVS. Which the better to effect he ſent one of his Chiaus embaſſadour to the Venetians, to requeſt them, That his fleet might by their leaue paſſe alongſt the Adriaticke, and haue the vſe of their ports and harbours, as need ſhould require. Which his requeſt the Venetians hearing, refuſed in any caſe to yeeld therunto:
F fearing (and not without cauſe) the vnfaithfulneſſe and treacherie of the Turkes, whoſe oathes and promiſes are no longer ſtrong, or by them regarded, than ſtandeth with their owne good and profit: neuertheleſſe, they moſt honorably vſed the embaſſador, and ſo ſent him away, without obtaining of that he was eſpecially ſent for.

In the vpper part of HVNGARIE Chriſtopher lord Teuffenbach the Archdukes lieutenant hauing

uing gathered an armie of twentie thouſand ſouldiors, the ſixteenth of Aprill laid ſiege to HATVVAN, a ſtrong towne, ſix miles from BVDA, fortified with a triple ditch, and bulwarks of exceeding ſtrength. Againſt which although the Chriſtians could not doe much either by mines or mounts, by reaſon it was ſo enuironed with water: yet they ſo ſhut vp all the paſſages thereunto, that nothing could be brought or caried in or out of the towne. They of the town ſeeing themſelues thus blockt vp, by ſecret meſſengers certified the Baſſa of BVDA in what caſe they ſtood, praying him of aid: who with ten thouſand choſen ſouldiours, which he had then in readineſſe, and the Sanzacks of SERNAH, GIVLA, LIPPA, LERVVOGE, and TSCHANGRAD, with fiue thouſand moe, forthwith ſet forward toward HATVVAN to raiſe the ſiege: and the laſt of Aprill being come within ſight of the Chriſtian armie, about one of the clocke in the afternoone encamped on the ſide of the riuer Sagiwa: but when he could not or els durſt not for the deepeneſſe of the way, the abundance of the water, and neereneſſe of the enemie, aduenture to paſſe the riuer, he retired back againe, to paſſe ouer at Iaſperin (otherwiſe called Iasbrin) where the riuer was ioyned with a bridge, and not farre off a good fourd alſo to paſſe ouer at; thinking ſo to haue come vpon the backs of the Chriſtians, and with more ſafetie to haue relieued the beſieged towne. But Teuffenbach perceiuing his purpoſe, forthwith after his departure paſſed the riuer with much difficultie, and ouertaking him with his armie the next day, being the firſt of May, about one of the clock in the afternoone, between ZARCHA and FVSCASALVA, with his great ordinance diſordered the rereward of the enemies battell; and comming on couragiouſly with his whole armie, began a moſt cruell fight: which the Turks a great while endured with wonderfull reſolution: but now deſtitute of their wonted multitude (their greateſt confidence) and hardly layed vnto by the Chriſtians, they in the end turned their backs and fled: whom ſix thouſand Hungarians and Germanes fiercely purſued, and had the killing of them almoſt to BVDA. In this battell the Chriſtians tooke all the enemies great ordinance, with ſeuenteene enſigns, and alſo the caſtle of Iaſperin, which the Turks had for feare abandoned; wherein was found good ſtore of victuals, certaine great pieces, with much other warlike prouiſion. Of this ſo notable a victorie Teuffenbach by letters preſently aduertiſed the Archduke, after he was againe returned to the ſiege of HATVVAN. Which letters becauſe they containe many particularities and circumſtances of this battell, I haue thought it not amiſſe here to inſert.

Although (ſayth he) I haue by a ſpeedie meſſenger vpon the very kalends of May certified your excellencie of the notable victorie, which God of his great goodneſſe gaue vnto vs the ſame day ouer our hereditarie enemie: yet afterward vpon diligent inquiſition wee vnderſtood many particularities, as well of the captiues themſelues, as of the inhabitants about ZOLNOCK, PESTH, and BVDA, whereof I thought good to aduertiſe you. The captiues themſelues confeſſe, That the Baſſa of BVDA, with the Sanzacks of ZOLNOC, ZARVVACE, GIVLA, and TSCHANGRAD, CIPPAIO, GENNE, and others, had with great celeritie raiſed an armie of thirteene thouſand ſouldiours, amongſt whom were many Tartars, with purpoſe to haue relieued the beſieged towne of HATVVAN, and vpon the ſudden to haue oppreſſed vs in our tents: Filled with which hope, they in great haſt came with all their power the laſt of Aprill towards HATVVAN: but for as much as they could not paſſe ouer the riuer Zagiwa, by reaſon of the height of the water, they were the next day, being the firſt of May, conducted by the captaine of Iaſparin to a more commodious paſſage, ſo to come the neerer vnto vs, and the next day in the morning to haue ſurprized vs in our tents. But our moſt mercifull God hath auerted this ſo great a miſchiefe from vs, and turned it vpon their owne heads. For as it is moſt conſtantly reported from ZOLNOC, PESTH, and BVDA, and confirmed by the inhabitants of the ſame places, there are two thouſand fiue hundred of the Turkes ſlaine, and as many wounded, of whom many periſhed, and are found dead vpon the high wayes leading to PESTH and ZOLNOC: of theſe wee haue ſent a thouſand heads to CASSOVIA, and cauſed many of the Turkes to be buried for feare of infection in this ſo great heat. Verely it was a bloudie battell, ſo that the old ſouldiours ſay, they haue not remembred or ſeene the Turkes (no moe in number) to haue ſtood ſo long in battell, and to haue ſo fought it out without flying. Many men of great name and place there periſhed and fell, amongſt whom are redeemed the Sanzacks of PESTH, NOVIGRAD, and TEMESKE: GENNE, ALAVIUS, BOGSTE, ALVSTAFA, MARIELAVS, and certain Chiaus lately ſent from the Court with the Baſſa his guard, wherein were eight hundred right valiant ſoldiors, of whom few eſcaped with life. Many fell that would haue yeelded great ranſome; but it was agreed vpon betweene the Germanes and the Hungarians, not

A to ſpare any of the enemies, but to put them all to ſword; and that whoſoeuer did otherwiſe, it ſhould be imputed vnto him for diſhonour. So that more than ſixteene common ſouldiors, none were taken priſoners, of whom wee might learne how things went amongſt the Turkes, with other circumſtances of the battell. Wee tooke thirteene field pieces, whereof foure were greater than the reſt, which they called organes, and foure and twentie of the enemies enſignes. The Baſſa of BVDA (beſide other three wounds by him receiued) was grieuouſly wounded in the ſide. Of our men were loſt about an hundred, and many of them moſt expert ſouldiors: and about ſix hundred others grieuouſly wounded, of whom there is ſmall hope, many of them being alreadie dead. Neither is the loſſe ſmall wee haue receiued in our horſes and armour, for there be few amongſt the Germane horſemen, which haue not loſt one, two, or three of their horſes or ſeruants, whereby our horſemen are wonderfully weakened: yet
B was the victorie great, to God be the praiſe, to him be the glorie and thankes therefore. Let vs in the meane time proſecute the ſiege begun. The laſt night I commaunded the water to be drawne another way, ſo that now our trenches may be aduanced many paces, and bulwarks raiſed within two hundred paces of the wall. Wee haue alreadie planted fiue great pieces of artillerie in one bulwarke, and hope the next night to place fiue moe vpon a mount faſt by, and will doe what ſhall bee needfull for a ſtraight ſiege: and when time ſhall ſerue, vndertake the towne with all our power, God graunt vs therein good ſucceſſe and victorie.

The Turkes in garriſon at ZABOLA, a fort thereby, diſcouraged with the ouerthrow of their friends, forſooke the fort; which for ſtrength and greatneſſe was comparable with TOCAY or
C ERLA. Which ſtrong place the Chriſtians without any loſſe now recouered.

Whileſt this valiant captaine the lord Teuffenbach thus lay at the ſiege of HATVVAN, Matthias the archduke Generall of the Chriſtian armie in HVNGARIE, encouraged with the good ſucceſſe he had at NOVIGRAD, came with his armie (being 44000 ſtrong) before STRIGONIVM (ſometime the Metropoliticall citie of HVNGARIE, but now of long a ſure receptacle of the Turkes) and the ſixt of May encamped his armie about a quarter of a mile from the caſtle in a moſt pleaſant medow, from whence both the citie and the caſtle were plainely to be ſeene. Vpon whom the Turkes out of the caſtle, and three gallies that lay vpon the riuer, diſcharged certaine great pieces without any great harme doing: but after the Chriſtian fleet was a little before night come downe the riuer, and with their great ordinance began to anſwere
D them againe, the enemie ceaſed ſhooting, and lay ſtill that night. In the meane time it fortuned, that a Turkiſh youth taken in a garden thereby, & brought into the campe and examined, confeſſed that there was no garriſon in the citie, more than foure hundred Ianizaries, and that a new ſupply was daily expected from BVDA. The Chriſtians labouring that night, were by the breaking of the day, come with their trenches to a hil ouer againſt the caſtle, where they placed their batterie, and forthwith began to batter the citie. The ſame day (being the ſeauenth of May) two and twentie Turkes heads were preſented to the archduke, and foure men taken aliue, newly ſent out of the citie to haue viewed the Chriſtian campe. About night certaine bals of wild fire were ſhot into the citie, whereof one fell vpon the tower called S. Adelbert, and ſet it on fire; wherewith firſt the church, and afterward a great part of the towne fell on fire. The Sanzacks
E houſe, with all his horſes and armor, and a great quantitie of pouder was then burnt, and ineſtimable hurt done in the citie. The next day the Chriſtians had with continuall batterie made a breach in the caſtle wall: but adioyning vnto the wall was an high and broad ſandie rampier, which could hardly be battered; for all that the Germans gaue a fierce aſſault vnto the breach, hoping to haue entred by the ruines of the wall, but not being able to get ouer the ſandie rampier, were enforced with loſſe to retire. The day following they began againe the batterie with eighteene great pieces; when about eight a clocke in the morning, the Raſcians that were in the old citie gaue the General to vnderſtand, That if he would at a place by them appointed, aſſault the greater citie to draw the Turks thither, they would in the meane time deliuer vnto the Chriſtians certaine little poſternes, and receiue them into the old citie; vpon condition, that no vio-
F lence ſhould be done vnto them or theirs. Which being ſo agreed vpon, the Chriſtians accordingly gaue the aſſault the eleuenth of May in the euening, and by the helpe of the Raſcians tooke the citie; who according to promiſe were all taken to mercie, and the Turkes ſlaine, except ſuch as by their good hap recouered the new towne. The keeping of this citie was committed to the charge of two companies of German footmen, and ſix hundred Hungarians, with three hundred Rascians and other townesmen. Thus was the old citie of STRIGONIVM gai- G ned by the Christians, the suburbs whereof they presently burnt; neuertheless the new towne with the castle was still holden by the Turkes. Wherefore the Christians hauing cast vp certaine trenches and mounts, and placed their artillerie as they thought most conuenient, began again

The castle as-saulted. to batter the castle, and after they had by the furie of the cannon made it saultable, with great courage assailed the breach, which the Turkes valiantly defended: so that the Christians were glad to retire, leauing behind them about an hundred and thirtie of their sellowes slaine in the breach. The Turkes a little before the comming of the Christians, had fortified an hill, whereunto the castle was something subiect, called of the Christians S. Nicholas his hill; this hill so fortified, the Christians with continuall batterie and assault gained the 17 of May, and put all the Turkes left aliue therein to the sword; and turning the ordinance, from thence also batte- H red the castle. The two and twentith of May a little before the going downe of the Sunne, certaine ensignes of footmen were drawne out of the campe, to haue the next day assaulted the lower towne; who taking the benefit of the night, attempting to haue entred the towne in the dead time of the night, were notably encountred by the Turkes sallying out of the towne vpon them. The Christians for all that hauing enforced them to retire, prosecuted their former resolution, and with much adoe got ouer the vttermost wall: but finding there, contrarie to their expectation, such a deepe and broad countermure as was not possible to be passed, they stood as men dismaied: neither could they in the darkenesse of the night, well see how to get back againe ouer the towne ditch, but disorderly retiring, stucke fast many of them in the deepe mud, and there perished. In this assault there were about a thousand of the Christians wounded and slain: I and albeit that they twise or thrise renewed the assault, yet preuailed they nothing, but were still repulsed with losse. Many also of the Turkish garrison were likewise slaine; yea the Sanzacke himselfe hurt with a great shot, with many other wounded men sent downe the riuer to BVDA, brought thither true newes of the aforesaid assaults, and of the state of the besieged.

The Rascians rise vp against the Turks. In the meane time newes was brought to the campe, That Sinan Bassa the old enemie of the Christians, and the Turks great lieutenent, comming towards HVNGARIE with a great armie, and hauing by boats conuaied ouer part thereof, was set vpon by the Rascians (these are poore oppressed Christians dwelling on both sides of Danubius, who weary of the Turkish thraldome, and desirous of their auncient libertie, haue oftentimes taken vp armes against the Turks, as they now did, encouraged by the good successe of the Christians on the other side of HVN- K GARIE) and that after diuers skirmishes, they had taken thirteene of the Turks vessels, wherein beside victuals and certaine great pieces of artillerie, they found about 2400 waight of powder, 447 hundred of lead, 46454 bundles of match, 1200 great shot, whereof 1005 were of 66 pound waight, and of small shot for harquebusiers 48500, with much other warlike prouision:
a great part whereof was brought into the campe at STRIGONIVM, and the rest reserued to future vses. This losse so troubled the great Bassa, that he altered his purpose before entended for CASSOVIA.

The fourth of Iune, about fiue hundred Turks sent vp the riuer from BVDA, conducted by two Sanzacks vnder two red and white ensignes, landed neere to GOKARA on the farther side of Danubius, ouer against STRIGONIVM: where after they had awhile refreshed themselues, L and left some few for the more assurance of the place, all the rest were conuaied ouer the riuer into STRIGONIVM, where they had been long looked for, the old garrison being now sore weak-ned by the former assaults. Foure daies after, the Turks encouraged with this supply, sallied out vpon a sudden, and had entred one of the forts of the Christians; but were forthwith againe repulsed, hauing lost six and twentie of their men, and two of their ensignes: not farre off lay a troupe of horsemen, who if they had in time come in, not one of the Turks had escaped. Long it were to tell, how often and in what manner the Christians assaulted this citie, but were by the Fiue thousand Christians lost at the siege of Strigonium. Turkes so receiued, that in fiue assaults they lost fiue thousand of their men, amongst whom were diuers captaines, lieutenants, auntients, and others of good account: three and twentie canoniers were also slaine, and ten great pieces of artillerie so spoiled, as that they were no more M seruiceable. The garrison of this citie consisted for most part of the Ianizaries (the Turkes best souldiors) whose notable valour in holding out of this siege, was both of their owne people and their enemies much commended: whatsoeuer was beaten downe by day, that they againe repaired by night; and still relieued with victuall and things necessarie from BVDA, did what was possible

A possible to be done for defence of the citie. About the same time certaine Turkes chancing vpon a troupe of Germane horsemen, in fight slew about fiftie of them, and put the rest to flight: whereupon an alarum being raised in the campe, many ran out to the rescue of their fellowes, taking with them certaine small field pieces. Which the Turkes perceiuing, began to flie: whom the Christians eagerly pursuing, were suddenly assailed by other Turkes, sallying out of a fort fast by, and enforced shamefully to retire, and to leaue their field pieces behind them. Which the Turkes seazing vpon, cloyed them, brake their carriages, and made them altogither vnserviceable.

All this while the lord Teuffenbach lying at the siege of HATVVAN, about this time requested aid of the Archduke, for that his power was with often conflicts, hunger, and other difficulties alwaies attending long sieges, so much weakned, as that he had scarcely six thousand sound men in his camp, to whom the Archduke forthwith sent twelue hundred footmen, being loth to spare any mo, for too much weakening of his owne armie. The Archduke sendeth aid to the siege of Hatwan.

Amurath disdaining to see the frontiers of his empire in so many places impugned by the Christians, and dayly to receiue from them so great harmes, sought by all meanes to bee reuenged: wherefore beside the great power of his owne, which he was now about to send with Sinan Bassa into HVNGARIE, he had also procured from the great Tartar a wonderfull number of those rough and sauage people, to be sent into HVNGARIE, there to ioine with his armie. These wild people to the number of seuentie thousand, according to direction giuen, breaking into PODOLIA, WALACHIA, and MOLDAVIA, gathered togither an incredible number of oxen and kine; to this end and purpose, that driuing them before them, they might both be assured of victuals, and the safer trauell through a part of POLONIA. But when they were come vnto the borders of that countrie, and there found the power of Samoschie the great Chancellor and the Polonian Cossackes in armes, they easily perceiued that they could not that way passe without great losse. Wherefore they placed the aforesaid heards of cattell, some before, some behind, and some on each side of the armie, and so inclosed round about with those cattell as with a trench, marched on. But when they were come neere vnto the Polonians, this rude deuice serued them to no other purpose than the ouerthrow of themselues: for the Polonians discharging their great ordinance, so terrified the cattell, that they turned vpon the Tartars, and ouerthrowing whomsoeuer came in their way, did exceeding much harme: whom the Polonians immediatly following, and hardly charging the confused armie, armed onely with bow and arrowes, after some small fight put them at last to flight, and obtained of them a notable victorie, with an exceeding rich prey. Of the Polonians were lost about eighteene hundred, but of the Tartars were slaine thirtie thousand. The rest retiring into PODOLIA, and passing the riuer Nester by the way of TRANSYLVANIA, where they did exceeding much harme, came to TEMESVVARE, and so afterwards further into HVNGARIE: vnto whom the Turks sent seuen hundred horsemen, to conduct them to the armie.

But to returne againe to the siege of STRIGONIVM. The foureteenth day of Iune the Christians betweene eight and nine of the clocke in the morning with great furie assaulted the town in three places: which assault they most notably maintained, vntill it was almost three a clocke in the afternoone. Neuertheless, the Turkes so valiantly defended themselues, that at last the Christians were glad to giue ouer the assault, and with losse to retire. The Archduke from an high place beholding the assault, had one of his footmen slaine fast by him with a small shot. Many of the Turkes were also slaine in this assault, and amongst them one of the three Sanzacks that defended the citie. The night following there arose a most horrible tempest, with such raging wind, and abundance of raine, that many thought they should neuer haue seen day: with the violence whereof the Archdukes tent was ouerthrowne, and diuers others blowne downe or rent in sunder, were in the aire carried from place to place. About the same time the lord Palfi within the sight of the castle cast vp a notable fort, with high mounts and strong trenches (euen in the selfesame place where Solyman lay about fiftie yeares before, when he besieged and woon STRIGONIVM (by which fort so built, the enemie was embarred to conuey any thing vp the riuer for reliefe of the citie, to the great discomfiture of the besieged: for to haue hindered the which worke, the enemie oftentimes sallied out, but to no purpose. This fort being brought to perfection, the Christians tooke also another fort in an island on the further side of the riuer, which the Turkes had but few daies before taken from the Christians, and cloyed the great pieces there- Strigonium assaulted.

in: which fort the Christians now againe repaired, furnished it with a sufficient garrison and other great ordinance. G

Strigonium fore battered.

These things thus done, the castle and the lower towne were in fiue diuers places out of the new built fort, the old towne, and the island, so battered with continuall shot, that a man should haue said, that one stone would not haue beene left vpon another, but that all should haue beene beaten downe and laied euen with the ground. The seuenteenth of Iune one of the Christian canoniers so dismounted one of the great pieces in the castle, that the piece togither with the Turkish canonier that had charge thereof fell downe out of the castle into the ditch. And the same day a mason that fled out of the castle into the campe, amongst other things reported, That many of the Turks were slaine with this continuall batterie and often assaults, and that not past H an houre before fortie of them were slaine in one chamber, and now acknowledged themselues to be indeed besieged: and to haue resolued, that when they were brought to the last cast, then desperatly to sallie out vpon the Christians, and so either to return with victorie, or to make shift euery man for himselfe as he might. Which his report seemed not altogither faigned: for about midnight a thousand of the Turks sallying out of the castle vpon the fort newly built vpon the riuer, in hope to haue surprised it, were by the Christians therein notably repulsed and enforced to retire: in which conflict fiftie of the Turkes were slaine, and many moe wounded and taken prisoners. And the same day toward euening eight Turks of good sort being taken & brought into the campe, confessed, That but six daies before, they had seene seuen boats full of wounded and dead men sent downe the riuer from STRIGONIVM to BVDA. Whereby it was easily to bee I gathered how bloodie a siege this was vnto the Turks, for as much as all those bodies were the bodies of men of good account and place; for the bodies of such common souldiors as were slaine, they still threw into the riuer running by

The new built fort hardly assaulted by the Turkes.

The fort newly built vpon the banke of Danubius, much troubled the besieged Turkes in STRIGONIVM, because nothing could without danger of it be sent vp the riuer for their relieſe, Wherefore they by fit messengers sent word out of the castle vnto the Admirall of the Turkes gallies lying below in the riuer, That he should at an appointed time come vp the riuer with his gallies as high as the fort, and on that side at leastwise to make shew as if he would assault it: at which time they of the towne would be likewise readie to sallie out, and to assaile it indeed on the other side by land. The Admirall accordingly came vp the riuer with his gallies, and by dis- K charging of certaine great pieces, made shew as if he would on that side haue battered the fort: but was so welcommed thereout of, that he was glad with his rent gallies quickly to fall downe the riuer againe further off out of danger. But whiles the thundring shot was thus flying too and fro towards the riuer, they of the towne sallying out, assaulted the fort on the other side toward the land, and that with such desperat resolution, that some of them were got vp to the top of the rampiers, and there for the space of two houres maintained a most cruell fight: wherein many of them were slaine, and wounded, and the rest enforced with shame to retire.

The Christians thus still lying at the siege, and intentiue to all occasions, partly by their espials, and partly by such as they had taken prisoners, vnderstood, that a new supplie both of men and victuals was shortly to be put into STRIGONIVM: and therefore sent out certaine companies of soldiors, who lying in two conuenient places, the one vpon the riuer, the other by land, L might intercept the said supply. Both which places were before by the prouident enemie possessed: who suddenly assayling the Christians comming thither, and fearing no such matter, slew some of them, and put the rest to flight: who neuertheles in their retreat, brake the bridge which the Turkes had made of boats vnder the castle of STRIGONIVM ouer Danubius. Of which boats some were carried away with the violence of the streame, & of the rest thirtie fell into the hands of the Christians, without losse of any man more than fiue, who making too much hast out of a little boat, fell into the riuer, & so perished. In this time, Fame the forerunner of all great attempts had brought newes into the Christian campe, That Sinan Bassa the Turks great Generall was comming to the relieſe of STRIGONIVM: of whose power, diuers diuersly reported. But the greater part doubting the worst, and wearie of the long siege and of the calamities in- M cident thereunto, added still something to the last report, to make the danger of longer stay to seeme the greater: certaine it is, that the newes of the comming of so great and puissant an enemie, raised many a troubled thought in the minds of so great a multitude. Now were the besieged Turkes in great wants in STRIGONIVM, as appeared by letters intercepted from the San-

A zacke to the Baſſa of Byda, declaring vnto him the hard eſtate of the beſieged, and humbly craauing his promiſed helpe, without which the citie could not for want of victuals poſſibly be defended by the fainting ſouldiors aboue three daies. Which letters being read in the campe, cauſed great preparation to be made for the continuing of the ſiege & the withſtanding of the enemie, whoſe comming was euery houre expected. All this while the great ordinance neuer ceaſed on either ſide: wherby many were ſlaine, as well of the Chriſtians as of the Turks; and amongſt others many of the cannoniers.

But for as much as the rife fame of Sinan Baſſaes comming encreaſed dayly, and the Chriſtian campe poſſeſſed with a generall feare, gaue vnto the wiſe iuſt ſuſpition of ſome great miſchiefe likely to enſue: Matthias the Generall entered into counſell with countie Ferdinand Hardeck,
B the lord Palfi, the lord Vngenade preſident of the counſell for the warres, and Eraſmus Eraun gouernor of Comora, What were beſt to be done in ſo dangerous a time? who with generall conſent agreed betimes (before the comming of Sinan) to raiſe the ſiege, and to remoue with the armie into ſome place of more ſafetie. Which their determinat reſolution, the day following, being the ſix and twentieth of Iune, they made knowne to the other princes and great commanders in the armie: who wonderfully diſcontented therwith, eſpecially the Germans, both openly by word, and ſolemnly by writing, proteſted againſt the ſame, as moſt diſhonourable, and altogither made without their knowledge or good liking. To whom the preſident of the counſell for their further ſatisfaction, declared, That the enemie was comming with a very great armie,
C and euen now at hand, whoſe ſtrength encreaſed daily, and with what power hee had purpoſed to aſſaile them in their tents, was vncertaine: beſides that, it was manifeſtly knowne vnto the world, how that in the former aſſaults they had loſt many of their beſt ſouldiors, beſide others that died in the camp: and that the place wherin they lay encamped, was ſubiect to many dangers: For which ſo vrgent cauſes the General had reſolued to raiſe his ſiege, and before the comming of ſo ſtrong an enemie, to remoue his armie into a place of more ſafetie. Which reaſons for all that did not ſo well ſatisfie the Germane princes and commanders, but that they ſtill vrged their former proteſtation, requeſting his excellencie to haue them excuſed before God and the world, if they yeelding to his commaund, as to their Generall, did that which they thought not altogither beſt, and which they would not haue otherwiſe done. For the more euidence
D whereof, the ſaid Germane princes and great commanders cauſed their ſaid proteſtation to bee ſolemnly conceiued in writing, which they firmed with their ſeales, and ſubſcribed with their owne hands in order as followeth: Francis duke of Saxonie, Auguſtus duke of Brvnsvvick, Sebaſtian Schlick, countie Wigand Maltzan, Erneſtus of Alstan, Henry Phluck, Iohn Nicholas Ruſwormb, Henrie Curwigger Heerrath, Iohn Oberhavsen, Henrie Rottcirch, Melchior of Nothvvith.

But the Archduke with the reſt conſtant in their former reſolution, firſt ſent away the great ordinance, and raiſing the ſiege the eight and twentieth of Iune, followed after with the whole armie, paſſing ouer Danubius not farre from Kokara, doubtfully expecting what courſe Sinan the great Baſſa (who was then reported to be euen at hand) would take. Yet before their departure they ſet the old towne on fire, and raſed the fort S. Nicholas, before taken from the enemie,
E which they had once purpoſed to haue kept. This vnexpected departure of the chriſtians much gladded the beſieged Turkes: who for want of victuals had not been able long to haue holden out. Yet lay the lord Teuffenbach ſtill at the ſiege of Hatvvan, labouring by all meanes to take from the beſieged Turks their water, and with earth and faggots to fill vp their ditches, which worke he had now happily brought to ſome good perfection. Whereof they in the towne by letters aduertiſed the Baſſa of Byda, and that except they were within the ſpace of three daies relieued, they ſhould be enforced to yeeld the towne. Which their diſtreſſe the Baſſa conſidering, with ſpeed aſſembled all his forces, & ſo ſet forward to relieue them, hoping to haue come vpon the Chriſtians before they were aware of his comming. But Teuffenbach vnderſtanding thereof,
F with fiue thouſand choſen horſemen went out of the campe to meet him, & ſuddenly comming vpon him, fearing no ſuch thing, ſlew fiue thouſand of the Turks, put the Baſſa to flight, and togither with the victorie obtained an exceeding rich prey.

The Archduke raiſeth his ſiege, and with his armie paſſeth the riuer.

Fiue thouſand Turks ſlaine.

Now was there no leſſe expectation and hope of the winning or yeelding vp of Hatvvan, than was before of Strigonivm: but according to the chance of warre it fell out otherwiſe. For Teuffenbach hauing with continuall batterie layed the breaches faire open, and made choiſe of ſuch ſouldiors as he thought meeteſt for the aſſault, was in the performing thereof ſo notably repulſed by the Turks, that he was glad to retire with the loſſe of his beſt and moſt reſolut ſouldiors: which put him out of all hope of taking the towne by force. For beſide the loſſe of theſe good men, he had ſcarce ſo many ſound men left, as might ſuffice to furniſh his garriſons for defence of thoſe frontires: by reaſon that the Hungarians were almoſt all ſhrunk home, and of the Germans were left ſcarce two thouſand. Beſides that he had oftentimes craued new ſupplies of the Archduke, but all in vaine: for which cauſes he was glad to abandon two ſtrong forts he had built before HATVVAN, and to leaue the towne now brought to great extremitie. Thus two notable cities, which were now as it were in the hands of the Chriſtians, and by the recouerie whereof the broken ſtate of the afflicted Chriſtians in HVNGARIE had bin much ſtrengthened, were as it were againe reſtored vnto the barbarous and cruell enemie. Teuffenbach ſiueth ouer the ſiege of Hatwan

Whileſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege of STRIGONIVM and HATVVAN, the Raſcians (of whom we haue before ſpoken) ſtriuing ſtill more and more to rid themſelues from the Turkiſh thraldome, gathered themſelues togither to the number of fifteene thouſand, betweene BVDA and BELGRADE, vnder a Generall of their owne chuſing. For feare of whom, the Baſſa of TEMESVVAR with an armie of foureteene thouſand, went to fortifie and victuall LIPPA, doubting leaſt it ſhould by them bee ſurpriſed: but hauing done that he went for, in his returne he was met with by the ſame Raſcians, and twice fought withall in one day, and both times put to the worſe, with the loſſe of the greateſt part of his armie. After which victorie the Raſcians tooke BECZKEREK a ſtrong towne, ſtanding in a marſh foure miles from BELGRADE, and ſlew all the Turkes they found therein. After that they tooke a caſtle called OTTADT, and dealt with the Turkes in like manner. From thence they went and beſieged BECHE, a caſtle ſtanding vpon the riuer Tibiſcus or Teiſe, where the town adioyning vnto it yeelded preſently; but they in the caſtle ſtanding a while vpon their guard, offered at laſt to yeeld alſo vpon certaine conditions. But the Raſcians knowing that the Turks thereabouts had conuaied into that caſtle the beſt part of their wealth, and withall that it was but weakely manned, would accept of no conditions, but needs haue it abſolutely deliuered vp to their pleaſure. In the meane time the old Baſſa of TEMESVVAR and his ſonne, knowing it to tend to their diſhonour to ſuffer this baſe people ſo to rage at their pleaſure about them, gathered togither 11000 Turkes, and ſo in great haſt came to relieue the beſieged caſtle. Vpon whom the Raſcians turned themſelues, and in plain battell ouerthrew the Baſſa, & ſo purſued the victorie, that of thoſe 11000 Turks ſcarcely eſcaped 1000: the Baſſa himſelfe being there ſlain, and with him three Sanzacks, his ſonne eſcaped by flight. In this battell the Raſcians tooke 18 great pieces of artillerie: and not long after tooke alſo WERSETZ and LVTZ, two ſtrong places. After which ſo happie ſucceſſe, they ſent vnto the archduke Matthias for aid, but eſpecially for canoniers, profeſſing themſelues now vtter enemies vnto the Turkes. The Raſcians alſo about TEMESVVAR ſent word vnto the other in the campe, that they would come and ioine with them. And they which inhabite the countrie betweene the riuers Danubius and Tibiſcus, by meſſengers ſent of purpoſe vnto the lord Teuffenbach (the archdukes lieutenant in the vpper part of HVNGARIE) offered in ſhort time to ſend him ten or twelue thouſand men, ſo that he would receiue them and their countrie into the emperors protection; which he eaſily granted them, & therof aſſured them by writing. And to the archduke himſelfe they ſent alſo their truſty meſſengers, requeſting him to ſend them a Generall to leade them, promiſing vnto him all obedience: which meſſengers departing from them the fourteenth of Iune, ſhortly after returned with ſuch anſwere as was thought moſt conuenient for their preſent ſtate. Thus againſt the comming of Sinan, was HVNGARIE almoſt all on a broile. I K L

A Diet of the empire holden at Ratiſbone for the withſtanding of the Turkes.

The emperour long before diſtruſting the Turkes purpoſe for warre, and well conſidering what a difficultie it would be for him with his owne forces only to withſtand ſo puiſſant an enemie as was Amurath; had by his embaſſadours praied aid of diuers Chriſtian princes, but eſpecially of them of the empire, as thoſe whom this warre concerned moſt. Wherefore he after the ancient and wonted maner of his ſtate in ſo common and imminent a danger, appointed a generall aſſembly of the Princes and States of the empire, to be holden at RATISBONE, in the latter end of Februarie: which for ſundrie vrgent cauſes was put off vntill March, and againe vntill Aprill, and ſo afterward vntill May. At which time the emperour in perſon himſelfe, with the Princes Electors, and other the great States of the empire, being met togither with great M

A pompe at RATISBONE, and ſolemnely aſſembled in the Biſhops pallace, began there to ſit in counſell the 2. of Iune. Vnto which princes and ſtates ſo aſſembled, after that the emperour had firſt by the mouth of Philip Countie Palatine of RHENE, giuen great thanks for their ſo readie apparance, & briefly declared the cauſe of their aſſembly; he himſelfe after ſome complaint made of the Turkiſh infidelity, in expreſſe words declared vnto them, how that he by his embaſſadour then lying at CONSTANTINOPLE, had in the yeare 1591 made a league for eight yeares, with the preſent Turkiſh Sultan Amurath: which league Amurath himſelfe had approued and confirmed, and thereof ſent him publike and ſolemne inſtruments: wherein it was prouided, That no hoſtilitie ſhould bee on either ſide during that time attempted. And yet notwithſtanding that he, contrarie to his faith giuen, as an hereditarie enemie of the Chriſtians, had violated this league, and by ſundrie incurſions barbarouſly ſpoyled and waſted, not HVNGARIE onely, but other of his imperiall prouinces alſo: But eſpecially by Haſſan Baſſa of BOSNA, who firſt with a ſtrong armie beſieged, battered, and tooke REPITZ, an ancient frontier caſtle, and after that WIHITZ, DRENIK, CRASSOVVITZ, with other places of name: And had in his dominion and territorie built PETRINIA, a moſt ſtrong fort, hurtfull to all that countrey, out of which hee had done incredible miſchiefe in CROATIA, WINDISMARCH, and the moſt fruitfull iſland TVROPOLIE; and had out of thoſe places carried away aboue fiue and thirtie thouſand Chriſtians into moſt miſerable captiuitie. Of which ſhamefull iniuries and breach of faith, he had many times by his embaſſadours complained vnto the Turkiſh Sultan at CONSTANTINOPLE, and requeſted, that all hoſtilitie ſet apart, due reſtitution might haue been made, but to haue therein preuailed nothing: and that the ſame Baſſa in ſtead of condigne puniſhment, had been for the doing thereof honoured by the great Sultan his lord with honourable gifts, the ſure tokens of his fauour: Whereby he was ſo confirmed in his barbarous proceedings, that he began to make open warre, and hauing raiſed a full army, and ſtrengthened alſo with certain companies of Ianizaries ſent from the Court, had paſſed ouer the riuer of Kulp, and beſieged the caſtle of SISEG: but by the iuſt iudgement of God the reuenger of wrongs, had there receiued the reward of his faithleſſe and cruell dealing, being there ſlaine, and almoſt all his armie vtterly deſtroyed by his ſmall forces, raiſed in haſte for his owne lawfull defence. Neuertheleſſe the faithleſſe Turke (as if hee had beene highly wronged himſelfe) to haue made this his breach both of league and faith forthwith knowen to all the world, by commanding open warre to be ſolemnly proclaimed againſt the kingdome of HVNGARIE, both in CONSTANTINOPLE and BVDA: and by the Beglerbeg of GRÆCE, to haue againe beſieged and taken the ſtrong fortreſſe of SISEG. Whereas on the other ſide (becauſe nothing ſhould on his part be wanting, which might make his deſire of peace more knowne) hee had againe, and oftentimes by his embaſſadour put the Turke in remembrance of his league made, and confirmed by his faith: who for all that had changed nothing of his purpoſe, but ſent his great Vilier Sinan Baſſa with the Beglerbeg of GRÆCIA, and many inferiour Baſſaes and Sanzackes into HVNGARIE, who with fire and ſword enforced the inhabitants and countrey people (ſuch as they left aliue) to ſweare vnto the Turke obedience, and to become his ſubiects: and at the ſame time tooke VESPRINIVM and PALOTTA, two famous fortreſſes of that kingdome. And that the ſame Baſſa by commandement from his lord and maſter, had contrary to the law of nations impriſoned Frederik Kreckowitz his embaſſadour, firſt at CONSTANTINOPLE, and cauſed the greater part of his followers to bee thruſt into the gallies; and afterwards to haue ſent him with a few of his ſeruants to BELGRADE, and there to haue kept him ſo long in priſon, that he there miſerably died. In reuenge of which ſo great and open wrong, and for the defence and comfort of his afflicted ſubiects ſo neere the enemie, he had raiſed a good ſtrength both of horſe and foot, by whoſe helpe and the aſſiſtance of almightie God, the Baſſa of BOSNA had reaped the fruit of his perfidious dealing: as had alſo the Baſſa of BVDA, with many thouſands of their great ſouldiors, ouerthrowne neere vnto ALBA REGALIS; beſides many of their caſtles and townes taken or raſed. Yet for all that was it eaſie to be ſeene, theſe ſo great victories by the goodneſſe of God had and obtained againſt ſo mightie and cruell an enemie, not to ſuffice; but that there was ſtill need of a perſeuerant and continual ſupply for the maintenance of a perpetual warre: and that it was daily to be expected, or rather euen now preſently to be deſcried, That the Turke in his quarrell which hee deemeth alwaies iuſt againſt the Chriſtians, & in reuenge of theſe ouerthrowes, would draw forth all his forces, and aduenture his whole ſtrength. For which cauſes he had by the knowledge and conſent defence for HVNGARIE (now in danger) at length prouided; being the moſt ſure defence and ſtrongeſt bulwarke of that part of Chriſtendome. And that whereas his owne hereditarie prouinces were not of themſelues alone ſufficient to maintaine ſo chargeable a war, he therefore requeſted the Electors, Princes, and States both preſent and abſent, not to grudge to be preſent with their helpe, their counſell, and whatſoeuer elſe ſhould bee needfull againſt ſo puiſſant and dangerous an enemie. So ending his ſpeech, he cauſed all his demaunds before conceiued into H writing to be read, and ſo deliuered vnto them. For anſwering whereunto, the Princes electors and others there preſent required time; which granted, after many ſittings & long conſultations they at laſt with one conſent anſwered, That it was a hard matter by reaſon of the late dearth, and other like occaſions, for them to grant ſuch help and aid as the emperour had in writing required: yet hauing before their eies the great and imminent danger wherein the Chriſtian common weale then ſtood, they not regarding their own proper and neere difficulties, had in regard of his ſacred and imperiall maieſtie, for the comfort and defence of the endangered Chriſtians, and for the repreſſing of the Turkiſh furie, of their owne free will and meere compaſſion, granted beſide their accuſtomed contribution, ſuch farther reliefe for the ſpace of ſix yeares, as they thought ſufficient for the maintenance of a defenſiue warre, both for the preſent and the time to I come. What was by them farther decreed concerning the emperors other demands, as not pertinent to our purpoſe, we willingly paſſe ouer.

Sinan Baſſa with an army of 150 thouſand betweene Buda & Alba Regalis.

Of all theſe things, as alſo whatſoeuer elſe had happened at STRIGONIVM, HATVVAN, or other places of HVNGARIE, was not Sinan Baſſa ignorant: who now euen vpon the departure of the Chriſtians from STRIGONIVM, was come with an huge armie betweene BVDA and ALBA REGALIS: vnto whom alſo fortie thouſand Tartars, that by force had made themſelues way through PODOLIA and the vpper part of HVNGARIE, had now ioyned themſelues: ſo that in his armie were reckoned aboue an hundred and fiftie thouſand fighting men; to the great terrour, not onely of HVNGARIE, AVSTRIA, STIRIA, CROATIA, BOHEMIA, and the prouinces thereabout, but alſo of the whole ſtate of GERMANIE. With this great armie the old Baſſa had purpoſed to haue ouerwhelmed the Chriſtians in their campe at STRIGONIVM: but now that they were before his comming departed ouer the riuer towards COMARA, he reſolued to keepe on his way, and to beſiege the ſtrong citie IAVRINVM, now called RAB. And to make all ſure before him, he thought it beſt to take in his way DOTIS, a ſtrong towne of the Chriſtians, in the mid way between STRIGONIVM and RAB, about fiue Hungarian miles ſhort of RAB. The Chriſtian armie but newly paſſed ouer Danubius, in marching towards KOMARA, might ſee the mountains and fields on the other ſide of the riuer all couered with the multitude of the Turks armie: who though they were in deed many, yet marching diſperſedly, made ſhow of moe than in truth they were. So both armies marching in ſight the one of the other, and ſeparated onely with the L
riuer, held on their way: the Chriſtians to KOMARA, where they encamped vnder the verie wals of the citie, yet in ſuch ſort, as that they might a farre off well deſcrie one another; and the Turkes towards DOTIS, where the Baſſa with all his armie encamped the 21 day of Iuly. The night following, hauing planted his batterie, he began in furious manner to batter the caſtle, the chiefe ſtrength of the towne; the Chriſtian armie looking on, but not daring at ſo great ods to relieue their diſtreſſed friends. So whiles the Baſſa granteth no breathing time vnto the beſieged, but tireth them out with continuall batterie and alarums, they of the towne diſpairing of their owne ſtrength, and to be able for any long time to hold out againſt ſo mightie an enemy, within three dayes after yeelded the towne, being in that ſhort time ſore battered, and in diuers places vndermined: yet with this condition, That it ſhould be lawfull for the garriſon ſoldiors and townesmen, with their wiues & children in ſafetie to depart. Which was vnto them by the Baſſa frankly granted, but not ſo faithfully performed: for at their departure many of their wiues and children were ſtaied by the Turks, and the lord Baxi Gouernour of the towne fouly entreated. Immediatly after, the Baſſa without much adoe tooke S. Martins caſtle alſo, not farre DOTIS, being by the captaine yeelded vnto him. M

Dotis and Saint Martins yeelded to the Turks

In

A In the meane time the countrey villages round about forſaken of the poore Chriſtians, were by the Turks moſt miſerably burnt, and all the countrey laied waſt. Yea ſome of the forerunners of the Turks armie paſſing ouer the riuer Rabnitz, ran into the country as farre as ALTENBVRG, within fiue miles of VIENNA, burning the country villages as they went, and killing the poore people, or that worſe was, carying them away into perpetuall captiuitie: yet not without ſome loſſe, foure hundred of theſe roaming forragers being cut off by the lord Nadaſti. Palfi alſo, and Brun Gouernour of KOMARA following in the taile of the Turkes armie, ſet vpon them that had the charge of the victuals; of whom they ſlew a great number, tooke 120 of them priſoners, and 150 camels, and 30 mules laded with meale and rice, which they carried away with them to KOMARA.

B DOTIS and S. Martins thus taken, Sinan Baſſa conſtant in his former determination, ſet forward againe towards RAB, and being come within a mile of the citie, there encamped; the Chriſtian armie then lying not far off on the other ſide of the riuer. This citie of RAB is a ſtrong Rab. and populous citie, honored with a Biſhops See, and was worthily accounted the ſtrongeſt bulwarke of VIENNA, from whence it is diſtant about twelue Germane miles, ſtanding vpon the South ſide of Danubius, whence the riuer diuiding it ſelfe, maketh a moſt fertile iſland called SCHVT; in the Eaſt point whereof ſtandeth the ſtrong citie of KOMARA. The defence of this citie of RAB was commited to Countie Hardek, a man of greater courage than fidelitie, with a garriſon of twelue hundred choiſe ſouldiors, vnto whom a little before the comming of the Baſſa were certaine companies of Italians ioyned, who together with the citizens made vp the C number of fiue thouſand able men: a ſtrength in all mens iudgement ſufficient for the long defence of that place. The laſt of Iuly (Matthias the Archduke about the going downe of the Sunne departing out of the citie of RAB, ouer the riuer into the iſland ouer againſt it) came Sinan Baſſa with his huge armie and beſet it round, caſting vp trenches and mounts, whereon hee skilfully placed his gabions and great artillerie, and whatſoeuer elſe was neceſſarie for ſo great a ſiege: and that with ſuch celeritie, as was to the beholders thought moſt ſtrange. The ſecond of Auguſt, he with great furie battered the citie, and brought his trenches within musket ſhot of the wals. At which time foure thouſand Tartarian horſmen ſwam ouer the Danubius betweene RAB and KOMARA; after whom followed ſix thouſand Turkes, who being with much adoe got ouer to the farther ſide, ſuddenly ſurpriſed a fort of the Chriſtians next vnto the riuer; and The Turks and Tartars paſſing ouer the riuer, ouerthrowne.
D forthwith turning fiue great pieces of ordinance which they found therein, diſcharged them vpon the campe of the Chriſtians: who terrified with the ſudden accident, riſe vp all in armes, and hardly charging thoſe deſperat aduenturers, ſlew many of them; eſpecially ſuch as ſeeking after bootie had diſperſed themſelues from their fellowes, and forced the reſt againe to take the riuer, wherin moſt of them periſhed. About fiue daies after, the Tartarians (liuing for moſt part vpon The Tartarians the ſecond time ouerthrowne. prey) ſwam againe ouer the riuer, and vpon the ſudden burnt a village in the iſland, and ſlew certaine Chriſtians in their tents; but being quickly encountred by the Chriſtian horſemen, they were eaſily ouerthrown, and many of them ſlain: the reſt caſting away their weapons and forſaking their horſes, ran headlong into the riuer, truſting more to their ſwimming than to their fighting; whom the Chriſtians hardly purſuing, in the verie riuer ſlew about two thouſand of them: E and by this victory obtained many of the Tartarians ſwift horſes, with their ſcimitars, their bows and arrowes, and ſuch enſignes as they had. All this while Sinan Baſſa without intermiſſion, lay Rab battered. thundring with threeſcore great pieces of battery againſt the citie: but to little or ſmall purpoſe, for as yet he had made no breach whereby to enter, but the harme that was done, was vpon the towers, or high built houſes, or in the campe, by ſuch randon ſhot as flying ouer the towne, fell by chance among the tents of the Chriſtians. And the Ianizaries intentiue to all opportunities, in a great raine furiouſly and with a moſt horrible cry (as their manner is) aſſaulted an vtter bulwarke of the Chriſtians, which they for feare forſook, and retired themſelues into the citie; vpon which bulwarke ſo taken, the Ianizaries had ſet vp three of their enſignes: When the Chriſtians aſhamed of that they had done, and better aduiſed, taking courage vnto them, forthwith ſallied
F out againe, and couragiouſly charging the Ianizaries but now entred, ſlew many of them, and recouered againe the bulwarke.

Sinan Baſſa leauing nothing vnattempted that might further his deſire for the winnig of the A Baſſa ſlaine. citie, was now caſting vp a great mount againſt the citie: which whileſt he daily ſurueyed, hee chanced to fall ſicke, and therfore appointed one of the Baſſaes in his owne ſtead to ouerſee the worke:

worke; who whileſt he was walking too and fro, haſtening the worke, and commaunding this G and that thing to be done, he was taken with a ſhot out of the towne and ſlaine.

The fifteenth of Auguſt certaine Turks before the riſing of the Sunne getting ouer Danubius in boats, aſſailed a fort of the Chriſtians: which the ſouldiours that had the keeping of it, preſently forſooke, and left it to the enemie. Which Iohn de Medices, lately come into the campe with two thouſand Italians, perceiuing, forthwith came to the reſcue of the fort, draue out the Turks, and hauing ſlaine diuers of them, forced the reſt into the riuer, where they were all drowned. At which time 5000 Tartars in another place, paſſing ouer the riuer into the iſland were encountered by the lord Palfi and the Huſſars his followers, and without any great reſiſtance put to flight, wherein many of them were ſlaine: the reſt taking the riuer, were in good hope to haue got ouer, and ſo to haue ſaued themſelues. But other Turks meeting them in the riuer, H would with their weapons haue beaten them back, and ſtayed their flight: againſt whom the Tartars oppoſing themſelues, made with them in the very riuer a moſt cruell fight, but with ſuch loſſe vnto the Tartars, that of the fiue thouſand which aduentured ouer, few returned to carrie newes vnto their fellowes how they had ſped. Now began great ſcarcitie of victuals in the Turks campe, ſo that the ſouldiors were faine to feed vpon vnripe fruit and ſuch other vnwholeſome things: whereof enſued the bloudie flix, with many other dangerous diſeaſes: which raging amongſt them, did wonderfully conſume the Baſſaes armie. Beſide that, they of the citie with continuall ſhot had ſlaine many, and amongſt them a ſonne in law of the great Baſſaes, whoſe death he is reported to haue taken ſo vnpatiently, that he fell ſick for griefe, but in ſhort time after paſſed it ouer, and recouered againe. I

A fight in the riuer betwixt the Turks and the Tartars.

The Tartars not yet warned by their often loſſes, but paſſing againe ouer the riuer into the iſland the nineteenth of this moneth, were there three thouſand of them ſlaine. In the mean time certaine companies alſo of the Turks hauing ſecretly paſſed the riuer, in another quarter aſſayled the Chriſtians in their campe: in which hurlyburly other of the Tartars got ouer the riuer not farre from KOMARA, hoping now at length to performe ſome great matter, which they had before ſo often to their coſt vainely attempted. But finding the Turks ouerthrowne before their comming, and the Chriſtians (contrarie to their expectation) in armes readie to receiue them, they were eaſily diſcomfited, and two thouſand of them ſlaine. In this conflict the Sanzacke of STRIGONIVM, with two others, and many moe of great account among the Turkes periſhed. Shortly after the Chriſtians ſallying out of the citie, ſlew a great number of the Turkes, and ſo K retired with ſmall loſſe. Thus was the Turks armie dayly deminiſhed, beſides that the want of victuals with the bloudie flix ſo increaſed, that many perſwaded the Baſſa to haue raiſed his ſiege, and to haue remooued with his armie to ſome other more wholeſome place, and of greater plentie: but he reſolutely ſet downe not to depart before he had either woon the towne, or enforced them therein to yeeld, would not hearken to any perſwaſions to the contrarie.

Whileſt Sinan thus lay at the ſiege of RAB, Maximilian the Emperours brother tooke Craſtowitz, a fortreſſe of the Turks vpon the borders of CROATIA, and put to ſword all the Turks there in garriſon. After that he layed ſiege to PETRINIA, a ſtrong fortreſſe of the Turks, which they but a few yeares before had contrarie to the league built in the Emperours territorie, for the annoying of CROATIA, and for the exceeding ſtrength thereof was thought almoſt impregnable. Yet ſuch was the induſtrie of Maximilian and his ſouldiors, that what with continuall batterie and mines they ſo terrified the Turks there in garriſon, that they for feare ſet fire on the fort, and flying away by night made ſhift euery man for himſelfe, as he might. Which they in the caſtle of SISEG hearing, ſet fire alſo vpon it, and ſo left it to the Chriſtians: whoſe example they alſo of GARA followed: by which ſo proſperous and happie ſucceſſe of Maximilians, not the frontiers only, but euen the whole countrey of CROATIA was for that time deliuered of a wonderfull trouble and no leſſe danger. L

A great skirmiſh betwixt the Turks and the Chriſtians.

The eight and twentith day of Auguſt twentie thouſand of the Chriſtians paſſing ouer the riuer by a bridge out of the iſland, and ioyning with them of the towne, ſallied out vpon the Turks camp. The Hungarian Heidons in the foreward at the firſt onſet tooke two of the Turks M bulwarks; and hauing beaten out the enemies, cloyed certaine of their great pieces: but the Turks returning with greater power, enforced the Chriſtians to retire, and recouered again their loſt bulwarks. In this conflict many were ſlaine, as well Chriſtians as Turks. In the meane while Thonhauſe a great captaine of the Chriſtians, and Geitzhofler, countie Hardecke his lieutenant,

A nant, with fifteene hundred Hungarians and Germane footmen came in great boats to haue holpen their fellowes, but landing ſomewhat too late, they were by the enemie beaten back, and enforced with ſuch ſpeed to retire, that many of them being not able to recouer the boats, were drowned in the riuer, amongſt whom Geitzhofler himſelfe periſhed, and Thonhauſe was deadly wounded in his breaſt. Yet the Chriſtians not diſcouraged with this loſſe, but gathering themſelues together vnder the very wals of the citie, gaue a ſecond aſſault vnto the enemie. In the foreward were the footmen, who were by the enemies horſemen eaſily repulſed: but by the comming in of the lord Rinsberg (who was at the firſt onſet ſlaine) the Turks were enforced into their trenches, except ſome few, which deuided from the reſt hid themſelues in the vineyards, but being found out by the Chriſtians, were there all ſlaine. In this skirmiſh the lord Palfi was
B grieuouſly wounded in his thigh. Of the Chriſtians were ſlaine foure hundred, and of the Turks about two thouſand. Theſe conflicts endured from ſeuen a clock in the morning vntill twelue, at which time the Chriſtians returning into the citie, and ſo into the campe, amongſt other ſpoyles carried away with them ſeuenteene of the enemies enſignes.

Two thouſand Turks ſlain, and 17 of their enſignes taken.

No day now paſſing without ſome skirmiſh, at length the ninth of September ten thouſand Turkes, ſome in boates, ſome by other meanes, hauing got ouer the riuer of Danubius into the iſland of SCHVT, ſuddenly ſet vpon the Chriſtians, all ſleeping in ſecuritie, and little fearing any ſuch danger: of whom they ſlew about two thouſand, and after ſome ſmall fight put the reſt to moſt ſhamefull flight, in ſuch ſort, that Matthias the Archduke himſelfe with the other noblemen and captaines had much adoe by flight to eſcape. Thus whileſt euery man ſurprized with
C feare, made what ſhift he could for himſelfe; the enemie in the meane time entered the trenches, tooke their tents, the great ordinance, the ſhot and pouder, and all the money which but a little before was brought for the ſouldiors pay; beſides about a thouſand waggons, and two hundred boats well loaded with prouiſion for the campe, and ten gallies, wherein were an hundred and twentie pieces of great ordinance. The loſſe receiued this day was valued at fiue hundred thouſand duckats. And albeit that this victorie coſt the Turks two thouſand and fiue hundred of their liues, yet thereby they gained the maſterie both vpon the riuer and the land, ſo that now roming far and neere without reſiſtance, they ſpoyled the countrey all about, and burnt certain countrey villages not far from VIENNA: ſo that for many miles ſpace the countrey townes were for feare of the enemie forſaken by the inhabitants; of whom ſome were taken and ſlaine, ſome
D carried into captiuitie, and ſome others (reſerued to a better fortune) with ſuch things as they had, got themſelues farther off into places of more ſecuritie. And the more to encreaſe theſe calamities, the Tartars ſhortly after paſſing ouer Danubius neere vnto ALTENBVRG, firſt ſacked WEISENBVRG, and after burnt it, with certaine townes thereabout: but aduenturing to haue gone further into the countrey, they were with loſſe enforced to returne.

A great ſpoile taken by the Turks.

Whileſt the Turks thus preuaile in HVNGARIE, Cicala Baſſa the Turks Admirall then at ſea with a fleet of gallies, landing his men in diuers places of ITALIE, did exceeding much harme but eſpecially in CALABRIA, where he vpon the ſudden ſurprized RHEGIVM, rifled the towne, and afterwards burnt it. From thence taking his courſe towards SICILIA, he in the ſight of E MESSANA landed certaine of his men; who aduenturing too farre aſhore, were by the countrey people ouerthrowne and put to flight. So the Turks returning againe to RHEGIVM, vtterly raſed what they had before left of that towne. In the meane time not farre from MESSANA, euen in the ſight of the garriſon of the towne, they tooke a certaine ſhip comming out of the Eaſt countries, and three other comming from APVLIA. Afterward chancing vpon certaine gallies of the Eaſt, they changed ſome few ſhot with thē, but to no great purpoſe. And ſo turning their courſe, and ſailing alongſt the coaſt of CALABRIA, they oftentimes landed certain companies, which skirmiſhing with the Calabrians, had ſometime the better and ſometime the worſe, and ſo with ſuch fortune as befell them, were againe receiued into the gallies. They of MESSANA, vnto whoſe eyes theſe dangers were dayly preſented both by letters & ſpeedie meſſengers, gaue the Viceroy knowledge thereof (who then for his pleaſure lay at PALERMO) requeſting his pre-F ſent aid: but he dallying of the time, they for the more ſafegard of the citie and of the ſea coaſt, of themſelues raiſed fiue hundred horſemen, whom they committed to the leading of Philip Cicala, the renegate Turkiſh Admirals brother; and beſide ſtored the citie with all ſuch things as they thought neceſſarie for the enduring of a ſiege, if it ſhould chance the Turke to haue any ſuch purpoſe: of all which they certified the king of SPAINE, as alſo of the negligence of the Viceroy, Rhegium raſed by the Turks.

Viceroy, requeſting his ſpeedie aid againſt theſe terrours of the Turks. In the meane while the G Neapolitanes for ſafegard of their coaſt put to ſea thirtie gallies: vnto whom the Pope, the duke of FLORENCE, the Genowayes, and the knights of MALTA, ioyned alſo theirs, in all to the number of about foureſcore gallies, vnder the conduct of Auria. The prouident Venetians alſo although they were as then in league with the Turke; yet for the more ſafetie of their ſtate, put to ſea a fleet of about an hundred ſaile, ſome ſhips, ſome gallies, vnder the leading of Foſcarin their Admirall. Which two fleets ſayling vp and down thoſe ſeas, deliuered ITALIE, SICILIE, DALMATIA, with many other prouinces and iſlands of the Chriſtians of a great feare.

Rab aſſaulted by the Turks.

Sinan Baſſa hauing before encouraged his ſoldiors with great hope and large promiſes, commaunded an aſſault to be giuen to the citie of RAB: which was accordingly by them begun the three and twentith day of September, the Sun being as yet ſcarce vp, and furiouſly maintained H all that day from morning vntill night. But they of the towne ſo valiantly defended themſelues, that at laſt the Turks were glad to giue ouer the aſſault, & with loſſe to retire. Neuertheleſſe the next day the aſſault was again renewed, & moſt deſperatly cõtinued by the ſpace of two daies:

Twelue thouſand Turks ſlaine.

wherein aboue 12. thouſand of the Turks there loſt their liues, the other with ſhame retiring themſelues into their trenches. In few dayes after, the Turks by a mine blew vp one of the bulwarks of the towne, with the fall whereof the towne ditch was in that place ſomewhat filled: wherby the Turks with all their power attempted thrice the next day to haue entered, but were by the valour of the defendants ſtill notably with loſſe repulſed. Yet notwithſtanding all this chearefulneſſe and couragiouſneſſe of them in the towne, the puiſſant enemie ceaſed not with continual batterie & furious aſſaults to attempt the citie, vntill that at length he had gained two I of the bulwarks, from whence he might to his great aduantage, by the rubbiſh and earth fallen out of the battered bulwarks and rampiers, haue acceſſe vnto the towne, to the great terrour of the defendants. Whereupon countie Hardeck the Gouernor (who corrupted by the Turke, had of purpoſe many times before ſaid that the towne could not poſſibly be long defended) now tooke occaſion to enter into counſell with the other captaines of the town (diuers of whom he had alreadie framed to his purpoſe) what courſe were beſt to take for the yeelding of it vp. And ſo after a little conſultation, holden more for faſhion ſake, than for that he doubted what to do; reſolued to ſend a meſſenger vnto the Baſſa, for a truce to be graunted for a while, to ſee if happily in the meane time ſome reaſonable compoſition might be agreed vpõ. Yet the Gouernour K conſidering vnto what ſcorne & danger he ſhould expoſe himſelfe, by yeelding vp of ſo ſtrong a towne; to colour the matter, and to excuſe his doings vnto the reſt of the nobilitie and garriſons of HVNGARIE, cauſed a publicke inſtrument to be in his and all the reſt of the captaines names cõceiued in writing, wherin they ſolemnely proteſted vnto the world, That for as much as it was impoſſible (by reaſon of the weakneſſe of the garriſon) for them longer to defend the town againſt ſo mightie an enemy, without new ſupplies in ſtead of them that were ſlain, which they had oftentimes in vaine requeſted, they were therefore of neceſſitie enforced to come to compoſition with the enemie. Which proteſtation ſo made, the Gouernour with the chief captaines confirmed with their hands & ſeales. So after a truce granted, and pledges giuen on both ſides, at length it was agreed vpon, That all the garriſon ſouldiors, together with the countie & L other captaines ſhould in armes with enſignes diſplayed with bag & baggage depart in ſafetie, and with a ſafe conuoy be brought to ALTENBVRG. Which agreement though by oath confirmed, was not on the Turks part altogether performed: for whẽ the countie had the 29. day of September, at 10. a clock in the forenoone deliuered vp the citie vnto the Baſſa, & the Chriſtian garriſon was all come out, the countie himſelfe with a few of his friends was with a conuoy of Turks brought in ſafetie to the appointed place: but the Italians and other garriſon ſouldiors

that came behind, and ought to haue beene by the Gouernour protected, were contrary to the Turks promiſe ſpoyled of all that they had, and hardly eſcaping with life, came that night to HOCHSTRATE, and the next day to ALTENBVRG. Thus was RAB, one of the ſtrongeſt bulwarks of Chriſtendome, traiterouſly deliuered vnto the moſt mortall enemie of the Chriſtian religion; being euen then when it was giuen vp, victualled for a yeare, and ſufficiently furniſhed M with all things neceſſarie for defence: all which prouiſion together with the citie fell into the hands of the faithleſſe enemie. A loſſe neuer to haue been ſufficiently lamented, had it not been about foure yeares after, euen as it were miraculouſly againe recouered, to the great reioyſing of all that ſide of Chriſtendome, as in the proceſſe of this Hiſtorie ſhall appeare.

Sinan

A Sinan glad of this victorie, as the greateſt trophey of his maſters glorie ouer the Chriſtians, gaue him ſpeedie knowledge thereof, both by letters and meſſengers. Of whom hee was for that good ſeruice highly commended, and afterward bountifully rewarded: for now had Amurath alreadie in hope deuoured all AVSTRIA, with the prouinces thereabout. The great Baſſa, becauſe he would not with too long ſtay hinder the courſe of his victorie, without delay repaired the rent citie, new fortified the battered bulwarkes, enlarged the ditches, and filled the Cathedrall church with earth, in maner of a ſtrong bulwarke, whereupon he planted great ſtore of great ordinance: and with exceeding ſpeed diſpatched all things neceſſary for the holding of the place. In the meane time he ſent certaine Tartars to ſummon the towne and caſtle of PAPPA; which caſtle and little towne ſubiect thereunto, the Chriſtians the night following ſet on B fire, becauſe it ſhould not ſtand the enemy in any ſtead for the farther troubling of the country; and ſo fled. Rab repaired by the Turkes.

The Baſſa hauing at his pleaſure diſpoſed of all things in RAB, and leauing there foure thouſand Ianizaries, and two thouſand horſmen in garriſon, departed thence with his armie and laid ſiege to KOMARA, a ſtrong towne of that moſt fertile iſland, which the Hungarians call SCHVT; which ſituated in the verie point therof about foure miles from RAB, is on the Eaſt, South, and North encloſed with the two armes of Danubius. All theſe waies Sinan with his fleet (which he had there notably well appointed) laid hard ſiege vnto the towne, and gaue thereunto diuers aſſaults: and by land, the Beglerbeg of GRÆCE ceaſed not both by continuall batterie and mines, to ſhake the wals and bulwarkes thereof. Thus was the citie on all ſides both by water and by
C land hardly laid vnto. But the Chriſtians within, with no leſſe courage defended themſelues and the citie, than did the Turks aſſaile them; ſhewing indeed, that the libertie of their religion and countrey, was vnto them dearer than their liues. Matthias the archduke in the meane time, not ignorant how much it concerned the emperour his brother to haue this citie defended, hauing after his late ouerthrow gathered together a good armie of Germanes, Bohemians, and Hungarians, reſolued to go and raiſe the ſiege: and ſo marching forward with his armie, came and encamped the 28. day of October at NITRIA, about fiue miles from KOMARA. Now were the Tartars a little before departed from the campe, with purpoſe to returne home: yea the Turkes themſelues wearie of the ſiege, and wanting victuall both for themſelues and their horſes, began alſo as men diſcouraged to ſhrinke away. Which the Baſſa well conſidering, thought it not beſt
D with his heartleſſe ſouldiors and armie now ſore weakened, to abide the comming of the Chriſtians: and therefore vpon their approch he foorthwith forſooke the citie, which he had by the ſpace of three weeks hardly beſieged, and by a bridge made of boats tranſported his armie and artillerie ouer Danubius to DOTIS, where the next day after he brake vp his armie. Immediatly after the Turks were thus departed, the Archduke arriued at KOMARA, where hee with great diligence cauſed the breaches to be repaired, the mines to be filled vp, and new bulwarks and rampiers to be made in diuers places for the more ſtrength of the citie, leauing the charge thereof ſtill vnto the lord Braun the old gouernor, who in the defence therof had receiued a grieuous wound in his right knee: of whom alſo this notable fact is reported. The Baſſa in time of the late ſiege of KOMARA, vnder the colour of a parley, had ſent fiue Turkes into the citie to the Gouernour,
E but in deed to proue if he were by any meanes to be woon to yeeld vp the citie, and not to hold it out to the laſt: The faithfull Gouernour, hauing giuen them the hearing vntill they had diſcharged their whole treachery, preſently cauſed foure of their heads to be ſtrucken off, and to be ſet vpon long pikes vpon one of the bulwarks for the Baſſa to looke vpon; but the fift (the beholder of this this tragedie) he ſent back vnto the Baſſa, to tell him, That although he had found one in RAB to ſerue his turne, he was much deceiued if in him he thought to find Countie Hardeck; and that he wiſhed rather to die the emperours faithfull ſeruant in the bloud of the Turks, than to betray the citie committed to his charge. Komara beſieged by Sinan Baſſa.

Countie Hardeck late Gouernour of RAB, generally before ſuſpected to haue treacherouſly betrayed that ſtrong towne vnto the Baſſa, was therefore ſent for to VIENNA, and there by the F Emperours commaundement committed to priſon. Where among many things laid to his charge, as that he ſhould in the beginning of the ſiege negligently haue ſuffered many things to be done by the enemie, which afterwards turned to the great danger of the towne: and that in the time of the ſiege, he had cauſed ſome of the canoniers to diſcharge certaine great pieces againſt the enemie, with powder onely without ſhot: and that ſeeing one piece among the reſt to do the Sinan Baſſa raiſeth his ſiege.

enemy much harme, he had cauſed the ſame to be remooued, and ſo placed, as that it ſerued to little or no vſe: beſide that, he (as it ſhould ſeeme) making ſmall reckoning of the towne, ſhould oftentimes ſay, That if the Turks ſhould winne it, he ſhould be but one towne the richer: with diuers other ſuch things, giuing iuſt cauſe of ſuſpition. The thing that lay moſt heauy vpon him, was the teſtimonie of one of Sinan Baſſa his chamber, who being taken yong by the Turks, and ſeruing in the Baſſaes chamber, was now fled from the Turks, and comming to the Archduke in the time of his ſiege, declared vnto him, that there was treaſon in his campe: and that hee but three daies before by the commandement of his maſter, had deliuered two bags full of duckats vnto two Chriſtians, of whom the one had a notable ſcarre in his face, & was afterwards known to haue bin one of the Counties ſeruants. Vpon this and ſuch like proofs, the Countie was after many daies hearing, in open court by the iudgment of ſeuen and fortie noblemen and captains of name, condemned of treaſon, and adiudged to be hanged, his dead bodie to remaine vpon the gallowes by the ſpace of three daies, and all his lands and goods to be confiſcat: The rigour of which ſentence was afterward by the emperour mitigated, and the traitour by him adiudged to haue his right hand (by him before giuen to the emperour, in pawne of his faith) and his head ſtrucke off vpon a ſcaffold at VIENNA, and ſo buried. Which ſeuere ſentence was afterwards accordingly put in execution: for the tenth of Iune following, the traitour being brought to the ſcaffold built of purpoſe in the hie ſtreet of VIENNA, after the ſentence of his condemnation there ſolemnly read, commending himſelfe vpon his knees to the mercie of God, with his eies couered, & his right hand laid vpon a block couered with blacke, had both his hand and head ſo ſuddenly ſtrucke off by the executioners, as that the beholders could hardly iudge which of them was firſt off. His dead bodie with his head and hand, was preſently by his ſeruant wrapped in a black cloth, and laid in his coach, which ſtood there by of purpoſe couered with black, and was afterwards buried amongſt his anceſtors.

County Hardeck condemned and executed for betraying of Rab.

The Tartars but lately before departed from Sinans campe, paſſing ouer Danubius at STRIGONIVM, had purpoſed through the vpper part of HVNGARIE, and by the borders of TRANSYLVANIA and MOLDAVIA, to haue againe returned into their countrey: of whom two companies falling into the hands of the lord Palfi, were by him cut off and vtterly defeated: the reſt comming vnto the borders of TRANSYLVANIA, and finding the paſſages ſo beſet by the prince and the Vayuod of VALACHIA, as that they could not without moſt manifeſt danger paſſe that way, returned againe the ſame way they came: and hauing rifled and burnt certaine townes and villages in the vpper HVNGARIE about TOCKAIE, paſſed the riuer againe at STRIGONIVM, and wintering at VESPRINIM, PALOTTA, and other places in the countrey about RAB, liued vpon the ſpoile of the poore Chriſtians, vpon the frontiers of AVSTRIA, euen as far as MEINERSDORF.

These Tartars (of whom we haue ſo often ſpoken) at their firſt comming to the aid of Sinan, by direction from the Turkiſh Sultan, ſtaied vpon the frontiers of TRANSILVANIA, of purpoſe to haue ſurpriſed that countrey, and either to haue thruſt Sigiſmund Bator the young prince out of the gouernment therof, or elſe to haue ſent him in bonds to CONSTANTINOPLE: For it was commonly reported, That he weary of the heauie tribute which he yearely payed vnto the Turke, and had now after their greedie manner been diuers times enhaunſed: had purpoſed to reuolt from the Turkiſh Sultan, and to enter into contederation with the Chriſtian emperour. Which innouation and change, certaine of the nobilitie and chiefe States of TRANSILVANIA, ſought by all meanes to hinder: and acquainting Amurath with the matter, and entring into conſpiracie with the Tartars, vndertooke to deliuer the whole countrey into their hands, and to ſend the prince priſoner to HVSTT, where the Tartars then lay vpon the borders encamped. Wherefore diſſembling their purpoſe, they cunningly perſwaded the Prince, that Samoſche the great Chauncellor of POLONIA, in the confines of his countrey lay with a great power expecting his comming, to conclude with him of matters of great importance. And the better to colour this their treacherie, they had counterfeited letters to that effect from the Chancelor to the prince, and had wrought ſo effectually, that the prince not ſuſpecting any ſuch treaſon, gaue credit to their perſwaſions, and ſo put himſelfe vpon his way towards the Chancelor (as he ſuppoſed:) but by the way, he was aduiſed by ſome of his friends which had got ſome ſuſpition of the matter, not to go any farther, for that his comming was not attēded by the Polonians his friends (as he was perſuaded) but by the Tartars his enemies, who lay in wait for him at HVSTT, to be-

A reaue him of his life and gouernement. The Prince aſtonied with the noueltie of the matter, liſtned vnto their perſuaſion, and retired with his traine to the ſtrong fort of KEHVVERB; where he ſtayed fourteene daies, as if it had been only for feare of the Tartars. In the meane time, hee gaue notice to the nobilitie and gouernours of the countrie, his friends, of the imminent and common danger; who forthwith repaired vnto him in armes. But the traitors proceeding in their purpoſe, ceaſed not to perſuade Bornemiſſa, who had the leading of the princes armie, that to fight with the Tartars was a matter of no ſmall danger: and that therefore if he wiſhed well to his countrie, he ſhould not haue to do with them, but onely ſhew himſelfe neere vnto them, and that he was not vnprouided for them: which was accordingly done, and the Tranſyluanian armie brought ſo nigh vnto the Tartars, as that they might heare the noiſe of their drums and
B trumpets. Whereby the Tartars as by the watchword, perceiuing themſelues diſcouered, and nothing to fall out according to their expectation, as had bin vnto them promiſed for the betraying of the prince: they remoued thence, and by another way breaking through the midſt of TRANSYLVANIA, and ſo into HVNGARIE, rifled and burnt fiue hundred villages, ſlew all the males that were aboue twelue yeres of age, and carried away the reſt vnto the Turkiſh army then lying at the ſiege of RAB. In the meane time the traitours (when as this firſt plot ſerued them not) conſpired to ſet vp one Baltazar Bator, the young princes nigh kinſman, and with the good fouour of Amurath to preferre him to the ſoueraigne gouernment of their countrie. Which their purpoſe the Prince perceiuing, and doubting altogither to truſt vnto the fidelitie of his owne ſubiects; writ to his neighbours the Raſcians, and other his confederats, praying
C their aid in this his ſo dangerous and doubtfull eſtate. Which after he had receiued, he appointed a generall aſſembly of all his ſtates to be holden at CLAVSENBVRG, and that vpon a great pain to be inflicted vpon all ſuch as ſhould not there perſonally appeare: ſo at the prefixed day all came, except the Cardinall Bator and Stephen his brother, who guiltie of ſo foule a treaſon againſt their owne bloud, were now before fled into POLONIA. Being all thus met togither, the Prince commanded the gates of the citie to be ſhut, and diligent watch and ward to be kept, forbidding by open proclamation, that any man vpon paine of death ſhould ſo much as ſpeake of any imagined treaſon. And at the ſame time politickly cauſed to be publiſhed in writing, how that the Germans, had in the farther ſide of HVNGARIE got a notable victorie ouer the Turks; for ioy whereof he commanded bonefires to be made, and the great ordinance to be in triumph
D ſhot off, with many other ſignes of ioy and gladneſſe: and withall cauſed a notable banquet to be prepared, whereunto togither with others, were inuited alſo all the chiefe of the conſpirators: Of whom, euen as they were at dinner & leaſt feared any ſuch matter, he commanded fourteene to be apprehended and committed to priſon: and the next morning cauſed fiue of them to be executed in the open market place. The principall of whom, who had vndertaken to haue himſelfe ſlaine the prince, after three or foure light cuts in the necke, he cauſed to be drawne in pieces with foure horſes: the other foure, namely Alexander, and Gabriell Gengi, Gregorie Diaco, and Ladiſlaus Sallentz were beheaded, and their dead bodies all that day left in the market place for the people to behold: the reſt were alſo afterwards worthily executed; and Balthazor Bator, whom the conſpirators had intended to haue exalted, ſtrangled. Hauing thus reuenged him-
E ſelfe vpon his enemies, he by a publicke edict diuulged through all his dominion, gaue leaue to all his ſubiects in generall, of their own charge to take vp armes againſt the Turks, & whatſoeuer they could take from them, to haue it to themſelues, as good prize gotten from their lawfull enemies. By which vnwonted libertie, the Tranſyluanians encouraged as with a great bountie, armed themſelues on all hands to the number of fortie thouſand, who being muſtred & ſworne to hold togither againſt the Turkes, made their firſt expedition towards Danubius; where at their firſt arriuall, by good hap the light vpon certaine of the Turks ſhips laded with prouiſion for the campe, and marchandiſe of all ſorts, and much treaſure: of which rich ſhips, they at the firſt onſet tooke ſeuen, but the eighth (being indeed the Admirall) eſcaped their hands. In theſe ſhips they tooke an exceeding rich bootie, ſlew many of the Turks, and in token of the victo-
F rie, carried backe vnto the prince ſeuen of the Turkiſh enſignes. This victorie cauſed great ioy in TRANSILVANIA, euery man of ſo proſperous a beginning, conceiuing good hope of moſt happie ſucceſſe. It is reported, that Sinan Baſſa hearing of this loſſe, ſhould ſay, That if this prouiſion had come to him in ſafetie, he could with that treaſure more eaſily haue bought VIENNA in AVSTRIA, than he had RAB in HVNGARIE. After this victorie the prince laied ſiege

The Ianizaries in a tumult at Constantinople.

Not long after, about the two and twentith of December a tumult rise among the Ianizaries of the Court at CONSTANTINOPLE, which grew to such an height, that in the heat thereof one of the Bassaes was by them slaine, with some others of good account, and one of Amuraths sonnes sore wounded, and with much adoe saued. Vpon conceit whereof, Amurath for anger and griefe fell into a fit of the falling sicknes (wherunto he was much subiect) and was therwith for the space of three daies and three nights so grieuously vexed, as if he should haue presently giuen vp the ghost: so that the citie was filled with heauinesse and feare, and the great men of the Court were euen readie to thinke vpon a new lord. This tumult of the insolent Ianizaries many H suppосed to haue been the cause of Amurath his death, which shortly after ensued: his griefe and maladie encreasing dayly by the euill newes still brought vnto him both by messengers and letters, especially out of TRANSYLVAINA, where the prince waiting vpon euery occasion, was still at hand with the Turks, cutting them short in euery place; and in sundrie rodes which he made vpon them this month, tooke many of their castles and forts from them. He had at that time in the field in diuers places three armies: one vnder the conduct of Gesty Ferens, in the countrie of LVGAZ neere vnto TEMESVVARE: another vnder the leading of Michaell Horwat, on the side of Danubius, to intercept the Turkes comming to BYDA: and the third commaunded by Caspar Cornoyse in the countrie neere to GIVLA, vnto whom came shortly after fifteene hundred horsemen out of the vpper HVNGARIE. I

1595 The Transyluanian prince Sigismund Bator thus lately reuolted from the Turk, for the strengthening of his state thought it best betime to enter into confederation with his neighbors of VALACHIA and MOLDAVIA (who moued by his example, shortly after in like manner also cast off the seruile yoke of the Turke) but especially with the Christian emperour Rodolph. For which purpose he sent his embassadours honourably accompanied: who comming to COSSOVIA in HVNGARIE the foureteenth of December, arriued at PRAGE the twelfth of Ianuarie, with twentie waggons, and an hundred and fiftie horse, where they were by the emperours appointment most honourably receiued and royally entertained: and after a few daies hauing deliuered vnto the emperor the summe of their embassage, which was for a confederation to be made betweene the emperor and the prince: after much graue consultation and serious discourse it was K fully concluded and agreed vpon: the chiefe points wherof I thought it not amisse here in briefe to set downe, for the satisfying of such as desire to know in what tearmes that worthie prince next neighbour vnto the Turke then stood with the Christian emperour.

The capitulations of the league betwixt the emperor and the Transyluanian prince.

First it was agreed vpon, That the emperour for himselfe and for the states of HVNGARIE should promise to proceed in his wars begun against the common enemie, and not to conclude any peace with him, without the knowledge and good liking of the prince. And that in all conclusions of peace to be made betwixt him and the Turke, the countries of TRANSYLVANIA, VALACHIA, and MOLDAVIA, should be alwaies comprised: in regard whereof, the prince likewise promised for himselfe and the states of TRANSYLVANIA, to prosecute the commenced warre, and not to enter into any league with the Turke, without the knowledge and consent of L
the emperor and the nobilitie of HVNGARIE, and this to be confirmed by solemne oath on both sides.

Secondly, that the prouince of TRANSILVANIA with all the parts and confines thereof hitherto possessed by the prince in HVNGARIE, should remaine vnto the said prince Sigismund and his heires male, with all the profits arising thereof, in such sort as they had done in the time of Iohn, Stephen, and Christopher, his predecessours, to haue therein a most free and absolute authoritie: yet so, as that they should acknowledge his imperiall maiestie and his lawful successors for their lawfull soueraignes; vnto whom they should alwaies sweare their fealtie, but without any homage doing: and that to be performed by his successours at the time of the change; but M by the prince himselfe, presently after the confirming of this league. But that for lacke of heires male, the countrie of TRANSYLVANIA with all the territories thereunto annexed, should discend vnto his sacred maiestie and his successours, the kings of HVNGARIE, as a true and inseparable member thereof: whereunto the prince and all the states of TRANSYLVANIA should bind themselues by solemne oath. But yet that at such time as the heires male should faile in the line

A line of the preſent prince, and that the countrie of TRANSILVANIA ſhould according to theſe preſent conditions be deuolued to the crowne of HVNGARIE; as well his preſent imperiall and royall maieſtie as his ſucceſſors, ſhould keepe inuiolate the ancient laws, priuiledges, & cuſtomes of that countrie, and alwaies appoint one of the nobilitie of TRANSYLVANIA to be Gouernour or Vayuod of the ſame, and no other ſtranger.

Thirdly, that his maieſtie ſhould acknowledge the prince of TRANSILVANIA for an abſolute prince, and by ſpeciall charter confirme vnto him the title of Moſt excellent.

Fourthly, that his imperiall maieſtie ſhould procure one of the daughters of the late archduke Charles his vncle, for a wife for the prince, that as they were now to be ioined in league, ſo they might be ioyned in affinitie alſo.

B Fiftly, that the emperour ſhould procure him to bee made one of the order of the Golden Fleece.

Sixtly, that the prince might with more cheerefulnes and ſecuritie make war againſt the common enemie, his imperiall and royall maieſtie ſhould not at any time, howſoeuer things fell out, forſake the ſaid prince or any of the countries ſubiect vnto him: and euen now preſently to aid him according as the preſent occaſion required, and afterward (if greater need ſhould be) with greater helpe, whether it was by his Generall of CASSOVIA, or others: and this giuing of aid to be on both ſides mutuall and reciprocall, according as the neceſſitie of the one or other part ſhould require: and that where moſt need was, thither ſhould moſt helpe be conuerted.

C Seuenthly, that the ſacred Romane empire ſhould take vpon it the protection and defence of the prince and his territories. And that his imperial maieſtie ſhould create the ſaid prince and the princes his ſucceſſours, princes of the empire: yet ſo, as that they ſhould haue neither voice nor place among the ſaid princes.

Eightly, that whatſoeuer caſtles, towns, cities, or other places of ſtrength ſhould by their common forces be taken or recouered from the common enemie, at ſuch time as his imperiall maieſtie ſhould ſend into the field a full armie, ſhould be all his maieſties: But ſuch places as the prince ſhould by his own forces or policie gaine from the enemie, ſhould remain vnto the prince himſelfe. Yet that what places ſoeuer the prince ſhould recouer, which at any time before belonged to the kingdome of HVNGARIE, before it was taken by the Turke, thoſe he ſhould forthwith deliuer to his maieſtie, as ſoone as reaſonable recompence were by him therefore made vnto

D the prince.

Ninthly, his ſacred maieſtie ſhould promiſe of his owne bountie to giue vnto his excellencie ſufficient aid for the fortifying and defence of ſuch places as ſhould be thought neceſſary for the behoofe of the Chriſtians: as againe the ſaid prince ſhould likewiſe promiſe not to ſpare his owne cofers or forces, that the ſame places ſhould be throughly fortified and defended, for the behoofe of his maieſtie and the common good of the Chriſtian commonweale.

Laſtly, that for as much as the euents of warre are vncertain, and many things ſuddenly happen contrarie to mens expectation, if ſuch neceſſitie ſhould chance vnto his excellencie or his ſucceſſors (which miſhap God forbid) that hauing ſpent themſelues, they ſhould not be able longer to defend their ſtate and countrie, but that the mightie enemie preuailing, they ſhould at

E laſt be enforced to forſake the ſame: in this their extremitie, his imperial & royal maieſtie ſhould promiſe both for himſelfe and his ſucceſſours, within the ſpace of one moneth to aſſigne ſome certaine place in ſome other of his dominions, where the ſaid prince & his ſucceſſors might honorably liue. And the like regard to be had alſo of other ſuch principall men, as ſhould togither with the prince aduenture their liues and liuings in defence of the Chriſtian commonweale.

Which articles of confederation agreed vpon, & ſolemnly confirmed, the ſame embaſſadors were with all kindnes, bountie, and magnificence diſmiſſed and ſent back again vnto the prince: who was not himſelfe in the meane time idle, but labouring by all the meanes he could to draw vnto him Michael the Vayuod of VALACHIA, a man of no leſſe worth than himſelfe, and Aaron the Palatine of MOLDAVIA, both of them then the Turkes tributaries; and by them to alienate from the Turke both thoſe countries, that ſo with their combined forces they might the better defend their libertie, and withſtand their common enemie: wherein he did ſo much, and preuailed ſo farre with them both, that caſting off the Turkes obeiſance, they ſhortly after to the great benefit of the Chriſtian commonweale, and no leſſe hinderance of the Turkes proceedings in HVNGARIE, ioined hands both togither with him for the recouerie of their loſt libertie. Which reuolt of theſe bordering princes,for that it ſo much concerned the common good, as that the G ſafegard of AVSTRIA,and of the remnants of HVNGARIE,with ſome good part of GERMANIE alſo,is euen by them that in thoſe matters ſaw much,not without cauſe ſuppoſed to haue reſted therin; and that this noble Vayuod(of whom much is to be ſaid hereafter)was the ſecond actor herein,it ſhall not be from our purpoſe to ſee the maner of his reuolt alſo from the Turke, as we haue alreadie the Tranſyluanians.For the more euidence whereof,as for the honour of the man (whileſt he liued,a moſt worthie member of the Chriſtian common-weale) we will a little ſtep backe to ſee how he obtained of the Great Turke this ſo honourable a preferment as was the Vayuodſhip of VALACHIA, not without his reuolt long now to be holden.

Valachia oppreſſed by the Turkes.

Alexander the late Vayuod of VALACHIA, a Moldauian borne,and by Amurath himſelfe promoted to that dignitie, proud aboue meaſure of this his ſo great a preferment,as alſo of his H owne nobilitie,and the deceitfull fauour of fortune ſtill fawning vpon him; not only oppreſſed his people himſelfe with intollerable impoſitions, but to be in farther fauour with the Turks, brought into that countrie(too much before exhauſted)ſuch a companie of them, as that they ſeemed now almoſt wholly to haue poſſeſſed the ſame,oppreſſing the poore Chriſtians(the naturall inhabitants)with new exactions,and more than tyrannicall iniuries,euen ſuch as were not elſewhere by the Turks themſelues vſed; not only breaking at their pleaſure into their houſes, and diſpoyling them of their goods, but taking tythe alſo of their children, as if it had beene of their cattell,a thing neuer before their ſeene: and for the ſatisfying of their beaſtly luſt, rauiſ-hing their wiues and daughters,euen in the ſight of their huſbands & parents,with diuers other ſuch outragious villanies,not with modeſtie to be rehearſed. So that by this means he had vio- I lently taken from his Chriſtian ſubiects all hope of recouerie of their ancient libertie,had it not as ſometime it falleth out in theſe worldly things both vnto men and commonweales, which brought vnto the laſt caſt,& euen as it were to the bottome of diſpaire,by the goodneſſe of God contrarie to all hope find ſometime ſuch vnexpected helpe and reliefe,as that thereby they, beyond their hope,euen to the aſtoniſhment of the world,mount vp againe vnto a greater luſtre of their ſtate than was that from which they before fell: it had euen ſo by the ſingular mercie of God now happened vnto the Valachians,not knowing which way to turne themſelues. There was at CRAILOVVA,a citie in the confines of VALACHIA towards the confines of the Hungarians and Turks(where the gouernour of theſe borders is for the defence thereof with a ſtrong garriſon alwaies reſiant)a noble gentleman called * Ion Michael, ſonne to Peter the Palatine of that K countrie, the aforeſaid Alexander his predeceſſor: who as he was vnto the people for the honour of his father,the prerogatiue of his birth,the comelineſſe of his perſon,and talneſſe of his ſtature,well knowne: ſo was he for his zeale towards the Chriſtian religion, his loue towards his countrie,his kindneſſe towards his equals, his courteſie towards his inferiours, his vpright dealing,his conſtancie and bountie vnto them,no leſſe gracious; and for other the noble vertues of his heroicall mind and naturall diſpoſition for the performance of great matters, his deepe wiſdome and quicke foreſight,his ſweet & pleaſing ſpeech,void of all affectation,vnto all good men moſt deare: whoſe fame, both for the honour of his houſe, and of his owne vertues, ſtill more and more encreaſing,and rife in the eares of Alexander the Vayuod,was the cauſe that he commanded him as the readie or rather naturall competitor of his ſtate and honour to bee ſe- L cretly apprehended,and ſo taken out of the way: whereof hee by good fortune hauing intelligence,and carefull of his owne health,for ſafegard of himſelfe fled firſt into HVNGARIE,and there not ſtaying long(God ſo directing him)went to CONSTANTINOPLE in the yeare 1591, to ſue for the Vayuod his place, all the nobilitie of his countrie and the prouinces thereunto adioyning,ſecretly reioicing thereat. About which time the chiefe and moſt graue of the Vala-chian nobilitie and counſellours proſtrating themſelues at the feet of Amurath,moſt grieuouſly complained vnto him of the manifold and intollerable iniuries they had alreadie ſuſtained,and were ſtill like to endure,without hope of redreſſe, from Alexander their Vayuod, and the followers of his Court,the Turks garriſons and merchants with plentifull teares orderly declaring many his moſt foule and deteſtable facts,& afterward highly commending Ion Michael for his M rare vertues,as the true heire of their prouince; moſt humbly requeſted Amurath either to haue him appointed the lawfull Gouernour of their countrie,or els ſome other place by him aſſigned for them to dwell in, wiſhing any where to liue,rather than vnder the heauie commaund of ſo mercileſſe a man as was Alexander. For the furthering of which their ſute, Michael his vncle by

A the mothers ſide, a Greek borne, and a man for his exceeding wealth in great fauor in the Turks Court, ſpared for no coſt. So Michael by the goodneſſe of God was by Amurath with great ſolemnitie created Vayuod of VALACHIA, and the oppreſſed and almoſt forlorne ſtate of that ſometime moſt flouriſhing countrey by little and little well relieued (although not altogether without moſt ſharpe and violent remedies, ſuch as extremities oft require) began now againe to lift vp the head, and to aſpire vnto the auncient libertie and honour thereof. At the beginning of whoſe happie ſoueraigntie, Alexander his predeceſſour in his owne conſcience guiltie of his euill and ſhamefull gouernment of that ſo notable and great a prouince; and now in feare to be called to account, ſecretly fled. But certaine yeares after remooving to CONSTANTINOPLE with his wife, and there attempting diuers euill meanes for the obtaining of the Palatinat of
B MOLDAVIA, and for thoſe his vnlawfull practiſes accuſed by the Palatines Agent: hee was by the commandement of Amurath taken in his own houſe, and there in his princely apparel moſt miſerably ſtrangled vpon Palme ſunday, in the yeare 1597, about ſix yeares after his departure out of VALACHIA.

Michael on Amurath created Vayuod of Valachia.

Alexander ſtrangled at Conſtantinople.

Michael thus made Vayuod of VALACHIA, long it was not but that it fortuned the reuerend father Cornelius de Nona, ſent from Pope Clement the eight, vnto the Great duke of MVSCOVIE, in his returne conferring with Sigiſmund the Tranſyluanian prince, and Aaron the Palatine of MOLDAVIA, enformed them of the great conſent of diuers zealous Chriſtian princes, for the maintenance of the war againſt the dangerous and common enemie; with many graue and effectuall reaſons perſuading them (but eſpecially for that they were themſelues chriſtians) in that
C Chriſtian quarell to ioyne vnto them their forces alſo, raiſed in thoſe their countries neere vnto the great riuers Danubius and Neſter: but vnto Michael the Vayuod of VALACHIA, hee could not for diuers his other important buſineſſes then come; whom for all that, the aforeſaid Tranſyluanian prince Sigiſmund his neighbour, deſirouſly ſought to draw into the fellowſhip of that warre, euen for the ſame reaſons almoſt wherewith he had beene himſelfe mooued. Firſt by diuers great reaſons remouing ſuch doubts as might iuſtly ſeeme to hinder him from giuing thereunto his conſent; and then, by declaring the Turkiſh inſolencie daily increaſing, with the infinit grieuances by them deuiſed againſt the miſerable Valachians: when as the incurſions of the Turks or Tartars, or their paſſages that way (no leſſe troubleſome than their inroads) was almoſt
D euerie moneth to be feared, their armies as friends to be in Winter and Sommer receiued, their ſouldiors to their great charges relieued, and their commaunders and captaines rewarded. VALACHIA thus impoueriſhed, was not able (as he ſaid) to pay the great ſums it did already owe, neither was to expect any releaſement of the euils it was wrapped in; much leſſe was it able to ſuffice vnto the grieuous exactions to be thereunto by them afterwards impoſed. None of his predeceſſors (as he told him, and as truth was) had for many yeares now paſt, for any long time or with any ſecuritie held their ſtate or gouernment: but that either by the calumniation of the enuious, or bribes of their ambitious competitors, brought into ſuſpition with the Sultan, they were violently thruſt out, or moſt cruelly put to death. In briefe, he ſaid, it was a wiſe mans part, not without moſt manifeſt & waightie reaſons, to promiſe vnto himſelfe better fortune or more aſſurance of his ſtate, than had his vnfortunat predeceſſours before him; but warned by their
E harmes, betimes to prouide for his owne ſafetie. By which perſuaſion he ſo preuailed, that the Vayuod (whoſe name, whoſe fame, whoſe wealth and life together with his ſubiects was all therby endangered) although he would not (for the waightineſſe of the matter) at the firſt yeeld thereunto; yet aſſuredly promiſed, with his friends and the reſt of the nobilitie of his countrey, to conſider thereupon. Hauing it by the prince plainly laid downe before him, how a ſufficient number of ſoldiors might at all times be raiſed, their pay prouided, and aid ſtil ſent him as need ſhould be from the Germane emperour, or himſelfe out of TRANSYLVANIA: as alſo that Aaron the Palatine of MOLDAVIA, would at all times bee readie to combine himſelfe vnto them; that ſo with their vnited forces, they might vpon the bankes of Danubius and Neſter, eaſily repreſſe
F the incurſions both of the Turkes and Tartars their enemies: the Chriſtian emperour in the meane time, with leſſe trouble proceeding in his warres againſt the Turke in the other ſide of HVNGARIE.

Now whileſt this plot was thus in laying, and matters too and fro in debating, not altogether without the Turkes ſuſpition; Sinan Baſſa comming with a great armie into HVNGARIE, had taken the ſtrong towne of RAB, as is before declared: with which miſchance ſo much concerning the poore remainders of HVNGARIE, the Vayuod not a little mooued, began more deeply to conſider of his own eſtate. And as he was a man of a great ſpirit and no leſſe zeale towards his countrey, grieuing to ſee his ſubiects committed to his charge, to be ſo daily by the inſolent Turks ſtill more and more oppreſſed: he (as he had before promiſed to the Tranſyluanian) called an aſſembly of all the States of VALACHIA, to conſult with them what were beſt to be done for the remedie of ſo great euils, as alſo for the preuenting of greater, not without cauſe then to be feared. Where by the generall conſent of them all it was agreed, rather to ioyne with the Emperour and the other Chriſtian princes in confederation (as they had been oftentimes by them requeſted) than longer to endure that heauie yoake of the Turkiſh thraldome and ſlauerie. Whereupon the Vayuod taking vnto him two thouſand of the Hungarian garriſon ſouldiors, now before for that purpoſe ſecretly laid vpon the frontiers of his countrey; and calling vpon the name of Chriſt Ieſus, in one day to begin withall, ſlew about two thouſand of the Ianizaries (who without his leaue had in that countrey prowdly ſeated themſelues) with all the reſt of the Turks (in the middeſt of their inſolencie) togither with the traiterous Iewes, not leauing one of them that he could come by aliue in all the open countrey. And purpoſing to driue them out of their ſtrong holds alſo, and ſo to make a cleane riddance of them, he within foureteene daies after ſet vpon DZIVRDZOVVA, a great towne of the Turks, vpon the banke of Danubius, which he burnt all ſauing the caſtle; and hauing there made a great ſlaughter, and loded with the ſpoile of the Turks, returned to BVCARESTA the chiefe ſeat of his Palatinat.

ning

Michael the Vayuod of Valachia reuolteth from the Turks.

But long it was not after this his ſo great preſumption, but that he perceiued the Turkes in reuenge thereof to ſeeke after his life: although he yet ſeemed to yeeld his obedience vnto Amurath, and to haue done that he did, as enforced thereunto by the inſolencie of the Turks, and for the neceſſarie reliefe both of himſelfe and his ſubiects. For the ſame moneth, RAB being (as is aforeſaid) taken by Sinan: one of the Turks * Emirs, diſcended of the great family and ſtocke of Mahomet their falſe Prophet, and then Cadileſcher (a man of great account and place amongſt the Turks) accompanied with two thouſand choſen ſouldiors, fiftie of the great Sultans chamber, and many of the Zauſij and Spahi, vpon the ſudden came to BVCARESTA vnder the colour of refreſhing themſelues after their long traueli, but in deed with purpoſe to haue taken the Vayuod; where they without controlement committed all kind of outragious villanie: and taking vp all the chiefe houſes in the citie, imperiouſly demaunded of the Vayuod (who then lay at his pallace neere vnto the new monaſtery without the city, built without any caſtle or defence vpon the riuer Dembowiza) ten thouſand Florens for a preſent, with victuals and other neceſſarie prouiſion for his followers. And preſently after, being certainly enformed that he lay there but ſlenderly accompanied, and almoſt himſelfe alone, the Emir himſelfe on foot with a thouſand of his ſouldiors, went out of the citie as if it had been but for his pleaſure, and in curteſie to haue ſeene him. Of which ſo ſuſpitious a gueſts comming the Vayuod vnderſtanding, got him betimes away into the campe of his Hungarian mercinaries, which then lay but faſt by: when the Turke thus deceiued of the hope he had before conceiued for the taking of him, craftily ſent certaine of his followers, to know of him, to what end he in time of peace did entertaine ſuch a number of Hungarian ſouldiors? Whereunto the Vayuod cunningly anſwered, That they were at the firſt entertained for the taking of Peter the ſonne of Alexander, ſometime Palatine of MOLDAVIA; who although he were now before apprehended, and openly hanged vpon an hooke at CONSTANTINOPLE, yet that thoſe ſouldiours were for their readie ſeruice, of neceſſitie ſtill to be billited in the countrey, vntill ſuch time as their pay might be prouided. Which the Turke hearing, commaunded the Vayuod forthwith to diſcharge them as men vnneceſſarie, and to his ſubiects troubleſome, promiſing the next day to lend him a tunne of gold to pay them their wages. Which faigned promiſe the Vayuod ſeemed thankfully to take; yet neuertheleſſe commaunded the Hungarians forthwith in armes to ſtand in readineſſe in the campe, for the intercepting of the Turks, if happily by him diſtreſſed they ſhould betake themſelues to flight: whileſt he in the meane time with his courtiers and other ſouldiors, ſecretly aſſembled into a valley thereby, came ſuddenly vpon the Turks (not as then dreaming of any ſuch thing) compaſſed about the Innes wherein they lay, and ſetting fire vpon them in fiue places, notably forced them both with fire and the ſword, the two greateſt extremities of war; ſeeking now for nothing more, than the iuſt reuenge of his ſpoiled citie, his forced virgins, and wronged ſubiects. Howbeit the Turks for a ſpace right valiantly defended themſelues, and by plaine force (although

The Turks call all them that are diſcended of the ſtock of their Prophet Mahomet by the name of Emirs or Lords.*

A (although in vaine) ſought to haue broken through the middeſt of their enemies, and ſo to haue fled. Yea many of them by force of the fire driuen out of their lodgings, and tearing off their burning cloathes, fought ſtarke naked: but moſt of them which could, fled vnto the pallace where the great Emir lay, there with him readie to die or liue. All which their laſt endeauours of deſperation, the Vayuod eaſily fruſtrated, with two great pieces of artillerie opening a way for his ſouldiors vnto them. So that the proud Emir now in deſpaire (like the hunted Caſtor) threw downe out of a window a great cheſt full of gold and pretious ſtones, and other iewels of great valour, if happily hee might haue ſo appeaſed the Vayuods wrath, humbly now requeſting no more, but to haue his life ſpared; fearefully promiſing a large raunſome for himſelfe, and thoſe few which were yet left aliue with him. Howbeit the Vayuod mindfull of the manifold iniuries The Caderkeſſer with all the Turke his followers ſlaine.

Yet within leſſe than a moneth after, he ſent Albertus Kirall his lieutenant with an armie to PHLOCH (a great open vnwalled towne on the farther ſide of Danubius, equally diſtant from VROSCZVK and NICOPOLIS) from whence the Turks oftentimes paſſing ouer that frozen riuer into VALACHIA, had there done great harme: which towne, not inferiour vnto a good citie, he ſuddenly ſurpriſed, and ſacking it, put to the ſword all Phloch ſpoiled by the Vaiuod.

C the inhabitants thereof, except ſuch as were before his comming fled. And ſhortly after (the more to annoy the Turkes, marching againe ouer the frozen riuer to haue ſurpriſed HERSOVVA a walled city, but one daies iourney from BRAILOVA, he was by the way vpon the yſe encountred by the Turkes, whom he there in a great conflict ouerthrew; and hauing ſlaine many of them and put the reſt to flight, holding on his intended iourney, tooke that rich citie, which hee rifled and burnt downe to the ground, all except the caſtle, which was yet by the Turks valiantly defended: and ſo with the ſpoile of the citie returned againe ouer the riuer, there to refreſh his ſoldiors, wearied with labor, and the extremitie of the Winter weather. And yet not ſo contented, Herſowa taken. Silſtria burnt

D within ſix daies after paſſing againe ouer the riuer, and hauing vpon the ſide thereof in a great battell ouerthrowne the Turks garriſons, tooke SILISTRA, a great citie of MACEDONIA, built by Conſtantine the Great (being the ſeat of one of the Turks Sanzacks, and well inhabited with rich merchants) which faire citie he ranſacked, and hauing ſlaine moſt part of the inhabitants, burnt it downe to the ground as he had the other, no leſſe terrour than griefe vnto the Turks.

But whileſt the aforeſaid confederation betwixt the emperour and the Tranſyluanian prince was yet in hand, and the troubles in VALACHIA thus ariſing; Amurath the great Sultan grieuouſly vexed with the ſtoan, and attainted with the falling ſickneſſe, his wonted diſeaſe; and in- Amurath dieth.

E wardly alſo tormented with the late inſolencie of the Ianizaries, and reuolt of the countries of TRANSYLVANIA, VALACHIA, and MOLDAVIA, no ſmall hinderance to the proceeding of his warres in HVNGARIE: as a man both in bodie and ſoule tormented with great impatiencie and agonie of mind, departed this life the eighteenth day of Ianuarie, in the yeare of our Lord 1595: when he had liued one and fiftie, or as ſome ſay two and fiftie yeares, and therof raigned nineteene. At the time of his death ariſe ſuch a ſudden and terrible tempeſt at CONSTANTINOPLE, that many thought the world ſhould euen preſently haue bene diſſolued. His dead bodie was not long after with great pompe and ſolemnitie buried by Mahomet his eldeſt ſonne, in a Moſchie which he himſelfe had before built at CONSTANTINOPLE.

THE

THE LIFE OF MAHOMET, THE THIRD OF THAT NAME, SEVENTH EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKES.

1595

THe death of the late great Sultan Amurath was not forthwith made knowne in the Court, but with wonderfull ſecrecie concealed, not only for feare of the Ianizaries, who in time of the vacancie of the empire alwaies do whatſoeuer pleaſeth themſelues: but alſo for that the people hauing in diſtruſt the fierce nature of Mahomet, Amurath his eldeſt ſonne, were generally better affected to Amurath the younger brother, a prince of a more mild ſpirit and courteous diſpoſition, vnto whom they in heart wiſhed thoſe ſtatelie honours, which could by no meanes without the great wrong and preiudice of his elder brother, & danger of the whole ſtate bee giuen vnto him. Ten daies after came Mahomet in poſt from AMASIA to CONSTANTINOPLE, and was there by the great Baſſaes and other his mightie fauourites ſaluted emperor: which done, he preſently after cauſed all his brethren to be inuited to a ſolemne feaſt in the court: wherunto they yet ignorant of the death of their father, came chearefully as men fearing no harme, but being come, were there all by his commaundement moſt miſerably ſtrangled: and at once to rid himſelfe of the feare of all competitors (the greateſt torment of the mighty) he the ſame day (as is reported) cauſed ten of his fathers wiues and concubines, ſuch as by whom any iſſue was to be feared, to bee all drowned in the ſea.

Mahomet ſaluted Emperour of the Turkes.

He murthereth his brethren.

The Ianizaries and other ſouldiours of the Court not before acquainted with the death of Amurath, neither with the choice that the great Baſſaes had without their priuitie made of Mahomet, and not a little offended to ſee themſelues ſo diſappointed of ſuch ſpoyles as they reckon due vnto them in the time of their vacancie, as men diſcontented riſe vp in a rage, and made ſuch hauocke and ſpoyle in the imperiall citie, as greater they could not well haue made, had there beene as yet no emperor choſen at all; and not ſo contented, were now euen vpon the point to haue rifled their new emperors Court, and to haue laied violent hands vpon the perſon of himſelfe, in reuenge of the tyrannie by him executed vpon his brethren and fathers wiues (which inhumane crueltie the Turkiſh emperors eaſily excuſe by the name of, The policie of their ſtate.) For the appeaſing of which ſo dangerous a tumult, Mahomet called vnto him certaine of the chiefe men among theſe ſeditious, ſuch as were thought to be able to do moſt with them, whom hee ſought by faire perſuaſions and large promiſes to win vnto him, and by them to pacifie the reſt: Which ſerued him to little or no purpoſe, vntill ſuch time as the great Baſſaes themſelues came out with their followers, who with many faire perſuaſions, mixt with moſt grieuous threats and firme promiſe of a generall pardon, with much ado appeaſed the tumult: yet for the more ſafetie kept all the chiefe ſtreets of the citie with ſtrong watch and ward. This broile thus ouerblowne, a new tent was by the commandement of the new emperour ſet vp before the temple of Sophia: wherein on the right hand was placed the dead bodie of the late Sultan Amurath, his father, and on the left hand the bodies of his nineteene ſtrangled brethren, layed forth of purpoſe,

The Ianizaries in a tumult.

The tumult appeaſed.

A poſe, as an heauie ſpectacle for the people to behold: who all not long after were togither with their father with great ſolemnitie after the Turkiſh manner buried, and Mahomet himſelfe (being about nine and twentie yeares old) now openly proclaimed great emperor of the Turkes, and lord of all, from the riſing of the Sunne to the going downe of the ſame. After that returning to his pallace, hee made vnto his Baſſaes and other great men a ſumptuous and royall feaſt, as the manner was: but whileſt they were in the middeſt of their mirth, vpon the ſudden all the citie was againe in an vproare, and the people in armes, in ſuch ſort, as that it was thought ſcarce one man would haue eſcaped aliue, from that banket, had not the chiefe Baſſa with his grauitie and wiſdome and wonderfull labour in good time appeaſed their furie, and withall to their greater terror cauſed all the great ordinance in the citie to be brought forth into the ſtreets, readie char-

B ged, to be ſhot off amongſt them.

Whileſt theſe troubles thus paſſed at CONSTANTINOPLE, vpon the late confederation made betweene the emperor, the Tranſyluanian prince, the Valachians and Moldauians, diuers fortunate inrodes and skirmiſhes wer by them made in the frontiers of the Turkes dominions, many ſtrong places were ſurpriſed, many rich booties taken, and notable exploits done, which we will but briefely paſſe ouer, as the precedents of a greater warre. The citie of WEITZE, before taken by the Turks, was now againe in the beginning of this yeare recouered: and the Chriſtians about SCVTHIA, in number about foure thouſand, breaking into the Turks frontiers, carried away an exceeding rich prey, with diuers notable captiues. The like did alſo the Chriſtians of VIVARIA: at which time alſo the garriſon ſouldiours of ALTENBVRG making a rode into

Diuers fortunat rodes made by the Chriſtians vpon the Turkes

C the countrie about RAB, encountered with foure thouſand Turkes, of whom they ſlew two hundred, tooke certaine priſoners, whom they ſent ſome to PRESBVRG, ſome to ALTENBVRG: and Sinan Baſſa the late General returning towards CONSTANTINOPLE with much treaſure, which he had greedily ſcraped togither in the late wars in HVNGARIE, was by the Valachians ſet vpon by the way not farre from BELGRADE, and ſtript of all that he had, hauing much adoe to eſcape himſelfe with ſome few of his followers. The ſame Valachians, togither with the Tranſyluanians, vnder the conduct of their valiant captain Geſtius Ferens, entering further vpon the Turks, tooke from them diuers of their townes and caſtles, as PONDESIE, NICOPLISE, KILLA, and REBNICHI, and meeting with twelue thouſand Tartars, ſlew a great number of them, and put the reſt to flight. With this inſolencie of the Valachians his late tributaries, but

D now his enemies, the Turkiſh emperor was highly offended: and therefore ſent one Bogdanus a Valachian borne, deſcended of the Palatines houſe, with a great power to expulſe the old Vayuod, and to poſſeſſe himſelfe of that honour, as his tributarie; promiſing vnto him all fauour and kindneſſe. Bogdanus thus ſupported and furniſhed, came with his power into VALACHIA, yet thought it beſt before he attempted any great matter, to expect the comming of the Tartars left the laſt yeare in HVNGARIE by Sinan: of whoſe comming the Valachians and Tranſyluanians hauing vnderſtanding, met them by the way, and ioyning battel with them, ſlew eight thouſand of them, put the reſt to flight, and ſo returned: vnto whom preſently after this victorie the Tranſyluanian prince ſent foureteene thouſand ſouldiours moe to aid them againſt the Turkes. But Bogdanus vnderſtanding both of the ouerthrow of the Tartars and the comming of this new

E ſupplie, durſt not proceed any farther in his enterpriſe, but kept himſelfe ſtill in his trenches. Not long after by the commandement of the Turkiſh emperour, Han the Crim Tartar with a great power of his Tartarian horſemen entred into MOLDAVIA, with purpoſe to haue by fire and ſword reduced that countrie againe vnto the Turks obeiſance: of whoſe comming Aaron Vayuod of MOLDAVIA hauing knowledge, and aided by his neighbor Michael Vayuod of VALACHIA, ſo belaied the Tartars, that he in three diuers battels ouerthrew them, and hauing ſlaine twelue thouſand of them, enforced the reſt to retire againe out of his countrie: and following the courſe of this victorie, preſently after tooke BENDAR, SCHINITZ, TIONA, MECHNIS, with ſome other caſtles and fortreſſes of the Turkes neere vnto the riuer of Danubius, all which he furniſhed with his owne garriſons; and withall tooke in the rich countrie of BOBRA-

F GA, the inhabitants thereof willingly ſubmitting themſelues vnto him, as men wearie of the Turkiſh thraldome. With like good fortune, aided by the Polonian Coſſackes, he ouerthrew Ianicula the ſonne of Bogdanus, ſometime Vayuod of MOLDAVIA, now ſent by Mahomet with a great power, as a moſt fit inſtrument to trouble the Vayuod, and to recouer againe that countrey: with whom Aaron couragiouſly encountring at SCARPETRA, a mile from Danubius, ouerthrew him in plaine battel, and hauing ſlaine eight thouſand of his Turks, put him to flight, G and tooke the ſpoile of his whole campe. Neither yet ſo contented, marched preſently to NE-STER ALBA, where he put the Turkes in a great feare, and afterwards burnt the ſuburbs of the ci-tie, and ſo retired.

The emperors embaſſador lieth in priſon at Belgrade.

How Amurath the late Sultan in the beginning of theſe troubles, had at CONSTANTI-NOPLE thut vp in priſon Frederick Krecowitz the emperours embaſſadour, is before declared. This embaſſadour Sinan Baſſa brought with him the laſt yeare when he came into HVN-GARIE, who after many indignities by him ſuffered both vpon the way and at BELGRADE, there died: fiue of whoſe ſeruants the falſe Baſſa cauſed to be kept in ſtraight priſon, as guiltie of their maſters death, ſo to auert the infamie thereof from himſelfe. But now lying himſelfe at BEL-GRADE for the better mannaging of this yeares warres, vpon the comming of a new treaſurer H from the Court, he cauſed the fiue poore priſoners to be brought before him, and moſt impudently charged them with the death of their maſter: ſaying, that they ſhould anſwere for the ſame vnto God and their emperour; and that his purpoſe in bringing of him from CONSTAN-TINOPLE, was to no other end but to haue vſed his helpe in concluding a peace betwixt the Great Sultan and the emperour, and ſo to haue ſet him with all his at libertie: but now that hee was dead, he would ſend them his treacherous ſeruants to the emperour to bee by him examined: and withall to tell him, That he was ſent from the Great Sultan, (whoſe power was not by any but God onely to be withſtood) to beſiege VIENNA, which he could (as he ſaid) the laſt yeare haue taken with leſſe labour than he had done RAB: and that therefore it were beſt for him betime to ſeeke for peace, before ſo great a power had taken the field: And that for farther I inſtructions, he would referre them to his ſonne the Baſſa of BVDA, to whom he ſent them from BELGRADE, togither with the new come treaſurer. Being come to BVDA, they were forthwith brought before the Baſſa, and amongſt them the late embaſſadours ſecretarie, vnto whom after he had ſaid ſomewhat of the hard dealing with the embaſſadour and his followers, he declared that he had alwaies diſliked of that manner of proceeding, and oftentimes entreated his father for their libertie, and now at laſt to haue obtained, that the embaſſador being dead, his ſeruants might be ſet free: and ſo put them in good hope, that they ſhould in ſhort time be reſtored to their wonted libertie. In the meane time, that one of them ſhould go vnto the emperours Court, & there ſpeake with one of his Secretaries, whom he had before aduiſed to bethinke himſelfe of peace: vnto whom alſo he afterwards writ, vpon what conditions he thought peace K might be at the Sultans hand obtained. Which were, if all the caſtles and ſtrong holds taken by the emperours forces in theſe warres, as FILEK, SETCHINE, and NOVIGRAD, with their territories, ſhould be reſtored, SISEK in CROATIA ſurrendred; if the emperour ſhould from thence forth refuſe to aid or protect the Tranſyluanians, Moldauians, and Valachians, and leaue them to the Great Sultan to be chaſtiſed as rebels; if finally the emperour would at once ſend vnto the Turks Court his wonted tribute for the yeares paſt, and ſo yearely afterwards: ſo he could be content by the mediation of his father, to attempt to appeaſe the fierce and inueterat diſpleaſure of the Sultan, and to farther the treatie of peace. This he commaunded the Secretarie to write, and to ſend it by the young lord Perling, and to require thereof anſwere: yet that he ſhould go with this condition, That if the ſaid Perling within the ſpace of fiue and twentie daies L returned not with anſwere, all the reſt ſhould for his default loſe their heads. A ſubtile deuiſe and full of deceit, wherein the craftie Baſſaes, both the father and the ſonne ſought for nothing els but to ſee what confidence the Chriſtians had in themſelues, and to breake the confederation made betweene the emperour, the Tranſyluanians, Moldauians, and Valachians: and that other princes, whom God had ſtirred vp in defence of ſo iuſt a cauſe, hearing of a rumour of peace, might grow cold, and deferre to ſend their promiſed aid. For now the Turkes had found by experience, how hurtfull and dangerous the reuolt of the three countries of TRANSYLVANIA, MOLDAVIA, and VALACHIA was vnto them, as they which brought ten hundred thouſand duckats yearely into the Great Sultans treaſurie: beſides that, thoſe people now become their M enemies, were of all other fitteſt to intercept all maner of prouiſion to be brought by land either to or from CONSTANTINOPLE, were it victuall or other warlike prouiſion. Notwithſtanding this motion of peace made by the two Baſſaes, Sinan the old Baſſa in the meane time, with great diligence at BELGRADE prepared all things neceſſarie for warre, and cauſed three bridges to be made, whereby he might in diuers places as he thought beſt, tranſport his armie ouer Danubius;

A and at the ſame time ſent for the garriſons round about, and other ſoldiors before billited in the countrie, and put in readineſſe all things neceſſarie for a moſt mortall war.

Within the appointed time came Perling from the emperours Court with anſwere to the letters written by the embaſſadours Secretarie, at the commandement of the Baſſa; the effect whereof was, That he had receiued his letters by Perling, and did thereby vnderſtand what had paſſed betweene the captiue ſeruants of the late embaſſadour, and Sinan Baſſa at BELORADES and alſo betweene them and Sinan Baſſa his ſonne at BVDA; and that the emperours mind was neuer other, but that a firme peace might haue been made betweene him and the Sultan; and that the emperour had done nothing elſe by his embaſſadour at CONSTANTINOPLE, or by others in other places, but that ſuch reaſonable conditions might haue been found out, as might
B haue ended thoſe warres, and haue on both ſides deliuered their innocent ſubiects from their great and dayly calamities; which might eaſily haue beene done, if Sinan the author and fautor of this warre, had with like deſire furthered the peace. But that it was manifeſt vnto the whole world, that all complaints of infinit grieuances, being by the embaſſadour, yea and by the emperor himſelfe, by his letters laied open vnto the Sultan and his chiefe Baſſaes, had not only nothing preuailed, but alſo to haue bin with great contempt reiected, and the treatie of peace once begun, to haue by the inſolencie of the Baſſa of BOSNA been interrupted: That the emperour, becauſe the matter ſhould not breake out into open warre, had ſent his double tribute into the confines of HVNGARIE, which was a great while laid vp at KOMARA vntill the Sultans mind were knowne. But when all his deſſignes tended to warre, and the Chriſtian prouinces were by C his robbers on euery ſide ſpoiled, the inhabitants led away into moſt miſerable captiuitie, the townes and villages burnt, yea whole countries left deſolate, and all manner of outrages were vpon a meere pride and contempt as it were of the whole world exerciſed: then the emperour to haue taken his refuge vnto the defence of his iuſt cauſe, and to haue vſed ſuch remedies as are both before God and the world to bee allowed, and ſo by lawfull warre to haue repulſed warre. And that although all had not the laſt yeare proſpered in his hand, but that he had receiued ſome loſſe: yet that Sinan Baſſa himſelfe, and the Baſſa of BVDA his ſonne, with other of the wiſer ſort of the Turks muſt needs confeſſe, that to haue chanced, that by their wiſedome, policie or power, but by the ſufferance of God by a rare misfortune, through the inexcuſable neg-
D ligence and treaſon of ſuch as he had put in truſt with the confines of his empire, worthie moſt ſeuere chaſtiſement. And that no man could denie, but that great powers of the Turks, had not once, but oftentimes been ouerthrowne and diſcomfited, by ſmall handfuls of the Chriſtians: therefore their power not to be ſo inuincible, as they vainly vaunted of. But whereas it is written, that the great Viſier Sinan and the Baſſa his ſonne are of opinion, that the emperour is brought to ſo low an ebbe, that he muſt be glad to accept of moſt hard and diſhonourable conditions of peace propounded by them: therein they erre much and deceiue themſelues far, for by the power of God they ſhould ſhortly by experience know, that his imperiall maieſtie wanteth neither power nor wealth, to repaire the loſſe receiued through the treaſon of them he truſted, yea and to recouer whatſoeuer he had loſt elſe: and that it ſhould in ſhort time bee witneſſed vnto the whole world, by the helpe of God and the defence of a moſt iuſt cauſe, that the E emperour was not ſo poore and weake as they ſuppoſed him to bee. Yet as he of his owne naturall goodnes and clemencie, with his own incomparable loſſe and harme, had alwaies ſought for the quiet and profit of his ſubiects, and to the vttermoſt of his power ſtaied the effuſion of innocent bloud; ſo now alſo forgetting all iniuries, he could happily be content to thinke of an honourable peace: whereunto hee was more enclined than to protract the warre with the vnſpeakable harms of the ſubiects on both ſides. Yet aboue all things it behooued Sinan to know, that he was to reſtore all ſuch caſtles and townes as haue in this warre been taken by the Turks, beginning at WIHITZ in CROATIA euen to the laſt innocent ſubiect by them carried way into captiuitie. And that the Tranſyluanians, Moldauians, and Valachians (people many ages ioyned and vnited as inſeperable members to the kingdome of HVNGARIE, as vnto the true F bodie, and now of late by the practiſe and treacherie of certaine rebellious perſons ſeperated from the ſame) were from henceforth to be left vnder the protection & gouernment of his imperiall maieſtie, and neuer more to be impugned by the Turkes. If theſe things were done, and order taken that the iniurie and diſgrace done vnto the emperours late embaſſadour (a fact that all the princes of the world cried ſhame of) might not remaine vnpuniſhed: & that his ſeruants in durance at Byda and Constantinople, might be restored vnto their wonted libertie, G

then some good forme of peace, and bounding of their territories might happily be agreed vpon: without which conditions, all talke of peace was but vaine; for that God the iust and mightie protector of such as put their trust in him, would not faile to helpe his imperial maiestie, with the rest of the confederat princes, in their so iust a quarrell, and abate the pride of such as trust in their owne strength and power.

This answere the captiues at Byda were commaunded to giue vnto the Bassa, either by writing or by word of mouth: and withall earnestly to request him both for their owne libertie and their fellowes, wrongfully detayned at Constantinople. Which if it could not bee obtained, yet to comfort themselues with that, that they should in bounteous manner receiue from the emperour such allowance, as should suffice to prouide them things necessarie: as hee H had granted to Perling, whom he might haue iustly detained and not sent him backe againe, but for his oaths sake, being no lawfull prisoner. Thus were the vnreasonable conditions of peace craftily by the Bassa propounded, by others answered: but by whom he knew not, no mans name being set thereunto.

The emperor not ignorant with what an enemie hee had to doe, and of nothing more carefull than of the kingdome (or more truely to say, of the reliques of the kingdome) of Hvngarie, lying now as it were in the lyons mouth, ceased not to pray aid, not of the princes electors only, but of others also farther off; yea euen as farre as Italie and Spaine, but especially of the king of Polonia, as his neere alliance and neighbour. Vnto whom both he and the States of Hvngarie sent their embassadours, at such time as he moued with the dayly incursions of I the Turkes and Tartars into the countries adioyning vpon his, had for the safetie of his owne kingdome, called a parliament of all his States in Februarie last, at Cracovia. Whereof Mahomet the Great Turke hearing, sent also two of his chiefe Chiaus, his vsuall embassadours vnto the king and his States so assembled, to craue his aid in his wars in Hvngarie: which if the king should not refuse, then to promise him to want no coine to pay his souldiors; and that Mahomet mindfull of so great a courtesie, would at all times be readie to requit him with like, when his occasions should require. These embassadours, hauing obtained safe conduct from Michael the Vayuod of Valachia for their passage through his countrie, comming thither, were by the Vayuod himselfe honourably entertained and welcomed, and so brought into a faire lodging, where they discoursed with him of many matters. But the Vayuods followers, grieued to K see so great honour done to these their sworn and mortall enemies, with weapons in their hands brake into the roome where the embassadours were, and without more adoe slew them both: and in the same furie setting vpon the rest of the Turkes their followers, cut them all in pieces, so that of them none came into Polonia to do their great Masters message, either yet returned to Constantinople to carrie newes of the rest, but there altogither perished. Of which outrage Mahomet yet vnderstanding, was therewith wonderfully enraged, threatning all euils both to the Moldauians and Valachians, and forthwith sent out other embassadors to the same purpose, who with better fortune afterwards in safetie arriued in Polonia.

The Turkes embassadors sent vnto the Polonian king slaine in Valachia.

The Tartars in many places (as is before declared) ouerthrown, and many strong castles and forts taken from the Turks by the Transyluanians, Valachians, and Moldauians, the Turkish L affaires going to wracke in those quarters, and sore shaken on that side of Hvngarie; Mahomet the Turkish emperor called home to the Court Sinan Bassa his Generall in Hvngarie, to conferre with him (as it was thought) of some great matters. In whose place hee sent Ferat Bassa, hee who sometime had the leading of Amuraths great armies against the Persians: who now departing from Constantinople, came to Belgrade in Aprill, and there tooke the charge vpon him. Where at his first comming in the night time, all the ropes and cordes of the tents were suddenly cut in sunder, and so his tent let fall about his eares: which some supposed to haue bin done to his disgrace, by the procurement of Cicala Bassa before by him wronged; or as others thought, by the insolent Ianizaries, who disliking of him, did it in despight, wishing rather to haue beene led by Mahomet himselfe. Now at his comming, the famine which the last M yeare began amongst the Turks, was growne exceeding great, not at Byda and Belgrade onely, but euen generally in most places of Hvngarie possessed by the Turkes: insomuch, that the Tartar women that followed the campe, were faine to roast their owne children & eate them. This famine was also accompanied with a most terrible plague, whereof great numbers of

A the Turkes and Tartars died dayly: ſo that of foureſcore fiue thouſand Tartars which came the laſt yeare into Hvngarie, now remained ſcarce eight thouſand, the reſt being all deuoured with the ſword, famin, and the peſtilence.

Great were the harmes the Turkes ſtill daily receiued from the late reuolted countries of Transylvania, Valachia, and Moldavia, the Chriſtians, of thoſe places ſeeking by all meanes to annoy them. Michael Vaiuod of Valachia, not contented with that he had alreadie done, but entring into the Turkes frontires, ſurpriſed Schimele, together with the caſtle, wherin he found 14. field pieces, amongſt which were two which had vpō them the armes of the emperour Ferdinand, and other two hauing vpon them the armes of Huniades: which pieces he afterward ſent as a preſent to the Tranſyluanian prince. After that he tooke Orosig, a famous

With the beginning of the Spring came Matthias the Archduke and Generall of the Chriſtian armie, from the aſſembly of the nobilitie of Hvngarie at Presbvrg, to Vienna, and ſo from thence to the emporour his brother at Prage; who appointed him Generall of the lower

C Hvngarie, and Maximilian his brother Generall of the vpper country: giuing them for their lieutenants, vnto Maximilian the lord Teuffenbach, and to Matthias the countie Charles Mansfelt, by him ſent for out of Flanders, and after created one of the princes of the empire. Iohn de Medices, who was yet in Hvngarie, he made maſter of the great ordinance, which charge to fortifie Komara: which he ſo well performed, as that it was thought nothing in ſtrength inferior to Rab. All this while the emperor ceaſed not both by his embaſſadors and letters to ſollicite the Chriſtian princes, for the repreſsing of the common enemie to put to their helping hands: and ſo much preuailed with them, that out of his owne hereditarie prouinces, & from other princes his friends, he had this Spring raiſed a right puiſſant and ſtrong armie for the defence of Hvngarie: which how it was raiſed, and from whom, it ſhall not be much from our purpoſe briefely to remember, as the chiefe ſtrength vnder God, wherby the Chriſtian commonweale was this yeare moſt notably defended. Out of the higher Saxonie came a thouſand two hundred

D horſemen, and out of the lower Saxonie ſix hundred: from Franconia a thouſand horſemen: from Svevia foure thouſand footmen: out of the countie of Tirol as many: from Bavaria three thouſand: out of Bomemia two thouſand men at armes, ſix hundred light horſemen, and ſix thouſand footmen: from Silesia a thouſand fiue hundred horſemen: from Lvsatia fiue hundred horſe and a thouſand foot: from Moravia a thouſand horſe, and two thouſand foot: out of Avstria two thouſand horſe and ſix thouſand foot: from Hvngarie fiue hundred horſemen and a thouſand foot: from the nobilitie of Svevia and Franconia foure thouſand foot: from the king of Spaine out of the low countries vnder the conduct of Charles countie Mansfelt, two thouſand horſemen and ſix thouſand foot: Vnto theſe the biſhop of Rome added two thouſand horſemen and eight thouſand foot: the great duke of

E Florence ſent fiue hundred horſe and three thouſand foot: the duke Ferrara a thouſand fiue hundred footmen: the duke of Mantva a thouſand foot: and duke Ventureo fiue hundred horſe. All which being put together, fill vp the number of fifteene thouſand nine hundred horſemen, and fiftie thouſand fiue hundred foot. Which notable armie, raiſed from the power of diuers Chriſtian princes, and conducted by worthie chiefetaines, had by the goodneſſe of God much better ſucceſſe this Summer againſt the auntient enemies of Chriſtendome, than had the like armie the yeare before, as in the proceſſe of this Hiſtorie ſhall appeare.

Among the worthie commaunders that were in this puiſſant armie, Charles countie Mansfelt the ſonne of Peter Erneſtus the old countie, from his youth brought vp in armes, was by the king of Spaine at the requeſt of the emprour ſent with the aforeſaid forces of two thouſand

F horſe and ſix thouſand foot out of the Low countries, as a man for his approued valour and direction, fit to manage theſe dangerous warres againſt the Turke vnder Matthias the Archduke, as his lieutenant Generall: who hauing raiſed the appointed forces, for moſt part Wallons, departed from Brvxelles about the midſt of Februarie, and by the way taking his leaue of his aged father at Lvxenbvrg, and trauelling through Germanie, came in March to Prage, where he was by the Emprour and the Archduke his brother moſt honourably entertained, and G ſhortly after with great ſolemnitie created one of the Princes of the empire. His forces following after him were by the way ſtaied, partly by the inundation of waters, the riuers they were to paſſe ouer (at that time riſing to an vnwonted height,) partly by the iealouſie of ſome of the Germane princes, who denied them paſſage through their territories, vntill ſuch time as that the emperour by his letters had opened vnto him the way: which princes for all that ſtood vpon their guard, and ſo gaue him paſſage.

Now ran great rumours of the wonderfull preparations of the Turks, as alſo of the Chriſtians; Fame after her wonted manner, encreaſing the report of all things aboue meaſure: which cauſed the Turks with exceeding care to looke to the fortification of their frontier towns, eſpecially of RAB and STRIGONIVM, as did the Chriſtians to the fortification of KOMARA and H ALTENBVRG. In the meane time many hoat skirmiſhes paſſed betweene the Chriſtians and the Turks, eſpecially in the late reuoulted countries of TRANSYLVANIA and VALACHIA, wherein the Turkes were ſtill put to the worſe, to the great diſcontentment of their emperour. Neere vnto TEMESVVAR the Baſſa of BVDA was ouerthrowne, by the valiant captaine Geſtius Ferentz, and the Tranſyluanians. And in VALACHIA the Turks Generall, entring with a great armie was there alſo by the lord Nadaſti and the Valachians aided with the Tranſyluanians, in a great battell diſcomfited and ouerthrowne. Eight thouſand of the Turkes heads in token of this victorie the lord Nadaſti ſent to ALBAIVLIA to the Tranſyluanian prince, and certaine enſigns, amongſt which one was moſt richly garniſhed with pretious ſtones and pearle, thought to be worth thirtie thouſand dollars; which the prince afterward reſtored againe to Nadaſti, of- I fering him great poſſeſſions in TRANSYLVAINA, if he could haue bin content there to haue ſeated himſelfe.

Ferat Baſſa ouerthrowne in Valachia.

All this Spring the Turkes countenanced their warres with greater boaſts and threats than true force, giuing it out, That they would in ſhort time worke wonders both by ſea and land. For the more credit whereof, Murat Rays, a notable pyrat, was ſent out with twelue gallies; who landing here and there vpon the coaſts of ITALIE, did much harme, cauſing it to bee reported in euery place where he landed, That this was but the beginning of a greater war, and that a wonderfull fleet was to follow him: which raiſed a great feare, as well in other places as in ITALIE. Howbeit, no ſuch fleet afterwards appeared: for why the Turkiſh emperor, much troubled with the reuolt of TRANSYLVANIA, VALACHIA, and MOLDAVIA, and the great mortalitie then K raging both among his ſouldiors and their horſes, was not at leaſure to looke into the ſea, hauing his hands full ynough with the troubles of HVNGARIE, where his men of war enioyed little reſt in the frontires of his territories.

Sigiſmund the Tranſyluanian prince, had vpon ſome iuſt cauſes of late ſuſpected Aaron the Vayuod of MOLDAVIA, to haue intelligence not only with the Polonians, but alſo with the Cardinall Bator and other his mortall enemies, and ſecretly to haue beene about to make his peace with Mahomet, and ſo againe to fall off from him vnto the Turke: Which vehement ſuſpition growing dayly more and more, was about this time manifeſtly confirmed by certain letters intercepted concerning that matter. For the preuenting whereof, the prince cauſed Aaron to be apprehended, and with his wife and ſonne to bee ſent as priſoners to PRAGE: in whoſe L roome he by the conſent of the nobilitie of the countrie, placed one Stephen Rozwan, a wiſe and diſcreet man amongſt them, and ſuch an one as had been vnto him alwaies faithfull. So as much as in him was, prouiding that that countrie ſhould not be rent from him, and the vnion of the other. But againſt the ſecret practiſes of the Polonians, he proteſted openly by letters vnto the emperor, by the power of God, and aid of his faithful ſubiects to redreſſe thoſe ſo great iniuries himſelfe by the ſword.

Mahomet ſendeth embaſſadors to the prince of Tranſyluania.

In the middeſt of theſe troubles came three Chiaus, embaſſadours from the Turkiſh Sultan vnto the prince, to perſuade him againe to put himſelfe into his protection, and to giue him paſſage through his countrey, as in former time into HVNGARIE; promiſing him, that all the iniuries by him or his people done, ſhould be for euer forgotten and forgiuen: and that hee ſhould M haue thoſe three countries of TRANSYLVANIA, VALACHIA, and MOLDAVIA, as his owne free inheritance, without paying any tribute, and ſo to be accounted as the Turks moſt louing friend and vaſſale. What the prince anſwered thereunto, was not knowne, but by his doings afterwards it was eaſily to be gathered, that hee hearkened not vnto the deceitfull charmes of the

faithleſſe

A faithleſſe tyrant, truſting more vnto the league he had with the Chriſtian Emperour. Theſe embaſſadors were ſcarce gone, but that a ſecret meſſenger came with letters from the chiefe of the Chriſtians in BVLGARIA to the prince, declaring vnto him, That if he did with any good ſucceſſe proſecute his warres, they would be readie to follow his fortune, and to ioyne hands with him againſt the cruell tyrant, and to ſhut vp all the paſſages that way into VALACHIA, MOLDAVIA, and HVNGARIE.

Whileſt theſe troubleſome times thus paſſed in TRANSYLVANIA and HVNGARIE, one of the old Ianizaries, called Waſuode Giezi, an old ſouldior, but a confident bold ſpoken fellow, moued as ſhould ſeeme with the diſcontentments of the time, came vnto Mahomet the great Sultan at CONSTANTINOPLE, and there openly ſet vpon him with this rough abrupt ſpeech.

B How long at laſt moſt mightie Emperour, wilt thou endure thy ſelfe to bee ſeduced and blinded by the great Baſſaes of thy Court, and commaunders of thine armies? How long wilt thou ſuffer thy ſelfe to be deceiued, to the great danger of thy ſelfe, and hurt of thy ſubiects? Seeſt thou not how ouerthwartly, fraudulently, and cunningly, they mooued onely with their owne couetous and ambitious humour, haue hitherto dealt with thee and thy father? eſpecially in that, that perſuaded by them, thou haſt diſhonorably broken thy league, and taken vp armes againſt the Chriſtian Emperour. At length open thine eyes, and ſee their deceit, and how much they abuſe thy power. Sinan Baſſa, who muſt haue himſelfe honoured and exalted aboue all others, hath not by ſtrong hand honourably woon RAB, as hath beene the manner of thine anncеſtors, but hath craftily bought it with thy money, and thereby caſt thee into a moſt dangerous

C warre, and infinite troubles. O RAB, RAB, now the cauſe of great triumph and reioycing, as if thereby all Chriſtendome ſhould in ſhort time bee ſubdued to thy ſcepter. But thou art therein much deceiued, thy barnes, thy ſtore-houſes, as are TRANSYLVANIA, VALACHIA, MOLDAVIA, BVLGARIA, and other prouinces adioyning, from whence this thy imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, with the countrey about it, thy court, yea thy ſelfe, art to be relieued, are by this warre ſhut vp; ſo that downe the riuer of Danubius out of the Weſt, or by the Euxine out of the Eaſt, thou art not able to looke for any prouiſion. From whence then, O mightie Emperour, wilt thou maintaine thy ſelfe, thy Court, this populous citie, and the countrey hereabout? Not to ſpeake in the meane time of thy mightie armie now in HVNGARIE, fleſh, fiſh, corne, all manner of victuall are now at ſuch a price, that the common ſouldior cannot buy them. In this extreame dearth of all things, not men onely, but euen the very beaſts and cattell ſtarue for hunger.

D Thy horſes go fat perhaps into HVNGARIE, but neither thou nor thy ſelect ſouldiors can liue by graſſe and weeds, all that is left in that countrey. This miſerie and calamitie of thy people thou ſeeſt daily, and yet thou wilt not with ſound iudgement lift vp thine eyes, to ſee from whence theſe harmes come, and how that they by thee put in greateſt truſt, ſtudie not for thy profit or the profit of the common weale, but only how by all meanes to enrich themſelues.

Mahomet much mooued with the confident ſpeach of the old Ianizarie, commaunded him to bee foorthwith committed to ward, and by faire meanes to be examined, by whoſe ſetting on, and for what cauſe he had ſo boldly vttered this rude ſpeech vnto his Soueraigne, and what further thing he had intended: but the reſt of the Ianizaries hearing thereof, riſe preſent-

E ly in a tumult, and by ſtrong hand tooke him out of priſon, and by ſolemne oath combined themſelues to defend him, euen to the ſpending of their owne blood, whereat Mahomet was glad to winke.

The greateſt part of the aid promiſed by the Chriſtian princes for the maintenance of this yeares warres againſt the Turke being now come to VIENNA in AVSTRIA, Countie Mansfelt, lieutenant Generall vnder the Archduke, forthwith called a counſell of the Colonels, captaines and other great commanders of the armie, to conſult with them what courſe to take for the beginning of this great warre: as whether they ſhould preſently lay ſiege to ſome towne of the enemies, or els to expect him in the plaine field and to giue him battell. All things well conſidered, and that reſolued vpon which was thought moſt expedient, he remoued from VIENNA to

F ALTENBVRG, where hee muſtered his whole armie: and departed thence with ſome few of his followers, came to WALKENBVRG, a village vpon the ſide of Danubius, where hee made choiſe of a place to encampe his armie in: which after he had marked out, he returned again with ſpeed to ALTENBVRG, and by open proclamation through the campe, gaue ſtraight commaundement, That againſt a certaine houre euery man ſhould be in readineſſe to remoue and ſet forward ward toward the enemy. But diuers of the ſouldiors, and eſpecially the Germanes, began forth- G with after their wonted manner to crie out for their pay before they would ſtirre any farther: ſo that the Countie was glad by a ſecond proclamation to command them to riſe, promiſing them their pay within eight daies. But they ſtil ſtanding vpon their former reſolution for their pay, refuſed any further to follow their captaines, and ſent ſix of the beſt ſort among thoſe mutinous ſouldiors to the Countie, in the name of all the reſt to demand their pay; whom he foorthwith commaunded to be all hanged: but three of them hauing reaſonably excuſed themſelues, he let them go, and cauſing the other three to caſt lots for their liues, hanged vp two of them. Which ſeuere execution ſo terrified the reſt, that vpon the ſigne giuen they all riſe, and with the reſt of the armie followed the Countie. The whole army being come to WALKENBVRG vnto the place where they were to incamp; the countie himſelfe with others of the nobilitie, began with ſpades H and ſhouels to dig & caſt vp the trenches, and ſo wrought vntill they ſweat againe: with whoſe example all the reſt of the armie, of what degree ſoeuer, being moued to labor, had in ſhort time caſt vp a verie great trench from Danubius vnto the mariſhes, large enough for foureſcore thouſand men to encampe in, the great worke with reſtleſſe labour going forward both night and

The Countie lying thus intrenched with his armie, was ſtill carefull by his eſpials to vnderſtand where the enemie lay, and what he did. Hee was readie ſtill to heare all, but to beleeue that which ſeemed to be moſt like to be true: what he purpoſed, he kept moſt ſecret; ſo that the enemie could neuer diſcouer any of his deſignes (wherein the Generals of late yeares before him had much erred:) and commonly his moſt certaine reſolutions were ſhadowed vnder the open ſhew of ſome other matter nothing meant: ſecuritie he much abhor- I red, as neuer free from danger: and although it was by diuers meſſengers brought vnto him, That the enemy was but of ſmall ſtrength, vnable to meet him, diſorderedly encamped, and in great diſtreſſe for want of victuals; yet would he giue little credit therunto, as knowing ſuch reports to haue oftentimes bin of purpoſe giuen out by the Turks to lull the chriſtians in ſecurity, the more eaſily to oppreſſe them. The Chriſtian armie thus ſtrongly entrenched, and the trenches planted with great ordinance, the Countie himſelfe with certain troups of horſmen would oftentimes ſhew himſelfe before RAB, and ſometime before DOTIS, viewing ſometime the one place, and ſometime the other, as if he had verely purpoſed to haue beſieged the one of them: and to giue the greater ſhew that he had ſo determined, he cauſed the ground to be marked out for his armie moſt conuenientlie to encampe in, and for the caſting vp of his mounts. Which K cauſed the Turks of SERIGONIVM, VMSPRINIVM, PALOTTA, and other places farther off, to ſend part as well of their warlike prouiſion as of their garriſon ſouldiors, ſome to RAB, ſome to Do-Dotis beſieged by the Chriſtians TIS for the defence of thoſe places neereſt (as they thought) vnto danger. The Countie in the meane time hauing now put all things in readineſſe, came with his armie and ſat downe before DOTIS, demanding to haue it yeelded vnto him. And the more to confirme the Turkes that he would aſſuredly beſiege that place, hee began to caſt vp his trenches, and to raiſe his mounts as ſeemed moſt conuenient, ſtraitly commanding euery man of what condition ſoeuer, to put his hand in ſome meaſure to the furtherance of thoſe works: and the more by his owne example to encourage others, would oftentimes himſelfe carrie a fagot or ſome other thing before him vp-on his horſe, for the raiſing of the mount. For all that certaine Hungarian gentlemen, diſdai- L ning ſuch baſe labour (as they deemed it) refuſed to doe any thing therein: which the Countie perceiuing, ſtraitly charged one of them by his example, to carrie a fagot to the mount, which the Hungarian gentleman refuſing, the Countie therewith much mooued, laid the fagot he was carrying himſelfe, before the Hungarian vpon his horſe, charging him to ſee that he caried it to the appointed place: the Hungarian diſdainfully taking it, caried it vntil he thought he was out of the Counties ſight, and then in ſcorne threw it down: which the Countie (hauing ſtill an eye after him) perceiuing, commanded him to be taken, and all armed as he rid, to be preſently hanged vpon the next tree for his obſtinacie. Which wholſome ſeueritie both then and afterwards, cauſed others more diligently to do what they were commanded by their ſuperiors.

An obſtinate Turke. It happened about this time, that three Turkes being taken priſoners, were brought into the M campe: whom the Countie ſtraitly examined of many matters. But the firſt of the three could neither by faire or foule meanes be induced to anſwer to any thing that he was asked: and was therefore by the commaundement of the Countie in the ſight of the other two, cut into ſmall pieces. Who terrified with his diſmembring, confeſſed many things whereof they were asked:

and

A and among others, that the Turkish Sultan had determined to turn his greatest forces into TRANSYLVANIA, MOLDAVIA, and the vpper part of HVNGARIE: and therefore would this Summer send small forces, or else none at all into those quarters.

Now was DOTIS so belaid by the Countie, as that no man doubted, but that he had thereon purposed to haue gaged his whole forces, when suddenly the last of Iune, commaundement was giuen through the campe, that euery man vpon signe giuen, should bee in readinesse to follow his leaders, for that the Countie had determined foorthwith to remoue: yet whither the armie was to be remooued, few or none knew, more than certaine of the chiefe commaunders. As for to goe to STRIGONIVM, few there were that so much as dreamed thereof, all was kept so secret: yet was it the Counties purpose, euen from the beginning to attempt the winning of that citie, Countie M... fold remo... with the ar... from Dotis to Strigonium.
B which the Archduke had in vaine the last yeare besieged. The next night being both darke and foule, the Countie rise with all his armie, and the next day being the first of Iuly, came to STRIGONIVM, they of the citie not hearing of his comming before they saw him vnder their walles. Wherefore the Turkes in the suburbs called the Rascian citie, and they in the fort vnder Saint Thomas hill, despairing of the keeping of those places, setting fire on the houses, and defacing the fort so much as in that sudden feare they possibly could, fled into the lower towne. The next day the Countie without resistance tooke the aforesaid places forsaken by the Turks, which hee manned with certaine companies of Wallons, and made a bridge of boats ouer Danubius, cast vp certaine mounts, and did many other things for the furtherance of the siege. In three dayes he had againe repaired the fort vnder Saint Thomas hill abandoned by the Turkes, and therein
C placed foure great pieces of artillerie, wherewith hee began to batter the lower towne, and in other places to strait the besieged more than they had been the yeare before. The Bassa of BVDA, not ignorant of the want both of men and munition in the besieged citie (and the rather for that they had but a little before sent part of their garrison with shot and pouder to RAB and DOTIS) attempted thrise (as he did many times after during the time of the siege) to haue by the riuer put new supplies both of men and munition into the citie: but was still by the diligence of the Christians excluded, and enforced with losse to returne. In short time the lower towne which they call WASSERSTAT, or the Water towne, was with continuall batterie sore beaten, so that scarcely any house or building was left whole; and a counterscarfe made the last yere, beaten downe. Whereunto certaine Wallons were sent, onely to haue viewed the breadth and D manner of the ditches, after whom certain companies of the Hungarian Heidons presently followed, without any commaund from their captaines, who with great courage got to the top of another high counterscarfe, & there set vp some of their ensignes. Which the Turks beholding, and comming on close together, by plain force inforced them with losse to retire. Among these Hungarians were diuers also of the Wallons slaine, with some others of good name and place, to the great griefe of the Countie, being not a little offended with that disordered seruice: yet day and night the batterie ceased not, and the Christians out of their trenches with their musket shot, slew many of the Turkes vpon the wals, receiuing little hurt againe, the Turks still shooting but sparingly, for feare of wanting shot and pouder at their greater need; yet that they spent they bestowed so well, that amongst others they had slain foure of the Christian canoniers, & one Wal- The Christians repulsed.
E lon captaine. About the middest of Iuly, the Countie with continuall batterie had made the water towne (as he thought) faultable: and therefore sent certaine companies to begin the assault, who hauing passed the counterscarfe, found the ditch full of deep mud, and but newly cut broader certaine paces by the Turkes, so that it was thought scarse possible to bee passed without a bridge; behind which ditch was an high wall, with strong bulwarks; and within all this was another new cast ditch, and vpon the very brinke therof a thicke and high parapit: all which for all that, certaine companies of the Wallons with great labour and danger aduentured to passe: but such was the valour of the defendants, and the smal number of them that came on to the assault, with the disaduantage of the place wherin they stood, that at length they were glad to retire, with the losse of many of their fellowes. The Christians in the beginning of this siege had taken a little
F island in the riuer before the citie, which was kept with some few companies of the lord Palfi his Heidons; whereof the Turks hauing intelligence at BVDA, with three gallies and certaine other vessels, landed in the island 3000 souldiors, which slew the Heidons, vnto whom no succour could be suddenly sent, and so recouered againe the island: wherin they left a sufficient garrison for the keeping thereof, furnished with all things necessarie, and so departed.

About

About three dayes after the former assault, the Christians in hope of better successe the second time assaulted the Water towne: in which assault the chiefe leaders were the lord Greis and Anthonie Zinne, a famous captaine, had he not stained his honor with countie Hardeck at RAB; but being pardoned by the Emperour, did now together with the rest appointed to that seruice, most couragiously assault the breach; but were againe by the Turks notably repulsed, and enforced at last to giue ouer the assault, and so to retire with the losse of an hundred and fiftie men: amongst whom Zinne himselfe was slaine, with one captaine Ruger, and some of the counties owne guard: the lord Greis was wounded in the head, and the yonger lord Schuendi with diuers other captaines grieuously hurt. The next day after, six hundred of the mountaine people came into the campe vnto the countie with supplications to request him, Not to giue ouer the siege vntill he had woon the citie, promising in the name of those townes and villages from whence they were sent, of their owne charges to repaire for him what harme soeuer he should doe in the city for the taking therof, yea though he should lay it euen with the ground: for why the harmes they daily receiued from the garrison of that citie, were wonderfull.

Mahomet carefull of Strigonium.

At the same time also he was aduertised by his espials (of whom he maintained many for the discouerie of the enimies doings) that Mahomet the Turkish Sultan had writ vnto the Bassa of BVDA, carfully to prouide, that his beloued citie of STRIGONIVM took no harme, and not to spare either for men or money betime to relieue it: and therin to do nothing without the aduice and good liking of his old and faithfull seruant Alis Beg, who of long time had gouerned and also defended that citie: and to the intent that nothing should be wanting for the performance hereof, that he had sent Alexander Aga of the Ianizaries from the Court (whose seruice he might euill haue spared) whose approued counsell and helpe he might also vse in all things: for that he had rather loose some other whole kingdome than that one citie: And that therefore he should beware that it were not by the enemie woon, or by any composition yeelded: wherin if he failed, he threatned vnto him his heauie displeasure, not to be appeased without the price of his head. Which so seuere a commaundement of the great Sultans, the Bassa sent to them of STRIGONIVM, with most grieuous threats from himselfe, if they, terrified with any batterie, vndermining, or assault, should yeeld the city, and not hold it out as became valiant soldiors vnto the last man, swearing to empaile them all vpon stakes, that should consent to the yeelding vp thereof. The old Gouernour Alis hauing receiued this so straight a command from him that was both able and like ynough to performe what hee had threatned, vtterly to deterre the souldiors from once thinking of yeelding, caused diligent enquirie to be made throughout the garrison, if any of thé had at any time made any motion of yeelding vp the city, or otherwise murmured against their captaines or commaunders, appointing them to any seruice: and such as he found to haue so don, he to the terror of others caused to be presently executed: & after that went down himselfe into the lower town, to see that nothing were there wanting or amisse where most danger was. But when he would haue againe returned into the vpper towne, he was stayed by the Ianizaries, who told him, That seeing he was of so valiant and couragious a mind, and their Gouernour, he should there stay with them, and take such part as they did, were it better or worse: and so would he or would he not, there needs stay he must.

Now the Bassaes of BVDA and TEMESVVAR, with diuers Sanzackes as well of those parts of HVNGARIE which the Turkes possessed, as other places, were assembling their forces for the reliefe of the besieged in STRIGONIVM: whereof the Transyluanian prince hearing, made shew as if he would forthwith haue the besieged TEMESVVAR, so that the Bassa thereof leauing the intended expedition for STRIGONIVM, was glad to return for the defence of his own charge: They also of STIRIA, CARINTHIA & CROATIA, with the troupes of countie Serinus, had so stopped all the passages, that twelue thousand Turks which were comming from ZIGETH and the places thereabout, could by no meanes come to ioyne themselues with their fellowes for the reliefe of the distressed citie.

The higher citie of Strigonium battered by the Christians.

The countie leauing nothing vntattempted or vndone that might helpe for the gaining of STRIGONIVM, had made a notable fort vpon S. Thomas hill, and therein placed fiue great culuerines, wherewith he furiously battered the higher citie, and did therein great harme: and thereby also brought to passe, that no man could goe vp or downe the hill, betwixt the vpper towne and the lower, but he was in danger to be set off with those pieces, or the musketiers, who defended by those great pieces, lay vpon the side of the hill in caues and bushes, awaiting for such as should

A ſhould goe vp or downe betwixt the two townes. Thus the Chriſtians at one time battered the vpper towne, the lower towne, and the ſtrong towne and fort of GOKARA, ſtanding on the farther ſide of Danubius, ouer againſt STRIGONIVM, beſieged by the lord Palfi. But of all theſe places, GOKARA was with the furie of the great ordinance moſt ſhaken: which the Countie perceiuing, cauſed the battery to be increaſed, and ſo continued, vntil he had beaten down the counterſcarſe, and made certaine faire breaches in the wall. Whereunto the Morauians (vnto whoſe lot it fell) the one and twentith of Iuly gaue an aſſault in fiue diuers places, whom the lord Palfi ſeconded with his Hungarians, of whom certaine were of purpoſe appointed beſide their armes to bring things with them for the firing of the towne, which they in the time of the aſſault found means ſo well to beſtow, that in a while the towne was all on a light fire. The Turks at firſt made
B notable reſiſtance, but finding themſelues ouerpreſſed, and ſeeing the town now on a fire about their eares, which with the force of the wind ſo encreaſed, that it caught hold of the lower town on the other ſide of the riuer, they retired to the riuer ſide, where ſome of them by boats got ouer to STRIGONIVM, otherſome periſhed in the riuer, the reſt falling into the hands of the Chriſtians, were by them all put to the ſword. GOKARA thus taken, and the fire quenched, the Chriſtians repairing the breaches, and ſtoring it with all warlike prouiſion, left in it a ſtrong garriſon. Within a night or two after were two hundred of the Turks horſemen deſcried in a field faſt by, which cauſed an alarum to be raiſed in the campe, as if the whole armie of the Turks had bin at hand: howbeit thoſe horſemen retiring, and no other appearing, it was afterwards knowne, that they were only ſcouts ſent out by the Turks to take view of the armie of the Chriſtians in what ſort
C they lay encamped.

Gokara taken by the Chriſtians.

The latter end of this moneth it fortuned that a young countrey fellow, ſecretly ſent out of the citie by the Gouernor, and falling into the hands of Palfi, was by him ſent to the Countie, by whom he was in friendly maner demanded, From whence he came, whether he was going, and whereabouts? Whereunto the youth frankly anſwered, That he was ſent from the Gouernour with letters to the Baſſa of BVDA, which hee preſently drew out of his boſome, and deliuered them vnto the countie; who after he had read them, cauſed them to be cloſed vp againe, and ſo deliuered them to the young man, with ſome few crownes, commanding him to carrie them to the Baſſa, as he was about, and in his returne to bring him the Baſſaes anſwere, promiſing for his ſo doing to reward him bountifully: which the young man vndertooke to doe, and ſo departed.
D Now the purport of the gouernors letters was, That if the Baſſa did not within ſix or ſeuen daies ſend him aid and relieue him, hee ſhould for want of victuals and other things neceſſarie for the holding out of the ſiege, be inforced either to abandon the citie, or to yeeld it vp into the enemies hands. Whereunto the Baſſa returned anſwer by the aforeſaid meſſenger, That he would within the appointed time be with him, willing him in the meane while to be mindfull of his wonted valour, and not to be with any thing diſcouraged: appointing him the day, the houre, the way, the meane, with all the other circumſtances how he would relieue him. Which letters the young man according to his promiſe deliuered vnto the Countie: who therupon prouided accordingly for the welcomming of the Baſſa. Within a day after alſo, one of the Turks canoniers conſidering the danger the citie lay in, and fearing that it would be loſt, fled out of it into the campe:
E who beſides that hee aptly declared the ſtate of the citie, and the wants the beſieged were in, did alſo afterwards good ſeruice during the time of the ſiege. The Turkes had in this while many times ſallied out, to their great loſſe: yet now vpon hope of better ſucceſſe they aduentured the nine and twentith of this month to ſally out again, but with like fortune as before, leauing fourſcore of their men behind them, hauing ſlaine but fiue of the Chriſtians.

Now had the Turks in great wants by the ſpace of a moneth right worthily defended STRIGONIVM, expecting ſtill for reliefe. At length newes was brought into the campe, That the Baſſa of BVDA with twentie thouſand men was comming to raiſe the ſiege: who the ſecond of Auguſt came accordingly, and with his armie encamped within foure miles of the Chriſtians: lying ſo nigh, certaine of the Turkes horſemen ſeeking after bootie, came verie neere vnto the F campe of the Chriſtians, and out of the paſtures, euen vnder their noſes, carried away ſome few horſes: againſt theſe deſperate aduenturers certaine troupes of the Hungarian and Germane horſemen iſſuing out, had with them an hot skirmiſh: but the Turks of purpoſe retiring as men ouercharged, and the Chriſtians ſtill following on, had at length drawen them vnto the place where diuers other troupes of the Turks lay in ambuſh for them, who now ſtarting foorth on euery euery ſide, hardly charged them. The Hungarian light horſmen well acquainted with ſuch skir- G miſhes, ſeeing the danger, preſently fled and left the Germanes to themſelues; who for a while valiantly encountred their enemies, but oppreſſed with multitude, were glad at laſt to flie alſo. In this skirmiſh of the Chriſtians were loſt and grieuouſly wounded about an hundred. The Turkes encouraged with this ſo proſperous a beginning, came on the next day with all their armie, being before reſolued by plaine force to open themſelues a way into the citie, and ſo to relieue the beſieged. Of all theſe things was not the Countie ignorant, as therof forewarned by the Baſſaes letters before deliuered vnto him, and had therefore with his armie ſtrongly belayed all the wayes vnto the citie: neuertheleſſe the enemy came ſtill on betweene the hils S. Thomas and S. George, and neere vnto the ſuburbs called the Raſcian citie, put themſelues in order of battell, as did alſo the Chriſtians, giuing the enemie leaue to come euen to their trenches. In the meane H time the lord Palfi with his Hungarian horſemen, fetching a compaſſe about the hill on the one ſide, and the lord Swartzenburg with his horſemen on the other, had ſo incloſed the Turkes beuenteene field pieces, came on after their wonted manner with a moſt hideous crie, and at the firſt onſet with their Turkie arrowes, as with a thicke ſhower, darkened the skie: when on the other ſide the Germane and Wallon horſemen with their petronels ſent their deadly ſhot as thicke as haile amongſt them againe; and the men at armes after them taught the Turks to their coſt, how vnfit their light and halfe naked horſmen were in a ſet battel to meet with men ſo well appointed: in a trice but not without great ſlaughter the battell was brought to the ſword, and I

to be tried by true valour: There was to be heard a crie heauens high, the thundring artillerie both great and ſmall, the clattering armour, the gliſtring weapons, the neighing of the horſes, the crying of the wounded, the heauie groanings of the dying, with the noyſe of the trumpets, drums, and other warlike inſtruments, made deafe the eares of the hearers, preſenting vnto them

It was a moſt miſerable ſight to ſee ſo many men in ſo ſhort time ſlaine: for the battell had ſcarcely endured halfe an houre, when many thouſands of the Turks lay dead vpon the ground, & the reſt ſeeing the victorie encline to the Chriſtians, betooke themſelues to flight, leauing behind them their great ordinance and whatſoeuer elſe they brought for the reliefe of the beſieged: whom ſo flying, the lord Palfi and Swartzenburg (who had before taken the ſtraits whereby they were to paſſe betweene the mountaines) ſo K receiued with their freſh horſmen, that of them that came that way, few eſcaped. The Baſſa himſelfe, who ſtood vpon the hill, ſeeing the diſcomfiture of his armie, fled alſo himſelfe: the Baſſa of Natolia with about an hundred of the Turks moe by good fortune got into Strigonivm. The number of the Turks ſlaine in this battell was great, and is of diuers diuerſly reported, ſome ſaying that there were ſlaine fourteene thouſand; and ſome, fewer. Beſides them that were ſlaine, many were alſo taken, and ſome of them men of great name and place. There were alſo taken ſeuen and twenty enſigns, with a multitude of cammels, aſſes, and mules, laded with mony, ſhot, pouder, and other neceſſarie prouiſion: all which, brought thither for the reliefe of the beſieged, became a prey vnto the Chriſtians. In the heat of this battell they of the citie ſallying out, had entred a fort of the Chriſtians vpon the riuer ſide, but were again preſently driuen out, and with L loſſe enforced againe to retire. After this victorie the Countie ſent certaine companies of the Hungarian and Germane horſemen with fiue hundred waggons to the enemies campe, not far off in the mountaines; who comming thither, found it vtterly forſaken by the enemie, but well ſtored with all manner of neceſſarie prouiſion, which they carried all away, together with ſix hundred tents, many whereof were lined with damaske, ſatin, and other ſilke, richly embrodered or laied with gold lace or twiſt. The Baſſaes rich tent taken by the colonell of the horſmen, was afterwards by him giuen vnto the Countie, as was alſo the plate and money there found, all which he diuided among the ſouldiors according to their deſerts. In the Turks campe were alſo found certeine heads of the Chriſtians, with the dead bodie of the lord Brandenſteine, ſlaine in the conflict but the day before; which the Chriſtians caried away with them into the campe, and M there honourably buried them. Thoſe that remained of the Turks armie, hid themſelues in the mountaines and woods, and ſo holpen by the darkeneſſe of the night, made beſt ſhift for themſelues that they could. The Baſſa himſelfe accompanied but with twentie horſe, came to Byda about midnight, and by his comming filled the citie with great heauineſſe, euery man lamenting his his loſt friends. The Hungarian Heidons beſt acquainted with the countrie, pricking vp and downe the mountaines and by waies, for certaine daies after the battel, brought in daily into the campe ſuch priſoners as they tooke, or elſe the heads of ſuch Turks as they ſlew. Of this ſo notable a victorie, the Countie by a ſpeedie meſſenger certified the Archduke at VIENNA, who rewarded him for his good news with a chaine worth fiue hundred duckats: and preſently cauſed the ſong of thankeſgiuing to be ſung in the church of the Auguſtine Friers, and afterward in all the churches of the citie. The Countie alſo to gratifie the emperour, ſent him by the lord Chalon his nephew vnto PRAGE, two of the chiefe priſoners taken in the late battell, with foure horſemens Guidons cunningly made of horſe haires, ſuch as are commonly carried before the greateſt commanders of the Turkes armies, and fourteene other enſignes of the Turks, with fourteen moſt goodly horſes of the Turks for a preſent.

The next day after this battell, the Countie ſent the lord Palſi with an interpretor vnto the citie, to demaund it to be yeelded: who hauing audience, declared vnto the Turkes in what danger they were, that the helpe they looked for was now quite ouerthrowne, new reliefe could not but in long time be ſent vnto them; and that therefore it ſhould be good for them, whileſt yet they might, to be well aduiſed, and betime to bethinke themſelues of yeelding vp the citie, leaſt happily when they would, it then would not be accepted: promiſing to intreat with the General, that they might in ſafetie depart, and with ſure conuoy be brought vnto ſuch place of ſafetie as were conuenient. Whereunto the beſieged Turkes anſwered, That the Chriſtians had now fiue weekes lien at the ſiege, and muſt yet lie three weekes longer: and that whereas of late ſome few of their friends came to haue relieued them, and had failed therein; there was yet an hundred thouſand moe to come after them, who if they ſhould not be able to performe that they came for, yet that they would not for that deliuer or forſake the citie, before they were readie to be drawne out of it by the heeles, and that yet they would then take three daies to reſolue thereupon.

Now had the Chriſtians with long and continual batterie ſore beaten both the vpper and the lower towne, which batterie they now maintained with greater furie than at any time from the beginning of the ſiege; and within the citie their wants increaſed dayly, hauing nothing left to liue vpon but a little wheat and barley, with ſome horſefleſh: vnto whom thus diſtreſſed, the lord Palſi by the commandment of the Countie (to trie what confidence they yet had in themſelues) the ninth of Auguſt, ſent two Gentlemen to the citie, to do a meſſage from him to the Gouernor. Who aduertiſed thereof, being a very aged and courteous man, accompanied with the Aga of the Ianizaries, came to the wals to heare what they had to ſay; where one of the ſaid gentlemen in few words deliuered him this ſhort meſſage.

The meſſage ſent by the lord Palſi to the Gouernour of Strigonium.

My moſt gratious Lord the lord Palſi, moſt worthie Gouernour greeteth thee well, and knowing thee to bee a Captaine both valiant and wiſe, and one that hath alwaies courteouſly vſed ſuch as haue fallen into thy hands, hath compaſſion of thy deſperate obſtinacie: and therefore, whereas thou art to looke or hope for nothing elſe but preſent death and deſtruction, hee as thy neighbour and a louer of thy vertues, aduiſeth and exhorteth thee, if thou wilt ſaue thy ſelfe and thine from moſt vndoubted and imminent death and vtter confuſion, without delay to deliuer vp this citie, which thou canſt not longer hold.

Vnto whom the old Gouernour thus without ſtay courteouſly anſwered.

The reſolute anſwere of the old Gouernor to the meſſage ſent him by Palſi.

Thy ſpeech my friend, and thy maſters aduiſe are vnto me both vaine. Tell the lord Palſi in my name, that I cannot pleaſure him with the leaſt ſtone in this citie. One foot I haue alreadie in the graue, and will with honour carrie theſe my graie haires into the ſame: and am yet comforted with a moſt certaine and vndoubted hope, that my moſt dread and mightie ſoueraigne, and my lord Sinan Baſſa will not forſake me: yea and that if they ſhould write vnto me, that they could find no meanes or way to relieue me (which I am ſure they can) yet would I well, and at leaſure conſider, whether it were fit for me to deliuer vp this citie or not; ſeeing that of the defence thereof, dependeth all mine honour and credit. Beſides that, what reward they haue on both ſides, that ſo eaſily deliuer ouer the cities they haue in charge, all the world doth ſee.

With this anſwere he ſent them away. All this while the Aga of the Ianizaries ſtanding by, ſpoke not one word, but ſighing in ſilence and grinding his teeth, declared by his countenance his indignation and inward griefe.

In the mid way betwixt BVDA and STRIGONIVM, in the middeſt of the riuer of Danubius

lieth a little iſland called Vizze, wherein many rich clothiers dwelt: this iſland the Hungarian Heidons ſpoyled, and in returning thence, met with foure and twentie wagons laded with corn, going to Byda, which they tooke, with eight and twentie priſoners which they brought into the campe. The lower towne being with long and continuall batterie made faultable, was by the Chriſtians the thirteenth of Auguſt, in three diuers places at once aſſaulted. The Bauarians were by lot to giue the firſt charge, who in the performing thereof, begininng to faint (for that they were notably repulſed by the Turkes) but ſeconded by them of Reitnavv and Svevia, pluckt downe a great paliſado, filled the ditches, remoued whatſoeuer ſtood in their way, and ſo long fought with the Turks in the breaches, that by the comming in of the Marqueſſe of Brgavvr with ſix enſignes of freſh men, they preuailed vpon the enemie, and ſo altogither brake in the towne. In the middeſt of this dangerous fight was the Marqueſſe himſelfe, who both with his preſence and cheereful ſpeech ſo encouraged his ſouldiors, that they as men fearing no perill, ran headlong into all danger vntill they had entred the towne: There might a man haue heard a moſt miſerable crie, eſpecially of women and children throughout the citie; when as the Chriſtians breaking in on euery ſide ſlew whoſoeuer came in their way, without reſpect of age or ſex, ſparing neither woman great with child, neither the little children hanging at their mothers breaſts. Yet did not all that were entred, ſo much attend the preſent execution, as ſome of them did the ſpoile and prey; and eſpecially the Hungarians, vnto whom all was good bootie, euen the very hinges of the doores and windowes: whereby many eſcaped into the caſtle and vpper towne with the Baſſa and Alis-Beg the old Gouernour. The Chriſtians had not many houres poſſeſſed the towne, but that diuers fires began to breake out in diuers places, but by what meanes was not at the firſt knowne. At laſt it was found out, that the Turkes doubting the loſſe of the towne, had before where they thought beſt left gunpouder, which taking fire by matches left burning for that purpoſe, ſhould at a certaine time ſet all on fire: by which means many moſt horrible fires were raiſed in the towne, which conſumed many goodly buildings, and other things which might haue ſtood the Chriſtians in great ſtead, and could hardly be in a day or two quenched.

The lower town taken by the Chriſtians.

Countie Manſfeld died at Komara.

This ſo ioyful a victorie ſaw not he, by whoſe good direction next vnder God it was gained, the worthie Countie: for he a few daies before being fallen ſick of a feauer, taken by drinking too much cold drinke in his heat, with immoderat paines taking in the late battell, and ſo afterwards falling into a great flix with a feauer, was by the counſell of his phyſitians (for the better recouering of his health) remoued to Komara, as a place of more quietneſſe: hauing before his departure ſent for the Archduke to come into the campe, and for Blankemier into Bavaria to ſupplie his owne roome. But his diſeaſe ſtill encreaſing, became at laſt deſperat, ſo that the phyſitions themſelues now diſpaired of his health. Yet lying thus drawing towards his end, he almoſt euery houre inquired how the armie did, and whether the citie were yet taken, or what hope there was of the taking thereof. But when it was told him a little before his death, that the lower towne was woon, he thereat greatly reioiced, and the next day being the fourteenth of Auguſt towards night quietly departed this world, to the great loſſe of the Chrihian commonweale, and the exceeding griefe of the whole armie. A man euen from his childhood brought vp in armes, of ſtature great, but of courage greater, and painefull aboue meaſure, not the leaſt cauſe of his vntimely death. All the time of this ſiege he tooke little reſt either by day or night, ſcarce ſo much as to lie downe vpon his bed in two or three nights togither. The little meat he did eat, he moſt part eat it ſtanding or walking, yea and ſometimes on horſeback: he was a moſt ſeuere obſeruer of martiall diſcipline, which cauſed him to be of his ſoldiors both beloued and feared. His bowels were with due ſolemnitie buried at Komara where he died, but his bodie was brought backe againe to Luxenburg, there to be honourably enterred with his anceſtors.

About which time Theodore the Great duke of Myscovia, hearing of the wars betwixt the emperor and the Turke, ſent two embaſſadors with letters and preſents to the emperor: which embaſſadours comming to Prage the ſixteenth of Auguſt, accompanied with two hundred and fiftie horſe, were by the emperors appointment, honourably receiued and entertained. And afterward hauing audience, firſt deliuered the letters of credence from the Great duke, reported to haue beene of this purport,

Your

A Your Maieſtie hath ſent vnto vs your embaſſadour Nicholas Warkotſie, requeſting our brotherly aid againſt the hereditarie enemie of all Chriſtianitie, the Turkiſh Sultan. Wherefore wee alſo deſiring to liue with you our deere and welbeloued brother in all perpetuall amitie and friendſhip, ſend vnto you by our faithfull counſellour and ſeruant Michael Iwanowitze and Iohn Sohnie, aid out of our treaſurie againſt the ſaid enemie: vnto whom we haue alſo giuen other things in charge to be propounded to your maieſtie, requeſting you to giue vnto them in all things full credit. Giuen in the great Court of our power at Mvsco, in the yeare of the world 7103, and from the natiuitie of Chriſt 1595, in the moneth of Aprill. The copy of the great dukes letters vnto the emperour.

What things in particular theſe embaſſadours were ſent for, was not commonly knowne, but among others it is ſaid, That the Muſcouite requeſted the emperour to ſend an embaſſador
B vnto the Perſian king, to draw him alſo into the league with them againſt the Turke: which embaſſadour ſhould firſt come into Mvscovia, and that way to paſſe into Persia. The preſents which the great duke ſent vnto the emperour were, an hundred and fiftie thouſand Florens of gold, great ſtore of moſt rich furs, and pretious perfumes deemed to bee of exceeding value, two white faulcons, and three leopards aliue. And Iwanowitze the embaſſadour himſelfe, preſented vnto the emperour of himſelfe, certaine rich Turkie, Perſian, and Babylonian hangings and carpets, certain timbers of Sables, with other rich furs no leſſe pretious than Sables, ſo many as eight porters could hardly carrie. Theſe embaſſadors tarried at Praoe vntill the ſeuen and twentith day of December, and then taking their leaue, returned with the emperours anſwere to the duke.

C But to returne againe vnto Strigonivm. The Chriſtians now poſſeſſed of the lower towne, bent their whole batterie vpon the higher towne, where it fortuned the foureteenth of Auguſt that the old Gouernour Alis-Beg, whileſt he was carefully walking from place to place to ſee where moſt danger was, had his arme ſtrucke off with a great ſhot, of which hurt he preſently died. Hee was a man of great grauitie, about the age of foureſcore yeares, and had of long time notably both gouerned and defended that famous citie, the loſſe whereof was like ynough to haue beene vnto him greater griefe than was the loſſe of his life there. Much about the ſame time alſo died the Aga of the Ianizaries, being before mortally wounded. Both the chiefe commaunders thus ſlaine, the Ianizaries with the other ſouldiours and citizens made choice of the Baſſa of Natolia (who as is aforeſaid eſcaped out of the late battell into the citie) for their
D Gouernour) who with heauie cheere tooke vpon him that forlorne charge. The Chriſtians not ignorant of the death of theſe two worthie men, in whoſe great and approued valour they ſuppoſed the chiefe defence of the citie to haue reſted, were in good hope that now the reſt would the more readily hearken to ſome good compoſition; and therfore ſent a meſſenger to demand if they would yet whileſt there were ſome mercie left, yeeld the citie. Who though they had loſt their chiefe commaunders with the greateſt part of the garriſon, and were in great wants both of victuals and all things elſe neceſſarie for their defence; yet their anſwere was in few words, That they would hold it out euen to the laſt man. The greateſt cauſe of which their obſtinat reſolution, was the ſtrait charge the Baſſa of Buda had giuen them for the defence therof: beſides that, they accounted their citie holy, as woon by their magnificent emperour Solyman,
E whom the Turkes generally yet haue in a deuout remembrance; and therefore thought it a great impietie to deliuer it vp vnto the Chriſtians. The next day after came Matthias the archduke into the campe; who after he had well viewed the whole armie and the manner of the ſiege, he called togither into his tent the chiefe commaunders, namely the Marqueſſe of Burgavv his couſin, Iohn de Medices the Florentine, and the lord Palfi the Hungarian, to conſult with them what were farther to be done for the winning of the citie. Shortly after he commanded the citie to be at once in two places aſſaulted, which was by the Wallons and Germanes couragiouſly performed: but ſuch was the valour of the defendants, that when the Chriſtians had done what they could, they were glad at laſt to giue ouer the aſſault, and with loſſe to re-F tire. About this time came the Duke of Mantva, with the three Counties his brethren to the ſiege: and now the Turkes began againe to draw togither neere vnto Buda, there to make head for the reliefe of Strigonivm, and to be reuenged of the loſſe they had there before receiued. Whereof the Archduke hauing intelligence, ſent out againſt them eight thouſand choſen ſouldiors out of the campe, who ſuddenly ſetting vpon the Turks in their campe, before the riſing of the Sunne made a great ſlaughter amongſt them, and tooke certaine priſo-ners, of whom the Sanzacke of COPAN was one: and so with victorie returned to the siege. G

The besieged Turkes in STRIGONIVM vnderstanding of this ouerthrow of their friends, from whom they expected most speedie reliefe, and beside the terrour of the continuall batterie and still feared assaults, pinched also with extreame wants of all things, began now to faint. Wherefore the Bassa with the other captaines, ouercome with the aforesaid difficulties, and the generall outcrie of the fearefull people, resolued with one consent to come now to parley, and vpon reasonable conditions to yeeld vp the citie: wherupon a flag of truce was set vp, and parley craued. Which granted, the Archduke after the going downe of the Sunne came into the lower town, where nine of the Turks attended his comming: who entring into parley, required that they might vnder safe conuoy with bag and baggage depart, & so leaue him the citie: which the Archduke would not by any meanes agree vnto. At length with much entreatie, they ob- H tained that they might vpon the same conditions depart that the Christians did at RAB; with their scimitars by their sides, and so much of their goods as they could carrie vpon their backes, vnto such ships as were to be appointed for the carriage of them to BVDA. For the performance wherof, hostages were on both sides giuen: and so the next day (being the second of September) they began to come out of the citie, moe in number than either the prisoners taken in the time of the siege had confessed, or the Christians had thought. Thirtie ships were appointed for the conuaying of them downe the riuer to BVDA, which not suffising, many of them tarried in the citie vntill the next day, at which time the Bassa with the sicke and wounded sayled to BVDA, the prisoners and pledges on both sides being before faithfully deliuered. Thus by the goodnesse of God and the good conduct of a few valiant Christians, was STRIGONIVM the Metropoliticall I citie of HVNGARIE, after it had 52 yeres groaned vnder the miserable yoake of the Turkish seruitude, againe restored vnto the Christian common-weale: which the Christians forthwith repaired and new fortified, as was thought best for the defence thereof against the enemie. All which being done, about the middest of this moneth the Archduke sent eighteene thousand to besiege VICEGRADE, other wise called PLINDENBVRG, a strong castle of the Turkes vpon the riuer betweene STRIGONIVM and BVDA, which castle they tooke. Which when they of BVDA vnderstood, they were strucken with such a feare, that many of the better sort were readie to forsake the citie, insomuch, that the Bassa to stay their flight, was glad to command the gates of the citie to be shut vpon them, and no man suffered to passe out. This good successe of the Christians in these wars, caused great reioycing to be made in most parts of Christendome. K

Strigonium yeelded vnto the Christians.

The castle of Vicegrade taken by the Christians.

All this while the Christians were thus busied at the siege of STRIGONIVM, the Transyluanian prince was not idle, but in diuers places did the Turkes exceeding much harme; so that now his name began to be dreadfull vnto them. It fortuned that the same day that the Countie Mansfelt departed at KOMARA, that the prince at ALBA IVLIA with great solemnitie maried Maria Christina, the daughter of the late Archduke Charles the sonne of the emperor Ferdinand, her other sister Anna being before married vnto Sigismund, now king of POLONIA: for so it was agreed for the more assurance of the league betweene the emperor and him, that he should take his wife out of the house of AASTRIA, which he now did. Of this solemnitie the Turkes (his euill neighbors) hauing intelligence, assembling to the numbe of 30000 or more, thought as vnwelcome guests to haue come vnbidden or vnlooked for, thereunto: but the vigilant prince vnderstan- L ding of their comming, prouided for their entertainment accordingly, and setting his pleasures for a while apart, and comming vpon them when they least looked for him, in a great battell ouerthrew them, and slew most part of them, carrying away with him as a triumphant victour, the whole spoile of his enemies.

About the same time the Transyluauians also besiged FAGIAT, a towne holden by the Turkes, not farre from TEMESVVAR; where after they had lien twelue daies, they of the towne dispairing to be able long to hold out, came to parley, and couenanting to depart with bag and baggage, began to go out of the towne. But in their departure, vnderstanding that the Bassa of TEMESVVAR with the Sanzackes of LIPPA and IENNE were comming to their reliefe, they that were yet in the towne began to find delaies, and they that were alreadie gone out began to M returne. Wherewith the Transyluanians much moued, by plaine force entred the towne, and put them all to the sword: and afterward turning vpon the Bassa, who with ten thousand Turks and certaine field pieces was comming to haue relieued the town, had with them a cruel battell; wherein most part of the Turks fell with small losse of the Transyluanians: who so eagarly pursued

A ſued the victorie, that the Baſſa himſelfe had much adoe with fiue hundred others to eſcape. The two Sanzackes, with diuers others of good place, were taken and ſent priſoners to the prince. Not long after, about the latter end of Auguſt the Tranſyluanians alſo beſieged LIPPA, a famous citie of HVNGARIE, ſtanding vpon the riuer Maracz, not far from TEMESVVAR, which the Turks being not able longer to hold, fled into the caſtle: where finding themſelues in no great ſafetie, after three daies ſiege they came to parle, and ſo yeelded, vpon condition that they might in ſafetie depart with ſo much of their goods as they could themſelues carrie. About which time alſo the Baſſa of BOSNA with ten thouſand Turks and Tartars went forth to haue againe recouered BABOTSCA, a frontier town, before taken by the Chriſtians: which the Stirians and the reſt of the Chriſtians dwelling thereabouts, betweene the two riuers of Sauus and Drauus, vnderſtanding,
B conducted by the lords Herbenſtein, Lewcowitz, and Eckenberg, that had the charge of thoſe frontiers, ouertooke the ſaid Turks and Tartars neere vnto BABOTSCA, fought with them, and in the plaine field ouerthrew them.

Mahomet not a little grieued with the good ſucceſſe of the Chriſtians in euery part of HVNGARIE, and aboue meaſure offended with Ferat Baſſa his Generall, through whoſe negligence all or at leaſtwiſe moſt part of this had happened (as he was by the enuie of Sinan Baſſa perſuaded) ſent for Ferat home, and in his place ſent out Sinan. Of which the great Sultans diſpleaſure Ferat was not ignorant, as forewarned thereof by her that beſt knew, euen the Sultans mother, & adUiſed not to come in ſight vntill his peace were made. Who neuertheleſſe truſting to his owne innocencie (the comfortable, but moſt dangerous and weak ſtay of the great) and doubting not
C to anſwere whatſoeuer Sinan ſhould be able to charge him with, came to the Court: where hee was by the commandement of Mahomet ſhortly after ſtrangled, and his goods to the value of fiue hundred thouſand duckats confiſcated.

Ferat Baſſa ſent for to Conſtantinople, and there ſtrangled.

Sinan Baſſa ſent in Ferats ſtead.

Among all the dangerous enemies of the Chriſtian common-weale, was none at this time more cruell than was Sinan, an Epyrot borne, a fiſhers ſonne, of a rough and vnciuile diſpoſition, now about foureſcore and theer yeares old, euen from his youth brought vp in the warres: and yet (as his motto was) breathing nothing but, Bloud and Warre. Hee had many times fortunately led the huge armies of the Turkiſh Emperours, Solyman, Selymus, and Amurath, and is now ſent by the great Sultan Mahomet, as the fitteſt man to reduce the late reuolted countries of TRANSYLVANIA, VALACHIA and MOLDAVIA, to their former thral-
D dome; which he before promiſed vnto Mahomet, vpon perill of his head to doe. Hee hauing raiſed a right puiſſant armie, by a bridge made of boats (after a moneths labour ſpent therein) paſſed ouer the great riuer of Danubius into VALACHIA: of whoſe comming the Tranſyluanians, with the Valachians and Moldauians, hauing knowledge, had before ſo ſhut vp the paſſages of the countrie, as that he could not without much danger haue farre entered; and were alſo readie with their vnited forces euen at his firſt enterance to giue him battell. Which hee not refuſing, there began a moſt mortall and cruell fight, with much bloudſhead on both ſides. Thrice were the Tranſyluanians enforced to retire, but ſtill relieued with new ſupplies, and knowing that they then carried in their armes the welfare of their whole countrie, came on freſh againe, and as hardly charged the Turks, as they had beene by them charged. Thus E with doubtfull fortune and great ſlaughter was the battell maintained, from the morning vntill night, victorie with doubtfull wings houering now ouer the one ſide, now ouer the other: vntill that at length, the Turkes ouercome by true valour, their battels being quite diſordered and broken, were now glad to ſeeke to ſaue themſelues by flight. In this battell, being fought the eleuenth of September, beſides many thouſands of the common ſouldiors, were ſlaine alſo diuers of great account amongſt the Turkes: and amongſt the reſt Haidar Baſſa, a man of them much regarded, was found dead euen in the ſame place where the battell was fought. Sinan himſelfe, in making too much haſt to get ouer the bridge, fell into the deepe mud, and in that generall confuſion of his armie, was like ynough there to haue periſhed: but as the common prouerbe goeth, Seldome lieth the diuell dead in a dike, the old Veiliarde was
F with much adoe drawne out by them of his guard, and ſo ſaued to further miſchiefe. Neuertheleſſe, the danger was ſo great, that for certaine daies it was commonly reported, that he was there drowned, moſt of his owne people not as yet certainly knowing what was become of him. All the ſpoile of the Turks became a prey vnto the Chriſtians, as did alſo their great ordinance, and many of their enſignes; amongſt which was one greene one, which they accounted religious, as Sinan in flying like to be drowned.

ſacred to their prophet Mahomet, whereunto they in time of their greateſt diſtreſſe flie as vnto G their laſt refuge: there was taken alſo all their tents, with great aboundance of victuals and other warlike prouiſion.

The old Baſſa thus ouerthrowne, full of griefe, and euen mad for deſpight, poſted himſelfe in all haſt to the Court, thinking it better himſelfe to make the beſt of that which was indeed nought, than to haue it made worſe than nought by the enuious report of others: and withall to fill the mind of the great Sultan with deſire of reuenge, which no man ſo much longed after, as himſelfe: wherein he ſo diſcreetly vſed the matter, as that the late loſſe was eaſily paſſed ouer, as receiued by the common chance of warre, or any other occaſion els whatſoeuer rather than by any default of his; and new commiſſion giuen him for the raiſing of another armie for the ſubduing of the late reuolted countries. In the meane time, to ſhew his hatred vnto the Chriſti- H ans, and to pleaſe the eyes of them of the Court with the noueltie of the ſight, he cauſed an hundred and twelue Chriſtian captiues whom he had in priſon at BELGRADE, to be brought in chaines like beaſts to CONSTANTINOPLE; and ſo being led through the principall ſtreets of the citie, to the vaine contentment of the citizens, to be brought to the Court gate for the Sultan to looke vpon, and the Courtiers to deride: from whence they were after many vnſpeakeable indignities conueyed to moſt miſerable and loathſome priſons, there to be fed with the bread of tribulation.

About this time the Turks vnder the command of the Baſſa of BOSNA, to the number of almoſt twentie thouſand, made a rode into CROATIA, where they were by the Chriſtians vnder the leading of the lord Eckenberg and Leucowitz ouerthrowne and almoſt all ſlaine: the Chri- I ſtians following the chaſe euen into the Turks frontiers, burnt fifteen of their villages, and took the caſtle of VARVIVAR: immediatly after, their forces encreaſing by the comming in of the lord Herbenſteine, Gouernour of VALERIA and WINDISMARCHE, and certaine other troupes of horſemen out of CARINTHIA and the countries thereabouts, they returned the thirteenth of September to beſiege PETRINIA, otherwiſe called PETROVVINA; which becauſe they were in hope to take by aſſault, they euen at their firſt comming couragiouſly aſſailed. But after two houres hard fight, finding both greater reſiſtance, and more difficultie than they had before ſuppoſed to haue found, and that without great ordinance (which could not in ſhort time bee got ouer the mountaines) there was no good to be done, they were glad to giue ouer the aſſault, and with ſuch loſſe as they had receiued to returne to SISEG, there to conſult further of the matter. K
But the ſame night a fugitiue horſeman fled from the enemie, came to the campe and told the Chriſtians, That Rnſtan Beg Gouernour of PETRINIA was in the late aſſault wounded in the breaſt with a ſmall ſhot, and dead: and that the Turkes in the towne diſcouraged with his death and the late ouerthrow of their friends in CROATIA, would vpon the firſt ſight of them abandon the towne, if they would but againe returne to beſiege it. Vpon which good hope the Chriſtians preſently riſe, and ſet forward againe towards PETRINIA: which the Turkes hearing of their comming, had before (as the ſouldior reported) for feare abandoned. So the Chriſtians without reſiſtance entring the towne, found therein ſome pillage, but better ſtore of ſhot and powder: and preſently ſending forth certaine troups of horſmen to purſue the flying Turks, tooke diuers of them, and among the reſt the late Gouernors lieutenant, whom they brought backe againe L into the towne. Thus was PETRINIA againe recouered from the Turkes, to the great quiet and ſafetie of all that ſide of the countrey.

Petrinia taken by the Chriſtians.

Sigiſmund the Tranſyluanian prince not ignorant with what an enemie he had to doe, either of the malice of old Sinan, who he knew would not be long before he returned, or yet of the ſecret practiſe of the Polonians for the withdrawing of the countrey of MOLDAVIA from him, ſought now by all means (as it ſtood him vpon) to make himſelfe ſo ſtrong as he could againſt ſo many ſtormes ariſing. It fortuned that euen at the ſame time the Zaculians (better known by the name of Siculi) in former time a free people, but as then tributarie vnto the Turkes, bordering vpon the Northeaſt part of TRANSYLVANIA, now wearie of the Turkiſh thraldome, and ſeeing the good ſucceſſe of the prince, and the late reuolted countries their neighbors, offered vnto M
the prince their ſeruice; promiſing of their own charge to maintaine fortie thouſand men in the field during his warres with the Turke, and yearely to pay him of euery houſe a dollar, with a certaine meaſure of wheat, oates, and barley, after the manner of their owne countrey: and further, That if God ſhould bleſſe him with a ſonne to ſucceed him in his gouernment, euery houſholder

A ſholder ſhould giue vnto him a good fat oxe. For all which ſeruice they craued no more, but that they might as his ſubiects liue vnder his protection: yet ſo, as to be gouerned by their owne auncient lawes and cuſtomes. Of which their offer the prince accepting, it was forthwith by them proclaimed in their campe, and all the people ſworne to the performance of the aforeſaid agreements. And hauing at that preſent but fiue and twentie thouſand in the field, they without delay ſent out their officers to preſſe out fifteene thouſand moe, for the filling vp of the promiſed number of fortie thouſand, wherewith they came vnto the prince, who taking a view of his armie, found himſelfe to be now foureſcore thouſand men ſtrong, to welcome the Baſſa withall when he ſhould come againe into his countrey.

The prince taketh a view of his armie.

B Now had Sinan with great ſpeed raiſed an armie of ſeauentie thouſand choice ſouldiours, amongſt whom were many whole bands of the Ianizaries, the ſtrength of the Turkiſh empire. With which power ioyned vnto the reliques of his other broken forces, he thought himſelfe ſtrong ynough for the ſubduing of the prince: vnto whom came alſo afterward Haſſan Baſſa, the ſonne of the great Baſſa Muhamet, one of the Turkes moſt renowned men of warre, and Bogdanus the late expulſed Vayuod of VALACHIA, with many others of great name. With this armie the old Baſſa by a bridge, which he with exceeding charge had made of boats, paſſed ouer the great riuer of Danubius at a towne called ZORZA or GIORGO (with vs S. George) in VALACHIA, a great way beneath that place where ſometime the emperour Traian built his famous bridge of ſtone, worthily accounted amongſt the rare and wonderfull buildings of the world.

Sinan Baſſa by a bridge made of boats paſſeth ouer Danubius into Valachia.

C From ZORZA he marched with his armie to TERGOVISTA (ſometime the Vayuod his chiefe citie, but then in the power of the Turks) where is a notable monaſterie, which he conuerted into a caſtle, fortifying it with deep trenches & ſtrong bulwarks, & good ſtore of great ordinance, purpoſing to make that the ſeat of his warre, vntill he had againe reſtored thoſe late reuolted countries vnto the Turkiſh empire, which hee vpon paine of his head had vndertaken to performe. The prince both by meſſengers and letters vnderſtanding of the Baſſaes arriuall there, and hauing his armie in good readineſſe, ſet forward to meet him and to giue him battell. But being come into VALACHIA, and there encamped, it is reported, that a great Eagle deſcending from an high rock therby, called, The Kings rock, and houering ouer the Chriſtian armie, flew about the princes tent, and there lighting, was taken and preſented to the prince, who commanded her to be kept as the preſage of his good fortune; holding on ſtill his way, and the fifteenth

D of October being come within halfe a dayes march of TERGOVISTA, he vnderſtood by two Chriſtians lately eſcaped from the Turks, That two daies before the Turks hearing of his comming, were ſtrucken with ſuch a generall and ſudden feare, that Sinan had much adoe either by faire meanes or by foule to ſtay the Ianizaries from flight; and that when he had done what he could, yet that certaine companies of them were quite fled and gone. But the truth was, that Sinan ſeeing the generall feare of his armie, and he himſelfe no leſſe fearefull than the reſt, vpon the princes approch fled with all his armie, leauing behind him for haſt his tents, his great ordinance, with much victuals, and other warlike prouiſion, carrying with him onely ſuch things as were of moſt value. As for the citie of TERGOVISTA, with the caſtle which he had made of the

E monaſterie, he committed it to the keeping of Haſſan Baſſa; and Bogdanus the late Vayuod, now become a renegate Turke, with a garriſon of foure thouſand choſen ſouldiors, promiſing within a few daies, if need ſhould be, to relieue them, but fled himſelfe in all haſt with his armie to BVCARESTA, a daies iourney from TERGOVISTA. From whence he preſently writ back again to Haſſan Baſſa, willing him if he could to defend the caſtle: but if he ſhould think it not poſſible to be kept againſt the power of the prince, then betime to forſake it & to ſhift for himſelfe. But theſe letters being intercepted by the Chriſtians, neuer came to the Baſſaes hands. Not long after the departing of Sinan, the prince comming to TERGOVISTA, entred the forſaken campe, where he found many tents, with ſome ordinance, and great ſtore of victuals, and without further delay ſummoned both the citie & the caſtle, which for all that were both denied him. But the next day

F after, Haſſan conſidering the flight of Sinan, the power of the prince, and without all doubting if need ſhould be to be relieued by Sinan, whom he not without cauſe ſuſpected not to loue him, was about vpon ſome reaſonable compoſition to haue yielded vp both the citie and the caſtle: whereunto the garriſon ſouldiors (being moſt part of the Ianizaries) would not in any caſe giue their conſent, but ſtood vpon the defence of the place. Wherupon the prince began furiouſly to batter both the citie & the caſtle, and after ſome few houres batterie by aſſault took both, & put to sword the whole garrison: only Hassan Bassa, as taken with his owne hand, he spared, and two other Sanzacks. Bogdanus the renegate was there slaine among the rest. The Christians had there a rich prey, besides 42 great pieces of ordinance, and good store of all maner of warlike prouision. Hassan thus taken, grieuously complained that Sinan had of a malitious purpose exposed him to so manifest danger, for the grudge he bare vnto his dead father the Visier Muhamet, vpon whom because he could neuer be reuenged, he now by sinister means had cunningly performed it vpon his sonne; yet he craued of the prince to be well vsed, offering for his ransome 100000 Hungarian duckats. Whilest the prince yet thus lay at TERGOVISTA, came thither 4000 Turks, whom Sinan had before his departure thence sent forth to spoile the countrie and to seeke after prey, thinking to haue there found him still: who now falling into the hands of the Christians, were there all slaine, and 60000 head of cattell recouered, which these Turks had taken out of VALACHIA and MOLDAAIA, and should by Sinans appointment haue bin sent to CONSTANTINOPLE. For VALACHIA and MOLDAVIA do so abound with corne and cattell, that they plentifully serue the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE not only with corne and flesh, but also yearely send at the least 150 ships, thither by the black sea, laded with other kind of victuals. Of which so great commodities the Turks were now depriued by the reuolt of the aforesaid countries.

The fruitfulnes of Valachia and Moldauia.

The prince leauing a strong garrison in TERGOVISTA, set forward with his armie towards BVCARESTA, hoping there to haue found Sinan. But he hearing of the losse of TERGOVISTA, & thinking himselfe in no good safetie at BVCARESTA, fled thence also to ZORZA. The prince comming to BVCARESTA, found it abandoned by the Turks, & so tooke it without resistance, yet had therein certain field pieces, with good store of shot and pouder left there by Sinan. Hauing there stayed a while for the manning of the place, he set forwards againe towards ZORZA, and that with such speed, that he ouertooke great numbers of the Turkes, whom he put all to the sword: so that the fields betwixt BVCARESTA and ZORZA, were in many places couered with the dead bodies of the Turkes. Neuertheless, he could not make so great hast, marching still in good order, but that the fearefull Bassa disorderly hasting, was about some six houres or more before come to the bridge he had with great charge made ouer the riuer of Danubius, the forme whereof you may here see.

Bucaresta taken by the prince.

The picture of the Bridge made ouer Danubius by Sinan Bassa, Anno 1595.

A Ouer the hithermoſt part of which bridge (being in length about a mile) was Sinan with the greateſt part of his armie (before the comming of the prince) got ouer into an iſland in the middeſt of the riuer, wherein hee had at his comming ouer, encamped: but doubting now there to ſtay, with all the ſpeed hee could got him ouer the other part of the bridge alſo vnto the farther ſide of the riuer, with ſo many of his men as in ſo ſhort time poſſibly could. Where to ſtay the farther purſuit of the prince, hee brake the bridge on that ſide, and ſet fire vpon it: and thereby cut off alſo many of his owne men that were not as yet come ouer. Whom the prince enclo- ſing, forced many of them into the riuer, where they periſhed: the reſt flying into the iſland, were by the Chriſtians fiercely purſuing of them, either there ſlaine, or ſeeking by the other part B of the bridge to haue got ouer (whereof the farther end before broken downe by Sinan, and the hither end toward the iſland now cut off by the Chriſtians) were together with the bridge carri- ed away by the violence of the riuer, and ſo altogether periſhed. Otherſome of the Chriſtians in the meane time tooke the bridge that leadeth vnto the caſtle of Zorza, which ſtandeth compaſ- ſed about with an arme of Danubius, and being not verie great, was kept by a garriſon of ſeuen hundred ſelect ſouldiors. Vnto which caſtle the prince preſently laid ſiege (the reſolute ſouldi- ors being not by any meanes to be perſuaded to yeeld it vp, but to hold it out euen vnto the laſt man) and after he had ſore battered it, by plaine force tooke it, and put to the ſword all the garri- ſon ſoldiors he could lay hands vpon. About an hundred of theſe Turks ſeeing they muſt needs fall into the power of their enemies, deſperatly leapt from the top of the caſtle into the riuer, where not one of them eſcaped, being all either drowned or ſlaine with ſmall ſhot. In the win- C ning of this caſtle, two hundred and fiftie of the Chriſtians were loſt, and many wounded: but of the Turks & Tartars, betwixt the eighteenth and the laſt of October periſhed aboue ſix and twentie thouſand. In this caſtle were taken thirtie nine great pieces, with ſuch ſtore of armour and other warlike prouiſion, as might haue ſerued for an whole kingdome: and foure thouſand Chriſtians beſide women and children, whom Sinan had taken out of Valachia, reſtored to their former libertie. With whom the prince after he had ſet all things in order, returned in great triumph to Tergovista, and ſo afterwards to his pallace at Alba Iulia, where, as alſo at Clavdiopolis and other cities through his dominions, he cauſed publike praiers with thankſ- giuing to almightie God, to bee deuoutly made for ſo great a victorie: as did alſo Michael the Vayuod in Valachia, who in all theſe great warres againſt the Turkes, was nothing inferiour D vnto the Tranſyluanian himſelfe. A greater loſſe than this the Turkiſh emperour receiued not at land in many yeares before, being by this ſo happie and victorious a prince, and the reuolt of theſe three countries, depriued of ſo much territory, as they had not from the Chriſtians of long time gained. It was by ſome of them of the better ſort of the Turkes that were taken, reported, that Sinan Baſſa ſhould oftentimes ſay, That this yong Tranſyluanian prince had bereft him of all the honour and renowne he had with great trauell got in the courſe of his long life: and that although he had eſcaped his hands, yet that he feared he would be the cauſe for him in theſe his great yeares, euen in the winding vp of all, to looſe his life together with his goods and honour. Now was the Tranſyluanian princes name (after the ouerthrow of this great Baſſa) become dreadfull vnto the Turkes, and alſo famous through all Chriſtendome: Which as it hath filled E the eares of many with admiration, ſo happily may the liuely repreſentation of his feature by cunning hand ſet forth, feed the longing eies of ſome with delight, and ſerue in better ſtead than the rude deſcription of his perſon.

Sinan fleeth ouer Danubius.

If worthie vertue, that thee raiſd aboue the ſtarrie skie,
With ſtedfaſt pace had runne the race ſo well begun by thee.

Ienna yeelded to the Tranſylvanians.

Whileſt this worthie Prince was thus buſied in this expedition againſt Sinan, hee cauſed the caſtle of IENNA (ſtanding vpon the high way betweene TEMESVVAR and GIVLA) to be beſieged by certaine of his captaines appointed to that ſeruice: in which caſtle lay one of the Turks Sanzackes with a garriſon of ſeuen hundred Turkes, who much troubled ſuch as paſſed that way. They now brought to ſome extremitie, and terrified with the ſucceſſe of the prince, offered to giue vp the caſtle, ſo that as ſouldiors with their ſcimitars by their ſides they might in ſafetie be brought to PANODA. Which their offer being accepted of, and they now vpon their way, the Hungarian light horſemen that ſhould haue conducted them (enformed that theſe Turks now vnder their charge, had ſecret intelligence with the Turkes in garriſon at GIVLA and TEMESVVAR, that they ſhould lie in ambuſh for them neere PANODA, and ſo cut them off by the way) ſet

A ſet vpon theſe Turks whom they ſhould haue conducted, and cut the throats of foure hundred of them: and yet ſtill holding on their way, met with theſe Turkes that lay in ambuſh for them, whom they after a ſharpe skirmiſh ouerthrew, and hauing ſlaine a great many of them, put the reſt to flight. By the taking of IENNA the wayes thereabout were quieted, eſpecially for them of WARADEN. The Sanzacke of IENNA reported, that Mahomet had a little before ſent word vnto his Baſſaes and Sanzackes in HVNGARIE, that ſuch caſtles and townes as they thought were not to bee defended againſt the Chriſtians, they ſhould betimes as occaſion ſerued yeeld them vp, or forſake them, ſo to ſpare the needleſſe loſſe of his good ſouldiors: of whom he had with ſo many townes and ſtrong holds loſt no ſmall number this yeare in HVNGARIE. IENNA
B thus taken, diuers of the richer ſort in TEMESVVAR fearing to bee euen preſently beſieged, ſent their wiues and children with their treaſure and ſuch other things as they made moſt reckoning of, out of the citie in wagons to be conueyed vnto places of more ſafetie: of which wagons, ſeuentie were by the Chriſtians (lying thereabout in garriſon) intercepted, and in them an exceeding rich bootie.

Mahomet hauing this yere fully purpoſed the vtter ruine of the Tranſyluanian prince, and the reducing of the countries of TRANSYLVANIA, MOLDAVIA, and VALACHIA, vnto his obeiſance by the great Baſſa Sinan: had for the better effecting therof, before prouided that the Grim Tartar (ready ſtill at his call) ſhould with his own people (wherof he hath great ſtore) and certain bands of the Turkes, at the ſame time inuade MOLDAVIA; and poſſeſſing himſelfe of this coun-
C trey, to place one Sidriake Vayuod in ſtead of Stephen placed by the prince, and to people the countrey with his Tartars in reward of his good ſeruice (as he ſaid) but indeed to haue them alwayes neere at hand to doe his commands in HVNGARIE, POLONIA, TRANSYLVANIA, or the other countries of the Chriſtians therunto adioyning. The Tartar according to his appoinment came with ſeuentie thouſand Tartars, accompanied with their wiues and children, to haue planted themſelues in the countrey, at the verie ſame time that Sinan came to TERGOVISTA: but being come vpon the frontiers of MOLDAVIA, to haue put in execution what he was by Mahomet commaunded, hee found there Zamoſchie the great Chauncellor of POLONIA, readie with a ſtrong armie to oppoſe himſelfe againſt him, and to ſtay his further paſſage. Wherupon ſome light skirmiſhes paſſed betweene the Tartars and Polonians: where the Tartars were ſtill put to the worſe, with the loſſe of three thouſand of their men. The Tartar Cham with Sidriake
D the Vayuod appointed by the Turke, finding themſelues, though in number mo, yet in ſtrength inferiour vnto the Polonian, and that without his good leaue he could not paſſe; ſent vnto the Chancellor to excuſe that was alreadie paſt, as done without their conſent by the inſolencie of their ſouldiors, and to tell him, That their comming was not to fight with him, as hauing expreſſe commaundement from the great Sultan Mahomet, in no caſe to diſturbe the league betwixt him and the Polonians; but quietly to paſſe by their frontiers into MOLDAVIA, and there to place Sidriake Vayuod his tributarie in ſtead of Stephen that now vſurped the place, by the appointment of the Tranſyluanian: which that they might doe, they craued his leaue as friends to paſſe. Whereunto the Chancelor anſwered, That he was come thither by the commandement of the king, to defend thoſe countries from the inuaſion of ſuch as had in them no right: and
E that there had of long time been an ancient league betwixt the Polonian kings and the Turkiſh emperours, vpon certaine conditions which he would for his part keepe inuiolat, with the fauor of the Turkiſh emperour; yet ſo, as that the kingdome of POLONIA tooke no harme thereby, and that they might quietly liue by him as their good neighbour: which league he proteſted not to haue been by him, but by them infringed: as for to giue them paſſage, he ſaid he could not. Meſſengers paſſing thus too and fro, and ſome parley had, at laſt certaine articles were agreed vpon, to the reaſonable contentment both of the Tartar and of the Chancellor (though not of Sidriake, diſappointed therby of his Vayuodſhip) as alſo of the Turkiſh Sultan, whoſe pleaſure they both ſeemed to haue in ſpeciall regard: Hereupon the Tartar with his multitude preſently returned, leauing the Chancelor to his owne deſignes. Now was it commonly thought, that the F Chancelor had done the Tranſyluanian prince great ſeruice by keeping out of the Tartars, and much honour was by many that ſaw leaſt ſpoke of him therefore: But farre was it from his thought to do the Tranſyluanian therin any ſuch good, at whoſe glory he enuied, and had with the cardinall and his brother, the princes vncles (but moſt deadly enemies) ſecretly conſpired ſo much as in them was, his vtter ruine and ouerthrow: wiſhing thoſe countries rather in the ſubie-

ction of the Turke, than to see them so honourably at libertie, gouerned by the prince: such is the force of malicious enuie, the inseparable companion of worthy vertue. Which the Chancelour (otherwise a man of great fame and honour) began now openly to poure forth: for presently after the departure of the Tartars, he with all his power passing ouer the riuer Nijester or Tyros into MOLDAVIA, euen at such time as the prince was going against Sinan at TERGOVISTA, first seized vpon the castle of Chotijm, which he furnished with his owne souldiours: and from thence marching to ZORONA, the metropoliticall citie of that prouince, & seat of the Vayuod, had it yielded vnto him: and so proceeding on, had in short time almost the whole country deliuered vnto him; Stephen the Vayuod placed by the prince, flying from place to place before him from whom he least feared any such thing, hauing made acount of no other enemies but of the Turks and Tartars. Stephen the Vayuod thus driuen out, and the Chancellor possessed of the countrey, he presently placed one Hieremias Vayuod in stead of Stephen, to hold that honour of the Polonian king as his soueraigne. Yet neuertheless, to satisfie the Turke, he sent a messenger to Sinan Bassa, then but newly come to TERGOVISTA, requesting him not to take it in euill part that he had entred into MOLDAVIA, and there placed a new Vayuod, but in the name of the great Sultan Mahomet, to confirme this his doing, and the Vayuod by him placed; promising the countrey of MOLDAVIA to remaine tributarie still vnto the Sultan, and that this new Vayuod should forthwith pay vnto him what tribute was behind, and from thenceforth a far greater tribute yearely than had the countrey of MOLDAVIA before. Whereunto the hautie Bassa (then fearing nothing lesse than that which immediatly after hapned, to be driuen out of those countries by the prince, proudly answered, That it was not the great Sultans mind, that the Polonians should at all inuade MOLDAVIA: for that beside hee could without their helpe reduce those countries to his obedience, he had giuen that country vnto the Tartar, in reward of his good seruice already done in HVNGARIE and other places; whose subiects the Tartars would ere long be ready with their wiues and children to take possession thereof. Neuertheless the Chancellor proceeded to defend the new Vayuod by him placed: which was no great matter for him to do, Sinan the Turks champion (as is before declared) being presently after ouerthrowne, and driuen quite out of those countries by the prince. Who if he had not then gained the victory, the Chancellour had not now holden MOLDAVIA, but the Turke; whose quarrell he seemed rather to fauour, than the princes. The Chancelor to colour this his inuasion, pretended, That the country of MOLDAVIA did of ancient right belong vnto the kingdome of POLONIA: which the Transyluanians tooke to be no other but meere and open wrong. This supposed title, such as it was, the Chancelor had so fashioned out vnto the king and the states of that kingdome, that they referred it to his discretion to inuade the country, and remouing the Vayuod placed by the prince, to place another in his stead: and the rather to persuade them, laboured by many forced reasons to shew the power of the Transyluanian prince to be so far inferiour vnto the Turks, that it was to be feared he should at length be thrust out of all his dominions, & so they together with MOLDAVIA become subiect to the Turke. Which if it should so come to passe, then should the Polonians haue an vntrustie and troublesome neighbour. And that therefore it were better that MOLDAVIA were possessed by them that were better able to defend it than was he, that so the Turke might be kept further of from POLONIA. Which occasion he said was not longer to bee delaied, but now betime to be laid hold vpon: persuading himselfe to find such grace and fauour with the Turkish emperor, as that he should be therwith right well contented: which was like enough for a time to be, for that the Transyluanian should thereby be much weakened. By these and such like reasons, framed to serue his owne turne, the Chancelor so preuailed with the king and the states of the kingdome, that he receiued from them (as I said) full authoritie to proceed in the matter, as he did, and as is before declared, to the great trouble of the prince, and benefit of the Turk: the late chosen Vayuod not long after opening a way in three places for the Tartars into TRANSYLVANIA, one by the countrey of SICVLI, another by the way that leadeth to ALBA IVLIA, and the third by VALACHIA.

The reasons pretended by the Chancelor for the inuasion of Moldauia

The late chosen Vayuod openeth three waies vnto the Turks & Tartars into Transyluania.

The Transyluanian prince seeing the countrey of MOLDAVIA by the practise of the Chancellour thus taken from him, and disseuered from the other vnited prouinces, to the great weakning of his state, after the flight of Sinan, sent certaine companies both of horse and foot to Stephen the late Vayuod, but now driuen out by the Polonians, to proue if happily he could by that meanes driue out the Polonians againe, and recouer his former dignitie. With this aid sent from

A from the prince and others that fauoured his quarrell, he ioyned a bloudie battell with the Polonians: but being therein by them ouercome and taken, and for a ſpace kept (as the prince feared, to haue beene deliuered vnto the Turke) he was by them (as is reported) cruelly afterwards put to death.

This foule dealing of the Polonian in MOLDAVIA much grieued many good Chriſtians, as tending to the generall hurt of the Chriſtian commonweale. For which cauſe the Emperour by his embaſſadours ſent for that purpoſe vnto the Polonian king, ſought to perſwade him to deſiſt from ſuch inuaſion of the Tranſyluanian prince by his Chancellour, as nothing ſtanding with his honour; and that ſome good reconciliation might be made betweene the prince and the Cardinall Bator and his brother, the princes vncles, authors of all theſe troubles. To which pur-
B poſe alſo the Pope ſent a meſſenger with like inſtructions and letters vnto the king, perſwading him, not ſo to proſecute his warres againſt the prince, but to turne his thoughts vnto a more peaceable and Chriſtianlike courſe, eſpecially with him with whom he was ſo neere linked in mariage. To the like effect he writ alſo vnto the Cardinall Bator, and after many graue admonitions peremptorily cited him to ROME. But for as much as the proceedings of the Polonian againſt the prince are more plainely to be gathered by the Popes letters vnto the king, it ſhal not I hope be miſtaken, if I here ſet them downe thus as I find them by others reported.

Pope Clement the eight to our beſt beloued ſonne in Chriſt, Sigiſmund, by the grace of God king The Popes letters vnto the king of Polonia, to diſſuade him from maintaining the prince.
C of POLONIA, with the benediction Apoſtolicall ſendeth greeting. By how much greater affection of fatherly loue wee embrace your Maieſtie in the Lord, ſo much the more feruently wee wiſh all your actions to be adorned with the greateſt commendation of true godlineſſe and wiſedome, both before God and men: Whereof it proceedeth, that wee are ſo much the more vehemently and grieuouſly moued, if wee heare any ſuch thing of you, as may ſeeme not agreeable to your vertue and approued zeale toward the Catholike religion, or tending to the obſcuring of the glorie of your name, as is now brought vnto vs concerning the affaires of MOLDAVIA; whereof not without great griefe wee write vnto you. And to rehearſe things a little before paſt: With what earneſtneſſe and feruencie dealt I with you, that for Gods cauſe, and the defence of the health and libertie of the Chriſtian commonweale againſt the tyrannie of the Turkes, you would combine your ſelfe with our moſt dearely beloued ſonne Rodolph the Emperour, and diuers other Chriſtian princes? and that you ſhould not let ſlip ſo no-
D table an occaſion, ſo worthily to deſerue of God, of the Catholike faith, and of the Chriſtian commonweale in generall? And albeit wee then thought, as well for many your owne priuat reſpects, as alſo of your kingdomes, That you were to be borne withall and excuſed if you did not now openly deſcend into this confederation of the Chriſtian princes againſt the moſt mortall and common enemie, neither openly ioyne your forces or giue aid for the repreſſing of his inſolencie; yet wee alwayes aſſured our ſelues, that no let ſhould in any caſe proceed from you, whereby either the Emperour or the other Chriſtian princes ſhould be the rather hindered, iuſtly to proſecute their iniuries, or to caſt off from their necks the heauie yoke of the moſt cruell tyrant: whoſe deſire of ſouereignetie is not comprized within the compaſſe of any bounds. But that you ſhould in fauour of the Turkes impugne the Catholike princes and de-
E fendors of the Chriſtian faith, and ſo ioyne hands with the enemies of the Croſſe of Chriſt, as that by your helpe their force and furie ſhould be encreaſed, and ours not onely weakened, but in the very courſe of victorie hindered, and caſt into moſt grieuous perils; this wee haue not onely not thought of you, but not ſo much as once ſuſpected: yea and can now ſcarce be perſwaded to beleeue thoſe things to bee done by you, which are reported vnto vs as moſt true and vndoubted. For the report goeth, That you hauing intelligence with the Turkes and Tartars, haue with them conſpired, and namely againſt our welbeloued ſonne Sigiſmund, prince of TRANSYLVANIA, who with inuincible courage fighteth the battels of the Lord: and leaſt he ſhould be able to abate the force and attempts of the moſt proud enemie (which by the ſingular mercie of God he hath hitherto aboue his owne power performed) but rather be enforced much to feare his owne eſtate, a new Vaynod and Prince as it were by a triumuirat authoritie and compact to be placed in MOLDAVIA, and him by the Turkes, you and the Tartars
F together, to be made gouernour of that countrey. Which vnto vs ſeemed ſo new and ſo ſtrange, and contrarie to the good opinion wee had alwayes conceiued of you, yea and ſo vnbeſeeming your zeale and wiſedome, that for griefe and admiration I had almoſt cried out with the Prophet, You heauens be amazed at this, and you gates thereof be you exceedingly heauie. For what could be ſuſpected or imagined farther from the expectation of vs and all good men, or more incredible, than that Sigiſmund the most religious king of Polonia and Svveden, who had alwaies professed himselfe a most G earnest defendor of the Catholike religion, who was readie euen with his owne bloud to redeeme the victorie of the Christians, and glorie of the Crosse, against the most wicked enemies of the same, to be vpon the sudden become so vnlike vnto himselfe? and (so much as in him was) to cut off the hope and happie successe of that religious warre, and to doe harme to a Christian and Catholike prince, not to refuse to ioyne in league and friendship, euen with the most barbarous nations and the Tartars, the perpetuall enemies of himselfe, and of the kingdome of Polonia. For which causes our mind is tormented with such bitternesse of griefe, that wee could not but by speedie messengers write vnto you concerning this matter, that hereby you might the sooner see the greatnesse of our griefe: and wee also without delay might signifie vnto you, what our fatherly loue towards you requesteth in so important a matter. For happely wee will send one euen of purpose to you concerning this cause, the care whereof H grieueth vs more than can well be expressed. Wherefore most dearely beloued sonne, wee exhort you, and in the most effectuall manner we can, aduise you, and beseech you in the Lord more attentiuely to consider what great displeasure both of God and man this your action and resolution may incurre, what a staine it may bring vnto your crowne and dignitie. For beleeue vs, that are to you in stead of a father in Christ, who loue you not fainedly, but faithfully, and in deed; who wish for your glorie in this world, and your eternall felicitie in the world to come: Beleeue vs (I say) this doth much blemish your fame with all Christian kings and princes; all men take it in euill part, and detest it as a thing monstrous, that it should by your meanes be wrought, that the Christian affaires should not prosper, that an heroicall prince, who hath vowed himselfe for Christ and his countrey, should not haue prosperous successe in this so religious and necessarie a warre against the Infidels, Turkes, and Tartars, no lesse yours, or I peraduenture also more yours, and other Christian princes enemies, than his. But what doe wee say, you to hinder the proceedings of the Transyluanian prince, this were happely but a small matter: nay verely, by this means not onely a Christian and Catholike prince, and valiant champion of the Christian faith (a vertue both admirable and amiable in the verie enemie) but your owne brother in law, bound vnto you with so many bonds of affinitie, whose children shall be as it were your childrens brethren, is by this meanes brought into great danger, and exposed vnto the furie of the most mercilesse Turkes. What doe you then my most dearely beloued sonne? Beware that all men, both now liuing, and hereafter to come, condemne you not of the greatest inhumanitie: But beware yet more, that you seeme not ingratefull not onely to your owne nigh kinsman, but to God himselfe, who hath bountifully blessed you with two great kingdomes, and so many good things: and that you prouoke not him to wrath against your selfe, K that reiecteth and confoundeth all euill and wicked deuices: and that this mischiefe that you haue brought vpon your brother, by the iust iudgement of God redound not to the greatest destruction of you and your kingdome, which he in mercie forbid. Doe you thinke, that the Transyluanian being ouercome, you shall in safetie liue from the trecherie of the Turke? Doe you not know him to be a faithlesse man, which measureth all things by his owne profit, which keepeth faith with none, but as standeth with his owne commoditie, who with an vnsatiable desire gapeth after euery kingdome, nay thirsteth after the destruction of all Christendome? Thinke also my sonne what wrong you shall doe vnto the Emperour your cousin, out of whose imperiall bloud you haue begotten sonnes and heires, and by the grace of God shall moe, but also our dignitie, and the dignitie of this Apostolicall seat, which you haue alwaies so deuoutly honoured, is thereby hurt, and your most deare mother (which wee know you of L all other least would) the Romane Church is offended, which for the maintenance of this sacred warre is at great and wonderfull charges: and our forces, which by you ought to haue beene relieued and encreased, being in so vnfit a time by these stirres in Moldavia disseuered and deminished, and the enemies on the contrarie part encreased and strengthened, into what danger and distresse may both our armie of the Church and the Emperours fall? And withall, how greatly all the manner and managing of this whole warre is thereby confounded, there is no man that seeth not. Yea and this moreouer, which no little concerneth the dignitie of vs and this holy See, wee haue vndertaken and certainely promised to our most dearely beloued sonnes Rodolph and Sigismund, that your royall maiestie should not in any thing hinder or hurt their affaires. neither did wee hereof assure them vpon a light occasi- on, but moued with great reason, not onely for that wee deseruedly ought so to promise of you in so iust M a cause, but also for that it was so vnto vs plainely and expressely written by the reuerend father, the Bishop of S. Seuerus, our Apostolicall Nuntio with you, whom wee know to be both vnto vs faithfull, and to you dutifull: neither can wee by any meanes doubt thereof, because he hath writ vnto vs concerning so weightie a matter, that he receiued it euen from your owne mouth. Which things so standing, seeing

A seeing you of your selfe see the manifold absurdities of this fact on euerie side, not to speake of the hay-nousnesse thereof: we request you againe, yea and oftentimes, forthwith to apply the necessarie remedies to these hurts. The Transyluanian prince your brother in law, deuoted to your selfe, and desirous of your fauour, either protect with your defence, or at leastwise hurt him not: yea hurt not the whole state of the Christian common-weale, and relieue not by any meanes the quarrell of the enemies of Christ. If you haue any controuersie with the prince Sigismund, or desire of him any thing, referre it vnto vs, that is to say, vnto your most louing father: you know your affaires to be of vs fauoured, and we hope by the power of God that it may easly come to passe that some conuenient meanes may be found whereby peace and quietnesse may be confirmed betwixt you, and good vnitie grow betwixt you two brethren our sonnes and so all the root of bitternesse and displeasure to be vtterly pluckt out of your minds. This haue I writ
B vnto you my sonne, frankly and from a sincere heart, though truely much grieued, because we loue you, and are much carefull of your honour and good: Shew you agatne in deed that you take it so, as written from your father; and that you altogither preferre our fatherly and wholsome exhortations before the sinister persuasions of others. Farther concerning these matters, you shall vnderstand by the same bishop our Nuntio now with you, to whom you may (as you haue done) giue credit in all things as to our selfe.

These letters dated from Rome the 8 day of Nouember, were deliuered to the king in December, with others to the Cardinall and Chancelor, whom the Pope sharply reproued as the authors and contriuers of all these mischiefes.

C The Tartar Cham before stirred vp by the Turkish emperour Mahomet, for the inuasion of Moldavia (as is alreadie before declared) about this time sent his embassadour also vnto the Polonian king, for the confirmation of such articles as he had before agreed vpon with the Chācelor: which because they manifestly declare the ground and purpose of his intended expedition into Moldavia, with the foule collusion of the Chauncelor with the Turks and Tartars against the Transyluanian prince, I thought it not amisse or from our purpose (for the more manifestation of that which is alreadie said) here to set them downe, as they are translated out of the Tartar language.

The copie of the letters of the Tartar vnto the king of Polonia

D Cham Kazikiery vnto the king of Polonia, and Svveden our brother, one of the great lords among the Christians, humbly boweth his head. First we signifie vnto you, that Aaron Palantine of Moldavia was a forsworne traitour; who hauing gathered a power of the Valachians, and ioyning vnto him the Polonian Cossackes, spoiled the territories of the great Sultan. But afterward dissention arising among them, the Hungarian Cossackes liuing in Valachia, sent Aaron in bonds vnto the king of Vienna: after him followed an other traitour called Rozwan, who also hauing raised certaine companies of souldiors, began in the like manner to forrage the countries of the Turkish emperor thereabout: which as soone as he had knowledge of, he writ vnto me his brother, That I should with all possible speed go into Valachia to chastice these rebels, to burne their houses and townes; and hauing with the edge of the sword slaine their men, to carrie away with me their wiues and children into captiuitie. Hauing this in charge, I the great Cham of the great territorie of the great Lord Karykterey, with my brother
E Letikerry Galga, and other my brethren and counsellors, warlike and valiant captaines and Murzis; mounting my horse, came with mine army into Valachia vnto the riuer Prut where it meeteth with another riuer called Cocoza: here we chanced vpon a faithfull seruitour of yours, our brother the Chancelor, who was also come a little before vs into Valachia with whom after some light contention when we began to be more tractable, he declared vnto vs, that he was of purpose come into Valachia to place there a new Vayuod, which (as he said) of antient right belonged vnto the Polonians; without any wrong or preiudice therein to be done to the couenants and league they had with the emperour of the Turkes; and farther that his desire was, that one Hieremias whom he had appointed Vayuod, might haue the comaund of that prouince; and that the antient amitie, such as was in the time of Sultan Solyman and Cham
F Dawlethgerd, might be faithfully kept. Which when I had for my part faithfully sworne to doe, and he likewise had caused the same to be done by such of his as he had therefore sent vnto me, we decreed togither, that the Cossackes on the farther side of Nijester (disordered and rebellious men) should be vtterly rooted out, that they should not hereafter doe any harme in the territories of the great Sultan: and that the presents vsually sent vnto vs of long, euen since the time of Sultan Solyman, should no more be detained, nor any harmes be hereafter done in any part of our dominions. And therefore when the Chan- cellor had promiſed vnto vs, that he would take order that theſe Coſſackes ſhould bee vtterly deſtroyed, I G alſo conſented, that according to the pleaſure of the royall maieſtie of you my brother, Hieremias ſhould hold the Vayuodſhip of VALACHIA: which I forthwith by letters ſignified vnto the Turkiſh emperor.

Now if it be ſo, that your maieſtie ſhall giue your conſent vnto thoſe things which wee haue here agreed vpon with your Chauncellour, you ſhall then for euer find brotherly friendſhip with me, my brother and all other our captaines and Murzis: but if you ſhall not deſtroy theſe Coſſackes, you ſhall not then perform the oath and couenants made. Theſe things we haue commaunded to be declared vnto you by our embaſſa-dour our brother Gianach Metagra, whom we requeſt your maieſtie courteouſly to entertaine, and by him to ſend the preſents vnto vs: for we will not now this yeare ſend any other. Giuen at the riuer Prut in the yeare of Mahomet 1004.

The Preſent offered by the Tartar embaſſador to the king of Polonia.

After the Tartar embaſſador had deliuered thoſe letters vnto the king, with a ſpeech in effect to the ſame purpoſe, he in the name of the Cham gaue vnto him an horſe and an arrow for a preſent: and afterward being brought to a lodging appointed for him, was commaunded there to expect his anſwere. At length his diſpatch was giuen him in letters ſealed vp, which hee tooke much againſt his will, requeſting the king to ſend an embaſſadour vnto the Cham: and farther by word of mouth, to tell him what to anſwere vnto his lord. But other anſwere could hee get none, than was alreadie deliuered him in writing: and ſo rewarded with a gowne furred with Sables, was diſmiſſed without the preſent requeſted by the Cham, or any embaſſador to accompanie him.

Thus the Tranſyluanian prince, on the one ſide mightily impugned by the Turke, and on I the other by the ſetting on of the Turke readie to haue beene no leſſe endangered by the inuaſion of the Tartar, receiued greater harme from the Polonians being Chriſtians than from both thoſe great Mahometane princes: The Polonian in ſome ſort performing for the Turke, what hee had plotted to haue beene done by the Tartar: and ſo by the taking away of MOLDAVIA from the prince, not onely weakened his ſtrength, but alſo opened a way for the barbarous enemies into his countrie. Howbeit much it is that the Polonians alleadge for the excuſe of themſelues, and the defence of that which was by the great Chauncellour then done in MOLDAVIA: which for that it cannot be better told than by the great Chauncellour himſelfe, let vs heare how he by his letters anſwereth the matter, euen vnto Clement the Pope himſelfe. K

Iohn Zamoſchie vnto Clement the Eight the great Biſhop.

Zamoſchie the great Chancelor his letters vnto Clement the Pope.

Moſt holy and bleſſed father in Chriſt, and moſt gratious lord, after the kiſſing of your moſt bleſſed feet, and my moſt humble commendations; I haue by your Holineſſe letters directed both vnto the Kings Maieſtie and my ſelfe, vnderſtood as well his royall Maieſtie and my moſt gratious Lord and maſter, as alſo my ſelfe as his ſeruant to bee both accuſed vnto your Holineſſe: as if by thoſe things by vs done in MOLDAVIA, the endeauours of the Chriſtians had beene hindered, and the power of the enemie confirmed. Whereof I am not with many words to purge my ſelfe vnto your Holineſſe, for- L aſmuch as I aſſure my ſelfe your Holineſſe to haue alreadie fully vnderſtood both what the things were that were done in MOLDAVIA, and how they were done: partly by the kings maieſties letters, and partly by his principall ſecretarie, for that cauſe eſpecially ſent vnto your Holineſſe. Yet doubt I not to requeſt this one thing of your Holineſſe, that if it hath knowne mee for a man, I will not ſay of any capacitie or wit, but euen of the leaſt experience in the world, or of any religion at all; ſo to perſuade it ſelfe of me, nothing to haue beene done, eſpecially in this matter, either raſhly, or to the hinderance of the Chriſtian common-weale. I will not now repeate what mine opinion was concerning the league and confederation to bee made with the reſt of the Chriſtian princes, for the combining of their forces againſt the common enemie, eſpecially his ſacred Maieſties: as alſo what myne owne labour and ende- M uour was in the laſt aſſemblie of the States in the high Court of Parliament. Which thing after it was euen by them whom it moſt concerned, either delayed or neglected, or vtterly caſt aſide: and yet his Maieſtie had ſtill a great deſire to doe the Chriſtian common-weale ſome great good, I alſo to the vttermoſt of my power laboured to that end; that by the common decree of the kingdome, an expedition might be made into TARTARIA, not ſo much in reuenge of the iniuries done by that enemie in theſe

late

A late yeares past, as so in the meane time to turne him from the necks of the Christians, as that he should not ioyne his forces with the Turks: or if it so pleased God to blesse those our endeuours, vtterly at length to root out that so great a mischiefe. But how it came to passe that this expedition, so much by the king desired (yet scarcely begun or taken in hand) tooke not effect, it is not needfull for mee to declare, for that I suppose your Holinesse hath by others, especially your Nuntio, vnderstood the same. In the meane time, by others and often messengers newes was brought, That Sinan Bassa with a great armie was alreadie come ouer Danubius; and I by letters from the Vayuod of the further VALACHIA was aduertised, how that hee not able to encounter him, had forsaken that prouince; which at the first impression taken and almost vtterly wasted by Sinan, he was now come fast vpon TRANSYLVANIA: and in MOLDAVIA
B the Tartar was still expected, insomuch that Rolwan (who hauing taken prisoner Aaron the Palatine whom he serued, in his house, and so himselfe inuaded the Palatine) began now also to quake for feare, and to craue helpe of me, or rather to seeke how he might flie away (as not long after he did) neither hauing any great strength about him, or expecting any greater from the people of that countrey: for why that prouince was brought so low by the miseries of the former yeares, but especially by such as had euill gouerned the same, that at such time as I entred into MOLDAVIA, I assure your Holinesse there were not in it of housholders aboue 15000, and those also for the most part poore countrey people of the basest sort, in whom there could neither be any great helpe, neither if they had bin able to haue done any thing, durst Rolwan haue trusted himselfe with them, vpon whom he had with all kind of crueltie tyranised. Chotim a castle in the very confines of this kingdome, was kept with no greater garison than 200 Hun-
C garians, who perceiuing themselues neither of sufficient strength to hold the place, nor to withstand the enemie, they also by and by followed after Rolwan. All the rest of the prouince was not onely vnarmed, but altogether poore vnd naked, without any certain gouernment, without counsell, without strength, and without any defence at all, two castles onely excepted: which standing vpon the confines of POLONIA, might haue serued better for the enemy, out of them to haue infested vs, than for the defence of MOLDAVIA against them: so that had the enemie once set foot into that prouince, neither could it without a great power haue bin recouered, neither being recouered, could easily haue bin defended against so puissant an enemy: and that which worse was, was not it selfe alone to haue bin consumed with that fire, but like ynough to haue caried away with it PODOLIA also, bordering vpon it, with a great part of RVSCIA. Wherefore in this state of things, when as both that prouince was in greatest danger to haue bin lost, and so many enemies houered not more ouer the heads of all Christendome than ouer this kingdome,
D what was of vs to be done? I knaw to whom I speake these things, euen vnto him, not onely whose diuine wisedome but singular loue also towards my natiue countrey is to me most knowne. Verely I entred into MOLDAVIA with no great armie, yet such anone as happily (as in like case it often chanceth) fame had made amongst the enemies a very great one: so that Sinan fearing if he should thrust himselfe with his army into the straits whereby he was to breake into TRANSYLVANIA, to be shut in by our armie, stayed his iourney: and the Tartar the more earnestly he was called vpon by Sinan (by reason of the fame of this our armie) resolued to make himselfe so much the stronger: So that whilest he assembleth the Nogaian Tartars and others further off, and so from all parts raiseth the greatest power he could, the matter was delaied almost vnto the end of Nouember: at which time he with a most huge armie, accompanied with Sendziak Iehiuense, and a great power of the Turkes raised out of their prouinces there-
E by, came directly vpon me in the fields of COROCI. Sendziak the Tartar Cham his sisters sonne, now called himselfe the Basse of MOLDAVIA, as did the Tartars eldest sonne name himselfe prince of another part of that prouince also: for so that countrey was to haue beene deuided betwixt them, that that part which was next vnto the Tartars dominions should be allotted vnto the Tartar, and the other part confining vpon this kingdome, to be gouerned by Sendziak, as Basse thereof, and so to make it the seat of a perpetuall war, from whence PODOLIA, RVSCIA, and the lesser POLONIA might be with continuall incursions wasted euen before our faces; concerning which matter they now dispersed their letters, wherein they published the power and authoritie giuen them from the grand signior, exhorting the people of that countrey to receiue the same. A whole day wee fought with this multitude, our men alwaies by the goodnesse of God hauing not onely the vpper hand, but without any notable losse also;
F yet not without great slaughter of theirs: and would to God I had had such strength, as that not onely the conditions of peace, but euen the enemies themselues might haue beene in my power. But when wee were oftentimes come to parle (they still requiring the same) and so at length vnto conditions of peace; if such were giuen them, as whereby this onely kingdome had without the wrong of any other beene deliuered from so great and sudden a danger, what reasonable man could find fault theretherewith, if wee ſhould haue preferred the health and welfare of our country (whereunto all good men G owe all they haue) before other mens profits? But now theſe things were ſo done, as that it was no leſſe prouided for the good of the neighbour Chriſtians, yea and happily not the leaſt for theirs, who for the ſame ſlander this kingdome vnto your Holineſſe: the furie of Sinan Baſſa was by this meanes repreſ- ſed, who whileſt he feared to be ſhut vp in the ſtraits by our armie now come into Moldavia, and expected the Tartars comming, ſpent almoſt all the reſt of the Summer idely and without any thing doing. The Tartar himſelfe was not onely turned from the bowels of Chriſtendome, whereinto hee had purpoſed (as the yeare before) to haue entered, we hauing with our owne breaſts receiued his force and furie: but being brought vnto conditions, was expreſſely enioyned in a moſt ſhort prefined time, and without any more harme doing to returne againe into his country by the ſelfeſame way he came, and by no other: whereby it is come to paſſe, that vntill this day Chriſtendome hath not this yeare yet felt the H Tartars weapons. But vnto Transylvania and Hvngaria, what a ſpace and power was gi- uen for them to gather their ſtrength and forces together, and out of the ſame places to oppoſe them a-gainſt the enemie, when as our armie kept them ſafe at their backes, and eaſed not onely Molda-via but Valachia and Transylvania alſo of that care? Whereas if this cauſe of delay had not beene obiected vnto the Turkes firſt, and after vnto the Tartars; not to ſay any thing of the Turkes, the Tartars at the very ſelfeſame time that the Tranſyluanian armie was gone into Valachia a- gainſt Sinan, might haue broken into Transylvania before it could haue returned home, or els marching directly towards that armie, might haue met with it out of Transylvania. As for Moldavia, which together with the memorie of the Chriſtian name, yet left in it, had vtterly pe- riſhed, was moſt manifeſtly preſerued by the comming of our armie. Which what end it would haue I had, if the enemie might at his pleaſure haue raged as he did in the farther Valachia, thoſe moſt bitter remembrances in it yet at this day ſmoking, doe well declare: out of which it is well knowen moe thouſands of Chriſtian captiues to haue beene carried away into moſt wofull captiuitie, than almoſt out of any other prouince in all the time of theſe miſerable warres. Which although it bee thus, yet boaſt wee not thereof, neither ſend wee any triumphant letters vnto your Holineſſe, nor brag wee of our good ſeruice done for the Chriſtian commonweale, contenting our ſelues with the conſcience of the thing it ſelfe. In the meane time wee are accuſed vnto your Holineſſe: but for what cauſe? If any man complaine for the taking of Moldavia, I will not ſay it was by them before willingly forſaken, whileſt

I was yet in the frontiers thereof; but that this kingdome hath a moſt auncient right vnto it, and ſuch a right, as that when our kings being buſied in their warres againſt the Muſcouite, the Cruciat Teu- K tonie brethren, or others; ſome others alſo troubling the ſtate thereof, it for a time became a prey vn- to the Turkiſh tyrants, yet in all the leagues made or renewed betwixt this kingdome and them, was ſtill excepted, That all ſuch things as the Palatine of Moldavia was of dutie to performe vnto the king, ſhould by him ſtill be performed. Which kings of Polonia, and namely Auguſtus himſelfe, the laſt of the Iagellonian race, appointed diuers of thoſe Palatines themſelues. Which although they be things moſt manifeſt, yet hauing more regard vnto the welfare of that prouince, as a Chriſtian countrey, than of our right, wee reſtored the ſame into the ſame ſtate wherein it hath beene for many
* viz. to become tributarie vnto the Turks. *yeares before theſe * warres. Wherefore if any man thinke any thing done, whereby the enemies of the* croſſe of Chriſt might be eaſed or ſtrengthened, or the defendors of the faith hindered, it is ſo farre from any ſuch thing to be done, that rather (as is before declared) the enemies force is repreſſed and L auerted, and greater meanes giuen to the Chriſtians afront to impugne them, the enemie being at their backes by vs ſhut from them. But I feare that they haue not fully enformed your Holineſſe how theſe things were done, who haue reported vnto your ſaid Holineſſe not onely the name of the Turkes to haue beene proclaimed together with the Polonians in Moldavia, but alſo the name of the Tar- tars the proper enemies of the Polonians, and by the power and decrees of them three, as it were confederat together, things to haue beene ordered in Moldavia. Which their complaint if it tend to that end, as if a confederation were made with them, I frankely confeſſe certaine conditions to haue beene giuen them, but ſuch as whereby is prouided not onely for the quiet and ſecuritie of this kingdome, but no leſſe alſo for the whole Chriſtian commonweale, as is before declared. All which things for all that although they were done for the good of this kingdome, and all Chriſtendome in generall, yet were they M ſo done, that they were all by mee referred vnto the kings maieſtie and the ſtates of the kingdome: ſo that at this preſent the kingdome is at free libertie either to ioyne in confederation with the reſt of the Chriſtian princes, or if that cannot vpon certaine and indifferent conditions be agreed vpon, yet with no mans iniurie or hurt to ratifie this, ioyned with the health and good of a great part of the Chriſtian commonweale:

commonweale: onely God graunt that the Chriſtian princes may ſerionſly thinke both of this ſo Chriſtian a confederation againſt the common enemie, and ſtriue alſo all together againſt the enemie with their weapons, and not with miſreports and ſlanders one againſt another. They are not to aſſaile the enemies feet, but his throat: neither is the ſeat of the warre to be placed in the borders of Polonia, where it concerneth themſelues much to haue all things rather peaceable behind them: but let the warre be vndertaken with no leſſe charge and preparation, than if the enemies royall ſeat were to be aſſailed; which ſtanding in an open and plaine countrey ſhall alwaies without much adoe be his that being ſtrongeſt can take it. This haue I written at large as my purpoſe was, all which I moſt humbly beſeech your Holineſſe with your diuine wiſedome to conſider of, and with your wonted clemencie to accept the ſame: and ſo proſtrate at your Holineſſe feet, I moſt humbly commend me to your clemencie. From Za- moſchie the tenth of Ianuarie 1596.

Thus much the great Chancelour in defence of himſelfe and of that he had done in Moldavia: which howſoeuer it contented the Pope, well I wot it nothing pleaſed the Emperour, and much leſſe the Tranſyluanian prince, now not a little weakened by the taking away of the countrey of Moldavia from him.

To end this troubleſome yeare withall, many ſharp and bloudie skirmiſhes yet daily paſſed in diuers places of thoſe frontier countries, the Turkes almoſt in euery place ſtill going to the worſe. In the beginning of Nouember, Lenconits Gouernour of Carolstat, the ſecond time ſurprized Wihitz in the frontiers of Croatia, where theſe wars firſt begun: but being not able to take the caſtle, contented himſelfe as before with the ſpoile of the citie, and afterward ſetting it on fire, departed. Maximilian alſo attempted Zolnoc: and the Chriſtians in garriſon at Strigonivm and Plindenbvrg now become neere neighbours vnto the Turkes at Byda, did with continuall inrodes not a little moleſt them both all the latter end of this yeare and the beginning of the next. And the Turkes in Braila in Valachia, vpon the ſide of Danubius, fearing after the flight of Sinan to be beſieged by the Vayuod, forſooke the citie, and in ſuch haſt paſſed the riuer, that in that tumultuous paſſage three hundred of them periſhed. Sinan Baſſa, by the Tranſyluanian prince of late driuen out of Valachia, was not long after ſent for to Constantinople, but the craftie old fox not ignorant of the fierce nature of the great Sultan, and warned by the late miſerie of Ferat, found occaſions to delay the time ſo long, vntill that he was ſent for againe, and after that, the third time alſo. In the meane while he had ſo wrought by his mightie friends in Court, and by rich rewards, mightier than they, that at his comming to the Court he was there honourably receiued, as the chiefeſt of the Baſſaes: and being afterwards offered to be diſcharged of the warres, as a man of aboue foureſcore yeares old, he refuſed ſo to be, ſaying, That he was borne & brought vp amongſt ſouldiors & martiall men, and ſo wiſhed amongſt them to die: as not long after he did; dying as was thought of conceit of the euill ſucceſſe he had in his warres againſt the Tranſyluanian.

Sinan Baſſa ſent for to Conſtantinople.

His death.

Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperour exceedingly grieued with the loſſe of ſo many his cities and ſtrong places this yeare loſt, as namely Strigonivm, Vicegrade, Sisec, Petrinia, Lippa, Ienna, Tergovista, Bvcaresta, Zorza, and many others of leſſe name: and both by letters and meſſengers vnderſtanding daily of the ſlaughter of his people, and waſting of his frontiers, commaunded great preparation to be made againſt the next Spring, giuing it out, That he would then in perſon himſelf come down into Hvngarie with ſuch a power as neuer had any his predeceſſours the Othoman kings and emperours, and there take moſt ſharp reuenge of all his former wrongs. Neuertheleſſe, theſe his ſo haſtie deſignes were by the plague & famine, (which then both raged extreamely in moſt part of his empire) and by other great occurrents of the ſame time ſo croſſed, that by that time the Spring came, he ſcarcely wel knew which way to turne himſelf firſt. For beſide theſe troubles of the Weſt, of themſelues ynough to haue filled his hands, the Georgians in the Eaſt, a warlike people, moued with the good ſucceſſe of the Chriſtians in Valachia and Hvngarie, had taken vp arms againſt him: and the old Perſian king but a little before dead, had left that great kingdome to his ſonne, a man of greater ſpirit than was like to endure the manifold iniuries before done vnto his father by the Turks, to the great diſhonor of that kingdome, & preiudice of himſelf. Of which things the Baſſa of Tavris gaue him ample intelligence, wiſhing him betimes to prouide for ſuch ſtormes: which ioyned to the reſt, filled his head with many troubled thoughts, whereunto we leaue him vntill the next Spring.

Mahomet perplexed.

The

1596 The Tranſyluanian prince carefull of his eſtate, and not a little troubled with the diſſeuering G of MOLDAVIA: thought it not vnfit for his affaires, now after the flight of Sinan and diſcomfi-ture of the Turks, to go in perſon himſelfe vnto the Emperour, to declare vnto him the wrong done him by the Polonian; and farther to conferre with him, concerning the mannaging of the warres againſt the common enemie. So hauing put all things in readineſſe for his iourney, he ſet forward in Ianuarie 1596, and by the way of CASSOVIA the fourth of Februarie, arriued at PRAGE in BOHEMIA, where he was by the emperours appointment moſt honourably entertained. But immediatly after his comming thither he fell ſick of an ague, which grieuouſly vexed him for the ſpace of three weekes. In the latter end of Februarie hauing ſomewhat recouered his health, he went to the church: where after his deuotions done, he was by the Deane of the Cathedrall church welcomed with a moſt eloquent oration, ſetting forth his worthie praiſes, H and farther animating him vnto the like exploits againſt the common enemie of all Chriſtiani-tie: Whereunto he forthwith anſwered in Latin, ſo eloquently and ſo readily, that all men maruelled that heard him: proteſting in his ſpeech, That as he and his ſubiects had not hitherto ſpared their liues or goods in defence of the common cauſe: ſo would they not afterwards ſpare the ſame, but aduenture all for the benefit of the Chriſtian common-weale; well hoping that the emperour and the other Chriſtian princes would not as occaſion ſhould require, be wanting vnto him with their forces, or the cleargie with their prayers: which done, he doubted not (as he ſaid) by the power of God, but to obtaine more notable victories than he had yet againſt the Turks the enemies of God.

The Siculi rebell againſt the prince.

Whileſt he yet thus lay at the emperours Court, it fortuned that the people called Siculi, of- I fended to haue their liberties in ſome part infringed in the late aſſembly of the States holden in TRANSYLVANIA in December laſt: riſe now vp in armes in diuers places, refuſing to yeeld their former obedience vnto the prince. A matter like enough to haue wrought him much trouble, and ſuppoſed not to haue been done without the priuitie of the Cardinall his vncle: but by the wiſedome and courage of ſuch as he had in his abſence put in truſt with the gouernment of his countrey, diuers of the ringleaders of this rebellion were apprehended, and in diuers ſorts executed: and three hundred of their complices to the terrour of their fellowes, had their noſes and eares cut off. By which wholſome ſeueritie, all thoſe troubles were appeaſed, and the countrey againe quieted.

At the ſame time alſo the Tranſyluanians obtained of the Turks a notable victory, with an K exceeding rich bootie. Mahomet the Turkiſh Sultan had about this time ſent a new Baſſa for the gouernment of TEMESVVAR: againſt whoſe comming the old Baſſa before Gouernour, had in ſeuentie fiue wagons truſſed vp a wonderfull deale of wealth, which he had there gotten in the time of his former gouernment, to haue been togither with himſelfe with a ſtrong conuoy conducted to BELGRADE. Of this his purpoſe, the Hungarian Heidons lying at LIPPA and IEN-NA hauing intelligence, lay in wait for him vpon the way, and in his paſſing by ſet vpon him:

where in a ſharp conflict they ouerthrew the conuoy, and ſlew the Baſſa, whoſe head they ſent for a preſent to the princeſſe at ALBA IVLIA: and tooke the ſpoyle of the Baſſaes carriages, wherein was taken a wonderfull wealth, for in one of thoſe wagons is reported to haue beene found twentie thouſand of Hungarian duckats. L

In this abſence alſo of the prince, ten thouſand of the Raſcians reuolting from the Turke, came and offered their ſeruice vnto the princeſſe, wherof ſhe by letters with great ſpeed certified the prince her huſband; who thereupon haſted to diſpatch with the emperour: and hauing procured both from him and the Pope the promiſe of ſome aid to be afterward ſent him, tooke of him his leaue, and being honourably accompanied, departed from PRAGE to VIENNA: where he ariued the eleuenth of March, ſitting in a princely chariot, drawn with ſix moſt beatifull hor-ſes, the gift of the emperour. At his comming thither he was met by the nobilitie of the countrey, and by Aldobrandinus the Popes nephew, who preſented him with three goodly horſes for ſeruice, moſt richly furniſhed. Him the prince tooke into his chariot, and ſo accompanied entered the citie, where he was with all due honour receiued & ioyfully entertained, and ſo brought M vnto the emperours pallace, where by the learned ſtudents of that Vniuerſitie, was for his plea-ſure acted before him the notable hiſtorie of Ioſua. Hauing ſtaied there three dayes, and purpo-ſing to haue in his returne viſited his mother in law at GREICZ in CROATIA: newes was brought him, that the Turks & Tartars by the ſetting on of Stephen Bator his vncle, were about

to

A to breake into TRANSYLVANIA. Wherefore changing his purpose, he departed thence to PRESBVRG, and so with all speed kept on his way towards TRANSYLVANIA: where he to the great ioy and comfort of his subiects in generall arriued in safetie in the beginning of Aprill.

In this while many hoat skirmishes passed betwixt the Christians and the Turks in the frontiers of their territories: and now the plague and famine, which had of long raged in CONSTANTINOPLE, and other places of the Turks dominions, began to asswage. Of which so great calamities as had deuoured many thousands of his people, the Turkish emperour finding himselfe somewhat eased, forthwith caused the continuation of his warres against the emperour and the Transyluanian prince, to be three daies together proclaimed in CONSTANTINOPLE, and a great armie to be raised to be sent into TRANSYLVANIA and HVNGARIE: giuing it out, that he would
B with that so puissant an army in person himselfe come into HVNGARIE. At which time it was also reported, that hee had already sent his tents and other his necessarie prouision before to HADRIANOPLE: for now was nothing more odious in the Turkes court, than the name of the Transyluanian prince.

Warres proclaimed in Constantinople against the emperor & the Transyluanian prince.

Of all these things was not the emperour ignorant, as fully thereof certified both by letters and espials, as also by the vniforme confession of such Turks as were daily taken prisoners. For which cause, he also with as much speed and care as he could, prouided for the raising of his armie, as he had the yeare before; as also for the leuying of mony, and prouision of all things necessary, that the enemie at his comming might not find him vnprouided. Neither spared he to pray aid of the other Christian princes his neighbors, especially of the Polonian, whom he had diuers
C times sought after to haue drawn him into the confederation with the other Christian princes against the Turke. To which purpose hee now also sent vnto him the bishop of PRESLAVV and the lord Poppelius his embassadours: as did the Pope also send vnto him the Cardinall Caietane his legat, and the princes electors also their embassadors: vnto whom the Polonian gaue good hearing and good words, but would not by any meanes be persuaded to breake his league with the Turk, or to affoord any aid vnto the Christians; although the Cardinall with many pregnant reasons shewed him what small assurance there was in the Turkes leagues, and how dangerous it might be to his state if the Turke making peace with the emperour, should turne his force vpon him, which it was like enough hee would, as knowing no man longer for friend than stood with his profit; beside the immortall blemish of his honour by disseuering himselfe from the vnion of D the Christian princes, to hold friendship with the Turks & infidels. But all this and much more to no purpose, so resolutely was the Polonian set downe for the keeping of the Turks fauour; so that of all the Christian princes so neere vnto the deuouring enemie, none stood the Christian common-weale in lesse stead than he. Which for all that, most men imputed not so much vnto the king as to others about him, especially to Zamoschie the great Chancelor, by whom that state was most swaied, who was not onely supposed but openly reported to haue secret intelligence both with the Turke and the Tartar.

All this while the lord Palfi Gouernour of STRIGONIVM, ceased not with continuall inroads to vex the Turks euen to the gates of BVDA, as did also the other Christian captaines in other places of the Turkes frontiers in HVNGARIE. Neere vnto BVDA were two great countrey villa-
E ges, for most part inhabited by Christians, who hauing giuen their oath of obedience vnto the Turke, liued a miserable life for the paiment of an excessiue tribute yearely. These poore Christians, weary of the Turkish thraldome and the continuall spoile of their labors by them of STRIGONIVM, by secret messengers requested of the lord Palfi, of mercie to carrie them with their goods and cattell away into some other place of the Christian territorie, that so they might yet liue amongst Christians, as he had but a little before done for them of old BVDA. Vnto which their so reasonable a request, the Christian Gouernor charitably hearkened; willing them against a certaine appointed time, to put themselues with all their things in readinesse. There was of these Christians about 755 families, who with their wiues and children, and such trash as they had, packt vp into eightie wagons drawne with fourteene and sixteene oxen apiece, at the ap-F pointed time about midnight committed themselues with all that they had vnto the conduct of them of STRGONIVM, sent out of purpose for them; by whom they were in safetie brought to STRIGONIVM. Amongst them were many rich men, who brought with them good store of coyne, with an exceeding great number of cattell. Vnto these newcome guests, Palfi assigned certaine fields betwixt STRIGONIVM and VIVARIA, on the North side of Danubius: where they they ſo commodiouſly liued, as was poſsible in ſo troubled an eſtate of a countrey. G

Six hundred of the garriſon ſoldiors of Lippa ſlaine by the Turkes.

Shortly after, ſix hundred garriſon ſouldiors of LIPPA ſeeking after bootie, and aduenturing too farre into the enemies territorie, were diſcouered by the Turks ſcouts: and ſo beſet by the Turkes and Tartars billeted in the countrie about TEMESVVAR, that there was no way left for them to eſcape. Which they well perceiuing, reſolued among themſelues (as became valiant men) to fight it out euen vnto the laſt man; and with no leſſe reſolution performed what they had before determined: for being on euerie ſide beſet and hardly charged by their enemies, they as men before reſolued to die, although ſcarce one to twenty, fought moſt deſperatly, ſeeking for nothing elſe but to ſell their liues as deare as they could vnto their enemies: and ſo fighting were all ſlaine, except ſome few which by great fortune eſcaped, leauing vnto the enemy a right bloudie victorie. Yet by this loſſe of ſo great a partie, was the garriſon of LIPPA greatly weakened, H which the enemie knew right well, and therevpon began forthwith to prepare to beſiege the towne. Which Barbelus the Gouernour (a moſt valiant man) wiſely foreſeeing, ſent in poſt vnto the Tranſyluanian prince, to requeſt him with all ſpeed to ſend him foure or fiue thouſand good ſouldiors, with which power he doubted not by the helpe of God, to be able to defend the towne againſt all the forces the enemie was at that time able to bring againſt it. vnto whom

Lippa beſieged by the Turkes and Tartars

the prince with out delay ſent eight thouſand, who all in ſafetie in good time arriued at LIPPA: for ſhortly after their arriuall fortie thouſand of the Turkes and Tartars came & ſat down before the towne, encloſing it on euerie ſide, and ſo lay for certaine daies without any thing doing worth the ſpeaking of; they of the towne in the meane time doing them all the harme they could with their great ſhot, which they ſent amongſt them not ſparingly. But they had not thus I long lien, but that newes was brought into the campe; that the Tranſyluanian prince was with a great power comming thither to relieue the towne: whereupon they preſently riſe, and retired to the place where they had before encamped, about two miles from LIPPA; where certainly vnderſtanding that the prince neither was neither could in ſhort time be in ſuch readines as was before reported, they forthwith returned, and more ſtraitly beſieged the towne than before. They had now brought with them ſeuenteene pieces of batterie, eight wagons laded with ſhot and pouder, and fortie ſix others laded with ſcaling ladders and other warlike prouiſion: thus appointed they began to batter the towne, & afterwards gaue therunto diuers deſperat aſſaults; which the Chriſtians valiantly receiued, and ſtill with great ſlaughter repulſed their enemies. For that ſtrong towne was with towers and bulwarkes flanking one another ſo fortified, that out of K them the Chriſtians with their murthering pieces made great ſpoile of their enemies, and ſtil enforced them with loſſe to retire, no bullet almoſt flying in vaine. In the heat of one of theſe aſſaults, the Gouernour cauſed one of the gats of the towue to be ſet open, hauing before within in the towne placed ſixteene great pieces, at the verie entrance of the ſame gate, charged with all kind of murthering ſhot: vnto which gate, as of meere deſperation ſet open by the defendants, the Turkes and Tartars deſiorus of reuenge, came thronging as thicke as might be, thinking to haue thereby entred: when ſuddenly, and as it were in the turning of an hand, they were with the aforeſaid murthering pieces cut downe as with a ſithe, and ſo againe, and the third and fourth time, before they could cleare themſelues of the danger thereof, their heads, armes, & legges and other rent limbes, flying in the ayre moſt miſerably to behold. Neuertheleſſe the ſiege was by L them continued, & the often aſſaults ſo reſolutly maintained, as if they had therupon purpoſed to haue gaged all their liues. But this ſo obſtinat a reſolution, was by an vnexpected accident when they leaſt thought, conuerted into ſuch a deſperat feare and aſtoniſhment, that they vpon the ſudden (no man forcing them) forſooke their trenches wherein they lay encamped, and leauing behind them their tents, their greate ordinance, and whatſoeuer elſe they had, they betooke themſelues to a moſt diſordered flight. The Tranſyluanians, who by chance were euen then comming thither, purſuing them, ſlew diuers of them, and tooke ſome others of them priſoners. At this ſiege the Baſſa of TEMESVVAR himſelfe was mortally wounded, and Hamat Sanzacke of GIVLA with diuers others of good place ſlaine, & foure thouſand of the common ſouldiors. M The cauſe of the Turkes ſo great and ſudden feare was this, Whileſt the Baſſa of TEMESVVAR lay at the ſiege of LIPPA, as is aforeſaid, they that were left in the citie fearing no harme, liued in great ſecuritie; in the meane time the Gouernour of LVGAZ ſent out ſix thouſand ſouldiors towards TEMESVVAR, now in the abſence of the Baſſa to ſeeke after bootie; who comming to TEMESVVAR, with great ſpeed rifled the ſuburbs of the citie, ſlew all the Turks they could light

vpon

A vpon, and ſet at libertie a thouſand captiues: and ſo hauing truſſed vp their bootie, ſet on fire all the ſuburbs, and departed. Which fire grew ſo great and ſo terrible, that it was plainly ſeene into the campe at LIPPA, making a ſhew as if the whole citie had beene on a light fire. Which ſo daunted the hearts of the Turkes at the ſiege, that they preſently fled (as is before ſaid) leauing all that they had behind them.

Plenia a towne of the Turkes ſacked by the Chriſtians.

The Tranſyluanian all this while buſied in raiſing of his armie, and prouiding of things neceſſarie for the maintenance of his warres, was come into the confines of HVNGARIE, towards TEMESVVAR, euen as the Turkes fled from LIPPA. At which time certaine Hungarian Heidons that ſerued him, getting ouer Danubius, not farre from NICOPOLIS tooke PLENIA, a little towne of the Turkes, which they ranſacked and burnt, and hauing ſlaine in the countrey
B thereabout aboue three thouſand of the Turks, returned with a rich prey vnto the prince.

Cliſſa lately ſurprized by the Chriſtians, loſt againe to the Turkes.

Not long before the Chriſtians had ſurprized CLISSA, a ſtrong frontier towne of the Turks in DALMATIA, not far from SPALATO: which towne the Baſſa of BOSNA ſought now againe to recouer, and thereto layed hard ſiege: for the reliefe wherof, Leucowitz gouernour of STIRIA and the other prouinces thereabouts belonging to the houſe of AVSTRIA, and the gouernour of ZENG, with a fleet of two and fortie ſhips, wherein they had embarked foure thouſand ſouldiors well appointed, with all things neceſſarie ſet forward toward CLISSA: and by the way lighting vpõ a gallie of the Venetians, bound with certain warlike prouiſion towards the Turks campe, tooke her as good prize, and rifled her. This fleet with a faire wind arriued at SIRET, neere vnto TRAV, where the gouernour landing his men, marched that night part of his way to-
C ward CLISSA, and all the next day lay cloſe. The night following they ſet forward againe, and hauing marched fifteene miles, came vnto the enemies campe before day: where ſetting vpon the Turkes in their trenches, fearing no ſuch perill, they brought ſuch a generall feare vpon the whole camp, that the Turks as men amazed fled ſome one way, ſome another, euery man (as in ſuch ſudden feare it commonly happeneth) making ſhift for himſelfe, leauing whatſoeuer they had in their trenches behind them. The Chriſtians contented ſo to haue put their enemies to flight, fel preſently to the ſpoile, as more deſirous therof, than by the haſtie purſute of their enemies to put thẽſelues in poſſeſſion of an aſſured victory. Which the Turks quickly perceiuing, and from the hills with the dawning of the day diſcouering the ſmall number of the Chriſtians, and how they were diſordered, they gathered themſelues again together, and comming downe, D encloſed on euery ſide the diſordered Chriſtians (greedily hunting after the ſpoyle) and ſlew them downeright. Leucowitz himſelfe with the gouernor of ZENG and ſome others got into CLISSA: where hauing ſtaied two daies, and doubting to be able to keep the towne, they ſecretly by night iſſued out with 600 men, in hope to haue recouered their fleet: but the Turks ſuſpecting ſuch a matter, had ſo beſet the paſſages, that of all that companie Leucowitz had much adoe himſelfe with three others to eſcape. The enemie now againe poſſeſſed of his trenches, laid ſtraighter ſiege to the towne than before: which they of the garriſon perceiuing, and now out of hope of reliefe, agreed with the Baſſa, that they might with bag and baggage depart; and ſo yeelded vp the towne. Thus CLISSA, one of the ſtrongeſt townes of DALMATIA, through the greedie couetouſneſſe of the diſordered ſouldiors, fell againe into the hands of the Turks.

Sombock taken by the lord Palfi.

E About the ſame time, Palfi gouernour of STRIGONIVM vnderſtanding of the meeting together of certaine notable aduenturers of the Turks at SOMBOCK, a caſtle almoſt in the mid way betwixt ALBA REGALIS and BVDA, raiſed the greateſt ſtrength he could, and ſo with certain pieces of artillerie, and other things neceſſarie for an aſſault, ſet forward from STRIGONIVM the two and twentith of May before the riſing of the Sunne, and about three a clocke in the afternoone came to the aforeſaid caſtle, whereunto he preſently gaue a moſt terrible aſſault; which he neuer gaue ouer vntill he had taken it: For after that he had by the ſpace of three houres together with great danger maintained a moſt deſperat aſſault, at length he with much difficultie preuailed, and put to the ſword all the Turkes he found therein, man, woman, and child; and with the reſt, fiftie Ianizaries but that day come thither. This caſtle was of great beautie, and
F moſt pleaſantly ſituated, whereunto the Baſſa of BVDA oftentimes for his pleaſure repaired: for which cauſe Palfi was very deſirous to haue taken it without ſpoyling: but the fire he had therein alreadie raiſed, ſo preuailed, that it burnt downe all the goodly buildings thereof, with great ſtore of victuals and other prouiſion, nothing remaining, but what the Chriſtians had ſaued for themſelues.

The

Temeſwar beſieged by the Tranſyluanian prince.

The Tranſyluanian prince hauing raiſed a great armie for the relieſe of LIPPA, being by great chance a little before his comming relieued, came and layed ſiege to the citie of TEMESVVAR: where he had not long lien, but that the Turks and Tartars fearing to looſe that ſo famous a citie, aſſembled together from all places thereabouts, to the number of fortie thouſand, and ſo came to raiſe the ſiege. Of whoſe comming the prince hearing, riſe with his armie, and went to meet them, and had with them a great and terrible battell, the victorie for a great while ſtanding very doubtfull, yet ſeeming to encline rather to the Turks and Tartars, than to the Chriſtians: but at length the Turks diſordered with the great artillerie, and the Tranſyluanians charging them afreſh, began to giue ground, and ſo at laſt to betake themſelues to plain flight. In this battell were ſlaine of the Turks and Tartars fiue thouſand, and of the Chriſtians fifteene hundred. It was for a time reported, that the prince himſelfe was in this battell ſlaine, which was not ſo, being reſerued to the further plague of the Turks, and comfort of his afflicted countrey. After this victorie he returned again to the ſiege, which he more ſtraightly continued than before, leauing nothing vnattempted that he could poſſibly deuiſe for the winning of the citie. Where whileſt he yet thus lay battering the citie both night and day, newes was brought him, That Giaffar Baſſa and the Tartars were comming with a great armie to the reliefe of the beſieged: whereupon hee conſidering his owne ſtrength and the power of his enemies, and that the aid promiſed him both from the Emperour and out of HVNGARIE, was not yet readie, with great griefe of mind raiſed his ſiege, and retired with his armie to LIPPA, there expecting new ſupplies as well of his owne as from his friends. Whileſt he yet there lay, he was certainely aduertiſed, That the Baſſa of NATOLIA, the forerunner of the great Sultan Mahomet, was come to BELGRADE with foureteene thouſand horſe and foure thouſand Ianizaries to ioyne with the Baſſa of BVDA for the relieuing of TEMESVVAR; whoſe forces ioyned together, were in number about threeſcore thouſand: and that Mahomet himſelfe, of whoſe comming riſe report had been all this yeare, was now comming after with a farre greater power. Whereupon he departed from LIPPA, leauing therein a ſtrong garriſon, and ſo returning to ALBA IVLIA, called there an aſſembly of all his ſtates, for the repreſſing of ſo puiſſant an enemie.

The prince raiſeth his ſiege.

Mahomet for the better ſucceſſe of his warres in HVNGARIE had drawne forth the Tartar with a mightie power: who although he was at the firſt ſo vnwilling to that ſeruice (conſidering the great loſſes he had therein before receiued) that he would not as he ſaid ſend ſo much as one Aſſe thereunto: yet ouercome with great gifts, and the reſpect he had of the Turkiſh Sultan, was now ready with a ſtrong armie vpon the frontiers of MOLDAVIA to meet him in HVNGARIE: vnto whom the late choſen Vayuod ſent certain preſents with ſuch ſtore of victuals as he could poſſibly prouide for him. Yet for as much as he was not that way to paſſe without the leaue of the Polonian, Mahomet had both by letters and diuers his embaſſadours entreated with the Polonian king for his paſſage: as alſo for the confirmation of the auncient league hee and the Polonian kings his predeceſſours had to their good of long time had with the Othoman emperors; from which he well knew the Chriſtian Emperour, with diuers other Chriſtian princes to ſeeke by all meanes to withdraw him. Mahomet alſo not ignorant how hurtfull and dangerous the confederation betwixt Michael the Vayuod of VALACHIA and the Tranſyluanian was vnto him and his deſignes, ſent vnto him an embaſſador, by the ſhew of great dangers to deterre him from the Tranſyluanian, and by many glorious promiſes to allure him to ſubmit himſelfe againe vnto his protection, and in token of his fidelitie to deliuer vnto the Sultan two of his frontier townes, ſuch as he ſhould require: in regard whereof he ſhould together with the Sultans fauour receiue golden mountaines. Whereunto the Vayuod anſwered, That as yet he was not wearie of the friendſhip he held with the prince: and for the townes he required, that they were not in his power to giue, as belonging to the prince; vnto whom he ſaid he would write, and ſtay the embaſſadour in the meane time vntill he had from him anſwere.

The Emperour on the other ſide had with all carefulneſſe ſo farre as in him was, prouided that his armie might be readie to take the field with the beginning of the Spring: but as it commonly chanceth, the ſpeedie proceedings of great actions (wherein the hands of many mightie is required) to be much hindered by delaies, ſometimes of one, and ſometimes of another; ſo fell it out with him now: for albeit that his owne forces were in ſome good time readie, yet was the Spring, yea and a good part of Summer alſo farre paſt, before the aid promiſed from other princes met together. At length after long expectance, when ſome conuenient number for an armie

A armie was from diuers places come togither at VIENNA: they were by the lord Swartzenburg and their other commaunders brought forth into the field, and not farre from ALTENBVRG encamped, within the selfesame trenches that were the last yeare cast vp by countie Mansfeld for the safetie of his armie; there to expect the comming downe of the great ordinance and other prouision by the riuer from VIENNA, as also the rest of the Christian forces dayly looked for. From ALTENBVRG the Christian armie remoued to KOMARA, and not staying there long, the foure and twentieth of Iuly marched towards VACIA, otherwise called WOCZEN: but before it came thither, the Turks hearing of the approach of the Christians, forsooke the towne, and with their cattel and best part of their substance fled to PESTH, carying also away with them the great ordinance; the greatest whereof they buried by the way, which was neuertheless afB terwards found out by the Christians. And although the Turkes at their departure had set fire both vpon the town and the castle, yet the Christians left therein did what they might to quench the same: by whose diligence and the helpe of two thousand footmen, and certaine troupes of horsemen sent thither by Swartzenburg, a great part both of the towne and the castle was preserued: the whole armie of the Christians following after, encamped in the open field, and with their horsemen braued the Turks euen to the gates of PESTH. This so sudden a comming of the Christians, brought a great feare both vpon them of PESTH and BVDA; insomuch, that they sent their wiues and children, with the chiefest of their substance downe the riuer vnto places of more safetie, and farther off from danger: which was done so disorderedly (as it happeneth in such common feares) that many of them for haft thrust one another into the riuer, and C so perished, Vacia abandoned of the Turks is taken by the Christians.

Hitherto in the former wars against the Turke, had Matthias bin Generall of the Christian armies: but now of late, Ferdinand the emperors vncle Countie of TIROL being dead, Matthias was by the emperor his brother preferred to the gouernment of that rich countrie and the prouinces thereabouts, not inferiour to some kingdomes; and Maximilian his younger brother appointed Generall in his stead: who departing from VIENNA in the latter end of Iuly, came into the campe the fourth of August, where he was by the lord Swartzenburg his lieutenant, and the lord Palfi, honourably and with great triumph receiued.

Now were the Christians threescore thousand strong, and hauing fortified VACIA, and therein placed a conuenient garrison, resolued by common consent to besiege HATVAN, a D strong towne of the Turkes in the vpper HVNGARIA. And thereupon rising with their armie from VACHIA the thirteenth of August, came the fifteenth of the same month about noone and sate downe before the towne; and that with such speed, that they were before seene of the Turks in the towne, than that they heard any thing of their comming: insomuch, that at the first shew of them, they of the towne tooke them to haue beene some come out to seeke after bootie; and therfore sallying out vpon them, skirmished with them a while, vntill they perceiued the whole battell comming. The Christians approching the towne, encamped themselue, as they thought most conuenient, and began in three places to batter the counterscarfe. This frontier towne of the Turkes, besids that it was kept with a strong garrison, was also strengthened with a broad ditch, and fortified with a broad counterscarfe and strong palisadoes. Whilest the Christians E thus lay at the siege, the Turks sallying out of the towne brake into their trenches, and there did great harme, and like ynough they were to haue done more, had not the horsemen in good time come in vpon them and enforced them to retire. In this sally, amongst others was one Greis a notable captaine slaine, being shamefully forsaken of his owne men; who for that their cowardise, were all in the sight of the whole armie disarmed, and so turned out of the campe as men vnworthie any longer to beare armes. One morning also as the Christians were at their deuotions in their trenches, a Turkish priest frome out of an high tower not far off, railed most bitterly vpon them, cursing and deriding them: wherewith one of the Christian canoniers much moued, made a shot at the tower, which he so well bestowed, that therewith he stroke downe the tower togither with the idolatrous priest, as he was yet rayling and blaspheming. At length the F Christians had with exceeding labour and continuall batterie made the town faultable; wherewith the Turks discouraged, offered (but all too late) to yeeld vp the towne vpon the same conditions, that they of STRIGONIVM had: whereunto they receiued no answere, yea commaundement was giuen throughout the campe, that no man vpon paine of death, should haue any parley with them. Shortly after all things being now in readines for the assault, the Christians one day about fiue a clocke in the afternoone, assaulted the towne in foure places; and after three houres hard fight, by strong hand tooke it, with the scriching and lamenting of the women and children, and other fearefull people, who now gaue themselues all lost and forlorne. G

Extreme cruelitie.

Foure houres execution was done vpon all that came to hand, without respect of age, sex, or condition: women were slaine great with child, and young children hanging at their mothers breasts, it booted not to crie for mercie, the bloudie sword deuouring all. The furie of the Wallons here exceeded, who ript the children out of their mothers wombs, and made thongs and points of the skins of men and women, whom they had slaine quick. Which their crueltie they afterwards excused when they were therefore reproued, by pretending that thereby they did teach the Turks hereafter not so wickedly to blaspheme against Christ, or with such their wonted and barbarous crueltie to torment the Christians that fell into their hands, for feare of like themselues. In this assault & furie perished of the Turks about foure thousand, and of the Christians not past three hundred. In this towne beside that which the fire deuoured, was found a very rich prey. The first that entred the towne was one Terskie, a notable captaine with his companie: after whom followed Ruswurme, who each of them were thought in their entrance at the breach, to haue slaine with their owne hand eight or ten Turks. H

Mahomet the great Sultan commeth to Buda with an army of two hundred thousand.

Now in the meane time Mahomet the great Sultan being come to Belgrade, remoued thence to come down into the heart of Hvngarie, sending Cicala Bassa before him: and at length after long looking for, the second of September arriued at Bvda, hauing in his armie about two hundred thousand men, and three hundred field pieces. From thence he presently sent fortie thousand to Temesvvar; but staied there himselfe with the rest of his armie. I

The Christians yet lying at Hatvvan, and doubting least the Sultan suddenly passing the riuer should come vpon them not yet readie for battell; departing thence, and retiring backe againe, came and encamped not farre from Vachia. And albeit that the Archduke before his departure from Hatvvan, had left a conuenient garrison for the keeping of the towne; yet such was the terrour of the Turkes approach, that the next day after, they that were there left in garrison forsooke the towne, and setting it on fire, followed themselues after the campe. This comming of the Turkish Sultan to Bvda, brought also a great feare vpon them at Vienna, as much doubting least he should that way haue turned his forces, which caused them both day and night to labour for the better fortification of the citie, and for the prouision of all things, as if it had bin for a present siege. K

But Mahomet not prouided for the vndertaking of so strong a place, and not ignorant of the disgrace his great grandfather the victorious Solyman had sometime receiued vnder the walles thereof; had no purpose thereto, as hauing bent his thoughts quite another way. In the vpper part of Hvngarie is an ancient famous citie, well fortified and honoured with a bishops See called Agria, not farre from Hatvvan: Vpon this citie, as the chiefe fortresse of the Christians in those quarters, had Mahomet at his comming into Hvngarie cast his eyes, and began now that way to make head; with purpose by taking of that citie, and placing there of a strong garrison, to hinder the vniting of the emperours forces with the Transyluanians, for the mutuall strengthening of the one the other by the way of the vpper Hvngarie. Which the Archduke perceiuing, sent thither forthwith the valiant Colonell Terskie with a notable companie of Italians and Germanes, and a thousand other harquebusiers, who all arriued there in safetie. At which time also the lord Teuffenbach sent into the citie three thousand footmen, vnder the conduct of countie Turn, with good store of warlike prouision needfull for the defence therof. The one and twentieth of September, Mahomet attended vpon by the great Bassaes, Ibrahim, Giaffar, Hassan, and Cicala, for old Sinan was now dead, with his armie of an hundred and fiftie thousand men, came and encamped between the two riuers of Danubius and Tibiscus, couering a great part of the countrie with his tents. Approaching the citie, he with wonderfull celeritie cast vp fiue great mounts, and from them with such furie battered the wals, that the Christians were glad night and day to stand in armes for the defence thereof. And although that the wals were so great, and in many places so weakely fortified as that they were not but by a greater garrison to be defended against so puissant an enemie; and that therefore the defendants with their honour lawfully might euen the first day haue set the citie on fire, and retired themselues into the castle, which was both faire and strong, and the only place to be trusted vnto; yet for the space of sixe daies they worthily defended the whole citie against the furie of the enemies, and out of it did L M

A them great harme. But ſeeing the danger greatly encreaſing, and that the citie was not longer to be holden, they ſet it on fire; hauing before conuaied all the beſt of their ſubſtance with themſelues into the caſtle: which the Turks quickly perceiuing, brake ſo ſuddenly into the citie, as if they would togither with the Chriſtians haue entred the caſtle alſo; but in the attempt thereof they were notably repulſed and many of them ſlaine. Adioyning to the caſtle was a great and ſtrong bulwarke, againſt which the Turks for certaine daies furiouſly thundred with their great ordinance, and that without intermiſſion: and hauing in diuers places ſore ſhaken it, in the ſpace of two daies aſſaulted it twelue times, but not without the wonderfull loſſe of their men: and yet gaue it not ſo ouer, but as men with their loſſe more enraged, came on againe with greater furie than before. and ſo at laſt by plaine force tooke it: and there put to the ſword all them they
B found therein, except ſuch as by good hap got betimes into the caſtle. This bulwarke thus loſt, the Chriſtians the next day ſallying out, againe recouered; wherein they ſlew a great number of the Turks, with the loſſe of ſome thirtie men, and as many moe wounded. The beſieged now diuers times both by letters and meſſengers craued aid of Maximilian the Generall, giuing him to vnderſtand, that they could not long hold out for want of ſhot and pouder, if they were not betimes relieued (whereof the enemie alſo was not ignorant) yet were they reſolued to hold it out euen to the laſt man; although the great Sultan had oftentimes by meſſengers ſent of purpoſe, willed them to yeeld it vp, with promiſe that they ſhould in ſafetie with life and goods depart, otherwiſe threatning vnto them greater extremities than was of late ſhewed vnto the Turks at HATVVAN, if they ſhould as obſtinat men hold it out vnto the laſt. Whereunto they neuer
C anſwered him any thing: for Terskie had forbid them all parley with the enemie; and in the middeſt of the market place had cauſed a paire of gallowes to be ſet vp, threatning to hang him thereon, whoſoeuer he were that ſhould once make motion of yeelding vp the citie.

A bulwarke twelue times aſſaulted in two daies.

Whileſt the beſieged thus liue in hope of reliefe, the Archduke vpon the comming ouer of the Sultan towards AGRIA, hauing retired with his armie to STRIGONIVM, and there ſtayed ſomewhat too long expecting the comming of more aid: began now at length to ſet forward, and to make ſome ſhew as if hee had indeed purpoſed to haue relieued his diſtreſſed friends ſo hardly beſet at AGRIA. But ſuch was the foulenеſſe of the weather, hindering the paſſage of his great ordinance (not to ſpeake of any thing elſe) that in fourteene daies he marched ſcarcely twelue miles forward. Whereby the enemie tooke occaſion to preuaile as he did in his ſiege:
D who now hearing of the comming of the Chriſtians, and ſeeing to how little purpoſe he had ſo long battered the caſtle, conuerted all his endeauours to the filling vp of the ditch of the old caſtle, with fagots, earth, and ſuch like matter: for the haſtening of which worke, Mahomet himſelfe ſpared not to ride vp and downe in all places of his armie, with his preſence and cheerefull ſpeech encouraging his men in that deſperat worke. But whileſt the Turkes are thus buſie in fulfilling his commaund, the Chriſtians ſallying out vpon them made great ſlaughter of them, and put to flight Ibrahim the great Baſſa with ſuch as were about him: after whom they ſo eagerly followed, that he in the flight loſt his tulipant for haſt, and was there very like to haue bin taken. Neuertheleſſe the worke went ſtill forward, and was now at length with the reſtleſſe labour of ſo great a multitude brought to ſuch perfection, that the Turkes thought it now no
E great matter by aſſault to enter the caſtle: and therupon the tenth of October gaue vnto it foure deſperat aſſaults one vpon another, being ſtil with great ſlaughter of his men repulſed. But comming on againe the fift time with freſh ſupplies, and greater furie than at the firſt, they preuailed; and ſo entring, put to the ſword all they found in the caſtle, in number about eight hundred: foure hundred of whoſe heads, one of the Turks captaines cauſed to be caried vnto Mahomet in the campe, in the beholding whereof, he is ſaid to haue taken great pleaſure, as in the vndoubted ſignes of his victorie.

The old caſtle taken.

The old caſtle thus taken, nothing remained but the new caſtle, againſt which the Turks conuerted their whole forces, wherein they repoſed not ſo much hope, although their batterie were verie terrible and their power great, as in the ſecret mines wherewith they had in fourteene pla-
F ces vndermined the caſtle, and were now almoſt readie to bee blowne vp. Which the beſieged perceiuing, and withall conſidering the ſtate wherein they ſtood, and not hearing any thing of reliefe; reſolued amongſt themſelues (without the conſent of their chiefe commaunders) no longer to hold out, but to yeeld. And thereupon altogither as if it had beene but one man, riſe vp in a mutinie againſt their two Gouernours, Paul Niari and Terskie; who at the firſt by all the reasons they could deuise, dissuaded them from such cowardise, putting them in mind of the G oath they had taken: which not preuailing, they afterwards vpon their knees requested them as men to hold it out yet a while, in hope of speedie reliefe: yea Terskie with his hands cast vp entreated them, that if they would no longer hold it out but needs yeeld, then they should first kill him with their owne hands, that he might not liue to see so great a dishonour. But what auaileth persuasion with men possessed with so great feare? And in the meane time two hundred and fiftie of the common souldiors, amongst whom were many Italians, secretly escaping out of the castle fled into the campe, of whom diuers became renegats and turned Turke; which added to the former feare, so much discouraged the minds of the rest, that they forthwith required to come to parley with the enemie, and so agreed, That they might with bag and baggage & their swords Agria yeelded vnto the Turkes by their sides in safetie depart: the great Sultan giuing his faith for the performance thereof, H with hostages deliuered on either side. So the thirteenth of October about noone, the garrison souldiors came out of the castle in number about two thousand: but they were not gone farre, but that they were in a great plaine set vpon by the Turks and Tartars, and there cut in pieces;

some of them were slaine quicke, and some other of them otherwise shamefully dismembred;
the Turkes in the meane time vpbraiding them, and saying, That faith was not to be kept with them that had so cruelly before dealt with them of HATVVAN. This perfidious dealing much offended diuers of the better sort of the Turks, insomuch, that some of them complained thereof vnto the Sultan; who (as is reported) caused some of the chiefe authors thereof to be put to death: and afterward by open proclamation commanded, that if any of the Turks or Tartars had taken any of them prisoners, they should forthwith set them at libertie. Thus is the famous I citie of AGRIA, of long time a Christian bishops seat, now become a sure receptacle for the Turks and Infidels.

Petrinia besieged by the Turks Whilest Mahomet thus lay at the siege of AGRIA, the Bassa of BOSNA with certaine other of the Sanzacks thereabouts, hauing raised a great armie, came and besieged PETRINIA in the borders of CROATIA: which he at his first comming so furiously battered by the space of seuen daies, that it was of many thought not possible for it to hold out two daies longer. In the meane time the lord Herbenstein and Leukowitz, with all the power they could make out of CROATIA and WINDISMARCH, came towards PETRINIA: but hauing no meanes in so great haste to make a bridge ouer the riuer of Kulp, they retired towards SISEG there to passe ouer. The Turkes hearing of their retire, and supposing them to haue fled for feare, put sixe K thousand horsemen ouer the riuer to pursue them: vpon whom the Christians turning, and charging them home, ouerthrew them; and hauing slain many of them, draue the rest headlong into the riuer, where most of them perished. The Christians neuertheless keeping on their way to SISEG, there the next day by a bridge passed ouer the riuer, and so marching towards PETRI-NIA, and being come neere vnto the towne, were encountred by eight thousand Turkes, whom they also put to flight; and by certaine prisoners there taken, vnderstood that the Bassa the day Petrinia re-lieued. before was risen from before the towne and gone: which they at the first beleiued not, but comming thither found it so, to their owne good contentment, and the great ioy of the late besieged.

Maximilian the Generall marching on faire and softly from STRIGONIVM, at length the L seuenteenth of October came to CASSOVIA, foure daies after that AGRIA was lost; and there met with the Transyluanian prince, who was come thither with eighteene thousand men, and fortie field pieces to aid him: of whom eight thousand were mercinarie horsemen, fifteene hundred were of the nobilitie of his countrie, and the rest footmen. The next day after they setting forward from CASSOVIA, ioyned themselues with the rest of the armie led by the lord Teuffenbach and Palfi, and so of all their vnited forces made one armie, consisting now of two and thirtie thousand horsemen and eight and twentie thousand foot: who drew with them an hundred and twentie field pieces, and twentie thousand wagons, wherewith they euery night enclosed their armie as with a most sure trench. So orderly marching, they kept on their way towards M AGRIA, with a full resolution to giue the Turks battell, whereof the whole armie seemed to bee very desirous. By the way at length they came to a faire heath two miles long and foure broad, where they were to passe ouer a certaine riuer, the passage whereof Giaffar Bassa had before taken with twentie thousand Turkes and Tartars, the rest of the Turkes armie lying still not farre from AGRIA. Now the purpose of the Bassa was, to haue enlarged the passage of the riuer, and so

A ſo to haue made way for the whole armie, to haue afterwards paſſed vnto the other ſide, as moſt commodious for many purpoſes, eſpecially for water, whereof they ſo might themſelues haue had plentie, and yet kept the Chriſtians from it. But of this his purpoſe, by the comming of the Chriſtians he was quite diſappointed: for the next day being the three and twentith of October, they skirmiſhed with him in diuers places, eſpecially at the paſſage of the riuer, where at the firſt encounter he loſt three hundred of his men, & in the end ſeeing himſelfe too weake to withſtand the whole power comming on, fled to the Sultan, hauing loſt two of his enſignes & twentie field pieces, but of his men not many, both for that he fled betime, and the approch of the night hindered the purſuit of the Chriſtians, who were now become maſters both of the paſſage of the riuer, and of the place where the Baſſa lay: which they finding not ſo commodious for them as
B they had at the firſt ſuppoſed (eſpecially for lacke of wood, the weather then being extreme cold, as alſo hearing of the approch of the Sultan with his whole armie) they forthwith forſooke the ſame, & retired againe ouer the riuer to the place where they lay before, encloſing themſelues with their waggons, as if it had been a citie ſtrongly encloſed with wooden wals. The next day, which was the foure and twentith of October, towards night, Mahomet with all his armie ſhewed himſelfe vnto the view of the Chriſtians, and ſent three thouſand Tartars to paſſe the riuer: of whom the Chriſtians ſlew a great number with their great ſhot, and put the reſt to flight. Both the armies were populous and ſtrong, and couered a great deale of ground, a moſt goodly ſight to behold: both drunk of the ſame riuer, as well the men as their horſes, and therefore kept continuall watch all that night on both ſides of the riuer, eſpecially at the paſſage. In the morning
C betwixt ſix and ſeuen a clocke, Mahomet with his armie ranged in order of battell, came within ſight of the Chriſtians, his ſquadrons as it were couering all the countrie on that ſide of the riuer as farre as the Chriſtians could well ſee; and now againe ſent part of his armie ouer the riuer: with whom the Chriſtians skirmiſhed from morning till night, both the armies parted but by the riuer, all this while ſtanding faſt, and as it were facing the one the other. But being at length on both ſides well wearied, and many ſlain, the Turks retired againe ouer the riuer to the campe: in the meane time (as if it had bin by conſent) they reſolued on both ſides the next day to trie the fortune of a battell, and ſo commaundement was giuen through both the armies, for euery man againſt a certaine appointed time to make himſelfe readie. So the next day, being the ſix and twentith of October, Mahomet brought forth his armie againe out of his campe, which D was not farre from the Chriſtians; and began now to draw downe towards the riuer. Neere vnto this place were the ruines of an old church, where Mahomet placed certaine companies of Ianizaries, and foure and twentie field pieces, and commanded ten thouſand of his ſelect ſoldiors to paſſe the riuer, which they readily did. The Chriſtians alſo readie for battell, and now thinking it time vpon the comming ouer of the enemie to begin; with part of their armie thereunto appointed, ſo fiercely charged the Turkes that were alreadie come ouer, that they quickly ouerthrew them, and not them onely, but certaine companies of Tartars alſo that were in another place came ouer the riuer: and not ſo contented, but following them they had in chaſe, put to flight them alſo that ſtood on the further ſide of the riuer, of whom they ſlew a great number, and by the comming on of the reſt of the armie tooke from them an hundred and ninetie great
E pieces of artillerie: whereof ſo great a feare riſe in the enemies campe, that Mahomet with Ibrahim the great Baſſa ſeeing the diſcomfiture of the armie, fled in all haſt towards AGRIA, ſhedding ſome teares by the way as he went, and wiping his eyes with a piece of Mahomets garment, which he for reuerence carried about him as a relique. It drew now towards night, & the Archduke was about to haue cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, and that day to haue done no more. But the Tranſyluanian prince, the lord Palfi, and the reſt, perſuaded him in that ſo great feare of the enemie to proſecute the victorie; and the rather, for that the Turks began againe to make head, and to repaire their diſordered battels. Wherefore the Chriſtians ſtill keeping their array, charged afreſh the front of their enemies reſtored battell, conſiſting of fortie thouſand men, and that with ſuch violence, as that they in ſhort time had ſlaine the moſt part of them, and put the reſt to F flight: and with the like good fortune charging the bodie of the maine battell, forced the diſcouraged Turkes with great ſlaughter into their owne campe. Now commaundement was before giuen throughout the Chriſtian armie, that no man vpon paine of death ſhould in ſeeking after ſpoile breake his array, or forſake his place, before the victorie were aſſuredly gotten. But they in this hot purſuit breaking togither with the Turks into their tents, & there killing a great number of them, and seeing in euery place great store of rich spoile, contrarie to the aforesaid commandement, left the pursuit of the enemie, and disorderly fell to the spoile of the tents, vntill they came to the very tent, of the great Sultan. But here began all the mischiefe, with a most sudden change of fortune. For here these greedie disordered men, not now worth the name of soldiors, light vpon a strong squadron of resolute men, with good store of great ordinance readie charged, which they discharged amongst the thickest of their enemies, and rent in sunder a number of them, and after that came on resolutely themselues: when in the meane time Cicala Bassa with his horsemen yet vntouched, brake in vpon them also, and with the terrour of his comming brought such a feare vpon them, that they began a maine to flie, especially the Hungarians and Germanes, most busied in the spoile. Neither could they in that feare, by any threats or intreatie of their commanders be perswaded to make a stand, or so much as once to looke backe, or to shew any token of true valour: which their hastie flight was the ouerthrow not of themselues onely, but of others also that would haue fought: for whilest they fled headlong vpon the spur, and could not be staied, they ouerran their owne footmen, and so furthered the enemies victorie. Thus for want of good order, through the greedie couetousnes of a sort of disordered men the most notable victorie that euer the Christians were like to haue had ouer the Turks, was let slip out of their hands. Many noble gentemen and commanders, in seeking to stay the flight of their owne men, were here slaine: and although the enemie followed the chase scarce halfe a mile, yet were the Christians possessed with such a feare, that they fled amaine all ouer the countrie with greater shame than losse, no man pursuing them. The Archduke himselfe seeing all desperat, fled to CASSOVIA. The Transyluanian of all others most orderly retired himselfe towards TOCAII, hauing not lost in this battell aboue two hundred men, and of them neuer a man of name. All this losse he imputed to the couetousnesse of the Hungarians, and cowardise of the Germane horsmen. The lord Bernstein hauing charge of the great artillerie, fled also, and made shift for himselfe, as did Palfi, and in fine all the rest. Neither was the feare lesse amongst the Turkes (a wonderfull thing to be spoken) than it was amongst the Christians: for the night following they for feare of the return of the Christians, trussing vp the best of their things, fled also towards AGRIA. And it was afterwards knowne, that the Turks great ordinance, tents, and baggage stood three daies in their trenches, either altogither vnguarded, or so slenderly guarded, as that they might haue bin easily taken by the Christians, if they would but haue made head again. Yea Mahomet himselfe is reported oftentimes to haue confessed the danger & feare he was then in to haue bin taken, and all his armie destroied, if the Christians had (as they should) pursued the victorie, and not so basely run after the spoile: by which danger he then warned, afterwards euer shunned to aduenture his person to the like perill in the field. In this battell of KARESTA (for so it is of a place thereby called) and at the siege of AGRIA were lost of the Christians about twentie thousand, and of the Turks threescore thousand. Mahomet after this victorie fortified AGRIA, and for the keeping thereof left in it 10000 souldiors, and so returned to BELGRADE.

The Christians in seeking too greedily after the spoile, ouerthrown and discomfited.

Twentie thousand Christians slaine, & three-score thousand Turke.

The Bassa of BVDA perswading himselfe that the Christians after so great an ouerthrow could not this yere to any purpose recouer their strength, came with all the power he was able to make, and the fourth of Nouember besieged VACIA, in hope to haue easily carred it: but finding there greater resistance than he had before imagined, and hearing that the dispersed Christians in the vpper part of HVNGARIE were making head for to come to the relefe of the towne, he more afraid than hurt, brake vp his siege, and so returned to BVDA: for indeed the dispersed reliques of the late armie of the Christians were drawing togither, but vnarmed and vnseruiceable, as hauing in the late flight shamefully cast away their armes, and therfore could haue done the Bassa small harme if he had continued the siege.

Vacia besieged by the Bassa of Buda.

Mahomet thinking it honour ynough for him to haue thus woon AGRIA, and driuen the Christians out of the field, diuided his armie into two parts at BELGRADE: wherof the one he billetted in the countrie thereabout, to be readie for all euents; and with the other he returned to CONSTANTINOPLE: but by the way he was set vpon by Barbelius Ianuschi the Transyluanian princes lieutenant, and the Vayuod of VALACHIA, who with a great power both of horse and foot being got ouer the riuer Danubius, and secretly fauored by the countrie people, lay in ambush for him in places of aduantage, and still following in the taile of his armie, cut off 7000 of his men before he could be rid of them: and so with much trouble arriued at length at CONSTANTINOPLE, where we will for this yeare leaue him, vntill we heare of him more.

Maximi-

A Maximilian with a ſmall retinue arriued at VIENNA in the latter end of Nouember, where he found the Vicount of BVRGAVV, Swartzenburg, with ſome other of the commaunders of his late armie; moſt of the reſt, eſpecially the Italians being ſlaine. The ſmall remainder of this vnfortunate yeare was ſpent with often skirmiſhes and inrodes one into anothers frontiers, as the manner of war is, without any other great thing done worth the remembrance.

Rodolph the Chriſtian emperour, notwithſtanding the late diſcomfiture of his armie not farre from AGRIA, made choice againe of his brother Maximilian the Archduke, for the managing of his forces for his next yeares wars againſt the Turke. Whereunto the Pope by his legate Fran. Aldobrandino promiſed of his owne charge to ſend ten thouſnd Italians, vnder the conduct of the duke of MANTVA: as did alſo the Germane princes their wonted aid, with ſome others: All
B which ſlowly at length meeting together neere vnto POSSONIVM and ALTENBVRG, in the moneths of Iuly & Auguſt, departing thence, marched to PAPPA; which after eight daies hard ſiege they tooke, and ſo againe retired to ALTENBVRG, where they tooke a generall muſter of the armie: and afterwards in the beginning of September ſhewed themſelues before the ſtrong town of RAB: where the lord Bernſteine approching too neere the wals, was with a ſhot ſlaine. Neuertheleſſe the reſt there ſtaied, vntill that hearing of the comming of Mahomet Baſſa the Turks Generall with a great armie, they left the ſiege, and the foure and twentith day of September paſſing ouer the riuer Danubius into the iſland SCHVT towards KOMARA, there on the North ſide of the riuer encamped. Neither went things this yeare better forward with the Chriſtians in other places than in this ſide of HVNGARIE. For Sigiſmund the Tranſyluanian prince by his Chancellour beſieging the D ſtrong citie of TEMESVVAR in October, was by the valour of the defendants and the vnſeaſonableneſſe of the weather enforced to raiſe his ſiege, and with diſhonor to depart. Michael alſo the Vayuod of VALACHIA, who mooued with the example and perſuaſions of the Tranſyluanian prince, had reuolted from the Turkes, and done them great harme (as is in part before declared) now wearied with their often inuaſions and the ſpoile of his countrey, almoſt brought to vtter deſolation, many thouſands of his ſubiects being by the Turks & Tartars caried away captiues; and his townes and caſtles for the moſt part raſed, to giue his people a time of breathing, ſubmitted himſelfe againe vnto the Turkiſh obeiſance, ſolemnely receiuing at the hands of one of the Turkes Chiaus (for that purpoſe ſent from CONSTANTINOPLE) an enſigne in token of his ſubmiſſion vnto the Turkiſh emperour, as alſo of his fauour towards him. Which the more to aſ-
E ſure him of, he by another honourable meſſenger ſhortly after receiued from Mahomet the Turkiſh emperour more kind letters than at any time before, with the confirmation of the Vayuodſhip of VALACHIA, by the graund ſignior his ſolemne oath vnto Michael the Vayuod and his ſonne Peter, then about thirteene yeares old, for the tearme of both their liues, without diſturbance, paying but the halfe of the old yearely tribute by the Turkes before demanded: ſo glad they were vpon any condition to haue reduced that martiall man with his countrey vnto their obeiſance: and in token of further grace together with theſe letters, he receiued alſo a goodly horſe, moſt richly furniſhed, with a faire ſcimitar and an horſemans maſe, in ſigne of the martiall power and gouernment committed vnto him by the great Sultan Mahomet. All which goodly gifts and honours the Vayuod ſeemed thankfully to accept: neuertheleſſe not daring too far to caſe ſo do for feare of the Tartars moſt horrible incurſions,and the ſpoiles of his countrey: yet G knew he right well how that they were by the great Sultan his expreſſe commaundement charged not to do any harme either in MOLDAVIA or VALACHIA, as they went into HVNGARIE. But this warie Vayuod not greatly truſting either the Sultan or them,as alſo loth himſelfe a chriſtian to goe againſt the Chriſtians his friends and late confederats,excuſed himſelfe by the neceſſarie care he had of his ſubiects and country,and ſo requeſted that his reaſonable excuſe to be in good part of the great Sultan accepted: but of him more is to be ſaid hereafter. Thus paſſed this yeare without any great thing done more than is before declared, both theſe great princes,the emperour and the Turkiſh Sultan, being warned by the laſt years worke what it was to put all to the fortune of a battell: and therfore now contenting themſelues to haue ſhewed their forces,as not 1598 afraid one of the other,countenanced this yeares wars with greater ſhewes than deeds. H

What great things might by the Chriſtian princes at vnitie amongſt themſelues bee done againſt the Turks,is by the conſiderat right eaſily to be gathered: but eſpecially by the notable victorie of the famous Tranſyluanian prince Sigiſmund,who confederated but with his poore oppreſſed neighbors the Valachians and Moldauians, and ſtrengthened with ſome ſmall aid from the emperour and the Hungarians, not only deliuered thoſe three countries from the heauy burthen of the Turkiſh thraldome,but vanquiſhed alſo their moſt renowned captaines, ouerthrew their mightie armies,burnt and ſpoiled their countries,raſed their townes and cities, which as it hath bin in part before declared,ſo if it ſhould be all particularly ſet downe,beſide that it would be tedious, ſo alſo might it happily ſeeme almoſt incredible. Beſide which calamities of warre (commonly more felt of the ſubiects than of the prince)the great Sultan himſelfe found no ſmal I

But this ſo wholeſome a confederation,to the great hurt of the chriſtian commonweale and benefit of the Turks,now broken,and MOLDAVIA by the Polonians diſſeuered from the reſt, and again made tributarie vnto the Turk(as is before declared)and now VALACHIA alſo in a ſort acknowledging the Turks obeiſance,the noble Tranſyluanian prince,who hitherto with great cheerfulneſſe and K

All this while continued the Diet of the empire,begun in December laſt paſt at RATISBONE, Matthias the emperours brother being there his deputie,and in his maieſties name demanding a greater

A greater aid for the maintenance of his warres againſt the Turke the common enemie, than was by the princes and ſtates of the empire offered: where after great and long deliberation, a large proportion was by them all agreed vpon for the defraying of the charges of thoſe wars and defence of the Chriſtian commonweale, to be paied in three yeares next, and ſo thereupon was the aſſembly diſſolued. But as they were returning home, behold contrarie to all hope, RAB one of the ſtrongeſt fortreſſes of Chriſtendome, three yeres before betrayed vnto the Turks by countie Hardeck, was now by the wiſdom and valour of Adolphus Baron of Swartzenburg, the Emperors lieutenant in the lower HVNGARIE, againe recouered, to the great griefe of the Turks, and wonderfull reioycing of the Chriſtians, in ſuch ſort as followeth.

This noble gentleman the lord Swartzenburg of no leſſe corage than experience, then lying at
B KOMARA, and ſtill in doubt leaſt the Turks ſo neere vnto him at RAB, ſhould attempt ſomething againſt him and his charge, prouided for his owne defence all that Winter time with a ſtrong garriſon, keeping continuall watch and ward, although it were as then no time for the enemie with any armie to keepe the field. So Winter paſſing and the Spring approaching, it fortuned that the two and twentith day of March about ſeuen a clocke in the night, the gates being ſhut, were heard neere vnto the wals of the towne two men, who by their ſpeach ſeemed to be Italians: with great inſtance requeſting, for the ſafegard of their liues to be let in, for feare of the enemies purſuit. Which by one of the Sentinels was forthwith reported vnto the Gouernor; who doubting it to be ſome ſubtile practiſe of the enemie, commaunded them there to take their fortune vntill the morning: at which time they were receiued into the citie, and being brought be-
C fore the Gouernour, proſtrating themſelues forthwith at his feet, pitifully requeſted him to haue compaſſion of their miſery, and to comfort them with his charitable reliefe, that ſo they might at length returne againe into their countrey: who at the firſt asked them, what countrey men they were? and from whence they came at that time of the night? Whereunto they anſwered, That they were Italians, and that they had but euen then eſcaped out of the cruell hands of the Turkes at RAB. But deſiring to know of them ſome newes, they after their manner humbled themſelues, ſhewing by their geſture not to know any; yet would he needs vnderſtand of them the particularities, when and how they were taken by the Turkes, and the meanes they had vſed to eſcape out of that cruell ſeruitude, in all order as had befallen them. Where the younger of them beginning, told him, That now almoſt two yeares ago, at ſuch time as the Chriſtians were D ouerthrowne by the Turkes vnder AGRIA, and euery man in that confuſion then ſeeking the beſt and neereſt way to ſaue themſelues: they hauing by flight now eſcaped the greateſt danger of the enemie, and ſo trauailing ouer the countrey towards VIENNA, were to their great misfortune (by an hundred Turks come out of RAB to ſcoure the countrey, and to ſeeke after prey) taken priſoners, and as ſlaues committed to the chaine, where they had almoſt two yeares vntill now, with great patience ſerued. Theſe two fugitiues by their outward appearance, ſeemed to be men of good ſpirit and valour, which cauſed the Gouernour to be more deſirous to know of them the meanes they had vſed for their eſcape. So the yonger proceeding in his tale, gaue him to vnderſtand of the whole matter, telling him, That they had bin three months before ſtill carefully deuiſing how to recouer their loſt libertie, which now ſeemed to make ſome offer of it ſelfe
E vnto them: For that ſince the time that the emperours armie riſe the laſt yeare from before the towne, they were not kept ſo ſtrait, or looked vnto as before, but lay as men by the Turkes not much regarded: which cauſed them the more cheerfully to take the offer of the time, and to reſolue either the ſooner to die, or to ſet themſelues at libertie. And that ſo one day as they were carying certaine munition from the pallace of Giaffer Baſſa for the ſouldiors, they ſecretly conuaied three pieces of coard of ſome reaſonable bigneſſe, therwith by night to let themſelues downe from the wall, & ſo as they might to eſcape: which ſtolne coard that it ſhould not be ſeen, and ſo their purpoſe ſuſpected, they buried in the ground. But the night being come for them to effect in what they had ſo long deſired, and they roaming vp and downe in the darke, and ſtill finding one let or other, they were enforced for that time to ſtay, and to deferre it vntill the night follow-
F ing: which being come, and choiſe made of a moſt conuenient place, they made faſt the coard aboue, and ſo thereby ſlid downe, firſt the elder, and then the younger; who not knowing how to ſwimme, was yet by the good direction and helpe of his fellow conducted ouer vnto the farther ſide of the broad and deepe ditch: and that ſo, in the night (ſo darke as that one of them could hardly ſee the other) they were come by chance to KOMARA, thinking to haue taken the way to VIENNA. The Gouernour thus fully inſtructed of their eſcape, demaunded of G them farther, how the ſtrong towne of RAB was by the Turks gouerned and guarded: who told him verie euill, and with ſmall care, eſpecially ſince the departure of the emperours campe: and alſo, that foure gates of the towne were filled vp with earth, which if they were broken open, would all fall into the towne ditch, and ſo further them that would attempt to enter: with diuers other particularities. Whereof the Gouernour hauing well conſidered, thought with himſelfe, that if by ſome ingenious deuice hee might by night with ſome good ſtrength vpon the ſudden enter the towne, it might happily be ſo againe recouered. Vpon which ſo great a deſignement he thought good to conſult farther with the lord Palfi, whom he requeſted in all haſt and with as much ſecreſie as was poſſible, with 1600 foot and as many horſe as he could make, to come vnto him to KOMARA. Who vpon the aduertiſement ſo giuen ſtaied not, but preſently giuing or- H der vnto his men, ſet forward by night, and the ſix and twentith day of March before day with 1400 foot, and 120 horſe arriued at KOMARA; where they were all ioyfully receiued, and the gates after they were entred, againe faſt ſhut, and ſo kept for feare of the enemies ſecret ſpies, of whom no man can be too wary, be he neuer ſo wiſe. Now whileſt theſe ſoldiors were refreſhing themſelues, in the mean time the Gouernor with the lord Palfi diſcourſed to the full concerning the entended enterpriſe: which reſolued vpon, they found themſelues vpon the view of their men to haue two thouſand ſix hundred foot of the garriſon ſouldiors, and three hundred horſe, all good and couragious men, and well appointed for the entended ſeruice: who there ſtaying had caused to be brought from BVDA, with great store of shot and pouder and other small pie- G ces, and meale sufficient to haue serued foure thousand men for a yeare and a halfe, but of wine (little vsed of the Turkes) onely foure vessels. In the Bassaes palace was also found of armour and weapons of all sorts, great store, with abundance of cloth and apparell, which was all giuen in spoile to the souldiors. Thus RAB, one of the strongest fortresses of Christendome, not full foure yeares before besieged by Sinan Bassa with 150 thousand men, by the space of almost of three months, and then at length by the treason of the Gouernour to him betraid; was now in one night, by the valour and policie of a few resolute men to their immortall glorie againe restored to the Christian common-weale, the nineteenth day of March in the yeare 1598. Of which so notable a victorie, the Christians reioyced not a little both in HVNGARIE and elsewhere: the great Sultan with the Turkes in the meane time no lesse grieuing and storming, as H well for the losse of the towne before got with no small charge, as for the death of his people there slaine, to the number of about six thousand and moe, with the losse of scarce six hundred Christians.

A great tumult betweene the Ianizaries and the Spahi.

Yet for all this Mahomet the great Sultan ceased not to make great prouision for his wars in HVNGARIE, and that greater than before; and so with greater furie also, to prosecute his wrathfull indignation, to be reuenged vpon the Christians. Whereunto order was giuen vnto Ibrahim Bassa his brother in law, and Generall of his armie, with all conuenient speed to take the field: which for all that fell out farre otherwise, for that now thinking to haue had all things in good forwardnesse, a great dissention rise betwixt the Ianizaries and the Spahi: the Ianizaries being the best footmen, and the Spahi the best horsemen of the Turkish empire; both the faith- I full keepers of the person of their prince, and the greatest strength of his state: whereby it commeth to passe, that in setting forward towards the wars, these two sorts of valiant souldiors, the one standing vpon their strength, and the other vpon their honour, and both iealous of their reputation and credit, haue no good liking of one the other, but oftentimes, and especially of late in this corruption of their martiall discipline vnder their degenerat emperors, fall at ods among themselues, as now they did, to the great hinderance of their affaires, & trouble of their Generall. Insomuch that to appease this tumult, he was glad to put to death certain of the insolent Ianizaries, refusing to set forward as they were by their Aga commanded. But proceeding farther, and thinking to haue executed some others of them also, to the farther terror of the rest; hee was by them and their adherents put in such feare of his life, that to auoid the present danger, he was glad K to excuse himselfe by his lieutenant, laying all the blame vpon him as the cause therof: who was therfore as a sacrifice deliuered vnto the fury of the Ianizaries, by whom he was there presently slaine, with some others of the Bassa his followers. So these broiles with much adoe ouerpast, Ibrahim hauing taken a generall reuiew of his army at SOPHIA, there staied, expecting order from the great Sultan where to begin his wars, in HVNGARIE or in TRANSYLVANIA (for as yet that was in question:) which could not well be before the beginning of Iuly, by reason of the scarcitie of victuals euen then arising in the camp: for the supplying wherof Mahomet himselfe had no small care. But this long delay was the cause that a great number of the Ianizaries comming from HADRIANOPLE, and hearing by the way that the Generall would not as yet set forward, not knowing the cause of his stay, and doubting to bee deceiued of their promised entertainment, L were about to haue returned back againe: which known at the court, commandement was presently sent thence vnto the Generall, without longer stay to set forward toward HVNGARIE, which the more hastened his departure with his armie.

In this the Turkes so long delay, the Christians had good leisure to prepare their new forces, being now the latter end of Sommer: for well they might thinke that the enemie slept not, knowing what prouision hee had made as well in CONSTANTINOPLE as in other places. Wherefore reasonably doubting, that Sommer well spent, and August now at hand, hee would not so late turne his forces into the lower HVNGARIE, they thought it best to prouide for the safetie of the vpper countrey: And to the end that the enemie approching those frontiers might there find forces readie to encounter him, the lord George Basta, a man of great experience and M valour, was appointed lieutenant Generall for that countrey; to the great contentment of the souldiors in generall, all shewing themselues most readie at his commaund. The lord Swartzenburg in the meane time remaining in the lower HVNGARIE at RAB, with eight thousand good souldiors: and the Archduke Matthias at VIENNA for the dispatch of George Basta, and the

A the haſting of him forward: for that the vpper HVNGARIE to the great hurt thereof began now to feele the incurſions of the Turks and Tartars: beſides that, he was afterwards to returne himſelfe to ſpeake with the emperour his brother, ſtill expecting a Chiaus of the Turkes by the appointment of the grand ſeignior, ſent by the way of POLONIA for PRAGE, to intreat with the emperor concerning a peace.

They of BVDA in the mean while ſeeing the delay of the Turks, of whom not one band yet appeared in thoſe quarters; and on the other ſide perceiuing the great preparation of the Imperials, and the great garriſon at RAB ſo neere at hand; began now to doubt ſome new reſolution of the Chriſtians: wherein they were no whit deceiued; for no armie of the Turkes being then in field in the lower HVNGARIE, and the countrey plaine and open, the lord Palſi with a conue- Buda beſieged by the Chriſtians.
B nient power & certain pieces of batterie ſet forward to attempt the enterpriſe, and the ſixteenth of October with ſixteene pieces of artillerie began to batter the citie of BVDA, to the great feare and diſcomfiture of them within: hauing firſt taken the fort S. Gerarde, with hope to haue gained the reſt alſo. For which cauſe, the men, the women, and all that dwelt in the citie, moſt inſtantly beſought the Baſſa, not to endure the deſtruction of the ſame, with the inhabitants and wealth thereof altogither; but being not able long to hold out againſt ſo furious a batterie, in time to hearken vnto ſome reaſonable compoſition, that ſo they might yet euery man at leaſt with life depart. Whereunto the Baſſa for all that would not hearken, but put them ſtill in hope that they ſhould be preſently relieued. Howbeit the batterie ſtill continuing, and they not able longer to endure the force of the Imperials, nor any reliefe yet comming, they were glad at
C length to abandon the citie with the loſſe of two thouſand of the Ianizaries, and but three hundred of the Chriſtians ſlaine, and eight hundred hurt: the reſt of the Turkes at the ſame time retiring themſelues into the caſtle, where they might for a ſpace deeme themſelues ſafe. So the lord Palſi poſſeſſed of the citie, with all his forces laid ſiege vnto the caſtle, which although it were in ſome places ſhaken with the continuall furie of the cannon, yet were the defendants ſtill readie to make good the ſame: inſomuch, that Palſi vpon good hope of ſucceſſe giuing thereunto a generall aſſault, was by their valour enforced to retire; they within in the meane time with great labour and induſtrie repairing the breaches and gaules made by the artillerie. So that Palſi conſidering the difficultie of the aſſault, thought it better by vndermining to ſhake the rock whereon the caſtle ſtood, than by a new aſſault to expoſe ſo many worthie men vnto ſo mani-
D feſt a danger: which his purpoſe by the enemie diſcouered, was by them alſo by countermining diſappointed: yet for all that were the Chriſtians ſtill in good hope by another mine not yet by the enemie perceiued, to ſort to the full of their deſire: and the more, for that they ſaw not ſo much brauerie, or ſhew of courage in the defendants as before. Who now kept themſelues ſilent and quiet, as if they had bin conſulting about the yeelding vp of the caſtle, as men bereft of all hope of reliefe and ſuccour; the Chriſtians being now poſſeſſed of a ſtrong abbey and fortreſſe faſt by, and hauing broken downe all the bridges ouer the riuer Danubius, in ſuch ſort, as that the beſieged could not receiue any reliefe either by land or water. But foraſmuch as the time of the yere began now to grow tedious, & the Winter weather ſharp, the Chriſtians thought it not beſt there long to protract the time; and therfore reſolued to preſent vnto the caſtle another
E generall aſſault, and at the ſame inſtant to blow vp the mine: but in giuing this aſſault, they were againe repulſed with the loſſe of two hundred men. At which time alſo a number of the Turks ſallying out of the caſtle, couragiouſly encountred the Chriſtians, but not with ſucceſſe anſwerable to their valour, being there almoſt all cut in pieces: neither did the mine take the deſired effect, but being blowne vp did little or no harme at all. So that the Chriſtians wearie of their long ſuffering of the extremitie of the weather, and withall conſidering the great courage of the defendants, were euen vpon the point to haue riſen: yet willing to giue a freſh attempt by the mine, they began againe to worke in the ſame, and in hope to preuaile began to parley with the defendants about the giuing vp of the caſte, but all to little or no purpoſe; for that the mine hauing taken no effect, the ſouldiours could hardly be drawne on through the deepe and muddie
F ditches, to giue a new aſſault. In fine, ſeeing no hope to preuaile, and hearing alſo of the com- The Chriſtians depart from the ſiege of Buda.
ming of a great armie of the Turks for the reliefe of the beſieged, they raiſed their ſiege, and at their departure burnt their ſuburbs, carrying away with them a great bootie: and ſo retiring towards STRIGONIVM, expected farther direction where to winter. the next Spring to take the field, or as occaſion ſhould ſerue to be otherwiſe imploied.

But Sigiſmund the Tranſyluanian prince in the mean time repenting himſelfe of the vnequall exchange he had made with the emperour, in diſguiſed apparell haſting in poſt out of SILESIA came to CLAVSENBVRG in TRASYLVANIA: and there ioyfully receiued of his ſubiects, and taking of them a new oath of obedience, by meſſengers ſent of purpoſe certified Maximilian the Archduke (appointed by the emperour for the gouernment of TRANSYLVANIA, and now vpon his way as farre as CASSOVIA) of the cauſes of his returne, perſuading him rather to conuert his forces againſt the Turkes for the recouerie of AGRIA, than to trouble himſelfe to come any farther for TRANSYLVANIA, now againe by him to the great contentment of his ſubiects repoſſeſſed: as did alſo the princeſſe his wife (Maximilian his couſin german) wiſhing him to H conſider what hurt and diſhonour he ſhould do vnto the emperour his maieſtie, himſelfe, the Roman empire, and the whole Chriſtian common-weale in generall, if in ſo dangerous a time hee ſhould attempt any thing againſt the prince her huſband, and vnto him by her ſo neerely allied.

Veradinum beſieged by the Turkes.

Now the Turks great armie being come into the vpper HVNGARIE, lay encamped vnder the wals of the ſtrong citie of VERADINVM, where that worthie captaine George Baſta was lieutenant Generall for the emperour: but not hauing ſuch ſtrength, as without farther helpe to goe againſt ſo mightie an enemie, or to relieue the beſieged citie, not as then furniſhed with a ſufficient garriſon, he gaue knowledge thereof vnto Maximilian the Archduke, who (as is aforeſaid) with a conuenient power was but a little before come to CASSOVIA; to haue gone into TRANSILVANIA, I had he not there by the way beene ſtaied by embaſſadours from the prince Sigiſmund but lately before returned out of SILESIA; and hauing againe taken vpon him the gouernment, by theſe his embaſſadours requeſted him no farther to trouble himſelfe with that iourney, offering to giue him aid againſt the Turkes whenſoeuer he ſhould require it. The beſieged neuertheleſſe in the meane time notably defended themſelues, and with certain braue ſallies did the enemie great harme; ſtill expecting, that Baſta the lieutenant, or the Tranſyluanian prince, or Maximilian the Archduke, or they all with their vnited forces ſhould ſend them reliefe: vnto whom they gaue knowledge the nineteenth of October, how that the Turkes with all the force and furie they had vſed, had as yet little preuailed, being by their valour ſtill repulſed, and with many ſharpe ſallies to their great loſſe encountred, and ſome of their great ordinance cloyed, in K ſuch ſort, as that they were in good hope to protract the time vntill they might by them their friends be relieued: yet not doubting, but that the Turkes according to their wonted manner, would do what they might to ſubdue them. According to whoſe expectation, the Tranſyluanian prince with a great power taking the field to haue relieued them, was letted ſo to do by the Tartars, to that purpoſe ſtirred vp by the Turks: ſo that he could by no means ioine his forces with Maximilian, for looking to the ſafetie of his owne people and countrie. Yet in token of forwardneſſe, he ſent certain companies of braue ſouldiors vnto the lieutenant Baſta: who vnderſtanding that of two thouſand good ſouldiors in garriſon in the citie at the beginning of the ſiege, there were ſcarce ſeuen hundred left aliue; all the reſt being with continuall aſſaults ſlaine or mortally wounded, vſed a notable ſtratageme to delude the enemie withall: for hauing put L

his men in good order, and comming brauely on, as if he would euen preſently haue ioyned battell (a thing which the Turkes moſt deſired) whileſt they likewiſe with great ſtirre were putting themſelues in order of battell, and wholly buſied therein, he by another way (of the Turks leaſt ſuſpected) cunningly thruſt into the citie eight hundred good ſoldiors; and that done, preſently retired againe into his trenches, wherein he ſtrongly encamped feared not all the Turkes forces: who thinking euen then to haue come to a day of battell, and ſtill in vaine expecting the ſame, returned deceiued by this fineneſſe. And ſo ſhortly after (enforced by contiuall foule weather) raiſed their ſiege, not without great difficultie & danger (reliefe lying ſo neere at hand, and the defendants ſtrengthned with new ſupplies) to haue beene longer maintained. So paſſed the troubles of this yeare, with no gaine but great loſſe of the Turks: who at their departure enforced by the vnſeaſonablenes of the weather and feare togither, left behind them in their trenches M many tents, with ſome great pieces of artillerie, being not able to conuay the ſame by water to BVDA: and withall fearing greatly to be encountred by the forces of Baſta, ſtrengthned with new ſupplies euen then ſent vnto him from the emperour.

The

A the ſix and twentith of october with all his armie, before deuided into three parts, but now againe vnited, came into the plaines neere TEMISON, about three leagues from HARMENSTAT: where vnderſtanding that his lieutenant corrupted by Ibrahim Baſſa, had promiſed to kill him; and now well aſſured thereof, to rid himſelfe of that danger, with his owne hands preſently cut his throat, and ſo diſpatched him. When by and by after came vnto him the Popes Nuntio, ſent by a fineneſſe from the Cardinall, accompanied with another embaſſadour, the better to countenance out the matter, telling him, that the ſame embaſſadour had commiſſion from the emperor, to will him forthwith to deſiſt from armes, and without further delay to depart out of TRANSYLVANIA. Which thing ſeeming vnto the Vayuod very ſtrange and almoſt impoſſible, hee deſired to ſee the ſaid commiſſion. Whereunto the Nuncio before inſtructed, anſwered, that he
B had left it with the Cardinall himſelfe: but I (ſaid the Vayuod) haue one here preſent from the Emperour of another purport, which I purpoſe fully to put in execution: yet was he for that day entreated by the Nuncio to ſtay his armie. And ſo in the meane time lying both ſtill, and in great ſuſpence, the Vayuod deſired to know of the Nuncio the cauſe why the Cardinall forgetting himſelfe, ſo troubled that countrey, by intruding himſelfe thereinto, to the great preiudice of them vnto whom it of better right belonged, not attending vnto the gouernment of the church, better beſeeming his calling than the managing of armes, to the diſturbance of the chriſtian peace. Whereunto he receiued no anſwere. So the eight and twentith of October, a day dedicated to the commemoration of the Apoſtles Simon and Iude, theſe meſſengers were ſent backe againe vnto the Cardinall: who preſently returned them back vnto the Vayuod with new
C inſtructions (being then buſie with his yong ſonne, in ſetting his men in order of battell, preſently to goe againſt the Cardinall:) of whom they could get no other anſwer, but that he was reſolued forthwith to come vnto the triall of a battell with him. So the two armies lying encamped not paſt a quarter of a league the one from the other, and the ſame day meeting together, ioyned a moſt terrible and cruell battell, which for the ſpace of fiue houres was with ſuch deſperat obſtinacie fought, as if they had euerie man vowed to haue carried away the victorie ouer his enemie, or there to haue left themſelues dead vpon the ground; vntill the Cardinals people at length ouercome in a long and bloudie fight, were there vtterly ouerthrowne: amongſt whom were thirtie thouſand Turks and Tartars, ſent vnto him from Ibrahim Baſſa the Turks Generall. The cardinall himſelfe ſeeing the diſcomfiture of his armie, was by ſome reported to haue ſaued
D himſelfe by flight: but by ſome others was ſaid to haue beene drowned in paſſing a riuer, as he fled from the Valachians that had him in chaſe. But the truth was, that the Vayuod now maſter of the field, ſent out certaine troups of horſemen diuers wayes ſtill to purſue him: and himſelfe with the reſt of his armie proſecuting the victorie, came to the Cardinals campe, now by the Tranſyluanians and Turkes quite forſaken, wherein he found fiue and fortie pieces of artillerie, with great ſtore of coine and wealth, beſide a number of tents and horſes, all which became vnto him a prey. From thence he marched vnto ALBA IVLIA, where hee was with great ioy receiued of his friends and confederats there: for though the greater part of the Tranſyluanians, eſpecially the nobilitie, had together with the Cardinall ſubmitted themſelues vnto the Turkes protection, and followed his enſignes: yet were there diuers others alſo, who ſtill fauoured the em-
E perour, and therefore reioyced not a little of this victorie. The Vayuod after that ſent his lieutenant to CLAVDIOPOLIS, to ſee if they would yeeld alſo: which they willingly did, with many other cities and caſtles in diuers parts of that countrey, which hauing none to reſt vpon, now yeelded alſo: in ſuch ſort, that ſhortly after all TRANSYLVANIA ſubmitted it ſelfe againe vnto the emperours obeiſance, and ſwore vnto him obedience: moſt of the nobilitie of that countrey being either ſlaine in the battell, or afterwards put to death by the Vayuod: amongſt whom were fiue, which corrupted by the Cardinall, had before vndertaken to kill him. Now the foureteenth of Nouember, after diuers reports of the Cardinals eſcape, his vngratious head was for all that preſented vnto the Vayuod, which to the terrour of others, being for a while ſet vp in ALBA IVLIA (where he but a little before had commaunded as a prince) was afterwards taken
F downe, and ſent for a preſent from the Vayuod vnto the Emperour and the Archdukes his brethren; his headleſſe bodie being afterward by the commaundement of the Vayuod honourably buried in a monaſterie at ALBA IVLIA, in the ſame tombe he had before made for his brother, beheaded by his couſin Sigiſmund Bathor. The Cardinals treaſure alſo fell into his hands, which was ſaid to haue beene three millions of gold. Thus the countrey of TRANSYLVANIA, latelie before before by the Cardinall yeelded vnto the obeiſance of the Turke, was againe by this worthie Vayuod recouered, and reſtored vnto the Chriſtian empire; the proud Cardinall caſt out and brought to confuſion, hauing not yet poſſeſſed theſe his new honours full eight moneths. His couſin Sigiſmund, the late Tranſyluanian prince, who almoſt all this while had ſtaied at BORVSIA, and in diſguiſed apparell ſeene DASNKE, and diuers other the free cities therabouts, now hearing newes of the Cardinals ouerthrow, ſecretly got him away from thence into POLONIA to ſeeke againe his new fortunes. The lord Swartzenburg at the ſame time vniting his forces in the lower HVNGARIE with them of STIRIA, and now twentie thouſand ſtrong, ſought by all meanes to reduce ſo many places vpon thoſe frontiers as he could vnto the emperors obeiſance, & ſo tooke in aboue two hundred villages. But afterward thinking to haue ſurpriſed the ſtrong caſtle of CAPISVAR, and by night ſecretly approching one of the gates with a Petarde, which tooke not the expected effect, hee was diſcouered by the watch, and ſo by the garriſon ſouldiors (now raiſed with the alarum) repulſed, and inforced to retire with the loſſe of about an hundred men, and diuers others wounded, all men of good account: in reuenge whereof Swartzenburg afterwards ſent out diuers troups of horſmen, which ſcouring all ouer the countrey as far as SIGETH, burnt it alſo, and ſo returning, caried away with them a great bootie. G H

Ibrahim Baſſa hearing of this ouerthrow of the Cardinall, with all the forces he had ſent him, much troubled therewith, ſent newes thereof in poſt to CONSTANTINOPLE: the brute whereof brought a general feare vpon the whole citie alſo, inſomuch that commiſſion was forthwith ſent vnto him from the great Sultan, giuing him power (if it might be) to come to ſome honourable peace with the emperour, and to bring it with him to CONSTANTINOPLE: whither hee was ſhortly to returne, being now no longer time to keepe the field with his armie, which beſide the cold ſeaſon of the yeare, ſuffred great want of bread, the plague alſo then raging therin with the death of many his beſt ſouldiors both horſe and foot, beſide the wonderfull mortalitie of their cattell alſo: in ſuch ſort, that the ſouldiors not able longer to endure the famine & wants increaſing, fell to robbing of one another, and ſo at length into mutinie; wherein diuers of them being ſlaine and cut in pieces by their fellows, the reſt for the moſt part brake in ſunder of themſelues, and ſo by diuers waies returned home, not well truſting one another. So that nothing more was now done with the great preparation of the Turkes, their armie being diſcomfited with wants and the euill ſucceſſe of their affaires, as well in HVNGARIE as in TRANSYLVANIA. Neither did Ibrahim the great Baſſa for the reliefe of thoſe euils, at his returne bring any concluſion of peace vnto his great lord and maſter, as was commonly expected.

Now beſide theſe troubles of TRANSYLVANIA and the other reuolted countries, Cuſahin (or as ſome call him Caſſan) the ſonne of one of the Sultaneſſes, brought vp in the Seraglio according to the manner thereof, and hauing long ſerued in the wars of PERSIA and HVNGARIE, and ſo at length made Baſſa of CARAMANIA, a man of great ſpirit, and not able to endure the imperfections he daily ſaw in the Othoman empire, and the cowardiſe of the graund ſignior; vpon the report of the euill ſucceſſe of the affaires of HVNGARIE on the one ſide, and the deſire he ſaw in the Perſians to recouer their loſt fortreſſes on the other, and grieued alſo with more particular wrongs concerning himſelfe; as a man altogether diſcontented, reſolued to take vp armes: and calling vnto him his ſouldiors, and (as he was a well ſpoken man) laying before them the deformities of the preſent ſtate, gallantly perſuaded them with the promiſe of honour, ſoueraignetie, and rich rewards, what an eaſie thing it were to chaſe the grand ſignior out of ASIA, and to ſet themſelues with all that part of the empire at libertie. And ſo euen at the firſt hauing woon vnto him three thouſand harquebuſiers, and fiue thouſand horſmen, tooke the field to the great hurt of the Turkes, and trouble of the ſtate. A ſtrange matter in that tyrannicall empire. The newes whereof comming in poſt to the Court, commiſſion was forthwith directed vnto foure of the Sanzakes of ASIA neereſt vnto him, for the ſpeedie ſuppreſſing of that rebellion but euen then ariſing. Whereof Cuſahin vnderſtanding, and that they with ten thouſand horſe and foot were comming to oppreſſe him: without farther ſtay went couragiouſly to meet them, and ſo encountring of them, ouerthrew them with a great ſlaughter, and tooke from them their baggage with ſix pieces of great ordinance. And after with his people ſeized vpon all the caſtles thereabouts, giuing whatſoeuer he found therein for a prey vnto his ſouldiors: who alſo much enriched themſelues with the ſpoile of the Iewes, as the people whom they moſt hated, and neuer reſted vntill he had made almoſt all the countrey of CARAMANIA his owne. After that he L M

A the Spaniards in the lower ſide of GERMANIE) which made him the more to dread the enemies comming, who he knew after his accuſtomed manner would that Summer appeare in the field with a farre greater number. But to haue holpen this want, the great duke of MVSCOVIE about this time, by his embaſſadours amongſt other things requeſted leaue of the Polonian, for fortie thouſand horſemen to paſſe through his countrey, which horſemen he had determined (as hee ſaid) to ſend in aid of the emperour againſt the Turke. Which his requeſt the Polonian would by no meanes graunt, as dangerous to his eſtate. wherefore the Muſcouite offended with the Polonian, ſent other his embaſſadours vnto the emperour by ſea: who embarked in an Engliſh ſhip in the port of S. Nicolas, and ſayling about the kingdomes of SVVEDEN, NORVVAY and DENMARKE, after long trouble at ſea, at length arriued at STOAD, and ſo from thence by land
B trauelling to HAMBOROVV, LVBECKE, and MAIDENBOROVV, and in euery place honourably entertained, came at laſt vnto the emperour into BOHEMIA, then lying at PLISENA, for that the plague was then hot at PRAGE: where they hauing with great ſtate deliuered their perſents and letters of credence vnto the emperour; had audience, and were by him moſt honorably vſed. Yet the Polonian hauing thus denied the Muſcouite paſſage, ſuffered the Turks embaſſadour, who called himſelfe Gabriel a Iew, to paſſe through his countrey vnto the emperour, to entreat with him of a peace to be made betwixt him and the Turk. Which Gabriel comming to PRAGE as embaſſador from the great Turke, and hauing no letters of credence to ſhew for his negotiation (for that they were, as he ſaid, vpon the way taken from him by the Polonian Coſſackes, and certaine of his retinue ſlaine) was there taken for a ſpie, and ſo ſent to VIENNA:
C where at his firſt arriuall he was well vſed in a common Inne: but the night following being taken in his chamber by the Martiall, was ſo clapt faſt in priſon, with as many yrons vpon him as hee could beare, and all his followers with gyues vpon their legs compelled as ſlaues daily to worke in the towne ditch.

About this time alſo Sigiſmund the Tranſyluanian prince (whom hitherto all men admired as a man euen ſent from heauen, for the benefit of his country and of the Chriſtian commonweale) by a wonderfull change gaue a moſt manifeſt token of a diuers and vnconſtant nature, to the great wonder of the world: For hauing broken the agreement made with the emperour the laſt yeare, and being ſecretly in poſt returned out of SILESIA into TRANSYLVANIA, and againe taken vpon him the gouernment (as is before declared) and hauing withall requeſted himſelfe
D and the Tranſyluanians his countreymen to be diſcharged of the oath of obedience & loyaltie by them before giuen vnto the emperour, and the citie of VERADINVM, with the country thereabout, to be againe reſtored vnto him; and the emperour pauſing thereupon: did now (doubting of his own abilitie for the keeping of that countrey) in the beginning of this yeare 1599, by his embaſſadours the Biſhop of ALBA IVLIA, and Stephen Paſchai his Chauncellour, ſent of purpoſe vnto the emperour, requeſt him to haue the firſt agreements againe renewed, and the principalitie of TREBNITZ in MORVIA, to be added vnto the two dukedomes of OPPELL and RATIBOR in SILESIA, with fiftie thouſand duckats to be yearely paied vnto him out of the chamber of the empire: and a generall pardon to be giuen vnto all the Tranſyluanians, that following him had of late reuolted from the emperour, and their auntient liberties to be againe vn-
E to euery one of them confirmed. With all which conditions obtained at the emperours hands (as of him that ſaw how needfull it was for him by any meanes to keepe that ſtrong countrey in his power) the ſame embaſſadours with their diſpatch returned from PRAGE the nineteenth of Aprill.

But Sigiſmund in the meane time at home, was entred into new conceits with certaine of the Polonian nobilitie, farre differing from the former agreement with the emperour: and hauing ſent for one of the Turks Chiaus from CONSTANTINOPLE; and for his couſin Andrew Bathor the proud Cardinall out of BORVSIA, and ſo meeting with them in an obſcure village in the confines of TRANSYLVANIA, towards POLONIA, accompanied with certaine of the chiefeſt of the ſtates of his countrey: there in the preſence of the Polonians and of the Turkiſh em-
F baſſadour, reſigned all the right and title he had in the countrey of TRANSYLVANIA, vnto the Cardinall his couſin, commaunding all the States there preſent to ſweare vnto him their obedience and fidelity who ſhortly after together with the Polonian embaſſadour ſent on of his eſpeciall fauorits to CONSTANTINOPLE, to deſire ſafe conduct for his embaſſadors to be ſent thither to conclude of all matters with the Turke. Which meſſengers ſo ſent, together with the Polonian embaſſador, were both courteouſly receiued in the Turks Court, and as with an eſpe- G ciall fauour rewarded with right ſumptuous garments, and charge giuen them, That the Cardinall within three months next ſhould ſend thither a ſolemne embaſſador, with the old accuſtomed tribute by the Turke demanded. Thus through the inconſtancie of the prince, the ambition of the proud Cardinall, and the foule colluſion of the Polonian, the countrie of TRANSYL-VANIA (one of the ſtrongeſt fortreſſes of that ſide of Chriſtendome) falling from the obedience of the emperor, and ſo in ſort bereft from the Chriſtian commonweale, became againe tributa-rie vnto the Turke; moſt good men deteſting the lightnes of the one, the ambition of the other, and the ſlineſſe of the third.

Now the Turkes of BVDA not able longer to endure the great famine therein, had moſt ear-neſtly requeſted reliefe from the other Turks their friends in HVNGARIE, who on all hands ran H to haue relieued them: but comming neere thereunto, could not put therein ſuch prouiſion as they had brought for the reliefe of the ſame, being letted ſo to do by the Imperials; who about a league off diligently attended euery motion of the enemie: from whence the lord Swartzen-burg in the night ſecretly approching one of the gates with his followers, thought with a Petrad to haue broken it open, and ſo to haue entred. Which his deuiſe taking not effect, as did that at RAB, the gate being within ſtrongly fortified by the enemie, he was enforced to depart, being alſo diſcouered by the Turks from the wall. Now ſhortly after the Baſſa of BVDA with ſix hunan ambuſh of the Haiducks, who after their maner fiercely encountered him, and putting him to flight, tooke him priſoner, his horſe in his chaſe falling vnder him: whom his ſouldiours ſee- I king to reſcue, there began a new skirmiſh, encreaſing their former ouerthrow with the loſſe of the greateſt part of them that were left: amongſt whom the Baſſa his ſonne, with the Aga of the Ianizaries, there loſt their liues alſo. Which conflict thus ended, the Baſſa was with ſafe conduct brought to the campe, and there with great threats enforced to reueale the ſtate of his citie, with other the ſecret deſignes of the Turkes. Whereupon the Haiduckes returned againe towards BVDA, ſeeking by all meanes to ſtop the comming of victuals thither, ſo in hope at length to haue gained the diſtreſſed citie. But whileſt they thus lay vpon the paſſages, behold newes was brought vnto them, how that the Baſſa of BOSNA, with the Sanzackes of SIGETH, QVINQVE ECCLESIÆ, and COPPAN, with ten thouſand Turkes were comming to oppreſſe them, and to ſo ſmal a force, ſtayed not for their comming but went to meet them; and in a place of good aduantage waiting for them, vpon their firſt appearance with great aſſurance and courage charged them, brake their array, and ſlew the greateſt part of them, togither with the Baſſa himſelfe: yet with ſo much adoe, as that had not the lord Palfi in good time ſent in vnto their aid certain companies of freſh men, it was not without cauſe doubted but that the Haiduckes had bin put to the worſe, about three hundred of them hauing there alreadie loſt their liues. The Tartars yet neuertheleſſe in good number held on their way towards BVDA, with purpoſe to haue ouerrun the countrie, and ſo haue withdrawne the Imperials from the citie: but for as much as that baſe nation was knowne to be good for nothing but to rob and ſpoile, the lord Swartzenburg his regiment only going againſt them, and encountrering them, ouerthrew them, in ſuch ſort, that part L of them being there ſlaine in fight, and part for feare driuen into Daunbie, the greater number of them there moſt miſerably periſhed.

Baſta the emperors lieutenant iu the vpper HVNGARIE at the ſame time lay at CASSOVIA with eighteene thouſand men, doubting leaſt the enemies armie, which he heard to be at hand, ſhould come to beſiege that citie. In the meane time Ibrahim Baſſa Generall of the Turkes forces, came to SOLNOCH with an armie of fiftie thouſand ſtrong, amongſt whom were ten thouſand Ianizaries: but for all that, vnderſtanding that Baſta nothing diſmaied awaited his com-ming at CASSOVIA, not thinking it good to goe any further (his ſouldiours being alreadie wea-rie with long trauell) neither yet ſafe there to ſtay ſo neere vnto his ſtrong enemie, retired backe againe to BELGRADE, a place of more ſtrength and ſecuritie; expecting a great fleet of ſhips, M which charged vpon the Danubius, were to bring victuals for the armie, as alſo for the reliefe of BVDA, ALBA REGALIS, and other ſuch diſtreſſed places, with diuers great pieces for batterie, and other leſſe artillerie vpon carriages, with a number of ladders and other inſtruments of war, declaring their purpoſe for the performãce of ſome notable exploit, all guarded with fiue thouſand

A ſand Turks, which conducted it vp the riuer. Of all which the imperials vnderſtanding, the lord Palſi diſpatched his lieutenant with a conuenient power, and the captaine of the Huſſars with his followers, all good and valiant ſouldiors, to cut off this conuoy: Who to make the matter ſhort, ſuddenly aſſailing them, and ſo comming to handie blowes, cut in pieces the conuoy, and rifled the ſhips, of whom the greater part were there ſunke in the deepe riuer; and ſo tooke an exceeding great bootie, deemed to be worth a million of gold: where amongſt other things of great value, there was found abourd an hundred thouſand dollars, which were all diuided amongſt the ſouldiors as a reward of their trauell. This great ouerthrow once knowne at BVDA, ALBA REGALIS, and the cities thereabouts, brought vpon them a great feare: yea the armie of Ibrahim grew thereby much diſcontented, as being at once diſappointed both of their victuals
B and their pay. Beſides that, the Imperials ouerran all the country therabout, ranſacking, ſacking, and deſtroying the country villages and caſtles without mercie, although the poore inhabitants offered them large contribution to haue ſtaied their furie, which would not be accepted. Vpon this notable ouerthrow alſo the lord Swartzenburg was determined with all his forces to come againe to the ſiege of BVDA, in hope in ſo great a diſcomfiture and want of victuals to haue had it deliuered vnto him; and for that purpoſe ſent for certaine great pieces of artillerie to VIENNA. But whileſt things went thus well in the lower HVNGARIE, colonell Rodoler of S. Andrewes in the vpper countrey, tooke occaſion alſo vpon this ouerthrow of the Turks with fiue hundred horſe and ſix hundred foot, to ſhew himſelfe with this ſmall company before AGRIA, hauing yet left the greateſt part of his forces a little off in ſecret ambuſh: Which ſmall companie the Baſſa
C of AGRIA beholding, preſently put himſelfe in armes, and ſo ſallying out, began an hot & braue skirmiſh: when ſuddenly the other ſouldiors left in ambuſh, ſtarting out and couragiouſly aſſailing their enemies, brake their order, & put them to flight, purſuing them at the heels euen to the gates of the citie: and had there been a greater force of footmen, it was verily thought, that the Turks (diſmaied with the flight, and altogether confounded) had abandoned the defence of the place, and the Chriſtians euen then become maſters of the citie, which had bin the cauſe of their notable ouerthrow in the yeare 1596. Neuertheleſſe they with great brauerie and ſmall loſſe retired, hauing ſlaine a great number of the Turks, and carrying away with them an hundred priſoners, with a bootie of fiue hundred horſe, and much other cattell.

The Turkes receiue a notable ouerthrow vpon the riuer of Danubius.

The free Haiduckes alſo ſtrengthened with new ſupplies, had done great harme in the coun-
D trey about BVDA, ſcouring freely all ouer it, finding none to oppoſe themſelues againſt them: for which cauſe the poore Chriſtians, which yet dwelt in that countrey, riſe vp againſt the Turks, promiſing their obedience vnto the emperour: and moreouer, to the intent they might be no more moleſted by the Imperials, offered to take vp armes themſelues againſt the enemie, and to the vttermoſt of their power to hinder his paſſage both by land & water. Theſe ſame Haiducks alſo had broken downe all the bridges which the Turkes had made betwixt BVDA and ALBA REGALIS, to the end they ſhould not that way commodiouſly bring either victuals or munition from the one place to the other. And the lord Palſi and Nadaſti vnderſtanding by their eſpials, That the Tartars diuided into three companies, had ouerrunne a great part of the countrey, and with a great bootie were retiring towards BVDA, preſently went out againſt them and enforced
E them to fight: which barbarous people, better inured to filch than to fight, there loſt all their liues, together with that they had before ſtolne. After which victory, theſe valiant men turning their forces againſt certaine other places of the Turkes thereby, tooke two of their caſtles with much rich ſpoile: which caſtles they ſacked and burnt, together with the great towne of ZOLNA, breaking downe alſo the bridge vpon the riuer Traua.

Now at this time the Turkes at BVDA held themſelues malecontent within the citie, hauing no Gouernour, their Baſſa being before taken by the Haiduckes, and they themſelues pinched alſo with great want of victuals. Wherefore doubting ſome ſudden attempt of the Chriſtians, as men diſmaied, they for their more ſafetie retired themſelues into the caſtle, a place of great
F ſtrength, leauing the citie vnto the Imperials then ready to haue beſieged it: but doubting of the Turkes great armie, which as they heard was marching thitherwards, the auauntguard thereof being come to MOATTESH, where Sartes Baſſa was alſo looked for; the report being giuen out, that the Turkes hauing relieued BVDA, would goe to beſiege CANISIA or elſe STRIGONIVM, they ſtayed to goe any farther, as men in doubt what to reſolue vpon. So were ſent certaine colonels and other captaines with their ſouldiors, to fortifie certaine paſſages whereby the

The Turkes for feare forſake the citie at Buda, and flie into the caſtle.

Turkes

The Christians vpō the approch of the Turkes great armie retire.

Turkes armie was to passe. The rest in the meane time retiring, for that the puissant enemie began now to approach; as also for that they knew the great desire that Ibrahim Bassa had to recouer againe STRIGONIVM, and had therefore sent a great number of Tartars to forrage and wast the countrey, and so suddenly hauing relieued BVDA & AGRIA, there to resolue whether to turne his forces. The Imperials in the meane time encamping neere vnto HATVVAN and ZOLNOK, to hinder the Turks from victualling of BVDA, as they desired, cut off fiue hundred of them at their first arriuall, who to that purpose were going towards BVDA; and tooke also one of the Turkes Chiaus prisoner: who sent from Ibrahim the Generall, was going to AGRIA, to put them in hope of their speedie relieſe. They also at the same time attempted to haue surprised ZOLNOK: where a good number of them with certaine Petardes approching the gates, in hope so to haue broken them open, being discouered by the watch, were inforced to retire, leauing fortie behind them slaine, and carying away with them many moe of their fellowes wounded: in reuenge whereof, the rest shewed their furie vpon the country therabout, destroying the villages, and intercepting a great deale of munition, which together with other victuals they met by the way as it was going to BVDA and AGRIA.

Summer now almost spent, Ibrahim the great Bassa in the beginning of September came to BVDA with an armie of an hundred and thirtie thousand strong, and from thence in the name of his great lord and master gaue the emperour to vnderstand at PRAGE, That for the sauing of further effusion of innocent blood, and not for any feare or distrust of his owne strength and power, he could bee content to hearken vnto some reasonable conditions or treatie of peace. Whereunto both these great princes (hauing well wearied themselues with these long warres, and exhausted their treasures) seemed not now vnwilling, expecting (as was thought) nothing more than for the honour to bee the first entreated: and the rather, for that the old Sultanesse, Mahomet his mother (whom by the weakenesse of her sonnes gouernment, such as neuer was in any the Othoman kings or emperours before, did beare the greatest sway in his affaires) seemed in what she might to further the same. Wherefore in the latter end of September a place was agreed vpon for a parley for peace, which was in an island in the riuer of Danubie beneath STRIGONIVM: whither the lord Swartzenburg, Nadasti, Palfi, and the bishop of VACCIA, being come for the emperour; and Amurath the Bassa of BVDA, with the lieutenant Generall of the Tartars, and some others for the Graund signior: the Turks at the first (after their vnreasonable manner) demaunded to haue RAB, STRIGONIVM, FILEK, SETCHIN, with all the rest of the townes and castles in fiue yeares before taken from them by the Christians, to bee now againe surrendred vnto them, with a certaine yearely tribute by the emperour to be payed vnto the great Sultan at CONSTANTINOPLE; as also there to haue his embassadour leiger continually attending vpon the Turkes Court: for which they offered to deliuer againe vnto the emperour the citie of AGRIA onely. All which their proud and vnreasonable demaunds being by the aforesaid commissioners on the emperours behalfe reiected, they were contented to come to some more reasonable talke, offering to leaue vnto the emperour RAB and AGRIA (whereof RAB was his owne alreadie) onely for STRIGONIVM, exchanging as it were STRIGONIVM for AGRIA. Which when it could neither be obtained, the parley was so broken off, and nothing concluded, and so the warres againe continued, without any memorable thing more this yeare betwixt them done, either on the one side or the other: the Christians contenting themselues to haue distressed the chiefe cities the Turks held in HVNGARIE, and the Turks no lesse apaied to haue relieued the same.

A parley for peace.

Machael the Vaynod with a great army entreth into Transyluania.

But whilest things thus passed betwixt the Christians and the Turks in HVNGARIE, Michael the Vayuod of VALACHIA, yet the emperours friend and confederat, and vnder his protection, certainely enformed his life to be sought after in the Turkes Court by the ambitious Cardinall Bathor his enuious neighbour, but lately become the prince of TRANSYLVANIA (as is before declared:) by commaundement from the emperour, and to be reuenged of so great a wrong, as also betimes to prouide for his own safety, with an armie of threescore thousand strong suddenly entred into TRANSYLVANIA, in most horrible manner burning the countrey, and killing the people before him as he went. Where whilest the Cardinall (who was thought to haue purposed to haue serued him in like sort, had hee not been by him preuented) was making head against him, he in the meane time had the citie of CORONA (commonly called BRASSO) with the strong castle of FOGARAS yeelded vnto him: from whence he marching toward ALBA IVLIA, the

A The Archduke Matthias, Swartzenburg, and the other commanders of the armie in the lower HVNGARIE, being twelue thouſand ſtrong, with the garriſon ſoldiors of RAB, STRIGONIVM, and KOMARA, in the meane time becauſe they would not ſtand idle, togither with the Hungarian horſemen, ouerran all the countrie thereabout euen vnto the gates of BVDA: in good hope alſo to haue met with eight thouſand Turks (as they were by their eſpials aduertiſed) comming towards PESTH with victuals for the reliefe of the caſtle of BVDA.

Whileſt things thus paſſed in HVNGARIE, Mahomet to ſhew his greatneſſe, as alſo the more to keepe the Chriſtian princes in ſuſpence, ſent Cicala (or as the Turkes call him Cigala) Baſſa his Admirall with a great fleet to ſea: wherewith being come vpon the coaſt of SICILIA;
B he requeſted the viceroy of that kingdome, to ſend him abourd his fleet the ladie Lucretia his mother, which dwelt in MESSINA, for that he greatly deſired to ſee her and to doe her honour; promiſing ſo quietly to depart without any harme doing. And the Viceroy againe conſidering how that the angrie renegat for the like courteſie to him at another time before denied, had in his rage done great harme all alongſt the ſea coaſt; couenanting with him to ſend her in ſafetie backe againe, ſent her honourably accompanied abourd the Admirall gallie: whom Cicala her ſonne receiued with great ioy and triumph, and hauing kept her with him one day with all the honour that might be, according to his promiſe ſent her back againe to MESSINA; & ſo without any harme done for her ſake to any part of Chriſtendome, peaceably returned backe againe with his fleet.

Now in the meane time Michael the Vayuod of VALACHIA with good forces of his owne,
C becauſe he would be doing ſomething alſo, reſolued to giue an attempt vpon NICOPOLIS, a citie of the Turks in BVLGARIA: and ſo giuing order to his people, cauſed a bridge to be made ouer Danubius to paſſe that great riuer by. Whereof the Baſſaes of SILISTRIA and BADOVA vnderſtanding, thought it good with all their power to diſturbe him in that worke: and ſo comming, as the ſaid bridge was by the Vayuod his ſouldiors laid ouer the riuer vpon boats, without farther ſtay attempted to haue broken the ſame, to the intent that the Vayuod ſhould not that way paſſe. Who haſting thither with his armie, reſcued his worke, and enforced the Baſſaes to forſake the exploit by them begun: where betwixt them for a ſpace was fought a moſt hard conflict, vntill at length the Turks were with a great ſlaughter ouerthrowne; and ſo glad, ſome here, ſome there, by flight as they might to ſaue their liues. After which victorie, he without let paſſing
D ouer the riuer with his whole forces, came and encamped vnder the wals of NICOPOLIS: where they of the citie vnderſtanding of the late ſtaughter of the Turks, & finding themſelues not able to hold out againſt the force and valour of the Valachies, and now out of hope of any helpe or reliefe in time to come from the Turkes, without farther reſiſtance yeelded themſelues into the power of the Vayuod. Who hauing ſacked the citie and ſet it on fire, caried thence a great ſpoile and bootie, with a number of the Bulgarians: chuſing out the beſt and moſt able bodies amongſt them to ſerue him in his wars, and appointing the reſt to inhabit & manure the waſted places of VALACHIA. The report of this ouerthrow giuen vnto the Turks by the Valachian, with the ſacking of NICOPOLIS, running abroad, brought a generall feare vpon the Turks euen in the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE. For the ſtaying whereof Mahomet commaunded the chiefe of his
E Baſſaes, with a great power of tumultuarie ſoldiors taken vp in haſt to go forthwith againſt the Vayuod, to ſtay the courſe of his farther proceedings, to the diſmaying of his people, himſelfe thundring out moſt horrible threats againſt him: who encouraged with his late victorie, and well acquainted with the Turkes manners, little regarded the ſame, as knowing that he was not with words but with armes to be vanquiſhed.

Nicopolis ſacked and burnt by the Vayuod.

Now Mahomet the Turkiſh emperour oppreſſed with melancholie to ſee himſelfe at once 1599 aſſailed with the plague then raging in CONSTANTINOPLE, the bloudie wars in HVNGARIE, and the horrible mortalitie & loſſe of his people in both places; and withall not ignorant of the euill ſucceſſe of his armie at VERADINVM, and of the great harme done at NICOPOLIS by the Valachian: yet for all that ceaſed not in what he might to prouide for ſo many euils, but gaue or-
F der to Taut Baſſa with all ſpeed to ſet forward (as we haue ſaid) from CONSTANTINOPLE toward VALACHIA; as from whence he feared the greateſt danger: who without delay to make the Vayuod to vnderſtand how highly the great Sultan was diſpleaſed with him, put himſelfe vpon the way with ſixe hundred Ianizaries towards HADRIANOPLE, with purpoſe there to Winter vntill the Spring, and ſo to expect the comming of the reſt of the armie, that ſo with the ſame, vnited vnto the forces of Mehemet Satergi (who the laſt yere beſieged VERADINVM) he might in the field appeare more terrible vnto his enemies. The Chriſtian emperor alſo at the ſame time reſted much diſcontented, that his people in ſo faire a way for the winning of the caſtle of BVDA, had yet failed thereof: the Wallons laying the fault vpon the lords Swartzenburg, Palfi, and the reſt of the commaunders, that it was not woon; for that when they as valiant men offered to haue done therein the vttermoſt of their deuoir, their leaders had made choiſe by the ſpade and mattocke rather than by the ſword to performe the ſame. G

The Turkes againe ſpoiled by the Vayuod.

But Michael the Vayuod ſeeing the Turkes not a little diſmayed with the ſacking of NICOPOLIS, began afreſh to their greater terrour and hurt to make new inrodes vpon them, in ſuch ſort, as that he was entred an hundred miles into their territorie: againſt whom Mehemet Satergi (as yet the Turks generall in HVNGARIE) comming with his forces, he againe retired, carrying away with him the ſpoile of the countrie by him waſted. H

Buda diſtreſſed.

They of BVDA in the meane time fearing ſome ſudden aſſault to bee giuen vpon them, and ſuffring within great want of victuals, expected long to be relieued both with victuals and other neceſſaries: vnderſtanding yet withall, that the Grand ſeignior had cauſed it to bee giuen out in CONSTANTINOPLE, that he was raiſing a great power of his beſt and moſt expert ſouldiors, and had therefore ſent for vnto the court all his old men of war, ſuch as had ſerued in the wars of PERSIA, to be now againe employed in HVNGARIE. Where the Turks in the meane time prouiding to relieue the diſtreſſed citie of BVDA both with men and many other neceſſaries; certaine reſolute Hungarians vnderſtanding by their eſpials, that one of the Turks Baſſaes with three thouſand ſoldiors was comming thither to encreaſe the garriſon, laied themſelues cloſe in ambuſh in a place whereby the Turkes were to paſſe: where they had not long ſtayed, but that the Turks as men without feare diſorderedly paſſing by, were by them with ſuch force and furie aſſailed, that in a moment, when they leaſt thought, they were ouerthrowne and put to flight, with the loſſe of many of their horſes, much money and iewels, and many captains there taken priſoners, the Baſſa himſelfe with much ado hardly eſcaping into the citie. But ſhortly after foure hundred Chriſtians ſcouring the countrie about BVDA, and hauing taken a good bootie of cattell and other pillage, returning loaded with the prey, were by the way aſſaulted by the Turks, and enforced to forſake the ſame, and to fight for their liues: whom for all that they notably repulſed, with the ſlaughter of diuers of them, & ſo againe recouering their bootie, returned with victorie. And about this time or not long after in the vpper HVNGARIE, a great power of the Turkes and Tartars hauing forraged a great part of that countrie, and done the Chriſtians great harme, came before COSSOVIA, making ſhew as if they would euen preſently haue beſieged that citie: which put the inhabitants in ſuch a feare, that many of them without further deliberation fled forthwith as faſt as they could into the mountaines, thinking themſelues more ſafe there than in the citie. Neuertheleſſe, by the perſuaſion of George Baſta, the emperours lieutenant in thoſe parts, two thouſand valiant and expert ſouldiors ſtaied there with him, expecting what the Turkes would doe: who approching the wals, demanded of them in the citie a great ſumme of money, by way of contribution, threatning otherwiſe the vtter ruine and deſtruction thereof. Which their proud demaund was by Baſta ſtoutly reiected, and they with the loſſe of a great many of their liues enforced to get them further off. Wherfore ſeeing themſelues not able to preuaile againſt a citie ſo well prouided, they for feare by night riſe, and departed quite another way than that wherby they came, doing great harme ſtill as they went. The free Haiduckes of VALACHIA alſo, a warlike kind of people, liuing for the moſt part vpon prey, and willing to ſhew ſome token of their hatred toward the Turks, by certaine bridges paſſing ouer the Danubius, encountred with the Baſſa of NATOLIA with a great power, whom they ouerthrew with much ſlaughter of his people, and the loſſe of his brother there ſlaine alſo: and ſo afterwards ouerrunning the countrie, did there exceeding harme, and tooke the ſame Baſſa his ſonne priſoner. Thus paſſed the Winter with many light skirmiſhes and incurſions in diuers parts of HVNGARIE and other the frontier countries, which had done great harme had it not beene before hand well prouided for by the Imperials; who in moſt places ſtrengthened with new ſupplies, ſtayed the furie of their barbarous enemies. Maximilian the Archduke in the meane time comming from PRAGE to VIENNA, found himſelfe there to haue in his campe but foure and twentie thouſand foot and ten thouſand horſe, readie againſt the next Spring (diuers of the Germane princes this yere not ſending thither any aid at all, by reaſon of their troubles neerer home, with I K L M

A laid ſiege to COGNA, a citie in the confines of NATOLIA, which was foorthwith yeelded vnto him. And yet not ſo contented, gaue it out by open proclamation, that for the reformation of the diſordered ſtate, he would ere long goe to beſiege the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE: and that therfore all ſuch as would follow him, ſhould of him be intreated as his friends & companions, threatning vnto the reſt moſt cruell death and deſtruction. Of which his proceedings Mahomet (as then diſporting himſelfe at his gardens of pleaſure in the countrey, all alongſt the ſide of PROPONTIS) vnderſtanding, and fearing to be there ſurpriſed, or that ſome ſudden innouation might be raiſed in the citie, haſted with all ſpeed to CONSTANTINOPLE, and from thence in all haſt diſpatched Mehemet one of the Viſier Baſſaes the ſonne of Sinan, with all the forces he could make to goe againſt him. Who paſſing ouer into ASIA with a great power, and
B yet fearing to come to the triall of a battell with him whom he knew to be a man of himſelfe deſperatly ſet, and not a little fauoured alſo euen of his own ſoldiors: ſo ſecretly wrought by large promiſes, that Cuſahin his footmen were euen vpon the point to haue forſaken him. Which he quickly perceiuing, fled foorthwith through SIRIA into ARABIA with his horſemen, and the horſmen of Simon the Georgian: purpoſing the next ſpring by the helpe of Arabians and Perſians to appeare in the field with greater forces than before. After whom Mehemet the great Baſſa following, came with his armie to ALEPPO, there to Winter, and to expect the returne of the rebell together with the Spring. This ſo dangerous a rebellion, with the troubles of TRANSYLVANIA and VALACHIA, were the cauſe that the graund ſignior ſeeing himſelfe in ſo many places forſaken of his ſubiects, was the readier to encline vnto peace with the emperour, whereunto for
C all that the emperour was not haſtie to hearken, but vpon honourable conditions: as knowing that the Turke required the ſame, not for any deſire he had to liue in quiet, but for that his troubled affaires both at home and elſewhere abroad ſo required; his Ianizaries and other men of warre in this his ſo weake gouernment being grown ſo inſolent, as that they were hardly to bee by him commaunded; openly threatning in their diſcontented humors not onely the depoſing of the principall officers about him, but of himſelfe alſo, and of the baniſhment of the Sultaneſſe his mother, ſaying, that ſhe had bewitched him, to the end ſhe might her ſelfe rule, which ſhe indeed did in all his greateſt affaires. But the rebell Cuſahin the next yeare growne againe very ſtrong, was now come into the field, and euen readie to haue giuen the Baſſa battell: who as hee was a man of great wiſdome and experience, well conſidering with what a deſperate enemie he D had to doe, thought it beſt againe to proue, if his rebellious followers might by faire meanes bee drawne from him: and ſo comming neere vnto him, by open proclamation promiſed a free and generall pardon to all ſuch as had followed the rebell in thoſe wars, if forſaking him, they ſhould forthwith return home to their dwellings, and ſo to the obedience of their iuſt and lawfull prince and ſoueraigne. Which generall pardon ſo proclaimed, was the ruine of Cuſahin, for that the greateſt part of his followers now inriched with the great booties they had gotten, and now alſo hauing free pardon offred them, returned home into their owne countries, there at eaſe to liue of their euill gotten goods, leauing their captaine with ſome few others which ſtaied with him, with little hope to be ſaued. So that within a few daies after Cuſahin thus forſaken of his followers, was himſelfe taken and brought priſoner to CONSTANTINOPLE, where ſhortly after he was E with moſt exquiſit torments tortured to death.

Mehemet one of the viſier Baſſaes ſent againſt the rebell.

Cuſahin the rebell taken and tortured to death at Conſtantinople.

The troubles of this yeare thus paſt, Rodolph the Chriſtian emperour with the beginning of the next (whileſt the ground yet couered with ſnow, and the vnſeaſonableneſſe of the weather would not ſuffer the ſouldiors to keep the field) cauſed a Diet of the princes of the empire to be called, to conſider with him of ſuch helps as were by them to be giuen againſt the Spring, for the maintenance of the warres which yet he had againſt the Turke: who all promiſed to ſend their ſoldiors with their pay, and ſuch further contribution as might ſerue for the maintenance of that defenſiue warre againſt the common enemie. Whereunto alſo Clement now biſhop of Rome (this yeare of Iubilie) put to his helping hand, as hee had diuers times before, by ſending thither ſuch aid both of men and money as he had before promiſed: ſo that by this meanes great pre-
F paration was made by the Chriſtians for the taking of the field with the firſt of the Spring. At which time the Turkes alſo began to ſtirre: who although Ibrahim Baſſa their Generall by the appointment of his great lord was then in ſome ſpeech with the emperor about a peace, yet ceaſed not they in the meane time that this treatie was from day to day prolonged, with their companies ſcattering here and there, to doe what harme they could vpon the frontiers of the emperors territories, the cauſe why he with more ſpeed called vpon his friends for their promiſed aid. G

And for the better managing of this yeares warres againſt the Turke, he appointed duke Mercurie (who had drawne a great number of Frenchmen both horſe and foot out of FRANCE) Generall of all his forces, ſending Ferrant Gonzaga ſurnamed the Lame (whom for his approoued valour and experience in martiall affaires, hee had ſent for to MANTVA) gouernour into the vpper HVNGARIE. So the ſouldiors now day by day by companies reſorting from diuers parts into AVSTRIA, were from thence ſent vnto ſuch places as were by the Turkes moſt moleſted, ſo to repreſſe their often incurſions, as in many places they did. For eight thouſand of the Turks going out vpon the ſudden to haue ſurpriſed PAPPA, were by the garriſon ſouldiors of that place encountered and ouerthrowen. And on the other ſide, whileſt Ferdinand the Archduke was aſſembling his people in CROATIA, for the defence of that countrey againſt the incurſions H of the enemie, ſix thouſand Turks without reſiſtance entring the ſame as farre as BVCCARI, and burning the country villages as they went, had taken many priſoners, with a great bootie of cattell; and ſo (merrie and out of feare) being about to haue returned, were ſuddenly ſet vpon by the Countie Serinus in certaine ſtraight and troubleſome paſſages, where they leaſt feared any ſuch matter, and ouercharged alſo with their prey, were (I ſay) eaſily by him for the moſt part ouerthrowne, and the reſt put to flight, and ſo the priſoners with all the reſt of the bootie againe recouered. At which time alſo one of the imperiall colonels with fifteene hundred horſe making an inrode into the countrey about ALBA REGALIS, and meeting with the Turkes and Tartars thereabouts, ſlew ſix hundred of them, and tooke diuers of their captaines priſoners. Six thouſand other Tartars alſo at this time returning out of HVNGARIE home towards their owne I countrey, were by the Coſſackes neere vnto the Blacke ſea ſet vpon with ſuch force, that many of them being ſlaine, the reſt for feare ran into the ſea, leauing all the prey they had got in HVNGARIE vnto their enemies. In the heat of theſe broiles the noble lord Palfi Gouernour of STRIGONIVM, a man that all his life long had done great ſeruice for his prince and country, & whom we haue ſo often in this hiſtory remembred, died the three and twentith of March in his caſtle at BIBERSPVRG, to the great griefe of many, eſpecially the Hungarians his countreymen. And for that STRIGONIVM (ſo neere vnto the enemie) required in his ſtead to haue a right valiant and couragious gouernor, the emperour appointed the lord Swartzenburg to that charge: the fame ſtill running, that Ibrahim Baſſa would come thither with the great armie he was in prouiding, if the peace went not forward, which was now ſtil leſſe and leſſe hoped for, by reaſon of his prowd K and inſolent demaunds.

The death of the lord Palfi.

The Frenchmen and Wallons mutinie in Pappa.

But whileſt theſe troubles with ſuch others too long to rehearſe, thus paſſed in diuers parts of this miſerable countrey of HVNGARIE: twelue hundred Frenchmen and Wallons in garriſon at PAPPA (a ſtrong frontier towne of the emperours in the lower HVNGARIE) for want of pay began to mutiny. For which cauſe it was thought good to the chiefe commanders to haue them thence remoued, and others placed in their roome. Which they perceiuing, and withall knowing themſelues too ſtrong for the reſt of the garriſon, all Hungarians or Almaines, not partakers of their conſpiracie; they firſt reſolued to thruſt their owne captaines out of the towne, as lets vnto their deſires: and then laying hands vpon Michael Marotti the paymaſter, and other the Hungarian and Dutch commanders, with their ſouldiors, tooke from them their weapons, and L caſt the ſaid Marotti with the other captaines, and ſome of the better ſort of their ſouldiors into yrons, exacting of the reſt as well Hungarians as Dutch, in number about a thouſand perſons, a thouſand duckats; threatning otherwiſe to deliuer them into the hands of the Turkes: and albeit that Marotti offered for his libertie eighteene hundred duckats; yet would they not bee ſo contented, but ſpoiling both him and the reſt of all that they had, with their apparell and weapons furniſhed ſuch Turkes as were there priſoners, and ſo ſent them away to ALBA REGALIS; and afterwards rifling euery mans houſe, as if they had been enemies, tooke from them whatſoeuer pleaſed themſelues: and that which worſe was, to encreaſe theſe outrages, compacted with the Turks of ALBA REGALIS and BVDA, for the pay which (they ſaid) the emperour ought M them, to deliuer them the town; certifying them withall, how that the lord Swartzenburg within two daies was comming with money to giue them contentment; promiſing if hee came into the towne, to deliuer him with the ſame into their hands: or to bee the more ſure of him, they might if they ſo pleaſed intercept him at the paſſage ZESNEGKH, whereby he muſt needs come. For the more credit of which their wicked purpoſe, they ſent an enſigne of the emperours, as a

A token vnto the Turks at ALBA REGALIS: who for all that altogither belieued them not, yet willing farther to trie them, ſent them for hoſtages two Chiaus; from whom the rebels ſent alſo two others of the better ſort of them to ALBA REGALIS; with concluſion, that the fiue and twentieth of Iune at the furtheſt the mony ſhould be paied, and the towne deliuered. For the receiuing whereof, and for feare of ſome hidden treaſon, the Turkes and Tartars began to make themſelues ſtrong: the Imperials alſo doing what they might for the appeaſing of ſo dangerous a tumult. So the tenth of Iune the lord Swartzenburg with two thouſand horſe and foot came within two miles of the towne, and from thence ſent foure and twentie horſemen to diſſuade the rebels from yeelding the towne vnto the Turkes, & to tell them that they ſhould ſhortly receiue their pay: who ſhamefully deriding them, ſent them backe againe as wiſe as they came: ſo that
B Swartzenburg perceiuing himſelfe with ſo ſmall forces to be able to doe nothing againſt them, neither yet by faire meanes to perſuade them, retired againe to RAB, vntill ſome greater ſtrength were come vnto him. Immediatly after, doctor Petzen, Counſellor for the warres, a man of great authoritie, grauitie and wiſedome, was by Matthias the Archduke with foure hundred horſe conducted to PAPPA, to ſee if he by his diſcretion could haue diſſuaded them from their ſo vngodly a purpoſe, for the yeelding of the towne vnto the enemie: whom they not only refuſed to heare, although he ſpake vnto them moſt kindly, but alſo bent their muskets and harquebuſies vpon him, threatning to kill him if he did not forthwith depart. When ſhortly after, twentie of the Hungarians impriſoned in a cellar in the towne, brake out, and comming to RAB, brought newes thither, That the Frenchmen and Wallons in PAPPA were at variance among
C themſelues about the yeelding vp of the towne vnto the Turkes (ſome better minded than the reſt, not willing to conſent therunto) inſomuch, that they in the caſtle ſhot at them in the towne, and they againe at them in the caſtle: and that they had alreadie receiued from the Turks twentie thouſand duckats, with ſome prouiſion of victuals, & were ſhortly after to receiue from them the reſt of the money promiſed them, and ſo to deliuer the towne. For preuenting whereof, the lord Swartzenburg the two and twentith of Iune ſent the lord Sharpfenſtein with a French colonell, three thouſand ſouldiors, certaine Petardes, and a number of ſcaling ladders towards PAPPA: whom the falſe rebels ſuffered peaceably to enter the towne the foure and twentith of Iune, ſtill encouraging them to come on, calling them their countriemen and brethren, and in token of friendſhip ſhaking them by the hands, telling them, that hauing aſſurance of their pay, they
D deſired no more: But hauing now receiued in ſo many of them as they thought good, and as they knew they were wel able to deale with, ſhutting the reſt out, they cut them all in pieces, and afterwards in deriſion called vpon the high Dutches to come on in like manner. Three hundred of theſe rebels at the ſame time had laied themſelues in ambuſh by a mill faſt without the town, who by the Wallons and Haiduckes without diſcouered, were alſo by them charged: vpon whom for all that, by reaſon of the ſhot out of the towne, they could do no good; but hauing loſt three hundred men, and amongſt them Hanniball Kralzs, the lord Sharpſenſteine his lieutenant generall, and one Del la Margoſe the chiefe enginer, they retired: Which loſſe the deſperat rebels (if it had bin in their choiſe) had wiſhed rather to haue happened vnto the Dutches than to the Wallons or Hungarians. About three daies after, three of theſe rebels being by chance taken priſoners by the Imperials, and brought to RAB, were not only apparelled but alſo trimmed after the Turkiſh faſhion, as men not deſiring longer to be accounted Chriſtians, the reſt of their fellowes in the towne alſo imitating the Turkes faſhions, as well in their apparrell as in their manner of ſeruice: yet for all that would not theſe metamorphoſed monſters yeeld the towne vnto the Turkes, before they had the full ſumme by them agreed vpon, the Baſſa of BOSNA being commaunded from the Grand ſeignior in all haſt to prouid it for them, and ſo to receiue of them the towne. Neuertheleſſe, for their more ſtrength and their more credit with the Turks, they receiued into the towne one enſigne of the Turks, with certain wagons of victuals, brought thither with ſo ſtrong a connoy as that the Imperials durſt not meddle therwith: in which wag- A moſt wicked fact.
F gons (being diſcharged) they ſent in bonds ſix hundred Hungarians & Dutch, men, women, and children, priſoners to ALBA REGALIS; being all of them glad to be ſo ſent away, in hope to find more fauour & courteſie at the hands of their enemies, than they had found with theſe renegat Chriſtians. So ſhortly after, theſe rebels ſent out certaine meſſengers vnto the gouernour of ALBA REGALIS, to know his full reſolution; which meſſengers (conducted by certaine Turkes of great account) were vpon the way by the free Haiduckes all intercepted, and the meſſengers taken, with an hundred Turkes moe. In the meane while Michael Marotti, before impriſoned by the rebels in PAPPA, by letters ſecretly aduertiſed the lord Swartzenburg of a certaine place, whereby he might (as he ſaid) eaſily enter the towne, and the rather, for that the rebels were at variance amongſt themſelues. Who thereupon the twelfth of Iuly came to PAPPA with nine thouſand horſe and foot, but diſappointed of his purpoſe for entering the towne, hardly neuertheleſſe belaied the ſame: vpon whom the mutiniers many times deſperatly ſallied out, & right valiantly encountered them, albeit that they were ſtill, without any notable loſſe, by their enemies (too ſtrong for them) beaten backe againe into the town. In one of which ſallies it fortuned one of their captaines to be taken, who to the terror of the reſt was preſently ſlaine quicke, and his head and skin vpon a pike ſet vp before the towne, for his fellowes to behold. But the lord Swartzenburg ſtill more and more preuailing vpon them, they ſent ſecretly for aid to the Turks: whereof he for all that getting intelligence, ſent alſo for three regiments of ſouldiours moe to come vnto him to the ſiege; by whoſe comming he well ſtrengthened, and bringing his approches neerer the towne, tooke from the rebels the mill, a ſtrength which they very vnwillingly loſt, as in hope thereby to haue the more eaſily receiued aid from the Turks; who hauing made prepration to haue relieued them, were letted ſo to doe by the riſing of the water, which had ſpoiled all the prouiſion for their reliefe at the bridge of ESSEC, as alſo hindered them for marching forward. At length the Imperials were come with their trenches euen to the towne ditches, out of which they had let out all the water: where ſome of the townſmen eſcaping out of the towne, declared, how that the mutinous ſoldiors within laboured both day and night to fortifie the towne, but to be in their worke much letted by the continuall aſſaults of the Imperials: as alſo that they now had neither bread nor wine, nor other victuals left, more than a little ſalt, and threeſcore horſe, of which they had alreadie begun to eat: and that although they were not altogither ſo valiant, yet that they had reſolued to die by the hands of the ſouldiors, as men expecting no other mercie. Yet ſhortly after, viz. the nine and twentith of Iuly, they deſperatly fel out vpon the trenches of Marſpurgiſch, a Dutch captaine, of whoſe ſouldiors they ſlew many, being drunke, and driuing the reſt out of their trenches, raiſed a great alarum. Which the lord Swartzenburg hearing, haſted thither to the reſcue; where with an vnluckie muſket ſhot he was ſtrucke in the head and ſlaine. Whereof the rebels got knowledge the ſame euening, and Del la Mota their Generall in reward of that ſeruice gaue vnto them that had made that ſallie a thouſand dollars to be diuided amongſt them. The dead bodie of that ſo worthie a man, as had done great ſeruice for the Chriſtian common-weale, was afterwards with great ſolemnitie brought to RAB, and there honourably interred. The like deſperate ſallie they made againe the next day, and ſlew of the Imperials an hundred and thirtie, and tooke certaine priſoners: and in retiring backe againe into the towne, cryed aloud, That when they lacked meat, rather than they would yeeld the towne, they would eate Chriſtians, whereof Marotti ſhould be the firſt.

The lord Swartzenburg ſlaine.

The lord Swartzenburg thus ſlaine, the gouernment of the armie was by Matthias the Archduke committed to the lord Redern, a noble man both valiant and learned, who although hee were very ſickely came vnto the camp before PAPPA the eight of Auguſt; where vnderſtanding that the rebels now brough vnto extremitie, had a purpoſe by night to flie away and ſo be gone, he cauſed a more vigilant & ſtrong watch to be kept; when lo according to his expectation the next night after about two houres before day they began to iſſue out: wherof the watch giuing knowledge vnto the Generall, they were indeed ſuffered to go out as vnperceiued, but preſently after at their heeles were ſent out the lord Nadaſti and the earle of Thurn with two hundred Huſſars, and after them the chiefe colonell and countie Solmes with part of their horſmen alſo, who in three diuers places ouertaking them neere vnto a great wood called Packem, ſlew moſt part of them: Del la Mota their chiefe captain or ringleader being ſlaine by the chiefe colonel, becauſe he would not yeeld, and his head afterwards by him preſented vnto the Generall in the campe. Two hundred Wallons the Huſſars vnder the leading of the lord Nadaſti, countie Solmes, and countie Thurn, found out in the wood; who albeit that they for a ſpace made great reſiſtance, yet in the end were enforced to yeeld, and ſo with their two enſignes were brought into the campe. The Huſſars alſo vpon another paſſage light vpon other two hundred mo of theſe rebellious Wallons, who becauſe they ſtood ſtrongly vpon their guard, and were more deſperatly ſet than the reſt, the Generall ſent out other two hundred of the colonels horſmen vpon them, by whom

A whom and the Huſſars they were almoſt all ſlaine: diuers others of them alſo were ſlaine in comming out of the town; and in the mariſhes therabouts. Their Generals lieutenant with ſuch other of their principall commanders as were taken, were by the lord Rederns commandment deliuered vnto the Prouoſt martiall; the reſt of the rebellious traitours hee at the requeſt of the ſouldiors diuided into diuers parts of the armie, there to the terrour of others to be executed, from whom the ſouldiors could hardly be perſuaded euen for the preſent to hold their hands. But afterwards hauing brought them to RAB, and leaue giuen them to doe with them their pleaſure, they as farre exceeded in the cruell manner of their execution, as had they before in their outragious dealings, eſpecially the Hungarians and Wallons, notwithſtanding moſt of them were of the Wallon countries. Some of them they impailed, ſome they brake vpon the B wheele; ſome of their skins they cut off their bodies as it were into thongs, and ſo poured into the wounds, vinegar, ſalt, and pepper; from ſome others they cut off their priuities, ſome they roaſted, and ſome they put vnto the Tenalia; vpon ſome they dropped molten pitch, and then caſting gunpouder vpon them, ſo burnt them to death; otherſome they hanged vpon yron hookes; and ſome they put in the ground vp to the chin, and for their diſport with yron bullets bowled at their heads. In all which torments no ſigne of compaſſion was to be ſeene, the tormentours to make their paine the greater doing nothing but deride them: the miſerable wretches in the meane time confeſſing the hainouſneſſe of their offence, and crauing for death as a
C fauour. A moſt horrible thing it was to ſee, how whileſt ſome were thus tortured, others were brought to ſee the ſame miſerie they themſelues were by and by to endure. Amongſt the reſt of theſe exquiſit torments, one Peter Orſy cauſed one of the mutiners to be ſowed vp in the belly of a mare, with his head hanging out, and ſo to be roaſted; in which miſerable torment he liued three houres, and then died: after which he cauſed the loathſome bodie ſo roaſted, to be giuen to them that lay ſtaruing vpon the wheele to eat. Thus was the dangerous mutinie at PAPPA with much adoe ended, and that ſtrong towne like to haue bin loſt, preſerued: the rebels themſelues being become a dreadfull example to all poſteritie, for all them to looke vpon that ſhal attempt the like villanie.

Now at this ſame time alſo, though neither the Chriſtians nor the Turkes had as then any great armie in the field, yet many an hoat and bloudie skirmiſh paſſed daily betwixt them in one place or other of HVNGARIE: all which to recount as it would be much tedious, ſo in ſilence to D paſſe them all ouer, were greatly to wrong thoſe worthie perſonages by whom they were not without their great aduenture done. Among the reſt one Nicholas Horbath countie Serinus his lieutenant, with an hundred and fiftie ſouldiours, and Andrew Thuſſi another great commaunder, going forth to ſeeke for bootie; Thuſſi hearing that the Turkes were abroad for the ſurpriſing of certaine Haiducks then gone out, ſtaied faſt in a ſecret place vntill he might heare farther newes, Horbath another way ſtill going on. Now it happened that the Baſſa of SIGETH hauing bin abroad, in returning home by chance met with Horbath, and encountering with him ouerthrew him, and ſlew moſt of his men, Horbath himſelfe by flight hardly eſcaping. But Thuſſi hearing this skirmiſh, as lying cloſe not farre off, and now haſting thither to haue been partaker thereof, found the Baſſa yet in the field on foot, viewing the bodies of the ſlaine: vpon whom E he came ſo ſuddenly and with ſuch force, as that the Baſſa with his diſordered men had much adoe to take horſe, and ſo without any great reſiſtance to betake himſelfe to flight: after whom the Hungarians fiercely following ſlew many of the Turks, and amongſt the reſt the Baſſa himſelfe, whoſe head preſently cut off, Horbath ſent to the countie Serinus, who ſhortly after by Thuſſi himſelfe ſent it to Matthias the Archduke. This Baſſa was a man of great ſtrength and courage, a moſt expert and aduenturous captaine, about thirtie ſix yeares old, & for his valour of a common ſouldior created a Baſſa by the great Sultan. His head being brought to VIENNA, and there ſhewed to the Baſſa of BVDA then their priſoner, and he demanded whether he knew it or not, ſighing anſwered, that he knew it well, and that it was the head of the Baſſa of SIGETH, a brauer man than whom the Sultan had none in all his empire, earneſtly withall deſiring to F know how he was ſlaine. And not long after the aduenturers out of COMORA, STRIGONIVM, and other places therabout hauing made a great partie, & taken a great bootie from the Turks at a faire at GOMBAR, and by TRA and ESSEG, thinking to haue paſſed Danubius in hope of a greater bootie, ſeuen hundred of them being paſſed the riuer, were by the new Baſſa of SIGETH and others with fiue thouſand Turkes in an hoat skirmiſh ouerthrowne; yet not without their great

there slaine, and but fiftie of the Christian aduenturers left dead in the place, the rest disordredly retiring to their boats, being for most part drowned in the Danubie. The free Haiduckes also Iula surprised and burnt by the free Haiduckes. surprised IVLA and set it on fire, in which confusion the Turkes flying into the castle, for hast thrust one another from the bridge into the castle ditch; wherein so many of them were drowned, that a man might haue gone drie foot ouer vpon the bodies of the dead. They tooke there also six hundred prisoners with much other bootie, & deliuered two hundred Christians which were there captiues. And albeit that these Haiduckes after this exploit done were hardly pursued by the Turks from other places, yet they in safetie retired with such bootie as they had alreadie gotten.

But now to leaue these the troubles of HVNGARIE for a while, as the forerunners of greater H ere long to ensue; let vs againe looke backe into TRANSYLVANIA and VALACHIA, to see how Michaell the Vayuod now in the meane time behaued himselfe there. The Cardinall Ba- thor ouerthrowne and slaine, and the countrie of TRANSYLVANIA againe brought vnder the emperours obedience; the Vayuod by his embassadours gaue him forthwith to vnderstand of all his proceedings, with the whole successe thereof, as also of a purpose he had to inuade MOL-DAVIA: for that it was commonly reported, and also belieued, that Sigismund the late prince (not a little moued with the death of the Cardinall his cousin, and the reuolt of his countrie) aided by the Turkes, the Tartars, the Polonians, and Moldauians, would now attempt some great matter for the recouerie of TRANSYLVANIA: All which was shortly after the rather thought to be true, for that diuers of his spies being taken, some at CLAVSENBVRG, some at I NESSEN, beside the letters that were found about them for him vnto the nobilitie and states of TRANSYLVANIA (perswading them to reuolt from the Vayuod vnto him, and that his meaning was shortly to come with a great armie out of POLONIA for the repulsing of him) they also of themselues confessed, how that Sigismund in disguised apparrell had himselfe bin in TRANSILVANIA, to conferre with diuers his secret friends concerning that matter. Which The gouernment of Transyluania by the emperour confirmed vnto Michael the Vayuod. his embassadours the emperour honourably entertained, and by them confirmed vnto the Vay-uod the gouernment of TRANSILVANIA, sending also vnto him diuers honourable presents, forbidding him neuertheless to inuade MOLDAVIA, for feare of raising a new and dangerous warre against the Polonians also, vnder whose protection and the Turkes the Palatine thereof then rested. According vnto which commaund the Vayuod stayed his intended expedition; yet K sending some good part of his forces vnto the frontiers of MOLDAVIA, for feare of Sigismund whom he heard to bee hatching some mischiefe in POLONIA, and euen then to lie vpon the frontiers of that countrie. Some few moneths thus passing, Husraim Aga (a graue reuerend old man, and much employed by the Turkish Sultan) with fiue other Turks of good account, em-bassadours from the great Sultan, and a great retinue following him, came to CRONSTAT in TRANSILVANIA where the Vayuod then lay. Of whose comming the Vayuod hearing, with foure thousand horsemen most brauely mounted, went halfe a mile out of the citie to meet them:
the footmen in the meane time on both sides of the street standing in good order, from the gate of the citie whereby they were to enter, euen vnto the Vayuods lodging; where stood also his guard all in red and white silke. So meeting in the field, they both alighted from their horses, L with great reuerence saluting the one the other: when presently the embassador embracing the Vayuod, vngirt his scimitar, and in the name of the great Sultan put another about him, so richly garnished with gold and pretious stones, as that no part of the scaberd was therefore to bee seene: Besides this, he presented him with a faire plume of blacke Hearnes feathers mixed with some white (a right goodly ornament, in forme of a great bush) which the Vayuod would not in the field put vpon his head, although he were therunto by the embassador most earnestly reensignes, in token of the Turks fauour and protection; the one for himselfe, and the other for his sonne Petrasco: moreouer, hee gaue vnto him two exceeding faire horses richly furnished, with foure others, and a most faire faulcon. The Vayuod himselfe was most brauely mounted, M and (after the maner of his countrie) had ten very faire spare horses led before him. At whose en-terance into the towne, all the great ordinance was discharged, with great vollies of small shot.

And so the embassador stil riding on the left hand of the Vayuod, being brought to his lodging, had six of his chiefe followers euery one of them presented with a rich robe of cloth of gold; in requitall

A requitall whereof the embaſſadour rewarded an hundred of the Vayuod his followers euerie one of them with a good ſuit of apparrell: with this embaſſadour of the Turkes was alſo the Polonian embaſſadour, whom the Vayuod in like manner honourably entertained. Theſe embaſſadours (as was thought) did what they might to haue drawne this worthie and renowmed man, togither with the countries of TRANSYLVANIA and VALACHIA, from the emperor vnto the Turkes obeiſance: howbeit he ſeldome or neuer ſpake with them, but that either before or after he had conference with the lords Vngnad and Zeckell (the emperors commiſſioners) concerning their requeſts; alwaies proteſting vnto them, not to yeeld to any thing without the emperours conſent and good liking. Whereof Mahomet aduertiſed, and that he was not by any thing yet ſaid or done to be remoued from the emperour, gaue him by the ſame embaſſadours
B to vnderſtand, How that he was in ſome ſpeech with the emperor concerning peace (as indeed he then was by meſſengers from the Baſſaes at PRESBVRG) which if it ſorted to effect, that then all ſhould be well; but if not, that then it ſhould be good for him whileſt he had yet time, wiſely to conſider of his owne eſtate, and to ſubmit himſelfe vnto his protection who was able to defend him, rather than for the vaine praiſe of a certain fooliſh conſtancie, to aduenture himſelfe with all that he had vnto moſt certaine danger and deſtruction: promiſing him in recompence of that his loyaltie, to giue vnto him for euer the countries of TRANSYLVANIA, VALACHIA, and MOLDAVIA, and at his need to furniſh him both with men and money; offering moreouer to make him a great commaunder in his armie in HVNGARIE, and the Baſſa of TEMESVVAR as his friend to be at all times readie with fiftie thouſand horſe & foot (as need ſhould
C be) to aſſiſt him againſt the emperor, reſeruing vnto himſelfe whatſoeuer he ſhould more win from him: for all which bountie and kindneſſe, requiring onely to haue him vnto him loyall. All which his large offers the Vayuod little regarding, declared the ſame vnto the emperours commiſſioners: yet ſtill proteſting neuer to ſtart, but to ſtand faſt for the Chriſtian emperour. Notwithſtanding as a man deſirous to better his eſtate, he tooke hereupon occaſion to requeſt of the emperour the countrie of TRANSYLVANIA, by him ſo lately taken in, vnto him and his ſonne in inheritance for euer, with ſuch frontier townes as in former time belonged vnto TRANSYLVANIA: and that whatſoeuer he ſhould win from the Turkes, might bee his and his ſonnes: He alſo requeſted, that all the preferments and dignities in former time granted by his Imperial maieſtie vnto Sigiſmund the late prince, might now be beſtowed vpon himſelfe; and for his ſer-
D uice done, to be furniſhed with money for the payment of his ſouldiors: And that the emperor with the other princes of the empire ſhould aſſure him, That if he were taken by the Turke, they ſhould raunſome him: but in caſe he were by the great power of the Turke driuen out of thoſe countries, then by the emperors appointment to haue ſome conuenient place allotted vnto him in the vpper HVNGARIE to liue in, with the yearely penſion of an hundred thouſand dollars. All which his requeſts if it would pleaſe him to grant, he promiſed this yeare to do ſo much againſt the Turke, as had not in an hundred yeares bin done before: with vaunt, that if he had had the imployment of the money which was ſpent in the time of this war, he would not haue doubted but to haue brought all the countries from the Euxine (or Blacke ſea) to BVDA, ALBA REGALIS, and SOLNOCK, vnder the emperors obeiſance. A large promiſe indeed, but hardly to haue bin
E performed by a far greater prince than he.

Thus whileſt things ſtood in diſcourſe after the Cardinals death, Sigiſmund the late prince in the meane time ſupported by the Polonians, with the aide of the Turks, the Tartars, and the Moldauians, was readie to haue inuaded TRANSYLVANIA: yea the Tartars (as the forerunners of his greater power) were alreadie entred the countrie, and had out of the frontiers therof carried away ſome bootie. Wherefore the Vayuod vnderſtanding, in great haſt aſſembled his forces out of all places, which in ſhort time was growne to ſome good head, the countrie people togither with the free Haiduckes (an aduenturous and reſolute kind of ſouldiors) in great number daily reſorting vnto him. So being now eight thouſand ſtrong, and moſt of them braue and luſtie men, he with them and twentie pieces of artillerie remoued to CRONSTAT the foure and F twentith day of Aprill, ſending part of his armie (which euerie day more and more encreaſed) before him to NESBAN: where all his forces being aſſembled to the number of almoſt fiftie thouſand horſe and foot, hee with great celeritie paſſed the rough and high mountaines into MOLDAVIA without reſiſtance, but yet not without ſome trouble, his ſouldiours by the way being glad ſometimes to eat the leaues of trees, the enemie hauing of purpoſe before carried away

whatsoeuer he could that might haue yeelded him reliefe. Of whose speedie comming and great strength, Sigismund and Ieremias the Vayuod of MOLDAVIA hearing, and vpon the reasonable estimate of their owne forces finding themselues too weake to encounter him, retired themselues out of MOLDAVIA into the frontires of POLONIA, there to gather greater strength, and so to meet him: for as yet Ieremias the Vayuod had not receiued from the Turke such forces as were vnto him promised, and as he still expected. Michaell the Vayuod in the meane time (his enemies thus fled) with fire and sword entering into MOLDAVIA, tooke in the greatest part thereof, the fearefull countrie people still yeelding vnto him as he went: and the rather, for that Ieremias their Vayuod (placed by the Polonian, but tributarie vnto the Turke) had laied vpon them a most grieuous imposition, as vpon euery man a duckat a month, for which they exceedingly hated him. But here in MOLDAVIA, Michael the Vayuod (hauing still in his companie one of the emperors commissioners in TRANSILVANIA most trustie seruants, who might faithfully report vnto them the whole manner of his proceedings) after the departure of Sigismund and Ieremias his enemies, stayed not long; but hearing that they were retired towards the confines of POLONIA, without longer delay made towards them, and the eighteenth of May found them by the castle OTHVNE neere vnto the riuer Nester, being thirtie thousand strong; Polonians, Moldauians, Turkes, and Tartars: with whom he ioyned a most fierce and cruell battell, which begun about ten a clocke before noone, was with great courage but greater obstinacie on both sides maintained vntill the euening. At which time the fortune of the Valachian preuailing, his enemies at last betooke themselues to flight, of whom were there slaine eight thousand, beside many others of them drowned in the riuer Nester: where of the Valachians were lost two thousand only. Concerning Sigismund and Ieremias, diuers reports were after this ouerthrow giuen out, some saying that they were slain, and some that they were in flying drowned: howbeit the truth was, that they both by flight escaped, to the greater trouble of themselues as of their afflicted countries also. Michael after this so notable a victorie, taking in the rest of MOLDAVIA, caused the people to sweare their obedience vnto the emperour, himselfe, and his sonne, to the great offence of the Polonians, not a little (as they tooke it) wronged therein; but especially of the great Chauncellour, an old enemie vnto the house of AVSTRIA. Whereof ensued greater troubles in those frontier countries than before, to the further effusion of more Christia bloud, much better to haue bin emploied against the fatall enemie in defence of the Christian common-weale. Yet thus the three warlike & frontier countries of TRANSYLVANIA, VALACHIA, and MOLDAVIA, the surest bulwarks of that side of Christendome, and most exposed vnto the furie of the common enemie, were now once againe vnited vnder the obeysance of the emperor, to the great benefit (no doubt) of the Christian common-weale, and hurt of the Turks; if they might haue so continued, as God wot they did not long.

Sigismund and the Moldauian ouerthrowne by Michaell the Vayuod.

Moldauia subdued by Michaell

Now the Vayuod notwithstanding this so great a victorie, well considering that he of himselfe could hardly keepe this new gained prouince of MOLDAVIA against the power of the Turke, pretending that to him it belonged as his own to giue to whom he pleased: as also against the Polonians (not more desirous to restore Ieremias againe into MOLDAVIA, than the prince Sigismund into TRANSYLVANIA) without the helpe of some other more mightie prince whom he might rest vpon: by his embassadors (sent for that purpose) offered the soueraignte of all those three countries vnto the emperour, with condition, that he should appoint him perpetual Gouernour of the same vnder him. The Emperour also vnderstood how that Mahomet the great Turke had not long before againe sent vnto him another of his Chiaus, commaunding him without delay to restore the countrie of TRANSYLVANIA vnto the prince Sigismund (vnto whom he was by the mediation of the king of POLONIA now before reconciled) threatning otherwise with fire and sword to destroy VALACHIA, & by force of armes to depriue him both of TRANSILVANIA and his life together. Wherefore the emperour doubting least the Vayuod either for feare, or for the better assuring of his owne estate, should to his preiudice fall to some agreement with the Turke, yeelded to all that his embassadors had of him requested; with condition, that he should be bound as need should require to serue with his people against the Turke; and that in TRANSYLVANIA neere vnto his owne person should be alwaies resident one of the emperors counsellors, as Superintendent ouer the whole countrie. Wherewith the Vayuod being contented, the Emperour sent thither doctor Petzen with sixe thousand souldiors, and a great summe of mony to pay the Vayuods souldiors, as he had before requested; and so

A ſo to take of them an oath, That they ſhould from thenceforth become his maieſties faithful ſeruants. Which Superintendent ſo by the emperor ſent, the Vayuod receiued with great honour, as vnto him of all others moſt welcome. Neuertheleſſe being again returned into TRANSYLVANIA, it was not long, but that (without regard of him) he began with new exactions to oppreſſe the people of the countrey, and in ſome ſort to tyrannize ouer them; vſing great ſeueritie againſt diuers of the nobilitie alſo, eſpecially ſuch as he knew to haue taken part before with the Cardinall, or now of late with Sigiſmund his couſin, or any way to haue fauoured his quarrell. All which he did without the conſent or good liking of Petzen, contrary to his promiſe made, No more to imbrue his hands in the bloud of the nobilitie of TRANSYLVANIA, without the knowledge or conſent of his Imperiall maieſtie, or the Superintendent by him appoynted: which for
B all that he had not done, hee could not poſſibly haue kept them (diſdaining to be gouerned by him) vnder his obeiſance. Neuertheles the Tranſyluanians taking it in euill part to be ſo oppreſſed, and the nobilitie almoſt extinguiſhed, yea and indeed to bee at all ruled by him; by generall conſent as if it had been but one man, riſe all vp in armes againſt him: inſomuch, that he finding himſelfe with his Valachians and other his fauourits too weake for them, retired with all ſuch as would follow him into the mountaines, and from thence ſent preſently for aid vnto the lord George Baſta, (a worthie captaine and then the emperours lieutenant in the vpper HVNGARIE) for the ſubduing of theſe rebellious people, and the reducing of them to their former obedience. Who by letters from Matthias the Archduke, at the inſtance of the Vayuod commaunded ſo to doe, with about ſix thouſand horſe and foot, and eight field pieces, remoued from CASSO-
C VIA in the vpper HVNGARIE the fourth of September: Where by the way came vnto him embaſſadours alſo from the people of TRANSYLVANIA now vp in armes, and confederate alſo againſt the Vayuod: who in like manner alſo requeſted his aid, pretending themſelues to be the emperours moſt loyall ſubiects, but not vnder the gouernment of ſuch a tyrant as was the Vayuod: alledging and exaggerating many his moſt cruell actions, and clearly proteſting, That for the preſent want of a good Gouernor they were enforced for the ſafegard of their owne liues to band themſelues together: which if happily it might be in any thing preiudicial vnto the emperour his claime and intereſt, which he with ſo great toile and coſt had procured in that prouince, it was againſt their wils, as enforced by neceſſitie to doe that they did in defence of themſelues. Which embaſſadors ſo ſent from the people, Baſta with all ſpeed diſpatched away backe againe,
D comforting them without farther ſtir to expect his arriuall in TRANSILVANIA: yet couenanting withall, That they ſhould before conceiue into writing the oath of their fidelitie and allegiance vnto his Imperiall maieſtie. Now might many and important conſiderations trouble the mind of Baſta in ſo doubtfull a caſe. To giue aid vnto the Vayuod againſt the people, was the expreſſe order from Matthias the Archduke the emperours lieutenant Generall: but to aid the people confederat againſt him as they had requeſted, ſeemed now both more profitable and honeſt, eſpecially hauing moſt certaine tokens of the ſmall and doubtful faith of the Vayuod; who onely by diſputation intereſſed in that prouince, was not ſo carefull of another mans; neither ſeeming to haue regard of Petzen, or of his own word giuen, for not farther imbruing his hands in the bloud of the nobilitie of TRANSILVANIA, without the emperours knowledge and leaue:
E vpon which promiſe was alſo grounded the archdukes order for giuing of him aid. So that ſuch breach of his faith, and contempt of Petzen had haſtened the conſpiracie of the people againſt him, deſpairing of all other health than that which by force of armes they could procure vnto themſelues. To ſtand doubtfull himſelfe, or to hold others in ſuſpence, vntill that by courrors in this new caſe he might receiue new inſtructions from the emperour or the archduke, had in it too much danger, as giuing leiſure to each partie to make ſides, and to encreaſe the ſlander of the laſt yeare, That he might ſo eaſily (and eſpecially from the Valachian) haue aſſured that prouince to his maieſtie, had he not beene an heartleſſe man of no reſolution, euen ſuch an one as durſt not looke vpon a cat (as ſome had ſaid:) all which might not a little pricke an honourable mind. To take part with the people confederat againſt the Vayuod, if it ſhould not happily fall
F out at the firſt encounter; might betwixt the two contendants giue an entrance vnto the third, either the Turke or the Polonian in the fauour of Bathor: but if it ſhould ſort to the quite contrarie, and ſo himſelfe to looſe the day; then he ſaw himſelfe void of all defence againſt the malicious, eſpecially in that the world commonly meaſureth the wiſdome vſed in any action, according to the ſucceſſe thereof, than which nothing can be more vnreaſonable, but aboue all others

in matters of warre. In this ſo troubled a tempeſt of contrary winds, of power to haue driuen a right good mariner out of his courſe, Baſta laid hand vpon the helme of good meaning, and ſpread the ſailes of ſuch diſcretion as taught him, in matters of war to be lawful for a Generall to depart euen from the inſtructions of his prince, not concerning the end, but the meanes leading to that end: eſpecially when the preſent occaſion ſo requireth, which the prince could not with reaſon before comprehend; as depending of the moſt mightie fortune of warre, which ſuffereth not ſo much delay as to expect counſell from far. So in this ambiguitie, Baſta reſolued to ioyne himſelfe vnto the confederats, moſt in his iudgement concerning his imperiall maiefty, as being the vttermoſt ſcope of his ſo great coſt and charge, to keepe the country of TRANSYLVANIA at his deuotion, which conſiſted in the people, and not in the woods or mountaines: the matter being not great by what meanes ſoeuer it were done, ſo that it were honourable and honeſt. G H

Baſta taketh part with the Tranſyluanians againſt the Vayuod in whoſe aid he was ſent.

Vpon this deſire Baſta ſet forward, and the 14 day arriued at TORDA, and there ioyned himſelf vnto the confederats (to the great wonder of the Vayuod) in whoſe help he was ſent:)where repoſing himſelfe one day conſulting and conſidering of their forces, about twelue thouſand ſtrong, with foure field pieces, beſides eight of his owne, with the ſixe thouſand ſouldiors he brought with him, in all about eighteene thouſand, he determined not to giue leyſure vnto the Vayuod to call vnto him farther helpe, hauing now with him about twentie thouſand foot, and twelue thouſand horſe, with ſeuen and twentie field pieces; amongſt whom were diuers of the Siculi, in hope of their auncient libertie, men of good account and ſort, with a mixture of the Coſſackes, Valachians, Raſcians, and Seruians, people of prey ſeruing onely to ſpoyle: whom Baſta knew to be farre inferiour in courage to his twelue thouſand foot and ſix thouſand horſe; I not onely for the valour of his owne men accuſtomed vnto the frontier ſeruice, but alſo for the confederates: who engaged with their goods, liues, and honour, and deſirous to be reuenged of the Vayuod, were like enough to ſtand well by it. Wherefore hee ſet forward the ſixteenth day, and in two dayes march came within ſight of the Vayuod: who hauing ſent out certaine great troups of horſemen to take view of the enemie, and ſeeing them repulſed, ſet fire on MIRISLO, a village laſt by, out of which they had before drawne certaine ſmall field pieces into the campe.

MIRISLO is a village two leagues on this ſide of ALBA IVLIA, directly vpon the high way, ſtretching from the ſide of Maracz, a nauigable riuer, vnto the foot of an hill; alongſt which the riuer running, ſometimes neerer, and ſometimes further off, together with the riſing of the hill, K maketh an vnequall liſt of ground, in ſome places halfe a mile broad and more, and in ſome other ſhut vp as it were into a narrow throat, as in the ſelfeſame place where the aforeaid village ſtandeth, and where the Vayuod lay encamped in a place of great aduantage, behind a great trench drawn from the riuer croſſe that little ſpace of ground betwixt the mountaine and the riuer. On this ſide, which from MIRISLO the further a man goeth, the further the plaine enlargeth, Baſta encamping cloſe vnto the village, oppoſed againſt the comming of the enemy three great corps du guard, two of them Hungarians, towards the hill fauoured with a Church, and the third towards the riuer, of the Almaine footmen, vnder the charge of Countie Tomaſo Cauriſli of BRESCIA, Sergeant Maior of the field, with all the artillery: who as in a place neer and very open vnto the enemy there entrenched himſelf, ſtill approching neerer and neerer both on the one ſide and the L other. Towards the euening of the ſelfeſame ſeuenteenth day came to Baſta one Peter Armenio with letters from the Vayuod, containing, That hauing vnderſtood of his arriuall in the campe of the conſpirators, hee now further deſired to know whether it were by the conſent and commandement of the emperour, or not; and how it came to paſſe, that he would ſo doe, conſidering the diuers chances of warre, the ſword hanging as it were euen ouer his head, if hee ſhould chance to loſe the battell? Whereunto Baſta anſwered, That the morrow following hee would ſhew him the authoritie he had from the emperour (alluding to the imperiall ſtanderd he carried with him:) and that as concerning the fortune and danger to enſue, he referred that vnto the wil and pleaſure of the Almightie, the iuſt iudge of all controuerſies. But in the meane time he exhorted him to leaue that prouince he had ſo euil gouerned, vnto his imperiall maieſtie, as he was M in dutie bound; promiſing him free paſſage into VALACHIA, and giuing him time to conſider therupon vntill eight a clock the next morning; after which time it ſhould be free for euery man to doe for himſelfe what he could. Which anſwere the Vayuod hauing read, enflamed with diſdaine, with many proud wordes full of threats and diſgrace, although it was then night, preſently

A ſently cauſed by the ſound of the drumme and trumpet the battell to be proclaimed againſt the next day.

On the other ſide, Baſſa after he had aſſured his campe, hauing not onely ſent, but gone himſelfe to haue the counſell of his owne eyes, for his better vnderſtanding how the enemy lay: and finding no reaſonable means for him there to attempt any exploit by, as well for the ſtrength of the trench before the front, and in part along the ſide of the enemies campe, as alſo for the danger of a riſing ground on the left hand, whereunto all the plaine betwixt the enemies campe and the village was ſubiect: thought it beſt to remoue, and to make a ſhort retreat about the ſpace of an Italian mile, according to the commodiouſnes of the place; thinking it no hard matter, of ſo proud an enemy, and not altogether ſo well acquainted with martial ſtratagemes, to gaine a no-
B table victory. This his purpoſe propounded in counſell, was greatly diſliked of the captains of the confederates: vnto whom it ſeemed more ſafetie to aſſault the Vayuod, yet lying in his ſtrength, than to retire before the face of an enemy ſo ſtrong and aduenturous: for that ſuch a retreat according to the maner of that countrey, would be deemed no other than a plaine flight: and to breake his order and ariſe, was (as they ſaid) but to diſcourage his own people, and to encourage his enemies. But Baſſa the better to perſuade them, promiſed therin to ſhew vnto them a more cunning kind of fight than was yet vnto them known; and declared the aſſurance that he in his owne perſon, with the Almaines in the rereward would giue them in that retreat, in ſuch ſort, as that they ſhould not loſe ſo much as a man, much leſſe they needed to feare to fall into any diſorder in ſo ſhort a ſpace, his purpoſe being only to giue the plain vnto the enemy, wherin
C to ſhew himſelfe in the open field. So the retreat being agreed vpon, the morning following being the eight and twentith of ſeptember, the three corps du guard (before ſpoken of) were betimes called backe, and the baggage ſent away: after which followed the Tranſyluanians and Hungarians, the Almaines in the rearward encloſing the great ordinance.

The Vayuod aware of their departure, ſent forth with a great troupe of horſemen, eſpecially of the Coſſackes, to take view of them, and to skirmiſh with them; which were ſo farre kept off by a company of musketiers in the rereward, as that they could not come ſo nigh as to doe any harme, although that all the way they went they were by them ſtill charged, to the great contentment of Baſſa, to ſee ſo good a beginning of his deſignes as might bring them all to their wiſhed effect. But when he ſaw the great artillerie vpon the carriages to come out of the village, D a certain ſigne that the enemy ſet forward with all his forces, he marched faire and ſoftly to giue him hope to ouertake him: and ſo retired as farre as he thought good from the village, hauing before thought of a conuenient place wherein his people might with roome ynough vpon aduantage ſtay: when as about halfe a mile from him, and as farre from the village, he might ſee the enemy march with his people in order of battell, then began he to march towards him alſo: and perceiuing the enemie to come on in one onely thick front, by reaſon of the ſtraightneſſe of the place, hauing on the right hand towards the riuer placed as it were all his horſemen, and towards the mountaine his footmen alone, and fiue hundred foot placed aloft without any artillerie, as it ſeemed he would haue done, hauing planted ſom below at the foot of the hill in the way, and in the middeſt, euen before the front of the battell, where the horſemen came after the foot-
E men: he alſo placed his ſquadron in one front onely, to the intent not to be encloſed by the enemie on the flanke of his army. The body of his maine battell conſiſted of one great ſquadron of about three thouſand Almaine footmen, flanked on each ſide with a hundred and fiftie Rutters of Silesia: before the ſquadron toward the right hand he had ſet a looſe wing of three hundred musketiers: in the right wing towards the hill he placed a companie of launces, with two ſquadrons of the country footmen: and in the left wing toward the riuer one ſquadron of Tranſyluanian footmen, and two of launces, for that the enemie was at that time verie ſtrong in horſemen: the Coſſacks, archers, and harquebuſiers he placed in the rereward: of his great artillery he would make no vſe, for that hauing not much, he would not ſtand vpon the defence therof, but deſired rather with al ſpeed to come to the ſword with the enemy, vnacquainted with ſuch cloſe
F fight, foot to foot; and well the leſſe fit, by reaſon of their light armour. And therfore he thought it beſt firſt to ſet forward his ſquadron of Almains to giue the charge, bending towards the right hand, amongſt the thickeſt of the footmen towards the artillerie at the foot of the hill, as there whereas was the ſtrength of the enemies infanterie. And doubting in the performing hereof, to be charged on the left ſide with a great ſquadron of about three thouſand lances, which ſeemed

to

to ſtand vpon that wing to giue the firſt charge; hee gaue order vnto Rodowiz his lieutenant, G and colonell of the Rutters, which had the leading of the left wing, that hee ſhould at a certaine ſigne giuen, ſet forward towards the left hand, for the charging of that great ſquadron. So his people being ſet in order, and the manner of proceeding ſet downe, hee putting on his helmet, with cheerefull countenance ſaid, That at that time hee truſted hee ſhould ſhew vnto the Vayuod, that his trunchion could doe more than his ſcimitar: And himſelfe ſetting forward betwixt the ſquadron of the Almaine footmen and the wing of the musketiers, about two houres after noone, marched faire and ſoftly towards the enemie: who without mooving expected the diſcharging of their artillerie; whereunto the neerer that the enemie came vnto it, the leſſe harme it did him, by ſhooting either ouer or ſhort in the field, which eaſily aſcended.
The wing of musketiers went directly to giue a charge vnto the artillerie; and the ſquadron to- H wards the foot of the hill, where Baſta deſired forcibly to charge, that thereby they might bee enforced to ſpend their firſt vollies, and with ſome diſcouragement or diſorder to retire, pre-ſently came in all afront iuſt vpon the ſigne giuen; and ſo with his Almaine footmen and the Rutters on the right hand, encloſed and compaſſed in behind the greateſt part of the enemies footmen. At which very inſtant, the Rutters on the left hand alſo ſo couragiouſly charged vp-on the three thouſand launces, that better could not haue beene deſired of any band of moſt old and expert ſouldiors. The launces retiring without any hurt, and the firſt volley diſcharenſued preſently a great ſlaughter and ouerthrow, onely fortie of Baſta his men being ſlaine, and as many hurt; where of the enemies were loſt in the battell ten thouſand: and greater had I the ſlaughter beene, if the village and approach of the night had not couered many of them that fled, and ſtayed the purſuite of the victors that followed them. Which putteth mee in remembrance of the great victorie that Scipio Aſiaticus had againſt Antiochus, wherein were ſlaine of the Romanes but three hundred (although that in the fight one of the wings ſtood for a time doubtfull) there being loſt of the enemies aboue fiftie thouſand. Howbeit there were afterwards found in all (as was by the peaſants the countrey reported) twentie thouſand ſlaine in this battell. By this victorie Baſta recouered many enſignes and much armour, before ſent by the Emperour vnto the Vayuod, together with all his tents and baggage. And preſently after the ouerthrow there were many troupes of horſemen ſent out euerie way with proclamation, To ſpare the liues of ſuch of the Siculi as ſhould lay downe their armes: of K whome many were ſent priſoners vnto diuers places, eſpecially to FOGARAS, a ſtrong towne toward VALACHIA. As for the Vayuod himſelfe, hee with certaine Coſſakes eſcaped by flight.

The morrow following, Baſta diſpatched away the Countie Caurioli, to enforme the em-perour of all the particularities of the ſucceſſe of that expedition: who ſeemed to bee therewith pleaſed, yet neither gaue reward vnto the Countie, neither commended Baſta in that hee had done, (foreſeeing perhaps what was to enſue thereof) although hee had in writing before approoued his reſolution and motion made in fauour of the Confederates. Staying that day in that quarter, Baſta gaue order vnto the Chiaki, to ſend out a thouſand horſemen to pur-
This Chiaki was the chiefe man and as it were the ringleader of the Tranſyl-uanians into rebellion. ſue the flying Vayuod: who in ſtead of ſo doing, ioyning themſelues with other their con- L ſorts, ſetled themſelues to ranſacke ALBA IVLIA, vnder the colour, that there was the Vay-uods wealth and ſubſtance; yet (as the manner of ſuch men is) ſparing neither marchant nor citizen: which worthily ſeemed vnto Baſta a great wrong, for to ſee the innocent puniſhed, and the guiltie to eſcape free. And albeit that hee made what haſt he might thitherwards with all his campe, and ſo ſtayed one day not farre from thence, to haue giuen ſome redreſſe vnto the ſpoyle that had happened: yet was all that his labour loſt, for that ſo many of the greater ſort and chiefeſt amongſt them had their hands therein, with whom hee thought it more wiſedome as then to diſſemble, than to fall into any rearmes of ſeueritie, without hope of doing any good. So hee reſolued in all haſt to march towards FOGARAS (whither hee heard ſay the Vay- M uod was come with new forces out of VALACHIA and MOLDAVIA) and in in ſixe daies march came to CIBINIVM, where hee receiued certaine newes, That the Great Chauncellour of PO-LONIA, and Sigiſmund (ſometime the Tranſyluanian prince) were with a ſtrong armie vpon the frontiers of MOLDAVIA; hauing ſent before them Moyſes the Siculian, with about eight thouſand of the Siculi (his ſouldiours) to what purpoſe was eaſie to bee ſeene. Which aduer-

A aduertiſement interrupted the courſe of Baſta his victorie, for that it ſeemed not reaſonable to purſue the enemie, and to leaue behind him a doubt of ſo great importance: and eſpecially, for that he thought he could not aſſure himſelfe of the aid of the countrey people, in caſe that Sigiſmund their old prince were once ſeene in TRANSILVANIA. Wherefore hee thought good to ſtay where he was, to prouide for all euents as need ſhould be; and ſo reſolued to ſend the Chiaki, and one Ladiſlaus Pithi to parley with Moſes, who made a ſhew of no great moment of his good will towards the confederats. In the meane time came two meſſengers from the Vayuod, offering in his name, that he ſhould doe whatſoeuer were in the behalfe of the emperour to bee impoſed vpon him: vnto whom theſe conditions were by Baſta and the reſt of the counſell propounded: Firſt, that hee ſhould for euer reſigne all the claime hee had or might haue into the
B countrey of TRANSYLVANIA; then, that he altogether with his armie ſhould giue his oath of fidelitie vnto his imperiall maieſtie; alſo, that he ſhould foorthwith through VALACHIA goe with his armie vnto the frontiers of MOLDAVIA, to ſtay the Polonians from further entrance; and moreouer, to giue his wife and little ſonne in hoſtage for the performance of theſe things. With which meſſengers was ſent one Sebaſtian Techelli, to receiue the oath and promiſed hoſtages: vnto whom was appointed for the place of their ſafe keeping, the biſhops caſtle in ALBA IVLIA, the Vayuod hauing before requeſted, that they might be ſo kept in TRANSYLVANIA: although Baſta thought it much better to haue had them kept in the vpper HVNGARIE. This agreement being made, Baſta kept on his way towards FOGARAS, which he found alreadie poſſeſſed by the Chiaki, and ſo from thence to CORONA. After which the Vayuod diſtruſting of the articles
C agreed vpon, went directly into VALACHIA, but not at all into MOLDAVIA; not ſo much diſcomfited with the forces of the Polonians whom he went againſt (not doubting to giue them a great ouerthrow) as for the diſtruſt he had of Moſes the Siculian, who in the battell might ſhew himſelfe his enemie behind him. Now whether it were for the diſtruſt hee had in his owne followers, or onely for feare of treaſon by the Polonians plotted, being not likely that they with ſo ſmall forces were come to fight, without ſome greater ſecret deceit; hee not knowing whom to truſt or to feare, of his owne accord tooke his flight into the ſtrength of the mountaines, without any great loſſe of his people, hauing left his baggage behind him, which was aſſailed and taken by the Haiducks and ſuch other ſharkers enured to prey, and alwaies readie in like occaſion helpe to ſpoile and chaſe them that are alreadie running: although that afterwards in diuers
D skirmiſhes with the Turkes (who to cauſe him the rather to turne his backe vnto the Polonians, had preſumptuouſly ſcoured vp and downe the countrey) he loſt many. In fine, giuing MOLDAVIA loſt, he was now out of hope how to be able to hold only VALACHIA, his old gouernment. Euen he which but a little before commaunded aboue an hundred thouſand ſouldiors in field: hee (which in deſpight of who ſaid nay) was able to commaund VALACHIA and MOLDAVIA, and happily the other countries alſo neere vnto him; as hauing receiued the commaund of TRANSYLVANIA, as gouernour for the emperour: he that made CONSTANTINOPLE to tremble, and found no empire equall to his deſignes. But it fareth oftentimes with the great, as with birds of prey, who greedily ſeeking to prey vpon others, become themſelues a prey vnto other, greater than themſelues: for they neuer contented, and attributing only vnto their owne
E valour and wiſedome, their owne proſperous proceedings, are the true ſhoares of the vnſtable wheele of fortune: or what ſay I of fortune? being rather the verie children of follie. So commonly falleth it out with princes (eſpecially the new) which in the garboiles of warre betwixt their mightie neighbours, not gouerned by their owne wiſdome, reſt themſelues only vpon the aduice of their counſellours, are by them led they wote not whither, for the greateſt intereſt they haue in them. For had the Vayuod had but the leaſt in-ſight into politicall gouernment; hee might well haue vnderſtood, that amongſt ſo many mightie princes, hee could not much grow or yet well root himſelfe, without the aſſured ſtay of ſome one or other of them. He ſhould alſo haue knowen within what compaſſe a new prince ought to haue vſed ſeueritie and rigour; and that he ought to abſtaine from all offence in good, or otherwiſe, which might any way procure F vnto him the diſpleaſure or hatred of his ſubiects. Whereas his counſellours not ſo much reſpecting his profit as their owne, had not the power or not the will to perſuade him ſo by good meanes to plant himſelfe ſure in TRANSYLVANIA; but ſo both caſt him headlong from his high eſtate, and at the ſame time furthered the loſſe of CANISIA, a matter of important conſeqence.

A reconciliatiō made betwixt Michael the Vayuod & Baſta

Michael for feare of being betrayed vnto the Polonians, taketh his flight into the mountaines.

Now

Now lay Baſta encamped in the field in TRANSYLVANIA, when a meſſenger came vnto G him from the great Chauncellor of POLONIA, to declare vnto him, That it was not his purpoſe to trouble TRANSYLVANIA, hauing no ſuch order from the king: albeit that he would aduiſe the Tranſyluanians if they wiſhed to liue in quiet, to make choice of a prince of their owne nation, and ſuch an one as the Turke ſhould well like of, whereas otherwiſe they ſhould but ſeeke their owne deſtruction, together with their neighbors. Which his counſell was well marked of them all, albeit that it was thought by many of the wiſer ſort not ſo much to proceed of any good meaning he had towards the Tranſyluanians, as of an old grudge and inueterat hatred he had alwaies borne againſt the houſe of AVSTRIA: as alſo that he euen then countenanced the prince Sigiſmund with his armie, to no other end, but by him to raiſe vp new ſtirres in that prouince, and ſo to draw it from the emperours obeiſance, although thereby it became againe tri- H butarie vnto the Turke, who in all theſe matters had a great hand. Yea ſome ſticked not to ſay, That he couertly aimed at that principalitie for his ſonne, howſoeuer he masked the ſame vnder the ſhew of Sigiſmund the late prince. But vnto him anſwer was giuen by the Tranſyluanians in generall (with thankes for his good will) that in all their conſultations they would haue a princi-pall regard of their owne welfare, together with the common. Which anſwere he hauing recei-ued, foorthwith placed on Simon (the brother of Hieremias the Moldauian) Vayuod of VA-The Chancellor placeth a new Vayuod in Valachia in ſtead of Michael, by him driuen out LACHIA in ſtead of Michael by him driuen out, and ſo leauing a conuenient number of ſouldi-ors with him, returned himſelfe towards POLONIA. Vnto which election ſo made by the Polo-nian, the Turks craftily gaue place, knowing well to play the foxes where they could not play the lyons, wiſely for a time comporting the iniurie: and the old Chancelor as craftie as they, ha- I uing a ſecret purpoſe by occaſion of theſe preſent troubles, to preferre his ſonne at length vnto the principalitie of TRANSYLVANIA, and thereunto alſo to ioyne the countries of MOLDAVIA, and VALACHIA, had therein of purpoſe placed the aforeſaid Simon, a man of no valour, and of a ſmal apprehenſion, whom he might againe at his pleaſure diſplace, and ioyne thoſe prouinces vnto his new purchaſe; which he could not ſo well doe, if he ſhould haue there placed a man of greater reach and courage. So worke the heads of the great, and ſo trauell the braines of the ambitious aſpiring.

Baſta vnderſtanding of the retiring of the Polonians, entred into conſultation with the Chiaki False rumours raiſed to haue terrified Baſta and other the principall men of that prouince (which lodged with the armie in the country villages thereabout) for calling together the ſtates and people, to make choice of ſome ſuch men as K they thought meeteſt to be ſent vnto the emperour, to know his pleaſure for the gouernment of that prouince. But now in the meane time, whileſt there was no ſuſpition of the forraine enemie, began to work certaine malecontents, which thinking with greater libertie to liue vnder a weake prince than vnder one of greater power, with one voice cried out, That Sigiſmund with a great power was entred into the confines of TRANSILVANIA, one whiles towards VALACHIA, another while by the way of MOLDAVIA; and that the ſtrength of the country and others thereby ſtill reſorted vnto him: with other ſuch like inuentions, of purpoſe deuiſed to haue made Baſta ſuddenly departed, or at leaſtwiſe to haue troubled the Diet or aſſembly called, and the conſulta-tion alſo. But he well aduiſed of their purpoſe, moued not out of his quarter, but there lay verie priuatly, to declare therby the great confidence he had in the thankfulneſſe of the nobilitie of the L countrey, as by him deliuered from the oppreſſion of the Vayuod: as alſo to make them to vn-derſtand, That the gouernment to be appointed, was not to be ſetled in the ſole power of a tyrant, but in the fidelitie of the ſubiects protected vnder a moſt gentle, royall, and moſt fatherlike gouernment, not ambitiouſly ſought after, but moſt voluntarily of themſelues offered, and (for the common good) by the emperour accepted. Beſide that, he knew right well how that Caſtaldo (in like caſe before in the yeare 1551 ſent into TRANSYLVANIA with eight thouſand Almaines) left behind him his armie, and without any precedent courteſie went priuatly to ALBA IVLIA, where queen Iſabel had for her defence aſſembled a Diet of all the ſtates, and there by well handling of the matter got to Ferdinand the emperor that kingdom, which he could not by the feare of his forces haue gained: for which doing, Writers attribute vnto him the name of great wiſ- M dome; notwithſtanding that the yeare following he was forced to abandon his conqueſt, but yet not through any default in himſelfe.

But it is truely ſaid, That men pleaſured, according to the occaſion change their manners, as doth the chamelion his color according to the place: nothing being by nature ſo ſhort, nothing
of

A of leſſe life than the remembrance of a benefit with the vnthankfull, which the greater it is, the more it is repaied with vngratitude; either by making it to haue been of little worth, or to haue proceeded not of courteſie, but from ſome other more priuat and proper conſiderations of the giuer. The Diet (aforeſaid) being aſſembled, diuers broiles were their raiſed by the malecontents, as vſually it commeth to paſſe where the people haue to do with the gouernment; apt to be moued with euerie rumour, alwaies readie to change their opinion as ſtraight glutted therewith, headſtrong, faithleſſe, all in words to no end: Some of them in that aſſemblie cried out, that the Almaines might be paied, diſcharged, and thanked for the paines they had taken for them as their neighbours, with offering to doe them the like pleaſure as their occaſions ſhould require: otherwiſe cried to haue them put all to the ſword, ſo much they were deuoid of reaſon:
B others cried out as faſt, that they were not by any meanes to endure the gouernment of Maximilian the Archduke, but by ſome nominated vnto them would needs haue a prince of their owne countrie, and ſuch an one as the great Turke ſhould well like of, as the Chancellor had perſuaded them. Baſta for all that not diſmaied with ſo vnexpected an encounter (albeit that he began to ſuſpect that he had loſt all his labour, if he were not in ſhort time with greater forces relieued) at ſuch time as the Chiaki with other the chiefe men amongſt the people, came as their maner was euery other day to viſit him: with couragious ſpeech and vnappauled countenance told them plainly. That he well perceiued their drift & purpoſe; and yet doubted not either of their oath of obedience giuen vnto his Imperial maieſtie, either of the freſh remembrance of the great benefit they had from him ſo lately receiued; and in caſe it might happen them little to
C eſteem of thoſe things (greater than which could not happen amongſt men) that yet they ſhould well know, that he was not a man to bee feared with words, but fully reſolued not to ſtirre one foot thence with his forces but rather to loſe his life, which he would for all that ſell as deere as he could. Whereunto anſwer was giuen with much courteous ſpeech, That he ſhould not giue eare vnto any the ſpeeches of the light vulgar people; but to content himſelfe that the Nobilitie in whoſe hands the chiefe power of that prouince was, had not done any thing not beſeeming themſelues. So after much diſpute, were appointed thre perſons according to the three eſtates (the Nobilitie, the Commons, & the State in general) to go vnto the Emperor, to requeſt of him Maximilian the Archduke for their Gouernour: with ſpeciall requeſt alſo, that it would pleaſe him not to ouercharge with forein ſoldiors that prouince alreadie ſore impoueriſhed; eſpecially
D hauing in it ſelfe people ſufficient for the defence thereof, & more nimble to encounter with the Turkes, than the heauie and ſlow Almaines and they alſo of double charge. Theſe difficulties with much adoe thus appeaſed by ſuch as ſtood faſt for the emperor, Baſta thought it not good againe to call any ſuch aſſembly, hoping that time and the emperors great wiſdome, would for all theſe matters find conuenient remedie. Yet ſaw he plainly the mind of the people was to reſolue to remaine for euer free, if they ſhould haue come to a ſecond conſultation; and in them a princely deſire to commaund rather than to be commaunded: Yea in that ſelfeſame Diet the Chiaki was declared Gouernour on the behalfe of the people, with authoritie in many things of himſelfe to determine without calling togither of any aſſemblie of the reſt of the States: which they ſaid they did only vntill they were by his Imperiall maieſtie prouided of a Gouernor. Ne-E uertheleſſe Baſta well perceiued more than a Tribunitial power to be now ioined by the people vnto the emperours commiſſioners, knowing that this Chiaki was in great hope to haue been proclaimed prince of the confederats, in caſe they had not been preſently relieued againſt the Vayuod: and hauing in him yet noted ſtill his great ambition, for that marching from TORDA toward the Vayuod, he cauſed to bee carried before him a ſpeare with an Hungarian cap, and a plume of feathers vpon a launce, in token of his chiefe command; albeit that afterwards at the complaint of Baſta, pretending therein a wrong to be done vnto his regiment marching vnder the Imperiall ſtandard, he tooke it downe: neither was he then a little ſuſpected to haue ſuffered his ſoldiors to haue ſacked ALBA IVLIA, as alſo to haue ſurpriſed FOGARAS, and to haue vſed diuers other meanes all tending vnto popularitie and ambitious aſpiring: wherein he deemed
F it yet better to diſſemble than to proceed farther, and then to do it indeed when he had power ſufficient.

The ſtout ſpeech of Baſta, vnto the Chiaki and the reſt of the nobilitie of Tranſyluania.

The next day following came all the Counſell of that prouince, with the Deputies (appointed to haue gone vnto the emperor) and the people vnto the houſe of Baſta, requeſting him (although ſuch their manner of comming might ſeeme to exceed the bounds of requeſt) that he would ſend his Germanes out of the countrie, and ſo after ſo many troubles to giue it leaue a G little to breath: as for himſelfe, that he might ſtay at ALBA IVLIA, vntill the men deputed to that purpoſe might go vnto his maieſtie with their requeſts. Baſta not a little troubled with ſuch an imperious requeſt, and now (but not before) perceiuing the occaſion of this great diſcontent-

The errour of Baſta. ment, ſaw himſelfe much deceiued in a moſt material point and the ground of all this action, by truſting too much vnto his owne too ſmall forces, too weake for the defence of his own perſon, much leſſe to keepe vnder ſo populous a prouince, ſuch as before in the yeare 1552 vnder the leading of Caſtaldo, had of it ſelfe ſent out 70 thouſand fighting men for the beſieging of LIP-PA, and now vpon the ſudden twelue thouſand with a few noblemen in the face of a mighty and armed enemie; where they now held an armed conſultation with him, the nobilitie meeting togither with their great retinues; and ſo much the greater, by how much the ſuſpition was the H more by them feared, for them to be enforced to reſolue vpon any thing contrarie to their good liking: whereas he contenting himſelfe only with their oath without any other hoſtages, and ſo giuing aid vnto the confederats, had put himſelfe vpon their faith, togither with all his people, into the middeſt of TRANSYLVANIA; a matter of far greater importance than any pledge they were able to haue giuen him. Beſides that, of the ſix thouſand men which he had brought with him into that countrie, three thouſand fiue hundred of SILESIA now brought to two thouſand, could not be perſuaded longer to ſtay without their pay before hand, the pay of their countrie being alreadie ſpent: & the reſt drawne out of the garriſons of the vpper HVNGARIE, or elſe there preſſed, were at a certaine time to returne. Yet neuertheleſſe he attempted in ſome ſort to ſatisfie their requeſt, for not grieuing of the countrie, by requeſting of them to deliuer vn- I to him ſome ſtrong place, whereinto he putting his men into garriſon, they might ſo lie without any further charge or trouble to the countrie, liuing vpon their owne wages. Which when he could not obtaine, and withall conſidering that if thoſe few of his people which yet remained could be contented to ſtay with him, the retaining of them might giue occaſion vnto the deſirous of new ſtirs vpon euery the leaſt diſorder of the ſoldiors, to alter the matter and their plea-ſure; as had happened vnto the eight thouſand Almaines of Caſtaldo, driuen ſometimes out of that countrie vnder the colour of ſome inſolencie by them committed, although others had bin the chiefe doers thereof, namely about ſome twentie Polonians: hee reſolued of all theſe things to giue notice to the Court, and ſo faire and ſoftly to march with his ſouldiors vnto the confines of that countrie, and to ſaue his eight pieces of artillerie with his other munition in Sa- K mos Viuar caſtle, a ſtrong fortreſſe a good way within the confines, which togither with the ſtrong caſtle of KVIVAR, Aga Leche an Albanoiſe and Generall of the Vayuods horſemen de-liuered to Zakell captaine of ZACCOMAR, one of his maieſties commiſſioners; who there prouided for the Gouernor Baſta his familiar fauorit: although that the Tranſyluanians had with great promiſes ſought to haue croſſed ſuch deliuerie of the aforeſaid caſtles, and to haue had them in their owne power.

The diſcretion of the doer is not alwaies to be deemed by the euent of the thing done.

Wherfore Baſta not deceiued, but by neceſſitie enforced, yeelded that he could not hold, and gaue that he could not ſell, making a vertue of neceſſitie; deceiued in the euent of the matter which he had propounded vnto himſelfe from the beginning, for the aſſurance of that countrie vnto the emperor, by an excuſable error, if it be true that ſome wiſe men ſay, Nothing to be more L vnreaſonable than by the euent of matters to iudge of their wiſedome by whom they were managed; which conſiſteth not in diuining before of the certaintie of the euent, but in the reaſona-ble coniecture thereof, by the means leading thereunto, than which nothing is more deceitfull, as not depending from our owne actions onely, but from other mens alſo more groſſe and vnreaſonable: none knowing better how much the wiſedome of man deceiueth it ſelfe, than thoſe which are vnto themſelues true witneſſes of the euent of their owne conſultations. Neuerthe-leſſe the matter was afterward ſo well handled by Baſta, Petzen, and others the emperours great fauourits in TRANSYLVANIA, that in a Diet holden by the Tranſyluanians, he was with a conuenient guard againe by them receiued as the Emperours lieutenant, vntill further order were by him taken for the gouernment and aſſurance of that countrie: the Chiaki and his complices M faintly conſenting thereunto, as not greatly pleaſed therewith. Neither had Baſta much cauſe to be proud of ſuch his gouernment, hauing therof no longer aſſurance than pleaſed that fickle people to affoord him: yet ſith no better could be had, hee muſt take it as he might, deeming it better in ſome ſort for the preſent to hold it for the Emperour, than not at all: with which his

But whileſt things thus paſſed (as we haue ſaid) in TRANSYLVANIA and HVNGARIE (the treatie for peace betwixt the emperour and the Turke being vaniſhed into ſmoake;) Ibrahim Baſſa the Turkes generall in HVNGARIE, hauing all the laſt Winter made great preparation for the inuaſion of the emperours territories, and the doing of ſome notable enterpriſe for the recouerie of his reputation ſomewhat impaired by the euill ſucceſſe of the laſt yeares warres; and euen in theſe his greateſt preparations of this yeare, not a little troubled by the mutinie of the Ianizaries and Spahi for want of their pay at CONSTANTINOPLE, as alſo with the rebellion in CARAMANIA: now at length in the latter end of Auguſt (by order from the Grand ſignior his great lord and maſter) began to ſet forward with his armie from BELGRADE, ſuppoſed to be
B aboue two hundred thouſand men ſtrong. And comming to BABOTSCA, a ſtrong fortreſſe of the Chriſtians in the neither HVNGARIE, ſat downe before it, and hauing planted his artillerie, furiouſly battered it, with purpoſe to haue the next day aſſaulted it: but the captaine of the caſtle conſidering the weakeneſſe of his garriſon to withſtand ſo puiſſant an enemie, and that the wals to be alreadie ſore ſhaken with the furie of the great ordinance, came to a reaſonable compoſition with the Baſſa, and ſo deliuered vnto him the place. Which exploit done and the caſtle to him ſurrendred, he marched from thence to CANISIA, a ſtrong towne in the frontiers of STIRIA, of moſt men before ſuppoſed a place impregnable; for that it was ſituat in a very deepe mariſh, and furniſhed with a ſtrong garriſon of valiant ſouldiors, part Hungarians and part Almains: after this ſtrong town Ibrahim the great Baſſa eſpecially longed, ſo to free thoſe frontires
C of the Turkes from the often incurſions that the garriſon ſoldiors of that place made therin; as alſo by the taking of that ſo ſtrong a fortreſſe from the Chriſtians, to open a more free and ſafe paſſage for the Turks into AVSTRIA, to the indangering of other places of the empire alſo farther off. Wherefore encamping his great armie on the ſide of the marſh which compaſſed the Iſle round whereon the towne ſtood, he began with fagots and earth to fill vp the mariſh, ſo to paſſe ouer his armie; they in the towne in the meane time not ceaſing with their thundring ſhot to diſturbe them, and to doe them what harme they might: who for all that proceeding in their worke, had brought it now almoſt cloſe vnto the iſland, where whileſt they were about to haue landed, they were by the ſouldiours of the garriſon ſo encountred, that hauing loſt a number of their men as well Ianizaries as others, with two of their beſt captaines alſo, they were by plaine
D valour enforced to retire. But preparing themſelues againſt the next day with a greater force to haue againe returned vnto the aſſault of the Iſle, they ſaw the Imperiall armie now at their backs, and come ſo neere them, that with their artillerie they did them great harme; which put them in no ſmall feare, ſeeing themſelues encloſed betwixt the towne and the campe, and both out of the one and the other to receiue no ſmall hurt, as well with the ſmall ſhot as the great: beſides that out of the campe diuers whole bands ſometimes ſallied, diſcharging great vollies of ſhot euen into their trenches. In the Imperiall armie were about two and fortie thouſand horſe and foot, men of diuers nations, vnder the leading of duke Mercurie, now Generall of the Emperors forces in HVNGARIE; with whom were alſo the lords Nadaſti, Eſdrin, Bacchian, and the Gouernour of CROATIA, with diuers other famous captaines, come thither for the reliefe of CA-
E NISIA, a place of ſo great importance for the defence of that ſide of the countrie, and to helpe that it fell not into the power of the barbarous enemie. But Ibrahim Baſſa vnderſtanding by his eſpials the ſmall number of the Chriſtians; and well knowing how much he was too ſtrong for them by reaſon of his great multitude, went out againſt them, & finding them as readie as himſelfe, ioyned battell with them, with great ſlaughter of men both on the one ſide and the other: which bloudie fight (the victorie yet ſtanding doubtfull, but in all mens iudgement more inclining vnto the Chriſtians than to the Turkes) was at length by the comming on of the night broken off. At which time the Chriſtians retiring themſelues into their trenches, the Turkes ſtood all the night in the field with their weapons in their hands, as fearing to haue bin againe in the night by their enemies aſſailed. Meane while the Chriſtian captaines in the campe at variance
F amongſt themſelues, and ſo not now to be commaunded by duke Mercurie their Generall (at ſuch time as the Turkes preſuming on their multitude dared them to battell the next day) could by no meanes be perſuaded to go out againſt them, or once to ſtirre out of their trenches. Inſomuch that the Generall of the Tartars therupon taking courage, made an inrode into the countrie thereby, and meeting with two hundred wagons laded with victuals going vnto the Chri-

Canisia beſieged by the Turkes.

ſuch want aroſe in the Chriſtian campe, that hauing not what to eat, and out of hope of any new ſupplie of reliefe in time to come, they were glad by night to diſlodge and retire, which could not ſo ſecretly be done, but that it was by the Turkes perceiued, who preſently following after them in the taile of the armie, cut off about three thouſand of them, with certaine pieces of great ordinance, and moſt part of the baggage; the reſt of the armie in the meane time retiring farther off into places of more ſafetie. From this victorie the Turks returned againe to the ſiege of CANISIA, where after a few daies, the garriſon ſouldiors now out of hope to be in good time relieued, ſuddenly fell into mutinie, refuſing any longer to defend the towne now hardly laied vnto by the Turkes; and the rather, for that diuers of the Hungarians were alreadie fled out of the town vnto the Baſſa, hauing (as it was thought) reuealed vnto him the whole eſtate of the be- H ſieged: ſo that now there was no remedie but that the towne muſt be deliuered vnto the enemie, Canisia yeelded vnto the Turkes although Paradiſer with ſome other of the captaines did what they might (as they ſaid afterwards) to haue perſuaded the contrarie. Whereupon they came to parley with the Baſſa, and couenanting with him that they might with bag and baggage depart, and with a ſafe conuoy be brought ouer the riuer Mur, promiſed to yeeld vnto him the towne: all which the Baſſa granted, fearing how to haue bin able to haue kept the field, if they ſhould for any long time haue holden out, Winter now ſo faſt approaching. So the two and twentith of October the towne was vnto the Baſſa right cowardly deliuered, and the garriſon ſoldiors with their baggage in an hundred wagons let them by the Turks, ſafely conducted ouer the Mur as was vnto them pro-miſed. After the agreement made for the yeelding vp of the towne, the Baſſa in courteſie ſent I vnto Paradiſer the gouernour a very rich gowne of cloth of gold; which albeit that he refuſed, yet was it afterwards laid to his charge as a preſumption of ſome treacherous colluſion betwixt him and the Baſſa for the betraying of the towne, which it was thought he might much longer foure thouſand foot and fiue hundred horſe, all old expert ſoldiors. And immeniatly after without reſiſtance, forraged the countrie round about CANISIA, burning all before him as he went; the poore Chriſtian inhabitants ſtil flying as faſt as they could for ſafegard of their liues. But hauing thus with the ſpoile of the countrie well pleaſed his ſouldiors, he deſirous to haue the ſame againe in time repeopled, as thereby to yeeld vnto the Turkes the more profit, ſtaid their farther K outrage, vpon great paine forbidding the ſame; by open proclamations in euery place ſet vp, inuiting the Chriſtians without feare of farther harme to return againe into the countrie, where ſubmitting them vnto the great Sultans obeiſance, they ſhould vnder his protection ſafely dwel, without any tribute to be of them exacted for the ſpace of three yeares next following. Which proclamations were in his name thus publiſhed.

Ibrahim Baſſa to the inhabitants of the countrey about CANISIA, greeting.

Ibrahim Baſſa his proclamation. We Ibrahim Baſſa by the grace of God, Viſier, and Couſin vnto the moſt puiſſant and inuincible Sul- L tan Mahomet, Emperor of the Turkes, vnto all the inhabitants of the marches about CANISIA, and the reſt of the countrie of STEIRMARCK, from the greateſt to the leaſt, greeting. Whereas we haue willingly heard that ſome of you willing to ſubmit your ſelues vnto the great Sultan, and to ſweare vnto him fealtie, are againe returned vnto your old dwellings: We promiſe and aſſure you vpon the faith of the ſaid emperor, that whoſoeuer ſhall be found neere vnto the fortreſſe of CANISIA now belonging vnto the great Sultan, with all reuerence ſubmitting himſelfe as his ſubiect vnder his gouernment, acknowledging him for his ſouereigne; ſhall enioy moe priuiledges than euer he did before, and alſo be protected in the ſame. And for that we know that your houſes are for the moſt part deſtroied, as alſo your poſteritie; you ſhall therefore for theſe three yeare next following be exempted and free from all tributes and charges whatſoeuer, to the intent you may the better recouer your ſelues. Of which grace if you ſhall willingly accept, M we promiſe you, that neither you, your wiues, or children, ſhall be in any thing wronged, or your goods in any part impaired, but ſo much as in vs poſſibly is to be defended: ſo that ſo many of you as pleaſe, may in ſafetie returne into your owne old dwellings, giuing before knowledge thereof vnto the Gouernour of this our fortreſſe. Giuen in our campe after the conqueſt of CANISIA.

Many

A Many of theſe poore countrey people before fled for feare of the Turkes, and not knowing where to beſtow themſelues, now vpon this proclamation returned again to their antient dwelling places, there to begin the world againe vnder the Turkiſh obeiſance. But for that Countie Serinus was the man whom of all others in that countrey the great Baſſa ſought after, as him whom he moſt feared after his departure to trouble this his new conqueſt, and to ſeeke to be reuenged; hauing in this ſo generall a calamitie of SYRIA his countrie, loſt twentie villages of his owne, quite burnt by the Turks, and the people moſt ſlaine or els taken priſoners: the Baſſa hauing many times before ſought to haue perſuaded him to haue yeelded his obedience vnto the Turkiſh Sultan, and now in hope after ſo great loſſe to bring him in, before he were come into the vtter ruine of all his fortunes (now by the loſſe of CANISIA, and the entrance of the Turkes
B into SYRIA, not a little endangered) writ vnto him as followeth:

Ibrahim Baſſa his letters vnto the Countie Serinus.

We Ibrahim Baſſa, chiefe of the Vifier Baſſaes, and couſin vnto the moſt puiſſant Sultan Mahomet, to the countie Serinus ſendeth greeting. We haue oftentimes heretofore written vnto thee concerning the matter thou knoweſt of: but what the cauſe is that we receiued no anſwere, we cannot tell. Yet could I not but write to thee againe, that if yet thou canſt be content to begin the matter aright, and to ſubmit thy ſelfe vnto our protection, we will be readie to receiue thee. Thou ſeeſt, that what we foretold thee, is now more than fulfilled both vpon thee and thine, which thou wouldeſt neuer beleeue. Neuertheleſſe, for the ſtaying of the further effuſion of the bloud as well of thy ſubiects as ours, and to come to ſome good attonement, it is high time for thee to lay thine hand vpon thine heart, and to conſider how much more it con-
C cerneth thee than vs, and that the benefit therof redoundeth more vnto thine than ours. What our affection is towards thee, Hierome the Vayuod can tell thee. Fare thou well from our campe after the conqueſt of CANISIA the ſeuenth of Nouember, 1600.

Ibrahim Baſſa returneth vnto his armie to Belgrade.

But theſe letters being alſo as the reſt anſwered with ſilence, the great Baſſa hauing diſpoſed of all as he thought beſt at CANISIA and in the countrie thereabout, returned with his armie to BELGRADE, there to Winter: hauing before fully certified the great Sultan of all his proceedings, and the ſucceſſe of this war, vaunting after his vaine maner, the next Spring to beſiege VIENNA alſo, if it ſhould pleaſe him ſo to commaund. Of all which things Mahomet vnderſtanding, & not a little therwith pleaſed, cauſed great triumphs to be made by the ſpace of foure
D dayes at CONSTANTINOPLE, and in token of his loue and fauour ſent a rich robe of cloth of gold, with a leading ſtaffe, all ſet with pearle and precious ſtones, vnto the Baſſa, yet lying at BELGRADE.

This loſſe of CANISIA much troubled all that ſide of Chriſtendome, eſpecially them of the territories belonging vnto the houſe of AVSTRIA, in a ſort diſmayed to ſee the Turkes ſo eaſily poſſeſſed of a towne, before thought almoſt impregnable, and the ſtrongeſt defence of all that countrey againſt the furious impreſſions of the Turks, to whom it was now become a moſt ſafe and ſure receptacle, all men with one voice blaming the diſcord of the captains in the imperiall armie for ſo retiring without any good doing: but aboue all deteſting the cowardiſe of Paradiſer, who knowne to haue in the towne a ſtrong garriſon, with good ſtore of munition and
E victuals (as was ſuppoſed) had ſo baſely deliuered the ſame vnto the enemie, not doing the vttermoſt of his deuoir as had beſeemed him for the defence thereof: whereas if he had ſo done, happily in the meane time the cold & vnſeaſonableneſſe of the weather (though no other reliefe had beene) Winter being now come, might haue inforced the Turkes to haue raiſed their ſiege. Whereupon he was for this ſo foule a fact by the emperours commandement apprehended and caſt in priſon at VIENNA, where after he had long lien, and his cauſe oftentimes examined, he was the next yere following condemned of felony and cowardiſe, and ſo the fifteenth day of October executed, hauing firſt his hand at foure ſtrokes of the executioner ſtruck off, and after that his head: with him was alſo in like maner executed his enſigne-bearer: and after them his lieutenant with the maior of the towne, who both bound faſt to a ſtake, had firſt their tongues cut out, and F afterwards their heads chopt off.

Paradiſer executed for the yeelding vp of Caniſa to the Turkes.

Now the rebellion before raiſed in CARAMANIA by Cuſſahin Baſſa, (as is aforeſaid) was not with his death altogether appeaſed. Alſo ORFA, a great citie of that countrey (which hauing taſted the ſweetneſſe of libertie in the time of Cuſſahin) yet ſtill holding out againſt Mehemet the great Baſſa, the Sultans lieutenant Generall there. At which time alſo a companion of Cuſſahin

the late rebell, called the Scrimano, and one of his greateſt fauorits; ſeeing how hardly not only Cuſſabin himſelfe, but the reſt of his followers had bin handled by the Turkes, began to make head, and to call vnto him all ſuch as loued their libertie: vnto the ſweet name whereof, ſo many were in ſhort time come about him, as that out of them he formed ſuch an armie, as made him now dreadfull vnto the Turkes his enemies. Againſt whom, Mehemet Baſſa going with all his power to haue oppreſſed him, found him with thoſe his rebellious followers ſo couragious (for the deſire they all had to breake out of the Othoman ſlauerie, and to liue in ſuch libertie as was promiſed them by their captaine and Generall) that ioyning battell with them, he receiued of them a notable ouerthrow, inſomuch that fearing to haue loſt his whole armie, he was glad to retire, and to ſend out commiſſions for the raiſing of greater forces. Sultan Mahomet in the mean time, whether it was for feare of this new rebellion, or for that he vnderſtood of the embaſſadors ſent from the Perſian vnto the Chriſtian princes, began to ſuſpect leaſt that king ſhould breake the league he had with him, and ſo to his farther trouble take vp armes alſo againſt him. Wherefore vpon a Turkiſh pride he ſent an embaſſador into PERSIA, to giue the king to vnderſtand, That for the more aſſurance of the league betwixt them, he demanded to haue one of his ſonnes ſent vnto him in hoſtage, as a pledge of his fathers faith. Which ſo proud a demand the Perſian king tooke in ſuch diſdaine, that he commanded in his rage the embaſſador to be forthwith ſlain: but that his furie being by his graue counſellors ſomewhat appeaſed, he remitted the ſeueritie of that his rigorous command, and ſparing his life, was contented, that in deſpight and contempt of him that had ſent him, he ſhould be put to the Baſtonado only: and ſo grieuouſly threatned, ſent backe againe vnto his maſter. Who hauing receiued this ſhamefull anſwere, and in doubt of ſome further matter from that angrie king, commanded new and ſtrong garriſons to be put in all his ſtrong holds confining vpon the Perſian kingdome.

The Turkes embaſſador euill entreated by the king of Perſia.

1601 This troubleſome yeare of Iubile thus paſt, the Emperour much troubled with the loſſe of CANISIA, and in doubt of worſe to come (albeit that Ibrahim Baſſa, whom for all that he truſted not, did afreſh entreat with him concerning peace) and ſeeing alſo the great need he had of greater aid to withſtand the mightie power of the Turke, with great inſtancie requeſted aid of the Pope and of the other princes of ITALIE: who conſidering alſo how much it concerned the reſt of the Chriſtian commonweale, to haue the frontires of HVNGARIE defended, condiſcended vnto the emperors requeſt: and ſo the Pope with the beginning of the Spring ſent him eight thouſand ſouldiours in pay, vnder the leading of Io. Franceſco Aldobrandino his nephew their Generall, who with the like charge had now ſerued euer ſince the yeare 1599: King Philip alſo at the inſtance of the emperour gaue order vnto the Countie Fuentes to ſend into CROATIA certain bands of Dutches; who by direction from him, were forthwith conducted to MILLAINE: The great duke of FLORENCE alſo ſent vnto him two thouſand ſouldiours, vnder the leading of Franceſco de Monte; with whom alſo by his appointment went the lord Io. de Medices, whom Ferdinand the Archduke forthwith requeſted for to be maſter of his campe: Thither came alſo the duke of MANTVA with an honourable companie both of horſe and foot, being forthwith by the Archduke made his lieutenant generall. And ſo whileſt theſe people aſſembled togither into CROATIA, the emperor ſent alſo another good armie into HVNGARIE, drawne for moſt part out of GERMANIE, which vnder the leading of the Archduke Matthias his brother, and the duke Mercurie his lieutenant generall, went into thoſe parts to withſtand the Turke. A third armie he alſo made of the Imperials: which ſtrengthened with the forces of Don Ferrant Gonzaga, Gouernour of the vpper HVNGARIE, ioyned themſelues with Baſta, for the recouerie of TRANSYLVANIA; out of which he had beene of late driuen, as ſhall hereafter be declared.

The aid ſent out of Italie vnto the emperor.

And ſo whileſt theſe armies were in preparing, many hot skirmiſhes paſſed in HVNGARIE betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks, the loſſe falling ſometime to the one ſide and ſometime to the other. But the time now come that ſouldiors might well take the field, Ibrahim Baſſa being now before dead at BELGRADE, whileſt he was yet entreating of a diſſembled peace, and Haſſan one of the Viſier Baſſaes by Mahomet appointed Generall in HVNGARIE in his place: yet delaying his comming, the parley for peace laied aſide (as neuer indeed by the Turks intended, but onely by them entertained to dallie off the time to their owne more aduantage) duke Mercurie Generall of the emperours forces taking the offer of ſo fit an oportunitie, came with his armie from COMORA (where he had lien expecting the euent of the parley) and laied ſiege to ALBA REGA-

Alba Regalis beſieged by duke Mercurie.

A REGALIS, one of the chiefe and ſtrongeſt cities of HVNGARIE: which ſeated in the middeſt of a mariſh, was thought almoſt impregnable, being hardly to be approached but by the ſuburbes; which ſtrongly fortified and defended by the mariſh, ſerued the citie in ſtead of three moſt ſure bulwarkes, within which ſtood alſo the citie it ſelfe, well defended with a good wall and a ditch. This citie the duke for certain daies continually battered, as if he had purpoſed at length to haue taken it by aſſault: but in the meane time certainly informed by a fugitiue (but lately fled out of the citie) that the broad lake on the other ſide of the citie ouer againſt the place where he lay, was not ſo deepe, but that it was to be paſſed (contrarie to the opinion both of the Turkes captiues, and of the naturall inhabitants, whom hee had vpon that point examined) and that the Turkes preſuming vpon the ſtrength therof, and thinking themſelus on that ſide ſafe, had turned almoſt
B all their care and forces vnto that ſide of the citie which was now by him battered, without regard of any great perill to be from the other ſide feared: he appointed the lord Ruſſworm with his ſouldiors to make proofe if the SIGETH ſuburbs (for ſo they were called) on the aforeſaid ſide of the citie ſo little regarded by the Turks, were not to be ſurpriſed: for that theſe ſuburbes being taken, the citie could not long hold out. For the vndertaking of which enterpriſe, Ruſſworm was both by the captiue Turks and countrey people thereby dwelling, much diſcouraged, they all with one conſent affirming, That albeit he ſhould find no other difficulties in the attempting thereof, yet the lake it ſelfe was not poſſible to be paſſed: who neuertheleſſe not altogether truſting them, ſent certaine of his men ſecretly to trie the matter: who hauing ſo done, brought him word, That the lake was vndoubtedly (though with much difficultie) to be paſſed. Whereupon
C hee with a thouſand ſelect ſouldiours with euery one of them a good faggot on his backe beſide his armes, to fill vp the deepeſt of the mariſh, by night entred the ſame; wherein he had not gone farre, but that he almoſt with the danger of his life found it much deeper and more troubleſome than the ſpies had vnto him before reported: but caried with an inuincible courage himſelf, and his ſouldiors moued by his example, hee ſtill went on, they alſo following of him. It is almoſt a thing incredible, to tell what theſe aduenturous men indured, plunged in the deep mud amongſt the flags and bulruſhes, going ſtil vp in water and mud vnto the waſt euen where the mariſh was the ſhalloweſt; where alſo if one miſſed but a ſtep, he was by and by ouer head and eares, and in danger to be drowned, if he were not by his fellowes preſently holden: yet at length by God his helpe hauing with the loſſe but of ſixe or ſeauen men a little before day got ouer, the duke by an D appointed ſigne aduertiſed thereof, with greater ſtirre and tumult than at any time before aſſailed that ſide of the citie where he lay; as if euen then and there he had onely meant to haue engaged his whole forces for the winning thereof. When in the meane time the lord Ruſſworm on the other ſide with his reſolute ſouldiors, with ladders prouided for the purpoſe ſcaled the wals of the ſuburbs, and almoſt vnperceiued, recouered the top thereof (the Turkes being at the ſame time wholly bent for the defence of the other ſide of the citie, where moſt ſtirre and apparent danger was) and ſo being got into the ſuburbes, with a great and terrible crie aſſailed the Turks; who ſurpriſed with an exceeding feare, and not well knowing which way to turne themſelues, without any great reſiſtance fled into the citie, the Chriſtians following them at the heeles, and making of them a great ſlaughter. In which ſo great a confuſion, euen where was leaſt feared,
E the duke by other his ſouldiors tooke the reſt of the ſuburbes as he had before determined, the Turks there alſo for feare forſaking them, and retiring with all the haſt they could vnto their fellowes in the citie, there to liue or die together. The Chriſtians in theſe ſuburbes, beſide much other rich prey, tooke alſo foureteene great pieces of artillerie, with good ſtore of ſhot and pouder. The ſuburbes (the greateſt ſtrength of the citie) thus happily taken, the duke againe ſummoned the citie, requiring to haue it deliuered vnto him: whereunto the Turkes gaue no other anſwere but by their pieces, which they diſcharged vpon the Chriſtians ſo perſwading them to yeeld. Wherewith the duke much diſpleaſed, ſent them word, That he would ſend them other manner of meſſengers to morrow, and by Gods helpe ſup with them in the citie, although hee were not vnto them welcome. Neither failed he of that his promiſe: for the next day hauing
F out of the ſuburbs by the furie of his artillerie made two faire breaches into the citie, he by the ruines thereof with great ſlaughter of the enemie entred the citie, albeit that the Turkes did what they might to haue defended the ſame, by caſting downe vpon the Chriſtians as they entered, darts, wild fire, and ſuch like things, vſually prouided for ſuch purpoſe. But ſeeing now no remedie, but that they muſt needs giue place vnto the fortune of their enemies, they fled amaine into into their houſes, there to defend themſelues, or els to die: many of which houſes they had before of purpoſe ſo vndermined, as that they could eaſily ouerthrow them, and ſo ouerwhelme as many as ſhould come within the danger of them: which ſo ſtrange a reſolution was by many of thē as deſperatly performed, inſomuch that the goodly church, the pallace, with many other ſumptuous buildings, were left vnto the Chriſtians all rent and torne, not much better than rude heapes of rubbidge and ſtones. Howbeit the Baſſa vpon promiſe of life yeelded himſelfe, and was by the Duke preſently ſent vnto the camp; the reſt of the ſouldiors being (as in ſuch caſe it commonly happeneth) all or moſt of them put to the ſword. The greateſt part of the prey fell vnto the Wallons; who by heapes breaking into the richeſt houſes, not onely tooke what themſelues light vpon, but ſtript the Germans alſo of ſuch things as they had by chance gotten, to their great heart-burning & griefe: yea theſe rauenous & irreligious men not ſo contented, opened the tombes of the Hungarian kings, there long before buried, to ſpoile euen the dead of ſuch things as had for honours ſake beene long before enterred with them (if happily any ſuch thing were there to be found) ſhewing themſelues therin more barbarous than the Turks, who by the ſpace of threeſcore yeares hauing had the citie in their poſſeſſion, had yet ſpared thoſe reuerend monuments, and ſuffered the reliques of thoſe worthie princes to reſt in peace. Of this taking of ALBA REGALIS, the Baſſa of BVDA long before taken priſoner, and then lying at VIENNA, hearing, abſtained from meat with his two ſeruants a whole day proſtrate vpon his face, praying vnto his prophet Mahomet, who had (as he ſaid) all this yeare beene angrie with the Turks. Which had the ſiege of CANISIA taken the like effect, had then vndoubtedly beene vnto them moſt vnfortunat: but God in his wiſdome ſtill tempereth the ſweet with the ſoure.

Aſſan Baſſa commeth out of ſeaſon to haue relieued Alba Regalis.

Now in the meane while was Aſſan the Viſier Baſſa and Generall of the Turkes armie with ſuch ſouldiors as were alreadie aſſembled at BELGRADE, comming to haue relieued ALBA REGALIS: and albeit that he vnderſtood by the way as he marched, that the citie was by the Chriſtians woon, yet held he on his entended iourney: and ſo taking with him the Baſſa of BVDA, with the other Sanzackes and commaunders of the townes and caſtles thereabout, had formed an armie of about threeſcore thouſand ſtrong, but for moſt part raw and vnexpert ſouldiours: with which power he ſtill held on his way towards ALBA REGALIS, as well thereby to giue ſome contentment vnto the angrie Sultan his maſter, as in hope alſo to ouerthrow the Chriſtian armie, or at leaſtwiſe to find the citie as yet vnrepaired, and ſo to regaine it. But vaine was that his deſignement, eſpecially for the recouerie of the citie: for that the duke had no ſooner taken it, but that he forthwith cauſed the breaches to be repaired, and for the more aſſurance of it, put into it a ſtrong garriſon of old expert ſouldiours: and being himſelfe about twentie thouſand ſtrong, and hearing of the Baſſaes comming, ſet forward to meet him, and being come neere vnto him, began an hot and bloudie skirmiſh with him. Yet the Baſſa to proſecute his entended purpoſe for the recouerie of ALBA REGALIS, the next day ſent away part of his armie, to make proofe if happily the citie might yet be againe recouered, and himſelfe in the meane time with the reſt of his armie offered battell vnto the Chriſtians, ſo to buſie them, that they ſhould not be able to trouble them whom he had ſent to ALBA REGALIS, or to relieue the citie, if it ſhould chance to be by them diſtreſſed. When as the duke, before enformed of the baſeneſſe of the ſouldiors in the Baſſaes armie, and that although he were for number of men farre aboue him, yet that for old, hardie, and expert ſouldiors he was ſtrong ynough for him, valiantly went out and encountered him: and ſo euen at the firſt onſet by plaine valour diſordering the formoſt ſquadrons of the Turkes battell, enforced them to retire with the loſſe of ſix thouſand men; amongſt whom were the Baſſa of BVDA, ſix Sanzackes, with diuers other captaines and commaunders of good place and marke. At which time he alſo tooke from them diuers pieces of great artillerie, and had vndoubtedly with a notable ſlaughter ouerthrowne all the reſt of the Baſſaes armie, had not a great ſquadron of the Tartars euen at that inſtant ſhewed themſelus at the backs of the Chriſtians, and ſo ſtaying them, giuen leiſure vnto the Baſſa again to reſtore his diſordered battaile. Whereupon the duke contenting himſelfe with the victorie he had alreadie gotten, in good order retired againe into his trenches, hauing in this conflict not loſt aboue three hundred of his people. But whileſt both armies thus lay, and new ſupplies ſtill repairing vnto them, expecting but when they ſhould come to a generall day of battaile; the Ianizaries ſtill murmuring, that it was now no time of the yeare longer to keepe the field, by their importunitie enforced the Baſſa to retire to BVDA, and there to disband his armie. retreat

A retreat many were by the Chriſtians cut off in the taile of his armie, and a number of priſoners taken, and amongſt the reſt fiftie of the French mutiners of PAPPA, whom the archduke Matthias at the inſtance of duke Mercurie afterwards pardoned. Neither ſped they much better that were ſent by the Baſſa to haue attempted the taking of ALBA REGALIS, for being come neere thereunto, they were ſo welcomed with great ſhot out of the citie, and charged with often ſallies by the ſtrong garriſon, that ſeeing no hope to preuaile, they were glad to riſe and to returne againe vnto the Baſſa that ſent them.

About the ſame time that the duke began to beſiege ALBA REGALIS, Ferdinand the archduke hauing receiued great aid from the Pope, with the other princes of ITALIE and the king of SPAINE, and ſo now thirtie thouſand ſtrong, by the aduiſe of the duke of MANTVA his lieu-
B tenant Generall, reſolued to beſiege CANISIA; which to haue again recouered out of the hands of the Turkes concerned much, not them of STIRIA and AVSTRIA onely, but the other prouinces adioyning, yea and ITALIE it ſelfe alſo: whereupon hee with his armie in good order came the tenth of September and encamped before it; the duke of MANTVA and Don Iohn di Medices with two thouſand harquebuſiers and two cornets of horſe, being come the day before to take view of the towne, at whom the Turkes made diuers ſhot, but without any harme doing. And albeit that the Turks there in garriſon in number not paſt a thouſand (accounting amongſt them three hundred of the Wallons ſometime of the garriſon of PAPPA) with their often and gallant ſallies greatly troubled the Chriſtians; and that great bands of other Turkes came many times out of the ſtrong towne and fortreſſes thereby, to skirmiſh with them, and to ſee if they
C could put any moe ſouldiors into the towne for the more aſſurance thereof: yet ſuch was the carefulneſſe of the Chriſtian commanders, and valour of their ſouldiors, that the Turks both in the one place and the other, were to their coſt ſtill repulſed and put to flight, with the loſſe alſo of ſome of their ſmall caſtles and forts thereabout. To approch this ſtrong towne and to plant a battery againſt it, ſeemed to be a matter of great difficultie, for that it was (as we haue elſewhere ſaid) enuironed round with a mariſh: yet meanes was found to drie it a little, and to fill it vp on the one ſide, and to come ſo neere the towne, that hauing planted three tyre of artillerie againſt it, the Chriſtians began furiouſly to batter it, beating downe both the walls, the houſes, and other buildings therein. Yea at length they had brought their approaches ſo neere, that they were come with their trenches euen cloſe vnto the towne ditch, perſuading the Turks now whi-
D leſt they might vpon good conditions to ſurrender the towne, and ſo to ſaue their liues. Whereunto their fierce and enraged minds were ſo farre from hearkening, that brauing the Chriſtians they ſaid, That they would in deſpight of all their forces keepe the place for their Sultan doe what they could. Whereupon the Archduke and the duke of MANTVA, by the aduiſe of Medices and the reſt of the principall captaines and commanders in the armie, reſolued to giue a generall aſſault vnto the towne. In the meane time newes was brought into the campe, of the winning of ALBA REGALIS, which there made great reioycing, in ſigne whereof the Chriſtians (as the manner is) in triumph many times diſcharged their great ordinance: and by fit men perſuaded the garriſon ſouldiors in CANISIA to yeeld, and not to caſt themſelues into ſuch danger as had their fellowes at ALBA REGALIS, for that in ſo doing they ſhould not onely ſaue
E their liues, but eaſily alſo obtaine ſuch other good conditions as they could reaſonably deſire, whereas otherwiſe they ſhould to their coſt finde the Chriſtians ſtrong enough to conſtraine them, which muſt needs bring with it their vtter ruine and deſtruction. Whereunto the garriſon ſouldiors (amongſt whom the renegate Wallons were the chiefe) contemptuouſly anſwered, That they little feared ſuch weake aſſailants: and with great crie and ſcorne commaunding the meſſengers to depart, in token of their confidence as alſo not to ſeeme inferiour vnto the Chriſtians, oftentimes to ſmall purpoſe diſcharged their great ordinance, as had the Chriſtians the day before. Now though the wals of the towne were with continuall batterie ſore ſhaken, and the breaches almoſt laid open; yet was the intended aſſault for a while delaid, vntill the bridges might be made that were to bee laid ouer the towne ditch, for the Chriſtians to paſſe ouer F vpon. But all things (as was thought) now in a readineſſe, and the Florentines with ſome other of the Italians (whoſe lot it was to giue the firſt aſſault) being come forward, the bridge whereby they were to paſſe the towne ditch was found both too ſhort and too weake for them to get ouer vnto the other ſide by: ſo that ſinking vnder them, not the ſouldiors onely, but euen the commaunders themſelues, and namely Herberſtein, were in great danger to haue been loſt. which which meanes they hindred, and the enemies murthering pieces continually flanking them, and G their musketiers ſtil playing vpon them afront, they were inforced to retire, leauing behind them three hundred of their men ſlaine. Yet were not the Chriſtian commaunders any thing therewith diſcouraged, but being generally reſolued not to giue ouer that they had taken in hand vntill they had brought it to effect, began to make ſuch prouiſion as they knew to be needfull to preſerue their armie vnder, againſt the violence of the winter weather, as alſo to hinder that no victuals might bee brought vnto the towne, ſo by famine at length to enforce the Turks and Wallons to yeeld: who although they were already pinched with wants, inſomuch that horſ-fleſh was daintie cheere with them; yet for all that they nothing abated of their wonted fierceneſſe, but being againe required to yeeld, vouchſafed not to anſwere them one word, but inſtead thereof ſhooke their naked ſwords a farre off at them, in token of their vndaunted courage. But H yet for all this reſolution of the commanders for the continuance of the ſiege, Aldobrandino Generall of the Italians being now a little before dead (of an old infirmitie he had) the Italians began at the firſt ſome few of them ſecretly to withdraw themſelues out of their quarter: but afterward by greater numbers to depart, and ſo to returne againe into their countrey; alleaging for their excuſe, want both of pay and victuals. But the reſt better minded, vnderſtanding that the Turkes were riſen from before ALBA REGALIS, and the reſt of their armie diſbanded, began to enter into new hope by ſome deuiſe or other to paſſe the ditch, and ſo by force to take the towne: and the rather, for that they were by a French fugitiue informed both of the weakneſſe and wants of the beſieged. Whereupon they began afreſh to make new engines for the approaching of the wals, without danger of the enemies ordinance any more to flanke them. At which I time alſo (viz. the fourth of Nouember) the lord Ruſſworm came vnto the campe, ſent thither from duke Mercurie with eight thouſand ſouldiors (after that Haſſan Baſſa had broke vp his armie) by whoſe comming they were alſo the more encouraged to proſecute that they had taken in hand: neither failed the Turks in the meane time with often ſallies to trouble the Chriſtians, attempting aboue all things to haue fired their tents; for that ſo lying open in that ſo cold a ſeaſon of the yeare, they muſt thereby of neceſſitie be inforced to raiſe their ſiege and be gone.

But the ſucceſſe of theſe their ſo great deſignes was not anſwerable to their hopes, being ſtill to their loſſe beaten backe into the towne by the Chriſtians: whom it behooued to looke well about them, for that the beſieged deſperatly ſet, and all reſolued rather to die that to yeeld, ad-uentured themſelues to all dangers, neuer ceaſing to doe what they might to put the Chriſtians K out of hope for winning the towne. But whileſt the Turkes with doubtfull and as it were deſpe-rate hope ſo defend the place, & the Chriſtians grown ſtronger by the comming of their friends lay in hope to win the ſame: loe, in the latter end of Nouember, the North wind accompanied with a deepe ſnow, ſo furiouſly raged, that it ouerthrew the greateſt part of the tents and pauillions of the Chriſtians, and as it were buried their whole armie in the ſnow and iſe; in ſuch wiſe, as that in Ferdinand the archdukes campe (being reaſonably well prouided for) were a thouſand fiue hundred men, with three hundred horſes, ſtarued and frozen to death. At which time the ſtate of them that came with the lord Ruſſworm was moſt miſerable, who wearied with the ſiege of ALBA REGALIS, and as it were ſpent with the dirtie trauell of the deep way, had not brought with them their tents or other prouiſion, and were therfore enforced to lie abroad in ſo cold and L vnreaſonable a time: with whoſe miſeries, although their good Generall was much grieued, yet to doe the Chriſtian common weale ſeruice, he with them right patiently endured. In which ſo great an extreamitie, the Archduke with the reſt of the commanders vpon view taken, well conſidering what ſmall hope there was in good time to take the towne, the vnreaſonableneſſe of the winter weather ſtill more and more increaſing; thought it better in time to riſe, than longer to expoſe their armie vnto moſt certaine deſtruction, either of the enemie or the cold. Which was done with ſuch haſt and confuſed tumult, as that their riſing ſeemed rather an haſtie flight than honourable departure; leauing behind them for haſt their great ordinance, with their tents and baggage; a common voice ſtill running, That they were well if they might but ſaue themſelues:
ſo that the ſoldiors euery man mindfull but of himſelfe, and in feare to be purſued by the enemy M no man chaſing them, fled, but ſtill accompanied with ſuch furious winds, ſnow, and extreame cold, that with all the labour they could take they could get them no heat, but fell downe to the earth many of them frozen, and ſo once falling neuer roſe more, being vnable for want of heat to helpe themſelues: in which caſe they were not to expect for helpe from others, euery man ha-

The Chriſtians by tempeſt and extremitie of weather inforced to giue ouer the ſiege of Camiſa.

A uing ynough to doe to looke vnto himſelfe: ſo that vpon the way whereby the armie went thus diſperſed with the weather, lay aboue fiue hundred dead of cold, beſide foure hundred others left ſicke in the forſaken trenches, who forthwith after the departure of the armie were thought to haue been all put to the ſword by them of the garriſon of CANISIA.

But hauing thus paſſed through theſe troubles of HVNGARIE, it is time now alſo to looke backe againe into the frontier countries of TRANSYLVANIA and VALACHIA; which to haue kept in the emperors obeiſance, and ſo preſerued as a liuely member of the Chriſtian commonweale, no leſſe concerned him, than the keeping of any other his frontier territories, which are many. Michael the Vayuod of VALACHIA, the laſt yeare for his crueltie firſt driuen out of TRANSYLVANIA by Baſta, and afterwards out of VALACHIA by the Great Chauncellour of
B POLONIA (as is aforeſaid) and another placed in his ſtead, as a man forſaken euen of his owne better fortunes, and not well knowing which way to turne himſelfe: thought it beſt now at laſt to ſubmit himſelfe vnto the emperour, if ſo happily by his meanes he might in ſome ſort repaire his broken eſtate, and ſo at leaſtwiſe recouer his gouernment in VALACHIA. So reſolued, he ſet forward, and in the beginning of this yeare, viz. the three and twentieth of Ianuarie, with fiue and thirtie of his followers and ſix coaches arriued at PRAGE, where he was by the emperours appointment honourably receiued, and his coſt at the emperours charge defrayed. Vnto whom he excuſed himſelfe of the ſeueritie by him vſed in TRANSYLVANIA (the cauſe of thoſe late troubles in that countrey) as enforced thereunto by the ſtubborneneſſe of the Tranſyluanians themſelues, whom he found ſtill enclined to rebellion, and vnwilling to be commanded by any
C but by themſelues. Which his excuſe (as true) was well admitted, and he with all kindneſſe vſed. Now at this ſame time Baſta lying alſo in TRANSYLVANIA, as Gouernour for the Emperour, right ſlenderly accompanied, (as is before alſo declared) the parliament at CLAVSENBVRG being ended, and all controuerſies (as was thought) well compoſed, now without feare one night the watch being ſet, went to bed to take his reſt; where he had not long lien, but that certaine of the Tranſyluanian lords, among whom the Chiaki was chiefe, came with their followers, and ſurpriſing the watch, and entring the pallace, brake into the chamber where hee lay, tooke him out of his bed, and ſo kept him priſoner all that night. And the next morning going forth, about twelue miles off met with Sigiſmund Bathor their late prince, before ſecretly by them called in, whom they honourably conducted to CLAVSENBVRG, and there deliuered vnto him Baſta, D the late gouernour for the emperour, whom hee commaunded to be caſt into yrons: and ſo going to the pallace, gaue like order for the apprehending and ſafe keeping of the reſt of the nobilitie alſo, ſuch as had taken part with Baſta in the behalfe of the emperour. For now the Tranſyluanians were diuided into three parts: whereof the one ſtood for the emperour; the ſecond for Iſtuan Bathor (pretending, that vnto him belonged the ſoueraignetie of that prouince) but the third and farre the greateſt, for Sigiſmund their antient lord and leader, who now by meanes of the king of POLONIA reconciled vnto the great Turke, and in this troubleſome time by his fauourites called againe into his countrey, was by them ioyfully receiued at ALBA IVLIA, CLAVSENBVRG, and the reſt of the chiefe cities of TRANSYLVANIA. Who now thereof againe poſſeſſed, for the better aſſuring of his eſtate forthwith writ vnto the emperour what had E happened, requeſting him to content himſelfe, that he was deſirous of his loue and fauour, promiſing to be alwaies his good friend and neighbor, and for euer to keepe good amitie with him: giuing Baſta alſo (whom hee had now at the interceſſion of certaine great friends againe enlarged) to vnderſtand, That hee was forthwith to depart from all the places belonging vnto his principalitie, as alſo to ceaſe from further moleſting of his people that were now voluntarily againe returned vnto his obedience. which his requeſt was neither of the one, nor of the other much regarded or hearkened vnto: for the emperour vpon the firſt aduertiſement of this ſo great an alteration in TRANSILVANIA, calling vnto him Michael the Vayuod (not ſo much troubled with the ſtrangeneſſe of the matter, as for that his wife and ſonne, whom he had left as hoſtages with Baſta, were now come into the hands of the Tranſyluanians his mortall enemies)
F and ſatisfying him in many things that hee had before requeſted, tooke order with him, That with all conuenient ſpeed returning home againe into VALACHIA, where he was now much longed for (the people generally diſliking of the ſimple Vayuod, by the great Chauncellour ſet ouer them) and gathering together ſuch power as he could, he ſhould ioyne himſelfe with Baſta his lieutenant generall, vnto whom he had alreadie ſent great companies both of horſe and foot for the expulſing of Sigiſmund out of TRANSYLVANIA, and the reducing againe of that prouince vnder his obeiſance. Whereupon the Vayuod forthwith returning into VALACHIA, and aſſembling about ten thouſand of his friends, all good and expert ſouldiors, went to ſeeke for Baſta as he had with the emperour agreed; whom he found readie in the field with about twentie thouſand foot and eight thouſand horſe, but newly departed from VERADINVM: where muſtering their armie, they with their vnited forces entred into TRANSYLVANIA, there to put in execution what the emperour had commanded. Where the Vayuod in diſdaine of the people which loued him not, with fire & ſword waſted all the country before him as he went: not without the great diſcontentment of Baſta, to whom it ſeemed not good to make deſolat that countrey which he was in good hope ſhould in ſhort time be his lord and maſters the emperors. But Sigiſmund vnderſtanding both of the comming of his enemies, and of the harme they did in his countrey, riſe from SOLNOCK, where hee lay encamped with his armie, and ſo to hinder their further proceeding went to meet them: howbeit being come ſo neer vnto them as that he might well diſcouer them, he would not come to the triall of a battell with them, which was by them offered; but fortified himſelfe in his trenches, ſo ſeeking but to delay the time vntil the comming of the Tartars, which were to haue come vnto him from the Chauncellor of POLONIA, as alſo of ſix thouſand Turkes to haue beene ſent him from the Baſſa of BELGRADE. Where hauing afterward vnderſtood that the paſſage of the Tartars to haue been ſent him, was ſtayed by Don Ferrante Gonzaga, the emperors lieutenant in the vpper HVNGARIE; and that the Turks ſtaying at GIVLA, would come no farther except they had their pay before hand: finding himſelfe too weake with his owne power to encounter with his enemies, he riſe with his armie, with purpoſe to haue retired a little backe, and to haue taken certaine ſtraight paſſages whereby the enemie muſt needs paſſe, ſo by the aduantage of the place to haue hopen his owne weake ſtrength. But Baſta and the Vayuod perceiuing his riſing (whereunto they were ſtill attentiue) followed him with ſuch ſpeed, that they ouertooke him before he could get thither, and ſo hardly preſſed him, that needes he muſt turne his face and ioyne battell, or elſe ſuffer his people altogether like beaſts to be ſlaine. In which doing, albeit that neither he nor his failed to doe what was by men to be done for the obtaining of a notable victory, yet ſuch was the valour of the ſouldiors of Baſta and the Vayuod, that in a great fight hauing diſordered his footmen, they put them to flight, and ſo cut them all in pieces. Which the prince beholding, and not able to remedie the matter, betime fled with his horſemen from the furie of his enemies, and ſo retired to the vttermoſt confines of TRANSYLVANIA, hauing in this battell loſt ten thouſand of his faithfull ſouldiors. Whereupon CLAVDIOPOLIS with diuers other cities and townes of that countrey, returned againe vnto the emperours obeyſance.

Sigiſmund ouer thrown by Baſta and the Vayuod fleeth out of Tranſyluania.

In the proſecuting of this victorie, the Vayuod to ſatisfie the hatred hee had of long borne againſt the Tranſyluanians, did what ſpoyle he could, vtterly waſting all the places whereby he paſſed: which Baſta not liking, requeſted him to vſe his victorie with more modeſtie, and to haue more reſpect to what he did, eſpecially vnto ſuch places or perſons as of themſelues returned vnto the Emperours obeyſance. Whereunto hee prowdly anſwered, That he would doe what he thought good without his appointment or the emperors either, eſpecially in that countrey which he had now with his owne ſword twiſe conquered: and that therefore Baſta might commaund them that were by him to be commaunded, as for himſelfe he acknowledged no ſoueraignetie that either Baſta or the Emperour had ouer him. Vnto which his ſo preſumptuous a ſpeech Baſta replied not, but yet much therewith diſcontented, began to enter into a great ſuſpition from what ground thoſe his haughtie conceits (eaſily by his words to bee gathered) might grow. And ſo from that time better obſeruing his proceedings, perceiued him to haue intelligence with the Turkes, with purpoſe to ioyne hands with them, that ſo by their helpe chaſing the Imperials out of TRANSYLVANIA, hee might hold it to himſelfe as tributarie to the Othoman emperour, of all others beſt able to defend him. Which to bee true (beſide diuers other ſtrong preſumptions) he certainly vnderſtood by certaine letters of his written to that purpoſe, intercepted by his ſouldiors and brought vnto him: whereupon he became verie penſiue and heauie, for the great power the Vayuod was of in thoſe countries, as alſo for the great ſtrength he had euen then preſent about him, and wherewith hee was as it were then guarded. So conſulting with certaine of his Colonels and chiefe Commaunders of his armie, what were beſt to be done in that ſo dangerous a caſe, whereof ſo much depended? a Wallon captaine offered himſelfe

A himſelfe to goe into the Vayuod his campe, and there in his owne tent to kill him as a traitour. Which his offer well liked of, and he as readie to performe as hee was to promiſe, going into the Vayuods campe accompanied with ſome threeſcore men, and finding him in his tent, boldly ſtepping to him, willed him to yeeld himſelfe the emperors priſoner: Whereat he being about to lay his hand vpon his ſcimitar, the Wallon captain with an holbard thruſt him into the breaſt, at which very inſtant another with a ſword at one blow claue his head downe to the ſhoulders. Michaell the Vayuod ſlaine. An vnworthie death for ſo worthie a captaine, had not ambition the torment of great ſpirits, caried him too high with the wings of immoderat deſire, beyond the bounds of loyaltie and reaſon. But there he lyeth now dead among his friends, whom the great Turke ſometime more feared euen in his pallace at CONSTANTINOPLE, than he did all the reſt of the emperors com-
B manders. Preſently vpon his death a great tumult and hurly burly was raiſed by the ſouldiours in his campe: but Baſta forthwith ſhewing himſelfe with all his ſouldiors in armes, and withall producing the letters declaring the treaſon by the Vayuod contriued with the Baſſa of TEMESVVAR againſt the emperour, all was againe appeaſed: but eſpecially for that his ſouldiours now ſaw themſelues without an head, and too weake alſo for the Imperials there preſent and alreadie in armes. In the Vayuods tent were alſo other letters found, ſo plainly declaring his ſecret colluſion with the Turke, and treaſon againſt the Emperour, that the Walachians who at the firſt were wonderfully mooued with his death, and hearing the ſame read, reſted not now onely contented, but ſaid moreouer, that he was worthily ſlaine, and that if they had knowne him to haue had any ſuch traiterous purpoſe, they would themſelues long before haue ta-
C ken of him deſerued puniſhment. Now vnto his ſouldiours Baſta offered, at their choice, either to depart whether they would without danger; or els taking the oath of obedience vnto the emperour to enter into his pay, which moſt part of them did. The tumult appeaſed, the dead bodie of the Vayuod was layed out a whole day for the ſouldiors to gaze vpon, and ſo afterward buried. So lyeth he, that but of late and many times before, had ſo fortunatly ouerthrown his enemies; vnhappie man himſelfe now ouerthrowne by his owne ambition and vnconſtancie.

Baſta now deliuered of the great feare he had before of the Vayuod, what by force, what by agreement, in ſhort time tooke in moſt part of the countrie: for that the Tranſyluanians ſeeing the ſmall power of Sigiſmund, & well comforted with the death of Michael the Vayuod ſo much
D of them hated; as alſo to auoid the dangers euen preſently hanging ouer their heads from the Imperials, if they ſhould in any thing ſhew themſelues obſtinate againſt them, ſubmitted themſelues wholly to the courteſie of Baſta, ſo that the places were but few that yet held out for the prince Sigiſmund: who in the mean time was doing what he might for the raiſing of a new armie (hauing not altogither with this late ouerthrow forthwith alſo loſt his hope) by the helpe of the Turkes, Tartars, and Polonians, to recouer againe the poſſeſſion of his ſtate, and by force of armes to chaſe out the Imperials. But he being brought to ſo low an ebbe, and almoſt all the countrie of TRANSYLVANIA poſſeſſed by Baſta; who would not haue thought but that now after ſo long trauels it would haue remained wholly at the emperors deuotion? and ſo many that thought themſelues to ſee much, ſaid aſſuredly it would. But ſee the change, and what ſmall aſ-
E ſurance euen the greateſt haue of the conſtancie of the vaine multitude: neuer more like themſelues, than in diſliking to morrow what they beſt liked to day, fooliſh, ſenceleſſe, improuident, raſh, headſtrong, violent, and aboue all things mutable, and vnconſtant. So now for all that Baſta had done for the aſſurance of this countrie vnto the Emperour (being ſo much as moſt men thought to haue bin ſufficient, and in deed as much as was poſſible for him to do) euen in the winding vp of this yeare 1601, the Tranſyluanians vnderſtanding that Sigiſmund with a great armie of Polonians, Turks, & Tartars, was now comming againſt the Imperials, moſt part of them preſently tooke vp armes in his fauour, ſaying, That their firſt oath voluntarily giuen vnto him as their naturall prince and Gouernor, was more to be reſpected than any other afterwards by force extorted from them by a forreine prince. Inſomuch that Baſta perceiuing with F what a tempeſt he was like euen preſently to be ouerwhelmed, to ſaue himſelfe and his people from the rage thereof, withdrew himſelfe with his followers vnto a ſtrong towne in a corner of that countrie: from whence he with all ſpeed ſent vnto the emperour for greater aid, as well for the defence of the place he yet held, as for the ſubduing againe of that rebellious people. After whose departure Sigismund without resistance entring the countrie, was of the people in general ioyfully receiued as their most lawfull prince and soueraigne, and all the honour done vnto him that was by them possible: in which his so princely, but dangerous estate, now twice in lesse than the space of one yere by him regained, and yet therof no whit assured, we will for a while leaue him to ioy therein with his subiects. The Bassa of Agria ouerthrowne by Ferrant Gonzaga.

But whilest the state thus turneth vpside downe in TRANSYLVANIA, the Bassa of AGRIA going out with ten thousand Turks in hope to haue surprised TOCCAIE (a strong hold of the Christians in the vpper HVNGARIE) was encountred by Ferrant Gonzaga the emperours lieutenant there, and by him ouerthrowne, and with great slaughter of his Turks chased to the gates of AGRIA.

Now was Mahomet the Turkish emperour this yeare also, no lesse troubled with the proceedings of the Scriuano in CARAMANIA and NATOLIA, than with the euill successe of his affaires in TRANSYLVANIA and HVNGARIE. For the Scriuano by his last yeares victorie growne into great credit with the common people, and still by them more and more followed; to maintaine the reputation of his credit, came now againe this yeare with a great power into the field, to meet with Mahomet the great Bassa and Generall of the Turkes armie; who with fiftie thousand good souldiors (a power thought sufficient to haue represt him) was readie to encounter him. With whom the Scriuano ioyning battell, in a great fight cut in sunder a great part of the Bassaes armie, and so became master of the field, forraged all the countries adioyning almost as far as ALEPPO, still calling the people vnto libertie; and causing himselfe to be proclaimed the true defender of the Mahometane faith, and of the libertie of those countries with him combined: in such sort, as that it now stood the great Turke vpon to send another great armie to the aid of Mahomet the discomfited Bassa. With whom also the Scriuano (presuming of his former fortune) comming to a day of battell, and ouercharged with the multitude of his enemies, was at the first encounter with his people put to the worse: but forthwith by his good direction hauing repaired his disordered battell, and thereby giuen as it were new courage to his fainting souldiors, he with a great slaughter disordered also the Bassaes armie. Yet hauing not any other firme state or stay to rest vpon, more than the fauour and reputation he held with these his rebellious followers, of whom he had now lost a great many, he thought it not best to aduenture too far (not knowing how presently to repaire his losses) but contenting himselfe with what he had alreadie done, retired with his armie into the strength of the mountaines, there that Winter to liue vpon the spoile of the countries adioyning, and the next yeare to do more harme than euer he had done before. The Ianizaries in mutinie at Constantinople.

Beside all which former troubles, the plague also this yeare sore raged both in CONSTANTINOPLE and many other places of the Turkish empire. At which time also the Ianizaries at CONSTANTINOPLE hauing receiued some disgrace by some of the great Sultans fauourits, and with great insolencie requiring to haue their heads, caused their Agawell accompanied presumptuously to enter into the Seraglio to prefer this their request: Whom Mahomet to the terror of the rest, caused for his presumption to be taken into the middest of the Spahi, and so by them to bee cut in pieces; which was not done without the great slaughter of the Spahi themselues also, slaine by the Ianizaries. Whereupon the other Ianizaries arising vp in armes also, and euen now readie to haue reuenged the death of their captaine, were yet by the wisedome of Cicala Bassa, bestowing amongst them a great summe of mony, againe appeased, without further harme doing. Which their so great insolencie Mahomet imputing vnto their excessiue drinking of wine, contrarie to the law of their great Prophet; by the persuasion of the Mufti, commanded all such as had any wine in their houses in CONSTANTINOPLE or PERA, vpon paine of death to bring it out and to staue it, except the embassadours of the Queene of ENGLAND, the French king, and of the state of VENICE: so that (as some report) wine for a space ran down the channels of the streets in CONSTANTINOPLE, as if it had bin water after a great shower of raine. L

1602 Sigismund the Transyluanian prince now of late againe possessed of TRANSYLVANIA (as is before declared) could not yet well assure himselfe of the keeping thereof: for that he with the Transyluanians of his faction alone, was not able to withstand the force of Bassa; who still strengthened with new supplies both of men and all things else necessarie for the warres from M

A the Emperour, was now with a great power alreadie entred into TRANSYLVANIA: the Polonians buſied in the warres of SVEVIA, and the Turkes with their other greater affaires, neither of them ſending him their promiſed aid, the greateſt hope and ſtay of himſelfe in that newneſſe of his eſtate. Wherefore ſeeing himſelfe euerie day to looſe one place or other, and fearing alſo leaſt his ſouldiours for want of pay ſhould in ſhort time quite forſake him and go ouer to Baſta: he thought it beſt betimes and whileſt he had yet ſomething left, and was not yet altogither become deſperat, otherwiſe to prouide for his eſtate, eſpecially hauing ſmall truſt in the Turkes, to whom he had before beene ſo great an enemie. Wherefore he dealt with Baſta for a truce or ceſſation from armes, vntill embaſſadors might be ſent vnto the Emperour, to intreat with him for ſome good attonement. Wherewith Baſta being content, and the embaſſadours
B ſent, the matter was ſo handled with the Emperour, that Sigiſmund to make an end of all theſe troubles, was contented to the behoofe of his Imperial maieſtie, to reſigne vnto Baſta his lieutenant all ſuch places as he yet held in TRANSYLVANIA, vpon much like conditions he had about three yeres before made with him: and ſo in all, and for all, to ſubmit himſelfe vnto his maieſtie. Which intended ſurrender of the princes being bruted in TRANSYLVANIA, Zachell Moiſes his lieutenant (and now in field with the princes forces) not able to endure or to heare that that noble prouince ſhould againe fall into the hands of the Germans, encouraging his ſouldiors, went vpon the ſudden to aſſaile Baſta, in hope to haue found him vnprouided, and ſo diſcomfiting his armie, to haue driuen the Imperials quite out of TRANSILVANIA: But he an old & expert commaunder, perceiuing euen the firſt moouing of the Tranſyluanians, with great celeritie put
C his armie in good order, and ſo ioyned battell with them: wherein hee with the loſſe of ſome fiue hundred men ouerthrew Moiſes, with his armie of Tranſyluanians, Turkes, and Tartars, hauing ſlaine aboue three thouſand of them, and put the reſt to flight: Moiſes himſelfe with ſome few others being now glad to take their refuge into the frontiers of the Turks territories towards TEMESVVAR. But when Sigiſmund vnderſtood what his lieutenant had without his knowledge done, he in token of his owne innocencie went himſelfe vnto the Imperiall campe, accompanied only with certain of his gentlemen, and there vnto Baſta excuſed himſelfe of that which was by his lieutenant againſt his will, and without his priuitie done; frankly offering to performe whatſoeuer was on his part to be performed, according to the agreement made betwixt the Emperour and him. And ſo preſently calling his garriſons out of all ſuch ſtrong pla-
D ces as were yet for him holden, he ſurrendred them to Baſta; and ſo forthwith honourably accompanied, put himſelfe vpon his way towards the Emperour. After whoſe departure out of TRANSYLVANIA, all that prouince voluntarily and without more ado yeelded to Baſta as to the Emperours lieutenant: who preſently called an aſſemblie of all the Nobilitie of the countrie, taking of them an oath for their obedience & loyaltie vnto the emperor. Thus by the wiſedome and prowes of this worthie commander, is the countrie of TRANSYLVANIA once againe brought vnder the emperors obeiſance; a matter of far greater importance, than to haue woon the ſtrongeſt citie the Turke holdeth in HVNGARIE.

Zachell Moiſes ouerthrowne by Baſta.

But whileſt theſe things thus paſſed in TRANSYLVANIA, great troubles ariſe in VALACHIA (the countrie next adioyning) for that the people of that prouince not able longer to endure
E the great inſolencie of the Turks (who after the death of Michael had by their power made one Hieremias Vayuod there) by a generall conſent tooke vp armes, and proclaiming one Radoll (a fauourite of the Emperours) Vayuod, chaſed Hieremias (before placed by the Turkes) quite out of the countrie: who flying vnto Simon Palatine of MOLDAVIA, his friend, by his means and the helpe of the Turks, returning vnto VALACHIA, draue out thence Radoll againe: who being now at this preſent with Baſta, with about ten thouſand Valachians his followers, earneſtly requeſted of him (now that hee was ſo quietly poſſeſſed of TRANSYLVANIA) to helpe him with his forces for the recouerie of VALACHIA. And Baſta well conſidering how much it concerned the quiet and ſure keeping of the poſſeſſion of TRANSYLVANIA for the Emperour, to haue that ſo neere a prouince to friend, eaſily yeelded to his requeſt; and gaue
F him a great regiment of his old approoued ſouldiours, and ſo ſent him away to recouer his eſtate: with whom (at his entrance into VALACHIA) the Moldauian meeting with a great power both of his owne and of the Turkes, come thither in the fauour of Hieremias, there was fought betwixt them a moſt terrible and bloudie battell, the glorie whereof fell vnto Radoll, hee carrying away the victorie. In which battell two of the Turkes Baſſaes were there ſlaine, with a great number of others both of the Moldauians and Turkes. After which victorie Radoll recouered againe the ſoueraignetie of VALACHIA, for which he was beholding to Baſſa: and ſhortly after with the ſame aid cut in pieces a great power of the Tartars, that were comming to haue aided the Moldauian. Troubles in Hungarie.

Now in the meane time in HVNGARIE alſo paſſed many an hot skirmiſh betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turkes, whoſe garriſons at BVDA and in other places in the lower HVNGARIE, attempting to haue ſurpriſed ALBA REGALIS, and diſcouered by the Chriſtians, were with great ſlaughter enforced to retire. At which time alſo, Countie Serinus vnderſtanding by his eſpials, that the Turkes with two hundred waggons with munition and victuals were going to CANISIA, vpon the ſudden ſet vpon them, and hauing ſlain and put to flight the conuoy that guarded them, carried the waggons with all that was in them away with him. And ſhortly after the free Haiduckes of COMARA in a great partie going out towards BVDA to ſeeke after bootie, and hauing taken threeſcore Turkes priſoners, and ſo with them about to haue returned home; vnderſtanding by the way, that Ali ſometime the Baſſa of BVDA, and now gouernour of PESTH, was with a ſmall retinue about to come downe the riuer Danubius from BVDA towards BELGRADE, there to meet the Viſier Baſſa, but then comming into HVNGARIE, they ſlew all the priſoners; and hauing got two ſmall boats, about fifteen miles beneath BVDA, lay in wait for the Baſſa: who according to their expectation comming downe the riuer, was by theſe aduenturers fiercely aſſailed, and of his thirtie followers hauing fourteene ſlaine, being H

himſelfe alſo ſhot in two places of his bodie, was there with a great bootie taken, & ſo brought to COMORA, and ſhortly after preſented vnto Matthias the archduke at VIENNA: who amongſt other things certainly enformed, that Haſſan Baſſa was with a great armie by the commaundement of the great Sultan Mahomet comming to beſiege ALBA REGALIS, and that he was now vpon his way as far as BELGRADE; preſently ſent thither the Countie Iſolan gouernour thereof, who with much ado got into the citie, the Turks hauing alreadie taken all the paſſages, to haue hindered the Chriſtians from putting in either men or munition, more than was therein alreadie. Howbeit the Countie now got in there, and being no leſſe good enginer than a valiant commaunder, cauſed all them in the citie to labour vpon the rampiers: ſo that beſide the naturall ſituation thereof, which was very ſtrong, he had in ſhort time ſo fortified it, as that in moſt mens iudgement it ſeemed a place almoſt impregnable. This Ali Baſſa was ſometime the Great Turkes butler, but after the taking of AGRIA made Baſſa of BVDA; which great place he held but three moneths, being by the enuie and ambition of ſome, but eſpecially of Amurath Baſſa, remoued thence, and made gouernour of PESTH: from whence now going downe the riuer to BELGRADE, it was his fortune to be thus taken by the Haiduckes, vnto whom he offered for his ranſome three hundred thouſand Sultanines; and had with him when he was taken ſeuentie thouſand duckats. I K

A great ranſome offered by Ali Baſſa.

Mahomet the great Sultan not a little troubled with the loſſe of ALBA REGALIS (taken from him by the Chriſtians the laſt yeare) and now reſolued for the recouerie of the ſame to ingage if need ſhould be a great part of his forces; had cauſed an armie of an hundred and fiftie thouſand ſtrong, to meet at meet at HADRIANOPLE for that purpoſe, vnder the leading of Haſſan Baſſa one of the chiefe Viſiers, to be ſent into HVNGARIE. Who by the way of BELGRADE comming to BVDA, and from thence to ALBA REGALIS, there the twelfth of Auguſt encamped (as he had oftentimes before threatned) with the multitude of his tents couering all the countrie round about, as if it had bin a whit ſnow: where hauing well entrenched himſelf, and planted his artillerie, he began a moſt terrible and furious batterie, in ſuch ſort as if he had not meant to haue made a breach only, but to haue beaten the citie euen from the face of the earth, which ſeemed now to tremble vnder his feet, and the clouds to rend with the thundering of his great ordinance: and for that the mariſh and deepe ditches were a great let vnto his men for tn come vnto the aſſault, he cauſed thē with the number of his pioners to be filled vp, a work thought almoſt impoſſible, & ſo brought on his men to aſſault the counterſcarf, which the gouernor had cauſed to be made before the citie for the better defence therof: which aſſault coſt him much blod, by reaſon of the wonderful valor of the defendants: yet in the end the great number of the Turks preuailing, the Chriſtians were enforced to forſake it & retire into the citie. But ſhortly after ſallying out again, they L M

Alba Regalis beſieged by the Turkes.

A they with ſuch force aſſailed the Turkes now got within the counterſcarſe, that hauing ſlaine moſt part of them that were entred, they forced the other out againe: at the bruit whereof, an alarme being raiſed throughout the camp, infinit numbers of the barbarous enemies came running thither with ſuch ſauage furie, that without regard of their liues they as deſperat men preſſing ſtill on, fell twice as many as before: inſomuch that the Chriſtians wearie of that long and bloudie fight, & on euery ſide charged or, rather ouerwhelmed with the enemies ſhot, were glad againe, but not without great loſſe, to abandon the place. With which skirmiſhes and diuers others that they had, the number of the defendants was greatly diminiſhed, to keepe a weak citie, ſhewing as yet the ruines of the late ſiege, when it was by the Chriſtians woone; the breaches thereof being but euill repaired, and the mines yet gaping, requiring great and ſtrong fortifica-
B tions to hold out and endure any long ſiege againſt ſo puiſſant an enemie. Yet was not the courage of the valiant countie Ysolan the Italian Gouernour, any whit therewith abated, but by his letters gaue the Archduke Matthias to vnderſtand in what caſe things ſtood with them in the citie, requeſting him with all ſpeed to ſend him reliefe, for that otherwiſe the citie, ſo weakly both manned & fortified, would be in danger to be loſt; many of the garriſon ſoldiors being aleadie ſlaine in the defence thereof, and diuers of the Hungarians forſaking the wals, daily flying vnto the Turkes campe: promiſing yet neuertheleſſe himſelfe to doe the vttermoſt of his deuoire. Vpon the receit of which letters, the Archduke gaue order vnto the lord Ruſſworm (maſter of the camp) to go forthwith to Comora, and there with ſuch forces as were from diuers places come thither, to go forth and to proue if by any meanes the weake garriſon of Alba Regalis might C ſo be relieued, by putting in ſome good ſupplie of freſh ſouldiors. According vnto which commaund, Ruſſworm comming thither, without delay tooke the field with twelue thouſand men which he found there, to ſee if he might with them put into the citie the deſired reliefe. But whileſt the matter was in the performance thereof too long delaied, by diſcord ariſing betwixt him and the other Colonels, about the maner of relieuing the towne, the Baſſa had time to effect his purpoſe: who the eight and twentith of the ſame moneth of Auguſt, after a long and terrible batterie, cauſed a generall aſſault to be giuen vnto the citie: which the Turkes from time to time renewing, continued all that day and the next night, with ſome part of the day following alſo, without ceaſing: ſo that the defendants now much weakned, and they alſo that were left ſo wearied or wounded, as that they were not wel able to make any longer reſiſtance (& the coun-D tie himſelfe, who gaue as it were life vnto them all, being now all caried away, dangerouſly hurt in the thigh with a musket ſhot) there was a ſigne of parley giuen vnto the enemie: which the Baſſa graunting, and the furie of the aſſault ſtaied, certaine of the chiefe captains and commanders in the citie, going vnto the Gouernor, put him in mind of the weakneſſe of the place, of the force of the enemie, of the number of his moſt valiant men ſlaine, of the want of the defendant. They had (as they ſaid) done ynough for their honour, hauing endured ſo many and ſo great aſſaults, in a place not defencible: and ynough to diſcharge their fidelitie, hauing holden it out to the vttermoſt of their power. That they could do no more than they had done, being not relieued; and that the ſame bond which bound them to defend the place, bound the emperor alſo to relieue them, ſeeing that otherwiſe it was not in their power to maintaine it. That they had,
E with the loſſe of their liues and bloud, ſhewed their fidelitie vnto the emperor, no ſufficient armie appearing from him (according to his promiſe) for their ſuccour. That to fight any longer was but to encreaſe the glorie of their enemies, and their owne loſſes: ſeeing that after they had done what they poſſibly could, expoſed to a thouſand dangers, they ſhould neuertheles be vanquiſhed, and the citie taken. That the ſame conſideration which carried valiant minds vnto the effects of honour, when they are relieued with hope, diſſuaded them being out of all hope of any happie end of their troubles: and to loſe themſelues to no purpoſe, was as great a ſigne of follie, as to let ſlip a faire opportunitie, was a ſigne of cowardiſe. That they were to expect nothing but extreme miſerie, if the enemy ſhould againe force them; the breaches being ſo broad, as wherby they might eaſily enter: and their owne beſt men ſlaine, that ſhould keepe them out.
F And that therfore he ſhould do well, to come to ſome good compoſition with the enemie, whileſt they had yet ſomething to yeeld vp vnto him, and that he ſtood in ſome feare of them: and not to expect, whileſt they were ſpoiled of all means, either to reſiſt him by force, or to bind him by courteſie: nothing remaining for them in the place, but death, if they ſhould obſtinatly ſtand to the defence thereof; nor no way left to ſaue their liues, but by yeelding. G

With theſe perſuaſions the Gouernour moued, came to a parley with the Baſſa, being right glad thereof; aſwell knowing that a towne beſieged comming to a parley, is commonly more than half woon: and glad by any means to gaine it, for that therof depended the aſſurance both of his head & honor: where after ſome ſhort talke it was agreed, That the Countie ſhould yeeld the towne into the hands of the Baſſa, with all the great ordinance, and other warlike munition therein: And that the Countie with his garriſon, ſhould with bag and baggage in ſafetie depart with their armes, by the ſuburbs leading toward R A B; and with a good conuoy in ſafetie to be brought halfe way thither. This capitulation agreed vpon, and by the Baſſa and the countie ſigned, euery man aſſured himſelfe of the Baſſaes faith, and thereon reſted. But what faith is to be expected from a faithleſſe man? Vpon the firſt brute of this compoſition, yea and before it H was altogither well concluded; whileſt the merchants in the towne were ſeeking for wagons to carrie their merchandiſe, and the ſouldiours for horſes to carrie their baggage, the ſcarceneſſe thereof bred a great confuſion and ſturre among the people; as commonly it falleth out in things done in haſt, but eſpecially where men for ſafeguard of their liues, in their flight for haſt fall into a thouſand errours: So whileſt ſome in this hurly burly were quarrelling about their horſes and carriages, and otherſome were opening the gates to be gone; others were as buſie in robbing and pilfering the baggages of their captaines and companions: miſerable men, who all appointed for a prey vnto the greeedie and mercileſſe Turks, yet fell to preying one vpon another. Which diſorders encouraged the reſt of the ſouldiors to fall to pillage all alſo, ſome loading themſelues with ſuch goods as the merchants had for lacke of carriages left behind them; I and otherſome euen with the goods of their owne captaines: which the ſouldiours appointed for defence of the breaches ſeeing, left their charge, and came thronging into the towne, and thruſt themſelues in amongſt theſe pilferers, as if the pillage of the towne had been vnto them by triumphant victorie aſſured, and that they themſelues had bin victors, and not men vanquiſhed. The Tartars lodged at the foot of the breach, ſeeing it forſaken, and without any great ſtrength to defend it, let not this opportunitie ſlip, but preſſing on without any great reſiſtance, entred the ſame; and ſo in a trice full thirtie thouſand of them thruſt into the towne, and there ſurpriſed the vanquiſhed Chriſtians at once loaded with prey, feare, and deſpaire. After whom, euen by the ſame breach, the Turks entred alſo, to be partakers of the ſpoile: ſo that in a moment the towne was full of enemies both Turks and Tartars. The Turks beſide the K bootie they tooke themſelues, fell to quarrelling with the Tartars, for ſome part of theirs: & ſo long as there was any thing that might pleaſe their eyes, or fill their hands, they abſtained from ſlaughter and bloudſhed, buſying themſelues with that which for the preſent was more for their profit: But the pillaging ceaſing, by reaſon there was no more to bee had, then the perfidious wretches fell to maſſacring of the miſerable Chriſtians, the ſword deuouring all that they could light vpon, ſo that all the citie flowed with bloud. Neither was there any end thereof, vntill that by the comming in of the Baſſa the ſlaughter was ſtaied; by which means Countie Tſolan the late Gouernor with ſome other captains and ſouldiors were ſaued, hauing eſcaped the enemies furie.

The capitulation betwixt the Baſſa and the Countie for the yeelding vp of the citie of Alba Regalis.

Great diſorder and confuſion among the beſieged.

Alba Regalis taken by the Turkes.

The Chriſtians cruelly murdered in Alba Regalis.

In this maſſacre were ſlaine three thouſand Chriſtian ſouldiors, beſide others of the citizens, L in number not few. The captaines that were ſpared, were led priſoners to CONSTANTINOPLE, there to be fed with the bread of tribulation: & with them the countie Iſolan, for his valour and noble courage vnworthie of ſo hard a fortune. Howbeit, that he by liuely and pregnant reaſons ſhewed, both himſelfe & the reſt to be vniuſtly detained, as taken priſoners contrarie to the publique faith vnto them before giuen; within the aſſurance of the capitulation agreed vpon with the Baſſa, and out of the actions of warre. Whereunto it was againe anſwered him, That the towne when he was taken, was yet ſtill in his power; and he at choice whether he would deliuer it or no. That if he would by the yeelding vp of the town challenge his libertie, according to the articles of the capitulation, he ought then to haue deliuered it as was agreed, & not to haue ſuffered it to haue bin taken by force, according to the ordinarie proceeding of warre: the lawes M wherof do iuſtly condemne to death, or to captiuitie, ſuch as are by force of armes vanquiſhed. That euery town which during the treatie of capitulation, is by force taken, followeth the courſe of the latter condition and ſtate, & not of the former, ſeeing that it is conquered and not deliuered.

Countie Iſolan carried awey priſoner to Conſtantinople.

A red. That this is the reaſon that they are puniſhed by the rigour of armes, which haue not beene carefull to preſerue themſelues by the ſweetneſſe of peace: for that a man is not to expect of his mortal enemie any other courteſie, than that which neceſſitie cauſed him to promiſe, which hee may for his owne good againe violate, as hee for the good of his enemie, againſt his will hath graunted. With ſuch quirkes and quillets the Countie deluded, ſay what he could, was carried away priſoner to CONSTANTINOPLE, where we muſt for a while leaue him. And ſo the Baſſa hauing in eighteene dayes taken ALBA REGALIS (now being eleuen moneths poſſeſſed by the Chriſtians) cauſed the breaches he had made to bee againe repaired, and the citie well prouided for both of victuals and munition, leauing therin a ſtrong garriſon of 6000 good ſouldiors: and
B with his people hauing ouerrun all the countrey as farre as STRIGONIVM, roſe with his armie, and retired againe to BVDA: whereas he was making a bridge of boats ouer the Danubius betwixt BVDA and PESTH, for the more eaſie tranſporting of victuall, and better relieuing of the one the other as need ſhould require; and hauing brought that worke to paſſe, and about to haue gone to the ſiege of STRIGONIVM, commandement came from the great Sultan, That he ſhould with all ſpeed returne to CONSTANTINOPLE; for that Mahomet accounting of him as of a moſt valiant man, was now minded to employ him in his wars againſt his rebels in NATOLIA, where things now went not well (as ſhall hereafter bee declared.) Vpon which commaundement, the Baſſa gaue leaue to all ſuch in his armie as had charge of any place, forthwith to returne to their ſeuerall places of gouernment: appoynting ſome others with 30000 ſouldiours
C in the companie of Zachael Moiſes (but of late prince Sigiſmund his lieutenant) to goe with him into TRANSYLVANIA; who after the ouerthrow he had there receiued by Baſta, was come vnto this great Baſſa, offering vnto him (with ſuch an aid as was now appointed for him, and the helpe of ſuch other his friends as he had in TRANSYLVANIA) to chaſe Baſta with his Germans from out thence, and to reduce that prouince againe vnto the deuotion of the Othoman Emperours, as it had in former time beene. And ſo by the way of BELGRADE haſted himſelfe with the reſt of his armie towards CONSTANTINOPLE: which he was thought the more willingly to doe, for that the great Sultan before his ſetting foorth had put him in good hope to marrie one of his aunts, a woman of great wealth and honour, if by the winning againe of ALBA REGALIS, he ſhould make himſelfe worthie ſo honourable a match, after which he now
D longed.

But long it was not after his departure, but that the Imperials now at laſt aſſembled together at COMARA, to the number of about thirtie thouſand men, with twelue * Naſſadies and two gallies, ſome by water, ſome by land, marched downe alongſt the riuer to STIOONIVM; where were alſo twenty other ſhips ready to receiue them, and ſo all embarked, were by the lord Ruſſworm and other the Imperiall captaines conducted to BVDA, there with ſome notable enterpriſe to redeeme the diſgrace by them before receiued in not relieuing of ALBA REGALIS. Whoſe comming was ſo ſuddaine and ſo vnlooked for of the Turkes there, as that they had no time to take in any greater helpe or prouiſion, than was alreadie in the citie. And for as much as the Chriſtians knew the good ſucceſſe of this their enterpriſe taken in hand, not ſo much to de-
E pend of their ſtrength, as of their politike proceeding and ſpeedy diſpatch of the matter begun, they thought it not good to vſe any long delay, or to ſpare for any labour, but ſo ſoone as they might by taking of the Water citie (or as ſome call it, the Iewes ſuburbes) ſo to cut off the paſſage of them of BVDA to PESTH: as alſo from thence to trouble them in the caſtle and the vpper citie of BVDA. Which their intended exploit they happily attempted and brought to paſſe in this ſort: The citie of PESTH ſtanding right ouer againſt BVDA, is (as we haue oftentimes before ſaid) diuided from the ſame with the great and ſwift riuer of Danubius: ouer which the Turkes vpon boates had with great labour and coſt of late built a moſt eaſie and commodious bridge, for paſſage or carriage of things from the one citie to the other. This bridge the Imperials thought neceſſarie firſt to breake, the more eaſie to beſiege either the one or other citie; and F for that purpoſe had by a ſtrange deuice built a ſhip, which by the force of the ſtreame carried downe the riuer, and reſting vpon the bridge, ſhould by a wonderfull power breake the ſame. Which ſhip the Turkes ſeeing comming downe the riuer with the reſt of the fleet after her, they ranne by heapes, eſpecially out of the Water citie to the bridge, for the defence thereof: where whileſt they were thus buſied, Countie Sultze on the other ſide by land with a Petarde blew vp one

one of the gates of the citie, and ſo entring, and killing all ſuch as he light vpon, came vnlooked G for vpon the backes of the Turks at the bridge, of whom, ſome he ſlewe, ſome he draue into the riuer, who there periſhed; the reſt in number not many, by ſpeedy flight retiring themſelues into the citie: whereupon he had now brought ſuch a generall feare, that they all, as well the ſoldiors as the citiſens, with the Chriſtians at their heeles, with as much haſt as they could tooke their refuge into the vpper citie of BVDA, much ſtronger and better fortified than was the lower city. At which time the bridge was by them vpon the riuer broken alſo, ſo that now the one citie could no more thereby relieue the other as before.

The Water-citie thus woone, and the bridge broken, the next was for the Imperials to beſiege either the one or the other citie. But for that they of PESTH might with their great ordinance much annoy them in the beſieging of the caſtle and the vpper citie of BVDA, they H thought beſt to begin with it firſt: which they did in much like ſort as they had before done at the lower citie of BVDA, the ſame deuice againe well proſpering in their hand. For the lord Ruffworm with the fleet vpon the riuer making a great ſhew, as if hee would euen preſently on that ſide haue entred, had with the ſtirre by him raiſed, drawne downe moſt part of the garriſon ſouldiors vnto that ſide of the citie where moſt ſhew of danger was: whileſt in the meane while Countie Sultze with the Gouernour of ALTHEM (before vndiſcouered) vpon the ſudden by land ſcaled the other ſide of the citie, and gained the wals, the Turkes yet dreaming of no ſuch matter. But hereupon began a great outcrie, the Turkes ſtanding as men aſtonied, eſpecially now feeling the Chriſtians weapons in their bodies, before they knew they were got into the citie. In this ſo great an amazement, ſuch of them as could, fled into the ſtrongeſt towers, I the reſt hid themſelues in cellars, and other the moſt ſecret corners they could find, out of which they were afterwards by the Chriſtians drawne and ſlaine. They which were retired alſo into the towers and other ſtronger places of the citie, ſeeing the great ordinance in euery place bent vpon them, and now out of all hope of reliefe, offered to yeeld, requeſting onely, that they might with their wiues and children with life depart; promiſing for that fauour ſo ſhewed them, to perſwade them of BVDA alſo in like maner to yeeld: Vpon which promiſe, that their poore requeſt was graunted, and the lord Nadaſti with certaine other captaines ſent with ſome of theſe citizens of PESTH with their wiues and children to BVDA: who comming thither, according to their promiſe moſt earneſtly requeſted them of BVDA to yeeld, for that they were not now to expect any further helpe, and that by their fooliſh obſtinacie they ſhould bee the cauſe K of the death of them, their friends, their wiues and children. Vnto whom alſo, to mooue them the more, the lord Nadaſti promiſed in the name of Generall, That they ſhould all, excepting ſome few of their chiefe commaunders, in ſafetie depart: howbeit, they of BVDA would not hearken thereunto, but ſtood ſtill vpon their guard. In this citie of PESTH, well inhabited with Turkiſh marchants, the Chriſtians found great ſtore of wealth, which all became a prey vnto the ſoldiors, with a thouſand horſes for ſeruice, many great pieces of artillerie, and much other warlike prouiſion.

The vpper citie and caſtle of Buda beſieged by the Chriſtians.

PESTH thus woon, and a ſtrong garriſon left therein, they returned againe ouer the riuer to beſiege the caſtle and vpper citie of BVDA: which they attempted by vndermining the ſame, as alſo by batterie; hauing placed ſome of their great ordinance ſo high, that they could at their L pleaſure ſhoot into the middeſt of the ſtreetes of the citie, wherewith they much troubled the Turkes, not a little before diſcouraged with the loſſe of PESTH; thundring alſo at the ſame time with their other batteries in diuers places of the wals both of the caſtle and of the citie, Where vnderſtanding, that the Turkes garriſons of the frontier townes and caſtles thereabouts (hearing of the ſiege) were comming to the reliefe of their diſtreſſed friends, they ſent out their horſemen with ſome part of their footmen againſt them: who meeting with them, gaue them a great ouerthrow, and ſo with victorie returned againe vnto the reſt of the armie lying at the ſiege, being ſtill in hope either by force or compoſition to become maſters of the citie.

But whileſt they lay in this hope, and, hauing the twelfth of October brought their approaches neerer vnto the walls, had there planted certaine notable pieces of batterie, with purpoſe M
the next day with all their power to haue aſſaulted the citie: behold, the Viſier Baſſa hearing (by the way as hee was going to BELGRADE, and ſo to CONSTANTINOPLE) that PESTH

was

A was woon, and BVDA beſieged; changing his mind, returned in haſt with ſuch forces as hee had yet left; and ſo vnlooked for, came and ſat downe before PESTH, being not then aboue fiue and twentie thouſand ſtrong, but thoſe all for the moſt part old and expert ſouldiours. But whileſt the Baſſa thus lay at the ſiege of PESTH on the one ſide of the riuer, and the Imperials at the ſiege of BVDA on the other, diuers braue attempts were in both places giuen both on the one ſide and the other. The Chriſtians in PESTH beſieged by the Turkes, hauing amongſt them diuers braue captaines, and deſirous of honour, one day vnder their conduct ſallied out of the citie to skirmiſh with the Turkes; and comming with them to the ſword, by plaine valour diſordered them, and enforced them to flie; and ſo allured with the ſweetneſſe of the victorie, purſued them euen to the trenches: from whence a great ſquadron of the Turkes horſemen
B and harquebuſiers at the ſame inſtant iſſuing out, and with their multitude ouercharging the Imperials, conſtrained them of force to retire: in which retreat, Countie Maximilian Martinengo (one of theſe aduenturers) doing what hee might both with his valour and direction to haue ſtaied the diſordered retreat of the Chriſtians, was with many others ſlaine: wherewith the reſt diſcouraged, tooke their refuge towards the citie. Which they of the garriſon beholding, ſent out certaine companies to relieue them; by whoſe comming out, the furie of the Turkes was not onely repreſſed, but they alſo euen vnto their trenches againe repulſed. Shortly after which hot skirmiſhes, the lord Ruſſworm with the other Chriſtian Captaines on the other ſide of the riuer, hauing with continuall batterie made ſuch a breach into the caſtle, as that the ſame ſeemed to be now ſaultable, in good order came on with certaine companies of their foot-
C men appointed for that ſeruice, and ſo couragiouſly aſſailed the breach: where the Turkes, who before had expected this aſſault, hauing in beſt ſort they could repaired the breach, and on both ſides thereof placed diuers murthering pieces, with great ſtore of dangerous fire workes, at ſuch time as the firſt companies of the Chriſtians ſought couragiouſly to haue entred the breach, ouerwhelmed them with that deadly fire, and ſo rent them with their murthering ſhot, that they no ſaſter entred, but that they were foorthwith cut off, and ſlaine: with the ſight whereof, they which were appointed to ſecond them, nothing diſcouraged, but ſeeking deſperately to haue entred, and with the taking of the caſtle, and ſlaughter of the Turkes to haue requited the death of their fellowes, were themſelues in like ſort welcommed. So that now a thouſand of them being loſt, the captaines conſidering how much the loſſe of ſo many braue
D ſoldiors concerned the whole enterpriſe taken in hand, and that the breach could not be gained without the loſſe of the greateſt part of them, they cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, and ſo the aſſault for that time to be giuen ouer.

A notable skirmiſh betwixt the Chriſtians, and the Turkes.

But long it was not that the Viſier Baſſa (thus retired as aforeſaid) had lien before PESTH, but that by reaſon of his ſo ſudden returne, great wants began to ariſe in his campe; his ſouldiors for want of food being glad to eat their dead horſes, a pound of bread being ſold for two Hungarian duckats, and a buſhell of oates for fiue, and yet hardly ſo to bee gotten: which wants in that ſo waſted a countrey ſtill more and more encreaſing, and many of his ſouldiors ſecretly ſtealing away from him, hee had much adoe by all the meanes he could vſe, to perſuade them there to ſtay eight dayes longer. Which time expired, and nothing more done, than ſome
E fewe weake attempts giuen, and ſome light skirmiſhes made, rather for faſhions ſake than for any hope of preuailing, and the want of all things ſtill encreaſing; he with the reſt of the commaunders fearing ſome ſudden miſchiefe to bee done them by the hungrie and diſcontented ſouldiors, the ſecond of Nouember, cauſing his baggage to bee truſſed vp in the dead time of the darke and ſilent night, riſe with his armie, and ſo in haſte retired directly to BELGRADE, leauing behind him in his campe three hundred dead horſes, not yet eaten by his hunger-ſtarued ſouldiours. Immediately after whoſe departure, the lord Nadaſti and ſome other of the commaunders in the armie, with fiue thouſand ſouldiors and certaine great pieces of artillerie, ſome by land, ſome by water, went downe alongſt the riuer to ADOM, a faire well built towne vpon the banke of Danubius, about foure Hungarian miles from BVDA, and ſeruing as it were F for a ſtore-houſe for the garriſon there: which towne Nadaſti ſummoned by his Huſſars ſent before, requiring to haue it deliuered vnto him. Which they of the towne at the firſt refuſed to doe: but afterwards ſeeing a farre greater power come, prouided of great ordnance and all things elſe requiſit for a ſiege, they with the ſight thereof diſcouraged, without more adoe offered to yeeld the towne, ſo that they might with bag and baggage in ſafetie depart: which they G did, the Chriſtians conducting them as farre as FELDVVAR, which caſtle was alſo at the firſt ſummons, by the perſuaſion of them of ADOM deliuered vnto them: for they of the caſtle, by them enformed of the great ſtrength of the Chriſtians, and of the ſtore of great ordinance they had brought with them, and that they ſtaied therewith but faſt by, were eaſily perſuaded to hearken to their friends, and ſo yeelded. Which done, the free Haiduckes the ſame night ſurpriſed alſo the caſtle of PAX: from whence the Chriſtians ſtill marching on alongſt the riuer, tooke in alſo the citie of TOLNA.

But whileſt Nadaſti with the reſt were thus buſied in taking theſe caſtles and townes alongſt the South ſide of Danubius, they in the campe at BVDA were aduertiſed of the new deſignes of the Turkes lieutenants and captaines thereabout, for the reliefe of the beſieged: as that the H Baſſa of BOSNA, with the Gouernours of CANISIA, SIGETH, and others, had aſſembled an armie of thirtie thouſand for the raiſing of the ſiege. Wherefore the Chriſtians doubting as they lay at the ſiege diſperſed, to be by them oppreſſed; leauing their tents in their trenches, gathered themſelues together into the Water citie: which the Turkes out of the vper citie quickely perceiuing, as feeling themſelues now at ſome more libertie, preſently ſallying out, tooke both the trenches and the tents ſo left, with no ſmall ſlaughter of ſuch as were left for the keeping of them: and ſo poſſeſſed of the trenches and tents, held them by the ſpace of two houres, vntill they were by ſtrong hand by the Chriſtians beaten out, and ſo with ſome loſſe enforced againe to retire into the citie. The lord Nadaſti alſo, with the reſt that had taken the aforeſaid caſtles and townes vpon the ſide of Danubius, making a rode towards ALBA REGALIS, I in their returne within a mile of BVDA light vpon a thouſand Turks there gathered together, moſt part of whom they ſlew, and hauing put the reſt to flight, tooke ſome fiftie of them priſoners. At which time alſo an other of the Imperiall Colonels meeting with certaine other companies of the Turkes comming to the reliefe of the beſieged, not farre from BVDA, ſlew moſt part of them: tooke an hundred and threeſcore of them priſoners, with a number of horſes and much other rich bootie, all which hee brought into the campe. Neither were they at the ſiege in the meane time idle, their great artillerie ſtill thundering againſt the walles both of the caſtle and the citie: ſo that by the furie of the cannon hauing beaten downe a ſtrong tower next vnto the Danubius, not farre from the Kings ſtable, they were a little before night about to haue there entred, when ſuddenly ſuch a tempeſt of wind and raine ariſe, as that they could not poſ- K ſibly vſe their pieces, or well any other weapon: ſo that the heauens as it were then fighting for the enemie, they were enforced for that time to giue ouer the aſſault begun. Which ſtorme was no ſooner ended, but that two thouſand of the Turkes both horſe and foot, to keepe the Chriſtians otherwiſe buſied, ſuddenly iſſuing out of the citie, charged vpon the Stirian horſemen; who preſently relieued by the men at armes, ſo welcommed them, that hauing loſt an hundred and threeſcore of their men, they were glad with more ſpeed to retire than they came out. But ſeeing ſome of the Chriſtians that ſo hardly purſued them, ſome ſlaine, and ſome hurt from the wals, taking heart againe, the next day (being the eleuenth of Nouember) they ſallied out againe; where albeit that a great number of them were ſlaine, yet fell they out againe the third day alſo, and were againe by the Countie Thurn with great loſſe of their men beaten backe L into the citie: where in purſuing of them, the Chriſtians were by certaine Ianizaries (layd cloſe for that purpoſe) ſuddenly aſſayled and dangerouſly gauled, the Countie himſelfe being hurt in his left arme, and ſome other captaines ſlaine. In all which ſallies, although the Turks were ſtill put to the worſe, yet thereby they gained time in ſome good ſort to repaire againe their breaches.

Shortly after, the imperials thus lying at the ſiege, certainly enformed that a world of the fierce and rude Tartars by the incitement of the Turke (hauing made themſelues way through VALACHIA) were comming as farre as TEMESVVAR to relieue BVDA; thought it not beſt (eſpecially now that winter was come) to abide the comming of that ſo great a Northren tem-

A rous enemie. As for ADOM, it was ſtrengthened with a garriſon of Hungarians only, with their wages offred to be paid before hand; which for all that they refuſed to accept, alledging that for the great danger this place was expoſed vnto aboue others, they could not ſafely take their oath for the defence thereof: yet offering withall to vndertake the charge, and to doe what beſeemed valiant ſouldiors, in ſuch ſort, as that all men ſhould well vnderſtand, that nothing euill ſhould happen thereunto through their default or negligence.

The ſiege of BVDA for feare of the Tartars thus giuen ouer, and the Imperials departed and gone, the Turkes foorthwith came downe out of the higher citie into the lower, declaring their ioy for the recouerie thereof, by the often thundering of their great ordinance, with diuers other ſignes of triumph. But whileſt in their iolitie they ſpared not by the mouth of the cannon to B ſend commendations to them of PESTH, they from them againe receiued the like; but in ſuch rude manner, that the Turkes wearie of ſuch greetings, requeſted them to ſpare their ſhot and powder, and quietly to liue by them as became neighbours for that Winter vntill the next Spring, at which time it was to be thought that this ſtrife ſhould be ended by their Emperours, the weaker yeelding vnto the ſtronger either the one or the other citie. Yet for all this their great ioy, their cheere in BVDA was not great, victuals by this ſiege being become ſo ſcarce, that it was by the Turkes feared, That if the Chriſtians had there longer lyen, they ſhould for very want haue been enforced to haue yeelded the citie. Of which their need their friends not ignorant; and hauing made what prouiſion they were able for their reliefe, were with a great conuoy bringing the ſame towards BVDA: whereof the garriſons of COMARA and STRIGONIVM ha-
C uing intelligence, went preſently out, and meeting with the Turkes in the mid way betwixt ALBA REGALIS and BVDA, ouerthrew the conuoy, and carried all that prouiſion of victuall, like vnbidden gueſts making themſelues merrie with that which was neuer prouided for them.

Mahomet much troubled with the Scriuano.

Theſe doubtfull warres of HVNGARIE, with the generall reuolt of TRANSYLVANIA, much troubled Mahomet the great Sultan, but nothing like vnto the warres hee had in ASIA againſt the Scriuano and the rebels his followers: the euill ſucceſſe whereof (as moſt dangerous to his ſtate) ſo much tormented his haughtie mind, as that it would ſcarce ſuffer him to thinke of any thing elſe. For the rebell encouraged with the ſucceſſe of the laſt yeares warres, and ſtill growing ſtronger and ſtronger (by reaſon of the great number, which allured with the ſweet name of D libertie, hope of prey, or the good entertainment by him giuen, daily more and more reſorted vnto his campe) had this yeare ouerrun a great part of the Turkes dominions in ASIA, putting all to fire and ſword that ſtood in his way, ranſacking alſo diuers walled and fenced cities by the way as he went: Which he might the more eaſily doe, for that the Ianizaries of ALEPPO and DAMASCO, with many other their partakers and fauourites, which might greatly haue hindered his proceedings, were at the ſame time alſo vp in armes and together by the eares amongſt them ſelues, to the great benefit of the Scriuano: who in the middeſt of the courſe of theſe his deſired fortunes, fell ſicke of a naturall diſeaſe, and ſo died. By whoſe death the rebellion was no whit appeaſed (as commonly in like caſe it falleth out, and as was then of many expected) but in ſhort time grew to be both farre greater and more dangerous than before: for the Scriuano was no ſoo-
E ner dead, but that a yonger brother of his, no leſſe warlike and couragious than himſelfe (to the great contentment of the rebellious) ſtept vp in his place, fiercely proſecuting the warres his brother had before him taken in hand. Againſt whom, Haſſan Baſſa by commandement from the Graund ſignior with a great armie ſetting forward, with hope in that newneſſe of his commaund to haue oppreſſed him, and ſo to haue quenched that ſo ſpreading a fire; at length met with him that was eaſie enough to be found, and ioyning battell with him, was by him in a great and bloody fight ouerthrowne and ſlaine together with his whole armie, except ſuch as by ſpeedie flight ſaued themſelues from the furie of their fierce enemies. So that Mahomet the great Sultan now inforced to employ his beſt commanders and ſouldiors into thoſe parts for the ſubduing of him, for that cauſe called Mahomet the Viſier Baſſa out of HVNGARIE, to ſerue againſt
F this new rebell: who in the meane time following the courſe of his victorie, made hauocke of all as he went, taking vnto his owne vſe all ſuch tribute as was in thoſe countreys and others alſo further off, due vnto the great Sultan; hauing of late exacted onely of the citie of ANCYRA and and the country therabout, three hundred thousand duckats: so by exacting of great summes of mony from the country people (such as be his enemies) heaping vp great treasures for the maintenance of his warres. G

Diuers incursi. of the Tartars into the frontiers of the emperours territories, and much harme by them there done.

Now though Mahomet the Turkish emperour had called home Mahomet the Visier Bassa out of HVNGARIE to goe against the rebels in ASIA (as is aforesaid) yet had he before prouided, that for the better assurance of his townes and territories in HVNGARIE, the Tartar Han with a great power of his Crim Tartars should euen against that time come downe into that country. Which rough and needie people (dwelling neere vnto the fennes of MEOTIS) for pay or prey, alwayes readie to doe the Othoman emperours seruice, setting forward vnder the leading of their great Han himselfe, and of his two sonnes; and by plaine force breaking through VALACHIA, though not without great losse of their men (being fought with by the Valachians and free Haiduckes a whole day) were now in the latter end of December with their huge companies come into HVNGARIE; the Han himselfe with fortie thousand to QVINQVE ECCLESIÆ, and his sonnes with twentie thousand moe into POSSEGA (a fertile countrey lying betweene the great riuer SAVVS and DRAVVS:) where they spoiled as well the Turkes as the other poore Christians, pretending all that frontier countrey with the whole commaund thereof to be giuen vnto them by the Turkish emperour in reward of their seruice. But long they lay not there quiet, but that to shew for what they came, they enforced the Christians thereabout to victuall CANISIA for the Turkes: and so breaking into STIRIA, not farre from CARAMANT, the neerest fortresse of the Christians towards CANISIA, caried away aboue two thousand Christians captiues: and shortly after surprising KESCHEMET, a great and populous towne, slew most part of the inhabitants, and caried away the rest prisoners. Othersome of them also at the same time making an inrode to SHARVAR, and hauing burnt twentie countrey villages downe to the ground, carried away thence about a thousand soules into most miserable captiuitie and thraldome. They also at their first comming, relieued them of BVDA, the lord Nadasti with his Hussars, who before kept them from victuals, not being able (for the great number of them) now longer so to doe. By them also the Turkes encouraged, tooke and burnt certaine places possessed by the Christians neere vnto BVDA, putting them all to the sword that they found therein. So that the poore countrey of HVNGARIE (neuer to bee sufficiently pitied) with the rest of the countries and prouinces belonging vnto the house of AVSTRIA, and confining vpon the Turke, were not so much eased by the calling home of the Visier Bassa with his armie, as they were now annoyed by the comming of these roguish Tartars, a people wholly euen from their infancie giuen to the spoyle. Against whom for all that, the Christians beside their ordinarie garrisons began now euen in the depth of Winter to oppose some other of their forces also: the Palatine of RHENE sending ten companies of horsemen to POSSONIVM, from thence to bee sent to SHARVAR, for the defence of STIRIA: and Collonitz (but lately knighted by the emperour) for his part raising foure hundred horse, a thousand Hussars, and three thousand of the free Haiduckes, for the repressing of those Tartars: the duke of BRVNSVVICKE also at that time for the same seruice sending thither a thousand horse, with two thousand foot, against those sworne enemies of the Christian Religion. THe troubles of this yeare thus ouerpaſt, ALBA REGALIS being by the Chriſtians loſt, PESTH with ſome other places woon, TRANSYLVANIA recouered, BVDA beſieged, the Viſier Baſſa returned, and the Tartars come into HVNGARIE, Ianuarie with a ſharp froſt began to open the next yeare; by force whereof the riuers in many places, but eſpecially in thoſe more Eaſterly countries, were not onely froſen ouer, but ſeemed rather euen wholly turned into yce: Danubius that great riuer (for all his ſwift courſe) being then alſo (as it is often) ſo hard froſen, that men and carts might ſafely paſſe to and fro thereupon. Which ſo hard a ſeaſon for all that did no whit freeſe but rather encreaſe the hote deſires of the greedie Turks, ſtill breathing after the vtter ſpoyle and ruine of the Chriſtians dwelling neere vn- 1602 A great froſt.

B to them. For which purpoſe, they euen in this dead time of the yeare, and extremitie of nature (which commonly affoordeth vnto moſt mortall enemies a ceſſation from armes) out of their garriſons of SIGETH, BVDA, CANISIA, ALBA REGALIS, BABOTZ, and ſuch other places, raiſed an armie of eighteene thouſand ſtrong, to haue forraged and ouerrun the Chriſtians, with their territories confining vpon them, QVERMANIE with the countrie thereabout being the places by them aſſigned to haue felt the firſt force of their ſudden rage and furie. An armie of the Turks raiſed out of their garriſons.

Of which their deſignes Collonitz, Gouernor for the Emperor in thoſe parts, vnderſtanding, to preuent the ſame, and to meet with their forces, with all ſpeed put into the ſuburbes of QVERMANIE a thouſand Reiſters, and two thouſand Lanſquenets; and in the burroughes thereabouts laded the regiment of the Countie Reingraue, with ſix companies of the Coſ- Collonitz in armes againſt the Turkes.

C ſackes, foure thouſand Haiduckes, foure hundred Carabins, French and Wallons, two hundred horſe of the regiment of Collonitz; with whom was Collonitz himſelfe, commaunding ouer all theſe troupes: a man for his worth euery way anſwerable vnto his charge. Who for the more aſſurance of this countrie, ouer which the enemie now houered, commaunded all the inhabitants thereabout to take vp armes; and withall, with good and ſtrong barricadoes to ſtrengthen the waies, and ſtop vp the paſſages into their countrie: which they right cherefully performed, with their weapons in the one hand, and their ſpades and ſhouels in the other. Of which their ſo great reſolution the Turkes vnderſtanding, changed their purpoſe. For they conſidering the aſſured danger they were to vndergoe, in forcing of theſe troupes, ſtanding vpon the wals of their defence, and ſtrong in their reſolution, changed their former

D deſigne, for the inuading of QVERMANIE, where they for the ſpace of fiue weekes togither had by the Chriſtians bin expected; and vpon a new reſolution marched along by ROQVESBOVRG, with purpoſe to haue loaded themſelues with the ſpoyle of the countrie thereabout. Which their new deſigne cauſed Collonitz to gather togither his forces to croſſe and fruſtrat them therein: which he did by fauour of the riuer, which both ſtrengthned him againſt their incurſions, and was well to be defended. But the Turkes, whoſe purpoſe was not to fight, but to haue robbed and ſpoyled the countrie at their pleaſure, finding now contrarie to their expectation, ſuch ſtrong reſiſtance, and their deſignes diſturbed, in fine, gaue ouer their enter- The Turkes for feare of the Chriſtians cowardly retire.

E priſe, and ſo againe retired; contenting themſelues to gather a conuoy of victuals to put into CANISIA, which then lay in great extremitie for want thereof. Which victuals they drew out of the villages thereabout, and ſo came to BABOTZ, to march to CANISIA, a towne moſt commodious for ſuch an aſſemblie, and for the relieuing of CANISIA. Of this their purpoſe Collonitz (who ſpared for nó coſt) by his eſpials aduertiſed, euen he which before was appointed as a prey vnto his enemies, began now to plot with himſelfe, that they ſhould become a prey vnto him: their cowardiſe, by ſo many precedent effects declared, had giuen him the meane to aduenture vpon them, and the hope to ouerthrow them. A neceſſarie conſideration in martiall affaires for commanders to put in execution their deſignes, at what price ſoeuer: for that it is better to looſe in the performance of them, with the preſeruation of their reputation, than otherwiſe to gaine with the loſſe thereof: for that it preſerued, ſtill ſtriketh a feare of their valour into the minds of their enemies, oftentimes ouercome euen with this their appre-

F henſion thereof: whereas otherwiſe they might happily ouercome, in the aſſurance by them conceiued of their enemies cowardiſe.

Vpon which reſolution this braue Colonell the foure and twentieth of March with his troupes marched towards little COMORA, about two leagues from CANISIA, and lay with Collonitz lyeth in ambuſh for the Turkes.

them close in ambush in the woods neere vnto two marishes, ouer which the Turks had made G two bridges to passe the great artillerie and wagons vpon: the Turks being well neere 20000 strong, and our men but 8200, whereof there were 2200 horsemen, and 6000 foot, a small number in comparison of their enemies. But whilest that those men lye thus close in ambush, with a purpose to do some notable exploit, let vs in the meane time run to PESTH, to see what there in the meane time passed.

The Turks after the losse of PESTH much grieued to haue this impostume so neere their hearts, sought to breake it to our hurt, employing all their trecherie to gaine our garrison sol-diors, and with their forces to distresse them of victuals. And the Christian armie was no sooner risen from before BVDA, but that the Turks came downe againe into their base towne, which they found much ruinated and in euill estate. But the ioy of their conquest buried in it H all the obiect of their sorrow, and the feeling of their griefe; the lesser passions alwaies giuing place vnto the greater, and sorrow finding no place at all in the middest of their immoderate ioy. Whereof they gaue a number of testimonies, by the thundring of their great ordnance, by fires of ioy, and vollies of small shot: all which their furie they discharged vpon them of PESTH; who with the like courtesie requited them, sending them back againe bullets for bullets. Which now became a common exercise among the cannoniers, passing the time in these actions, more vpon a brauerie than to any purpose, small harme being done thereby either on the one side or one the other: in such sort, that in the end the Turks better aduised, requested our men to cease from such shooting, as they on their part would do likewise, and to expect the end of the negotiation of peace, of a certain begun (as they said) betwixt their prin- I ces, but meaning indeed by this means to spare their pouder, shot, and paines, and to reserue them to their better vses.

Buda distressed for want of victuals.

And yet for all this triumphant ioy, the Turks in BVDA were in great want of victuals, the late siege hauing deuoured all their prouisions, and no new supplie thereof as yet come vnto them: insomuch, that their greatest care was now how to come by victuals, without which they must needs forsake their citie. Of which their so great necessitie the other garrisons in the places thereabout aduertised, assembled themselues to take order therefore; and hauing prouided 200 wagons, loaded with all maner of necessarie prouisions at ALBA REGALIS, with a conuoy of 6000 souldiours put themselues vpon the way toward BVDA. Of all which their proceedings the garrison of STRIGONIVM hauing got vnderstanding, and ioining vnto them K the garrison of COMARA, met with them vpon the way betwixt ALBA REGALIS and BVDA, and charged them; and so with great confidence on both sides came to handy blowes, the Turks being in number stronger, & our men in valour and resolution; the wagons in the mean time standing still, as the motiue of the charge, and appointed for a prey vnto the victors. But our horsmen being for the most part Hussards, wel acquainted with such charge, with their diuers courses greatly troubled the enemies, our footmen in the meane time charging them also with a number of harquebusiers: against whom the Turks with the same armes and like courage defending themselues, and many of them being slaine, and the waggons gained from them, gaue place vnto their valour, & so were almost all cut in pieces. The waggons thus surprised, were diuided as a rich bootie among the victors: fortie whereof were sent vnto the L garrison at PESTH; who were well content that the enemies trauell and wealth had been gathered for their good, and without their owne paines to solace themselues with the fruit of their enemies labours.

The Turkes in carying a conuoy of victuals to Buda ouerthrowne by the Christians.

But what should we say? The most sure resolutions are sometimes by chances crossed, and tempests otherwhiles ouertake vs, euen in the entrance of the desired port. The Turks of BV-DA vnderstanding of the bruit of this medley, and that it was for their bread, posted in hast to haue succoured their troupes, and arriued at the same time that our men victoriously led along by the riuer of Danubius the waggons they had before gained. At the sight of which obiect, they animated with hunger after the victuals, and with desire to be reuen-ged vpon the men, charged them. But our men, who thought of nothing more, but that M they were victorious, and possessors of their enemies bootie, seeing these new come enemies so furiously to charge them, daunted with the present perill, and with the consideration thereof only possessed, bethought themselues of nothing else, but how to saue themselues,

A and to leaue their honour, bootie, and the field, all as ſpoiles vnto their enemies. The furious countenance of the Turkes, and their number ſurmounting ours by 1500, ſo bereft them of their reſolution for to fight for their liues and waggons, as that they without more adoe quite forſooke them, accounting themſelues happie enough if they might but ſaue themſelues. And the Turks without further purſuing of them, contented to haue recouered their victuals, left them, and ſo returned homeward, driuing their waggons along the banke of Danubius. But ſee the wind which by and by changed, and hauing as it were with a ſudden tempeſt vndertaken euen at the entrance of the port to ſwallow vp both the one and the other, ſent the garriſon of PESTH vpon them of BVDA to ſtay them. Great changes of fortune in one moment
B of time, which mocketh men with ſhews, bringing forth effects quite contrarie to their expectation. Theſe Turkes ſtayed vpon their retreat by the comming of theſe new come aduerſaries, did euen as ours had done before. For not willing to preferre their good before their life, and more greedie of victual than of battell, they quitted their prize, and retired. For our men in number 2000, were ſeized of a forreſt about the midſt of the way wherby the Turks were to paſſe, and which they could by no meanes ſhun; and diuided into two companies, kept themſelues cloſe there in ambuſh, reſolutely attending for the comming of their enemies. Of which their purpoſe the Turkes not aware, and ſtill preſſing on forward, found themſelues hardly charged, before they could ſee them by whom they were ſo charged; one of our companies charging them afront, and the other behind. So that the Turks encloſed betwixt them,
C and in ſo great and ſudden a feare not knowing againſt whom to defend themſelues, without any great reſiſtance betooke themſelues to flight, leauing their waggons, and caſting away their armes: yet ſo, that a number of them were left dead vpon the place, ſome others of them taken priſoners, & the reſt chaſed euen vnto the gates of their citie. But our men being victors, with the waggons, & a number of priſoners returned home, and by the mouth of their great artillerie gaue a thouſand teſtimonies of their victorie vnto the ſorrowfull cowards: who themſelues alſo carried the heauie news thereof vnto the reſt of their fellowes ſhut vp within the citie of BVDA.

The conuoy of victuals againe recouered from the Chriſtians by the garriſon of Buda.

The ſame conuoy of victuals recouered from the Turks by the garriſon of Peſth.

But ſee againe the change of fortune, conſtant only in vnconſtancie, as the ſequele ſhortly after ſhewed. Danubius that great riuer was then alſo (as it is often) ſo hard froſen, that men
D and carts might now ſafely paſſe to and fro thereupon. In which ſo hard ſeaſon, the Turkes in garriſon at BVDA hauing once vpon the froſen riuer braued the Chriſtians in PESTH, and the two and twentith of Ianuarie in like brauerie comming out the ſecond time, were by the garriſon ſouldiors of PESTH put to flight, and by two hundred of the moſt forward and valiant ſouldiors hardly purſued; vpon whom, not onely they which fled, but other of the Turkes alſo out of BVDA in greater number returning, chaſed them likewiſe backe againe euen to the bridge, whereby they were to haue paſſed into the citie: which now drawne vp for feare of greater harme from ſuch a number of Turkes as were now come out, and were readie to haue entred at the heeles of the flying ſouldiours; the poore ſoules ſo ſhut out, and too weake for ſuch a multitude as then had them in chaſe, were there euen in E their friends ſight euerie man ſlaine, the Turkes themſelues with little harme returning to BVDA.

The garriſon ſoldiors of Peſth ouerthrowne by the Turkes of Buda.

Neither long laſted the ioy of this victorie: for within a few daies after one Lethner, a captaine of the Chriſtian garriſon in PESTH, more grieued than the reſt with the loſſe of ſo many valiant men, and ſome of them his friends and companions alſo, certainly vnderſtanding that certaine of the chiefe of the Turkes of BVDA, with two of their greateſt commanders, and a great traine of gallant gentlewomen, were for their pleaſure the next day about to goe vnto the hoat Bathes neere vnto BVDA; and taking with him threeſcore musketiers, the night before ſecretly vpon the yce paſſed ouer the riuer, and ſo not farre from the Bathes lay cloſe in ambuſh, expecting the comming of their deſired prey. In which ex-
F pectance they lay not long, but that theſe Turks caſting no perill, came accordingly as they could haue wiſhed, and in thoſe pleaſant bathes merrily bathed and ſolaced themſelues: Fooles to ſeeke after the pleaſures of peace amidſt the gulfe of the miſeries of warres, and euill aduiſed to aſſure themſelues of faire weather in a ſtorme ſo neere at hand. For in the middeſt of all their delights theſe reſolute men came ſuddenly vpon them, not fearing any ſuch danger, and ſlew all the men, ſparing none, but one boy and the Gentlewomen: who in the time of the conflict, naked as they were, ranne as faſt as they could into the citie, feare hauing in them ouercome the modeſtie of their ſexe. Which exploit done, the captaine leauing the Turkes ſlaine in the Bath, now become red with their blood, returned with his ſouldiors, laded with the rich bootie, and merily ſporting at the naked gentlewomen: with whoſe fearefull crie they of BVDA ſtirred vp, ſent out certaine of their garriſon after them, but to no purpoſe, for why, they were in ſafety before got home. By continuance of this froſt, by reaſon whereof victuals could not be ſent downe the riuer, the ſouldiors in garriſon in PESTH were driuen to ſuch wants, as that dogs & cats were accounted good meat among them; the Turks their enemies ſtill roaming about in the fields, to keepe them from victuals, and to encreaſe their neceſſitie. G H

Great want of victuals in Peſth.

Of theſe neceſſities the Turkes of BVDA were partakers alſo, hunger-ſtarued as were the other, but yet euery day in the field to ſeeke reliefe. They knew right well, that hunger was hard to be deceiued, being ſtill in action and vigilant; and therefore they ſought ſome meanes how to deceiue our men, ſtill attending vpon them, and ſo to aſſure themſelues of victuals. To which end they gaue it out, and made ſhew as if they would haue beſieged the fort of ADOM, diſtant about two leagues from BVDA: vnder the colour whereof, they receiued into their citie a conuoy of fiftie waggons laden with victuals and munition: which our men hindered not, for that they had no ſuſpition of any ſuch purpoſe of theirs. With which reliefe the Turks encouraged, gaue knowledge thereof vnto their ouerthwart neighbours in PESTH by a thouſand great ſhot, which they in thundring manner ſent ouer the riuer vnto them, as from men of courage, and deuoid of feare. Howbeit, that this action was more vaine than profitable vnto the Turkes, who for the diſpence of their ſhot and powder gayned not ſo much as the life of one ſouldiour, nor one ſtone out of the wals of PESTH. Vpon this iolitie theſe ſame garriſon ſouldiours of BVDA ſhortly after thought to haue vpon the ſudden ſurpriſed PALOTTA, a ſmall caſtle of the Chriſtians, by night: but being in good time diſcouered, were deceiued of their hope, and with the loſſe of an hundred and twentie of their men inforced to retire: vnto whom Gaſpar Horwad captaine of the caſtle, by a countrie peaſant before ſworne to do the errand, ſent a little pot full of ſalt, and a bottle of wine, willing them (in derſion) with that ſalt to ſeaſon the Veniſon they had taken in their late hunting, and to emptie that bottell to quench their thirſt, and to cheere them vp after their late conqueſt. I K

Buda victualled

The Turkes ſeeking to ſurpriſe Palotta, themſelues ouerthrowne.

This ieaſt more prouoked theſe enemies, galled ſo to heare of their ſhame and loſſe; in ſuch ſort, that in reuenge therof they diſcharged a ſhower of thundring great ſhot and ſmall bullets vpon the garriſon of PESTH, which in great abundance fell out of the cloud of their rage. But all to ſmall purpoſe: For that their canons being euill leuelled, ouerſhot the town, carrying with their thundring bullets more feare than they did hurt: yea, that worſe was, the ruine made by their great batterie fell vpon their own citie. For while they were thus thundering, fire by negligence of the cannoniers fell into one of their barrels of pouder, which taking hold of another, and ſo running along, as if it had bin by a traine of purpoſe laied, burſt out with ſuch force, that it ouerthrew a long piece of the wall of BVDA, which in the fall thereof ouerwhelmed a great number of the ſouldiors neere vnto it. The noiſe of this thunderclap was great, and the force thereof terrible, ſo that it reuiued them of PESTH with ſome good hope, by this breach to force the place, the Turkes being from thence retired. Vpon which occaſion the Gouernor of PESTH reſolued to giue an aſſault vnto the place, & to make vſe of the meane that fortune, without his paine or trauell, had put into his hand. Wherupon taking with him a thouſand Almaines, and three hundred Hungarians, he forthwith (in hope of good ſucceſſe) marched toward the breach; and happily had preuailed, but that by the way they by chance met with a companie of Turkes, who gaue an alarme vnto them of the vpper towne, who vpon that bruit of their approch manned their wals, and with great ſpeed repaired the breach. Now all that they of PESTH could do, was to reuenge themſelues vpon theſe Turkes whom they had met withall, who were there all ſlaine, except ſome few, whom they ſaued, and carried priſoners vnto PESTH, to bee by them inſtructed of the enemies affaires. About

Siliſtria ſpoyled by the Vayuod of Valachia.

A About this time Radul Vayuod of VALACHIA aduertiſed, That the Turkes in garriſon at SILISTRIA were gone abroad into the countrey to ſeeke after bootie and victuals, with his ſouldiors paſſed forthwith ouer the riuer Danubius vpon the yce, to ſurpriſe the towne, now bared of the garriſon: whoſe men for the deſire of the riches of the place, and for feare leaſt the garriſon ſouldiors ſhould returne before they had gained the place, with redoubled force and courage ſo aſſailed the towne, that the Turkes, diſmayed, and deeming the number of the Chriſtians that ſo furiouſly aſſayled them to be greater than indeed it was, by reaſon of the greatneſſe of the enterpriſe by them taken in hand; after ſome ſmall reſiſtance, left the way open for them to enter: who forthwith ouer the dead bodyes of their enemies thruſt into the towne, tooke the whole ſpoyle thereof, which was both great and rich, (as B being a towne well peopled) and ſo ſet fire vpon it, to the intent that it ſhould no more ſerue for a place for the enemie to retire vnto. The Vayuod thus victorious and rich, returned with his ſouldiors laded with ſpoyles of their enemies, before that the Turkes could gather themſelues together to hinder their retreat. And vnto George Baſta, who was then in TRANSYLVANIA in armes againſt the Turkes, for his part of the bootie he ſent him thirteene of the enemies enſignes.

But our troupes are now too long in their ambuſh, where the valiant Collonitz holdeth them cloſe, attending the comming of the Turkes, and of their conuoy to CANISIA, now we muſt draw them out of their Sentinels and ſee what effects their deſignes ſhall bring forth. Theſe braue ſouldiors had now lyen three dayes in their ambuſhes without diſcouering of any
C enemie, vntill that the ſixt of March three eſpies fell into their hands, whom the Turkes had ſent forth before, to diſcouer what enemies were then abroad in the field. But theſe faithfull Infidels ſo taken, would not by any meanes diſcouer any thing hurtfull vnto their friends, or profitable for ours: So that in fine the Generall mooued with their obſtinacie, commaunded one of their heads to be ſtrucke off, to terrifie the other two, and by force to draw from them that which faire entreatie and perſuaſion could not. The other two that were yet aliue diſmayed with his ſpectacle, and well beaten to tell the truth, were at laſt conſtrained to confeſſe, That they were the enemies ſpyes, ſent forth to view the countrey, to ſee if the Chriſtians had any forces there, able to let their cannons and waggons to enter into CANISIA: which not appearing, and they reporting vnto their companies, that the countrey was cleare, that then
D within two dayes after the conuoy was to paſſe euen by the ſame place where they then lay, to be put into CANISIA, ſetting foorth from BABOTZ two houres before day. Our men thus enformed of the enemies deſignes, forced their hope to defeat them, and againe retired themſelues into their ambuſcadoes, attending for their hoped prey, in ſuch ſort, that our men in their conceits held the victorie now as good as gained; howbeit, that it was yet but in hope and expectation. And that which more confirmed the matter, was, that within two houres after the taking of theſe ſpyes, the Haiduckes, layed without the principall ambuſcado, and hidden in the thickets and buſhes, diſcouered a cornet of horſemen; with fiue enſignes of the Turks, come out of CANISIA, marching to meet with the conuoy, in ſafetie to conduct the ſame into the towne. At which ouerture the Hungarians awaked, gaue knowledge vnto the Gene-
E rall of the arriuall of the enemie, to the end hee might reſolue what was beſt in that caſe to bee done. Which opportunitie Collonitz embracing, and making much of time, put his horſemen in good order, to encloſe the Turkes betwixt the mariſh and the wood, and to cut them ſo encloſed in pieces. The Turkes hauing diſcouered nothing but the mariſhes and the woods, held on their way, and ſo as men hauing their hands and feet bound, fell into the power of their enemies. For being come into the danger, the Chriſtian Carabins charged them in the head of their companies as they marched, and diſordered them: The Hungarians fell vpon their flankes which they opened, and the horſemen preſſed them at their backes. Theſe poore miſerable men ſo encloſed, not knowing againſt whom firſt to defend themſelues, and ſeeing death vpon euerie ſide of them, became as beaſtes to be ſacrificed vnto the furie
F of the Chriſtians. The ſmall reſiſtance that they made deſerued not the name of a fight, being all ſlaine, and hauing themſelues not ſlaine one man; layed by heapes one vpon another, not hauing ouerthrowne ſo much as one of their enemies: In ſuch ſort, that of ſixe hundred men that were there together, there were not foure of them ſaued. Their horſemen which followeth them, ſeeing them ſurpriſed, in ſtead of relieuing them, ſhamefully G flied; and thinking by flight to ſaue themſelues, whileſt that their companions were in maſſacring, preferred their liues before their honour: For if it bee a ſhame for ſouldiors in fight to flie with the ſafetie of their friends, it muſt needs be an irreparable diſhonour to flie and leaue them to the ſlaughter. But our Carabins taking the occaſion for their aduantage, no more ſpared their horſes in the purſuit of theſe Infidels, than they had done their hands in the defeating of their fellowes: but purſuing amaine after theſe fugitiues, ſlew a number of ſuch of them as were worſt mounted, and purſued the reſt euen vnto the gates of CANISIA. Thoſe of the towne at this tumult raiſed an alarme, ſhot off their great artillerie, and diſcharged many vollies of ſmall ſhot againſt our men, aſwell to ſtay the purſuit of our men, and to ſaue their own, as to giue warning vnto them that were to bring the conuoy, that our men were in the field, readie to ſurpriſe H them. But during this fight, three of the Turkes horſemen paſſing well mounted, and exceeding hardie, aduentured to paſſe by our troupes, and vpon the ſpurre to meet with them which were bringing of the conuoy, and to giue them warning of the ouerthrow, and that they ſhould againe returne to BABOTZ. Which their ſo braue an attempt Fortune fauoured, as not willing to fruſtrate the deſert of ſo well deſeruing valour. And the Turkes vpon the way with the conuoy, now vpon this aduertiſement returned, and retired themſelues againe into the caſtle from whence they came.

Babotz in vaine beſieged by Collonitz.

But our men aduertiſed of this their retreate, and as it were deceiued of the hope by them conceiued for the intercepting of the conuoy, vndertooke an exploit much more hautie, braue, and dangerous. For forthwith they made head toward BABOTZ, with a reſolution to carie the I place; and though they were almoſt ſixteene miles from it, yet they reſolued to goe thither, and to make themſelues maſters thereof. And ſo marching cheerefully on, therein vſed ſuch diligence, that about nine of the clocke at night they arriued at the place: whither they were no ſooner come, but that they did what they might to daunt their enemies, to make their conqueſt the more eaſie. The greatneſſe of the attempt it ſelfe ſerued well to that purpoſe, but yet the beliefe more, if they could driue into their enemies mindes the ſufficiencie of their forces, for the performance of ſo great an exploit. Which cauſed them to ſound their trumpets, to ſtrike vp their drums, to remooue their artillerie, to ruſle with their armes, to keepe a ſtir with their ſouldiours, and to make the noiſe not of a ſmall, but of a puiſſant and great armie. But the Turks in number twice ſo many as were our men, and within a good and ſtrong place, were K not with ſuch a bruit to bee carried away, but ſtanding faſt vpon their guard and reſolution, prepared themſelues for fight, and how to receiue our men, if they ſhould attempt to aſſaile them. Now whileſt the alarme thus ſounded, our companies aduanced themſelues, repeating oft times the name of Ieſus, and making themſelues readie for to fight. This skirmiſh began with a thouſand cannon ſhot, which the Turkes out of their caſtle deliuered vpon the troups of the Chriſtians, and their muskets ſtill playing from the curtaine of their wals, ſo that the caſtle ſeemed as if it had beene a mountaine of fire. All which terrors no whit ſtayed the hope of our reſolute footmen, who paſſing thwart theſe flaming ſhowers, marched along the counterſcarp of the ditch toward the gate of the town, to haue broken open and forced the ſame. The Turks at the ſame time were come forth out of the towne, making ſhew as if they would haue ſallied L forth vpon our men, and haue fought with them. But at the ſame inſtant that they charged the front of our footmen, they were by them ſo encountered and beaten backe, that hauing loſt ſome of their men, they were glad, againe to retire into the towne: where they did there endeuor to defend themſelues, not daring afterward to fight without the fauor of their wals: within which it ſtood them vpon to haue both courage and power, being ſtill furiouſly aſſayled by our men, who planted vpon the towne-ditch with their muskets and harquebuſes, ſo plyed the Turks vpon the wals and in their holds, as that they durſt not ſhew themſelues or looke out for the ſhowers of lead which they thundered vpon them. And aſſuredly, if our men had then had inſtruments wherewith to haue opened the gates or the wals, as well as their muskets and harquebuſes had made a breach into the reſolution of the Turkes, the towne had vndoubtedly bin M ours: but this deſigne being not before foreſeene, neither intended, wanted the meanes to put it in execution; ſo that, for want of Petards and of ſcaling ladders, the place remained ſtill the Turkes, and ſaued it ſelfe out of our hands. In fine, our men hauing beene foure houres in fight

before

A before it, both doing and receiuing harme, and finding no meane to enter the place, were enforced to ſound a retreat, and to leaue it.

In which retreat the Chriſtians burnt certaine villages of the enemies, rather to ſhew that they had beene there, than for any their valour therein: ſeeing that things inſenſible, which follow the order of their nature, are without offence, and they which hurt them, without reaſon. This done, they of purpoſe retired to little COMARA: for, the long time that they had kept the field, the diuers exploits by them done againſt the enemies, and the common report of the vanquiſhed, had ſtirred vp the enemies, ſo that they began now on euery ſide by heaps to flocke together, to ſwallow them vp, and euen now preſſed vpon their retreat. So Collonitz in deſpight of the enemie, in ſafetie brought backe his ſouldiors: and being entred into COMARA, cauſed the

B heads of the principall of the ſlaine enemies, to be ſet vpon the pikes of the paliſadoes, and vpon a great pine tree ſtanding before the gate, which for this purpoſe had almoſt all the branches lopped off. An action learned from the crueltie of the Turkes, and now done by the Chriſtians, more to aſtoniſh and deterre them from this their cruell cuſtome, than for any glorie or profit enſuing thereby: ſeeing that to tyrannize vpon a dead bodie, is but a ſigne of cowardiſe, and an action altogether vnprofitable.

This done, our men departed from this caſtle, as men worne, and almoſt ſpent with trauell and wearineſſe, but yet more with famine. For why, they thinking to haue executed but that deſigne which had put them in armes, and that in ſo ſhort a time alſo, had taken no prouiſion of victualls with them: ſo that they were all pined with hunger, ouercome with

C watching, and halfe dead with labour. Their horſes alſo in like ſort languiſhed, the countrey beeing alike cruell both to the one and to the other. For beſide that it was vnfruitfull for ſuch as helde the field, all the fruites thereof being gathered together and carried into the townes by the men of warre, it was not poſſible for our men to forrage, or to ſeeke for victuall there, and to come to an happie end of their deſigne, for that they had rayſed an alarme abroad in the countrey, and ſo perhaps might themſelues haue become a prey vnto them, whome they ought to prey vpon. Which was the cauſe that our ſouldiours had for the ſpace of three dayes eaten nothing but crabbes and acornes which they found in the woods which couered their ambuſhes: ſo that being now come vnto this caſtle, they deuoured a world of victuals, and requeſted euerie one of them to returne againe vnto their garri-

D ſons; their bodies weakened with hunger, being ſcarce able to beare their armes. But that was not all: for departing from little COMARA, they were aduertiſed, that the Turkse, ſhut vp the wayes whereby they were to make their retreat home; in hope eaſily to ouercome men alreadie with hunger brought low and to kill the bodies which trauel alreadie, had ſpent. Howbeit, the great courage of our men fruſtrated this the enemies deſigne, and ſaued themſelues. But ſo farre off was it that this aduertiſement diſmayed Collonitz, that euen to the contrarie it the more increaſed his courage, as appointed for his glorie: being glad to haue ſuch an occaſion offererd him for the ſhewing of his valour, although it were through the middeſt of daunger, death, and ſlaughter. So that in ſtead of ſhunning the combat, whereas it was reported that the Turkes with great aſſurance marched, neere vnto a caſtle of the Chriſtians, to make head

E vpon a paſſage whereby our men were to retire: he turned head toward the ſame place, with a firme reſolution with true valour vpon the ſudden to encounter the enemie; which had thought to haue ſurpriſed him by cowardiſe. And the ſouldiours, weakened with hunger, although they well apprehended the danger of this deſigne; yet reſting vpon the great reſolution of their Generall, and conſidering the neceſſitie they had to goe farther for their ſafetie, vpon a good courage were content to follow whither ſoeuer their Generall would: who led them directly vnto the aforeſaid caſtle, where it was expected that the Turkes ſhould haue charged them. But being come thither, there was no bodie to be ſeene: and yet our men, as hungrie as they were, ſtayed there one day in ambuſh, expecting the comming of their enemies, who for all that, hauing no mind to meet them, appeared not, but gaue them time and libertie in ſafetie

F to retire themſelues euery man vnto his own garriſon, to refreſh themſelues, and to recouer their ſtrength.

But now whileſt our men of warre, after theſe troubles in TRANSYLVANIA and HVNGARIE, repoſe themſelues; let vs in the meane time take our iourney to CONSTANTINOPLE; and goe vnto the marriage of Haſſan Baſſa, one of the Viſiers of the Graund Seignior, and laſt

yeare

yeare Generall of the Turks armie in HVNGARIE.

At ſuch time as he departed from this great citie, to goe vnto the conqueſt of ALBA-REGALIS, Mahomet the Turkiſh emperour reſolued to ſet all vpon the regaining of this citie; cauſed to be preſented vnto him a Crowne and a Sword, the one in reward of his valour, if hee returned with victorie from this exploit; and the other in reuenge of his cowardiſe, if he failed in the performance thereof: promiſing him indeed his ſiſter in mariage, amongſt other the glorious rewards and trophies of his victorie: and thretning him with death, as a puniſhment amongſt the griefes of his diſhonour. But it came to paſſe, that by the cowardiſe of our men, he came vnto the effect of his deſire (as is aforeſaid) and tooke the citie, which promiſed vnto him the glorious triumph in CONSTANTINOPLE. And vnder the ſweet influence of this Planet he returned to CONSTANTINOPLE, where he found all things in readines for the ſatisfying of his expectation, and the aduancement of his glorie. He is magnificently receiued of his prince, courteouſly ſaluted by all the nobilitie, and with greateſt reuerence poſſible honored of the people. And as he had happily diſcharged his charge, hee found in like manner all things prepared and in readineſſe, for the performance of the promiſe of the grand Seignieor his lord and maſter: who had cauſed them to be in moſt ſumptuous manner prouided for the ſolemnizing of the marriage, and the contentment of the Baſſa. But nothing now wanting that hee could haue deſired or wiſhed, more than the verie ſolemnizing of the mariage it ſelfe, and that alſo euerie day of all men expected; the Ianizaries and Spahi, with the other ſouldiors of the Court, to the number of fiue and twentie thouſand, euen vpon the ſudden, when as no ſuch thing was feared, came and in armes preſented themſelues before the Diuano, or Tribunall, holden for the cheife adminiſtration of juſtice in the Turkes palace, the firſt foure dayes in euerie weeke: And hauing ſet guards at the Court gates, the more ſafely to execute what they were before reſolued vpon, proudly demaunded to haue audience, for certaine of the Spahi and Ianizaries, of whom they had made choice, in the names of them all to deliuer vnto the great Baſſaes their grieuances, and the cauſes of that their aſſembly. Who as ſoone as they were entered into the Diuano before the Baſſaes, of whom the moſt couragious of them was not without feare, as looking for nothing but for preſent death, they at the firſt demaunded to haue Haſſan Baſſa deliuered vnto them: Who thinking that his head ſhould haue ſerued for a ſacrifice to pacifie this their furie; as a man altogether diſmayed, wan and pale, paſſed through this mutinous multitude, to haue gone vnto the great Sultan, proteſting of his owne innocencie, and calling vpon his prophet Mahomet, to diſcouer vnto them them the truth of all things. But they, after a thouſand iniuries and reproaches by them heaped vpon him, rudely demaunded of him, Whence it proceeded, that whileſt hee with a great part of the forces of the empire was buſied in HVNGARIE, for the recouering of ALBA REGALIS, there was in the meane time no good order taken for the repreſſing of the rebell in ASIA; who by ſufferance was (as they ſaid) now growne ſo proud, as with enſignes diſplayed to come within three or foure dayes iourney of CONSTANTINOPLE, the imperiall ſeat of the Othoman emperours. Whereunto hee in no ſmall feare anſwered, That hee for his part had done his duetie, as well while hee had the charge of the armie in ASIA, as now of late whileſt hee had the like charge againſt the Chriſtians in HVNGARIE, as euen the enemies themſelues could witneſſe. But ſeeing himſelfe euen readie to die, hee yet requeſted them, That his guiltleſſe death might bee vnto the ſtate in generall profitable: and in diſcharging of his conſcience, to declare vnto them the cauſes of this contempt, and neglect, for the ſuppreſſing of the Aſian rebell, which they were ſo deſirous to know. It proceedeth (ſaid hee) onely from the euill gouernment of the Graund Sultans mother (who then all commaunded) and from the negligent careleſſeneſſe of the Capi-Aga. Which his ſpeech although they with much impatience and ſtorming gaue eare vnto, yet hearing him ſo well to excuſe himſelfe, and to lay the blame there where they were well content it ſhould reſt; they gaue him leaue to goe to the great Sultan, to requeſt him that they might ſpeake with him, and further to deale with him, that they might haue the head of them who had beene the cauſe of this diſhonourable ſeruice, or otherwiſe cowardly behaued themſelues in the mannaging of the warres againſt the rebels in ASIA: Threatening him withall, That if he failed to performe this his charge, he ſhould not faile to feele the heauie effects of their iuſt furie. An heauie charge, yet glad was the Baſſa to vndergoe the ſame, to rid himſelfe out of their hands, where he ſaw himſelfe in greater danger, amongſt them,

Haſſan Baſſa in great feare of his life

A them, moſt of whom had ſometimes ſerued vnder him, than amongſt ſo many his moſt mortal enemies: but what remedy, he muſt now ſo doe, or die therfore; for which he was the more to be excuſed. So in great feare comming vnto the great Sultan, almoſt as fearefull as himſelfe, he ſhewed vnto him the great daunger like euen preſently to enſue, by the mutinie of his beſt ſouldiours, and guarders of his perſon: perſuading him, betime to appeaſe their furie, before they had embrued themſelues with bloud; for feare of further danger like ynough to enſue, as well vnto his owne perſon as vnto the reſt of his moſt faithfull and truſtie councellours, from ſuch furious and headſtrong men, vp in tumult, with their armes in their hands. And although that a prince ought not for the greatneſſe of his eſtate to doe any thing as therunto forced by his ſubiects, leaſt in ſo doing he might breed in them a contempt of himſelfe,
B and encreaſe their inſolencie; that yet neuertheleſſe in this action being altogether extraordinarie, he was not to reſt vpon this point: for that theſe mutinous ſouldiors turned not their weapons (as they pretended) againſt his imperiall power and ſoueraigntie, but rather to the contrarie, againſt the contemners thereof, ſeeking to be reuenged vpon them that had done him ſuch euill ſeruice for the maintenance of his honour and maieſtie, and for the puniſhmẽt of the inſolent aud diſloyall. And that therfore the juſtice of the cauſe requiting and couering the malice of the fact, he was of opinion, That it were beſt for him to yeeld a little vnto the zeale of theſe his beſt ſouldiours; and to ſatisfie their juſt deſire, although they had by verie euill and vnlawfull meanes ſought for the ſame. And therefore aduiſed his maieſtie, in ſome ſort to ſatisfie the juſt complaints of theſe men, armed for the reuenge of his honour:
C an to chaſtiſe the chiefe commanders of his Aſian forces, ſuch as by whoſe trecherie or cowardiſe, his ſeruice being neglected, had armed theſe men againſt them: with the ſame hand puniſhing ſuch as had wronged his maieſtie in honour, & appeaſing the diſcontented for the good of his ſeruice. Mahomet thus by the Baſſa perſuaded, as alſo to ſhew himſelfe in his maieſtie vnto theſe his diſcontented ſubiects, one part of their deſire; the neceſſitie of the cauſe ſo requiring, in his imperiall ſeat preſented himſelfe vnto them, accompained with the Mufti (the great Mahometan prieſt) and ſome few others of the reuerend doctors of their law: who by the Sultan commanded to ſit downe, and the Baſſaes ſtanding vp (ſo great the reſpect is to men of that ſort, euen in a barbarous nation of ſo ſmall reſpect) the chiefe of the ſeditious ſtepping forth, demanded leaue to ſpeake both for himſelfe and the reſt. Which being gran-D ted, he boldly thus began.

Haſſan Baſſa perſuadeth the great Sultan to giue way vnto the Ianizaries, and to grant them their requeſt.

Mahomet by the perſuaſion of Auſſan Baſſa, ſheweth himſelfe vnto the mutenous ſouldiors of the court.

Moſt happie and mightie Emperour, wee the Spahies and Ianizaries they obedient ſlaues, full of griefe and diſcontentment, to ſee a great part of thine empire in daunger to bee loſt; deſire to know of thee the cauſe, why thy greatneſſe doth not remedie it, and imploy the meanes which God hath giuen thee. They ſuppoſe that the rebels courſes in Asia are vnto thee vnknowne, ſeeing they haue been ſo hardie as to come in armes ſo neere vnto thy imperiall citie, the place of thine abode, and that without any let or reſiſtance. They deſire to know, if all this haue beene made knowne vnto thee, and whether thou wilt take vpon thy ſelfe the care of the gouerenment of thy great Monarchie, or no: which through the negligent careleſneſſe, and euill gouernment of ſome by thee put in truſt, is like vnto a bo-
E die with great and well proportioned members, but of little or no ſtrength or power. Or elſe, that thou void of care, canſt be content that all ſhould be diſmembred, and ſo euerie man to take vnto himſelfe what he can lay hand of, as the rebels do in Asia.

The proud and rude ſpeech of one of the mutiners vnto Mahomet the great Sultan.

Now let no man maruel at this preſumptuous rude ſpeech of a proud Ianizary vnto his ſoueraigne: for why, they are the men which may moſt boldly ſpeake in Tvrkie, they are the ſtay of the Turks empire, the great Sultans children acknowledging no other father but him: nay rather the great Turke himſelfe is their creature, for they raiſe him vp, & confirme him in the empire: they are his greateſt ſtrength, and vnto them he is moſt beholden. If Mahomet were with ſo inſolent a ſpeech much moued, he was not iuſtly to be therefore blamed: how-
F beit being beſet with ſuch a furious multitude, with weapons in their hands, and hauing no meanes to withſtand their furie, he wiſely diſſembled his inward choller, and with a faire coũtenance, and a maieſtie full of mildneſſe, with the beſt and calmeſt words hee could deuiſe, ſought to appeaſe them: imputing the diſorder and euill ſucceſſe of his affaires vnto the vnfaithfullneſſe of his miniſters, and the concealing of the truth therof from him. Saying more-from them all ocaſion of diſcontentment, or for them to vſe any ſuch ſpeech as was not beſeeming them, whoſe obedience and reſpect of loyall duetie vnto him their ſoueraigne, ſhould haue been an example vnto all the reſt of his ſubiects. Vpon which ſpeech they fiercely demaunded of Haſſan Baſſa, Why he had not giuen an account vnto his maieſtie, of the rebels proceeding in Asia. Who anſwered, That he had neuer failed of his dutie therein, but that he had been alwayes hindred ſo to do by the Capi-Aga; ſaying, that it was not needfull to trouble him their ſoueraigne therewith, hauing committed theſe matters to others: but to reforme and amend them as well as they might otherwiſe, without giuing of him any ſuch diſtaſt concerning theſe matters. And farther, that the cauſe of all theſe diſorders proceeded

With which his anſwer the mutiners more moued, furiouſly ſaid, That they were thither aſſembled to demand the heads of ſuch offendors, being reſolued to take another courſe, if he ſhould refuſe to graunt it them: meaning thereby to make a new emperour. Whereunto for all that the great Sultan anſwered, That it was no reaſon, neither that he would for their humours put ſuch as they demaunded innocently to death: but willed them to reſt themſelues contented, vntill it might by order of iuſtice be tried whether they had deſerued death or no, & that then he would giue them euen his owne ſonne, if hee were found culpable. But the mutiners conſtant in their reſolution, againe replied, That he had not by iuſtice put his brethren to death, but for the preſeruation of the ſtate: and that thoſe whom they ſo demaunded, were ſo guiltie of that wherewith they were I charged, as that they deſerued not to haue an orderly triall: That the lawes, how iuſt ſoeuer, ſhould be vnprofitable, and iuſtice iniurie, if they were not by them to be puniſhed: and that therefore it muſt needs be ſo, or elſe that they would take therein a courſe themſelues. As for the Empreſſe his mother, they were contented that ſhe ſhould bee confined into ſome place farther off, and no more to meddle in matters of eſtate. A ſtrange thing it was to ſee ſo great a prince ſo to be forced by the ſedition and mutinie of his ſubiects, to deliuer ſo great an officer of his Court as was the Capi-Aga, with ſuch others as they required, to bee vſed at their diſcretion. But they violent reſolution of theſe moſt inſolent men ſo vp in mutinie, made the Sultan Mahomet wiſely to yeeld to what they demaunded, cauſing the Capi-Aga and the others to bee brought foorth, who preſented themſelues vnto their furie, as men alreadie halfe K

For the loſſe of whom, ſo deare vnto him, Mahomet inwardly grieued, to bee in ſome part reuenged, commaunded the executioner, to proceed, and to do vnto ſome other of the chiefe Baſſas (whom he knew to be much beloued and reſpected of the Ianizaries, and whom he could haue been content to haue been rid of) as he had done vnto the Capi-Aga and the reſt: but then the murmuring and mutinie of the

Other cruelties of Sultan Mahomet. With like tyrannie, and no leſſe iniuſtice, Mahomet but a few dayes before had cauſed Capin one of his great Baſſaes to be beheaded; but whether it were for the deſire he had of his wealth and riches, or for the enuie of his honor and valour, was vncertain: howbeit the former cauſe ſeemed vnto many to bee the more probable, for that Mahomet immediatly after his death tooke the whole ſpoyle of his wealth, and ſeiſed vpon all his goods, except 400000 duckats which Calil Baſſa, father of the dead Baſſa, had detained for himſelfe. Which his purloyning Mahomet hauing diſcouered (as the eie of the couetous man is alwaies fixed vpon his prey) demanded one day of the Baſſa, if it were true that he had retained vnto himſelfe thoſe 400000 duckats. Which fact the Baſſa partly for feare, and partly for couetouſneſſe, conſtantly deni- M ed, & ſwore himſelfe to be guiltleſſe from any ſuch crime. Whereupon he was forthwith taken, and thinking by lying to haue ſaued his life, was for the trueth put to death, without any farther examination of the matter, hauing his head ſtruck off. Such is the ſmal aſſurance euen of the greateſt that liue in tyrants courts. Neither reſted his greedie mind ſo contented with

A the Baſſaes bloud,for why,that ſerued but for a ſhew; it was his wealth muſt worke that cure, which was all forthwith ſeiſed vpon,rifled,and caried away to ſatisfie in effect the greedy appetite of the hungrie tyrant,who changed the dowry and ſucceſſion of the wife and children of the dead Baſſa,into bonds,chaines,priſons,and ſlaueries.

Mahomet another Baſſa with theſe cruelties diſmaied, and perceiuing the like euill hap and danger to hang ouer his owne head, that had ouerwhelmed Calil and his ſonne; reſolued to haue prouided for himſelfe againſt this miſchiefe,by flying vnto the rebels in Asia. But this his purpoſe diſcouered by certain ſpies(which ſerue as meanes to open a way vnto the Turks crueltie)and he with one of the chiefe followers of Capin Baſſa taken by the Ianizaries, were both by them cut in pieces. Mahomet Baſſa by the Ianizaries ſlaine.

B But whileſt theſe things thus paſſed at Constantinople,the rebels with all diligence proſecuted their rebellion in Asia,and bent their forces againſt the great townes there. Their armie was exceeding great, euerie man ioyning himſelfe vnto the firſt forces, which were in good eſtate,being not as yet by any greater power repreſſed, and rich with the ſpoiles that they had taken. Theſe men had beſieged Angore, a great and ſtrong towne in Asia, and ſeemed reſolutely ſet downe for the carrying thereof. Whereof the citizens being afraid,and out of hope of reliefe,came to parley,offring vnto them a ſumme of money to redeem themſelues and their citie: And ſo in fine agreed to giue them 200000 duckats, vpon the ready paiment whereof,the rebels without more ado preſently departed. The ſucceſſe of the rebels in Aſia.

Shortly after the new captaines of Sultan Mahomet arriued there alſo,whom he had placed
C in the places of them whom he had before executed for the appeaſing of the ſouldiors of the court,who would needs make it treaſon,and put to death the citizens, for hauing giuen ſuch money as is aforeſaid,vnto the rebels,though it were done for the preſeruation of their liues: as if the lawes were to be reſpected in the horrours of neceſſitie,or that life were to become a ſlaue vnto riches, and riches not made for the vſe of mans life. Well, needs they would for this ſuppoſed treaſon(as they pretended)haue put them to death, and ſacked their citie; but indeed all was in their greedie furie to haue carried away that which the rebels had in their mercie left them. Theſe poore citizens with this ſo cruell a reſolution diſmayed, and out of all hope of finding fauour at ſuch mercileſſe mens hands,reſolued now to hazard all, and ſo vpon the ſudden taking vp armes,ſtood vpon their own defence.Hereupon aroſe a great and D cruell fight betwixt theſe ſouldiours and the citizens,both the ſubiects of one prince,and all of them of one and the ſelfeſame ſuperſtition: but the one ſide armed with pride and couetouſneſſe, and the other with neceſſitie and deſpaire: howbeit at laſt the iuſter cauſe preuailing, the citizens ouercame theſe new come ſouldiours,and hauing ſlaine a great number of them, chaſed the reſt out of the citie. This euill encounter of theſe new captaines euen at the firſt entrance into their charges giuen them,by the ſubiects themſelues, encreaſed the rebels courage, ſo that they being in number fourtie thouſand,vnder the leading of one of the Tartar Han his brethren, beſieged Bvrsa a great and rich citie,being the ſtore-houſe for the warlike prouiſions of Asia,and the place whereunto the Turkes cuſtomes, taxes, and ſubſidies of Asia were brought,and there kept. Theſe men after certaine dayes beſtowed in the E ſiege,and great reſiſtance made by the beſieged, at length by force carried the place,ſlew the inhabitants,& ſacked the citie.Which exploit gracing their fortune with honour and bootie, encreaſed alſo their power and reputation, ſo that redoubled on all ſides, and encreaſed with courage & ſpoiles,Mahomet diſmaied,reſolued by faire means to appeaſe them,and to intreat with them of peace. This good fortune had drawne vnto their part the Gouernour of Babylon,either weary of the ſeruice of the Turk,or deſirous by the ruine of the ſtate in generall,to increaſe his own power: whoſe reuolt greatly increaſed the rebels power,and diminiſhed the grand Seigniors. Beſide theſe miſhaps alſo,the great Shaugh of Persia(commonly called the Sophy)thruſting himſelfe into theſe diſorders,to make his gain,and to fiſh(as they ſay)in F a troubled water,had now taken Corberie,a ſtrong town vpon the borders of the Turks empire,& was making himſelfe ready for new conqueſts.All which tempeſts ariſing as it were in one together, cauſed Mahomet to ſtrike ſaile,and maugre his imperiall dignitie and honour to ſeek for peace;which indeed could not be great in ſuch weaknes of his nature, neither braue in ſuch his great want of courage. For great dignities and honours without valour to maintaine them,are but like rich garments which couer bodies almoſt rotten, but heale them not. The Turkes together by the eares amongſt themſelues.

Mahomet

Mahomet desirous to come to some good agreement with his rebellious subiects, at length, G but not without his great dishonour, obtained the same; graunting vnto them all their demaunds, disarming them by yeelding vnto them, and not by valour: and giuing vnto Zellalie one of their chieftaines, the honorable place of the Bassa of Bosna, to content his ambition, and to bind him therewith to doe his seruice. The readie way by sufferance to encrease the disloyall subiects courage, instead of stopping their furie by the seueritie of iustice: For to grace a rebell with offices of authoritie, is but to arme him with lawfull power, for him the better to vndertake whatsoeuer shall best fit his appetite and desire, vpon the hope of his own priuat and certaine profit or aduancement.

The captaines and souldiors murmure against their Sultan Mahomet.

Mahomet his other captaines and men of warre, seeing this dishonourable peace of their prince, and preferment of the rebels, honoured with honours and dignities, in stead of paines H and punishments which they should of right haue for their rebellion indured; began to enter into great murmuring and discontentment against their great Sultan. They considered his vniust dealing and base feare, in aduancing the rebels vnto such honours and dignities, as of right belonged vnto his most faithfull and loyall officers and seruants, by such their vnworthie preferments making them slaues vnto his enemies, and vassales vnto the rebels: they, to their dishonour and losse, by their insolencie and treacherie, enioying the honors and preferments of right due vnto their faithfull and loyall seruices. Which daungerous persuasions transported them so farre from their allegeance and dutie, as to vndertake a greater and more perillous matter against his crowne and dignitie, than had the rebels before by taking vp of armes in the field against him, whereunto the assured knowledge they had of his cowardise I encouraged them also: so that their resolution was to thrust him out of his imperiall state, and to set vp his eldest sonne called also Mahomet in his place. These are the ordinarie effects of iniustice and cowardise, the ouerthrow of princes; their iniustice through crueltie arming all creatures against them; and their cowardise through contempt dispensing with euery man for his duetie: so that he must be iust, that will keepe his subiects in order; and valiant, that must hold them in awe.

Mahomet in danger to haue been deposed from his empire and his eldest sonne set vp in his place.

Vnto these discontentments these mutiners ioyned also (as I said) the slothfulnesse, effeminateness, and insufficiencie of Mahomet, vnfit to deale in matters of estate, and altogether vnable to mannage armes. He was too cowardly, as they thought, to represse their valour by force, and too weake to crosse their designes by wisdome: which not a little encouraged them K in that their so desperate and dangerous a resolution. They drew also into this their plot the Sultaness, Mahomet his chiefe wife, and mother to the yong prince: who blinded with ambition (the bane of great spirits) had not the hap to reiect their persuasions, as dangerous vnto her and her sonne, but shutting her eyes against the due consideration of loyaltie and duetie, cast both her selfe and her sonne headlong into the middest of most desperat dangers.

This proiect of no lesse importance, than of the deposing of one of the greatest Monarchs of the world) resolued vpon, some of these men, according to the manner of the Turkes, ioyning superstition vnto their designes, consulted with an Astrologer, concerning the successe of the actions of the young prince, whom they were about to enstall in his fathers imperiall throne. This man to be excused in his trumperies, seeing that to deceiue is the chiefe point L of his art, erected the figure of the princes natiuitie, consulted with his spirits, considered the celestiall bodies, and in fine arriued at the poynt of his iudgement, for the good and welfare of the prince: and thereupon dispatched an Eunuch towards the Sultaness, with these pleasing speeches, That she should be of good courage, and in assured hope that the yong prince her sonne within a few dayes should haue the imperiall crown set vpon his head, and the roiall scepter put into his hand: his art (as he said) promising vnto him these honours, by the fauour of the celestiall bodies, of whom he had learned these newes; and by the conference with spirits, from whom he had this assurance. But ô the vaine and foolish knowledge of man against God! attributing vnto the second causes, that which altogether belongeth vnto his owne power, robbing him of his own prouidence, which extendeth ouer all, to giue the same vnto creatures, which neither haue their owne being, neither are able of themselues to bring M forth, or to worke any effects at all without it: And that more is, to giue certaine credit vnto the enemie of all faith and beliefe, euen to the father of leasing, who taketh as much glorie in falshood, as God himselfe doth in truth; as being the proper marke of his power. For it chanced

A ced that theſe letters ſent by the Eunuch to the Sultaneſſe, were intercepted & brought vnto Mahomet the great Sultan, whom they moſt concerned: wherupon it ſo fel our, that he which tooke vpon him to foretell the long life and empire to befall to another man, could not foreſee the end of his owne life, which followed him faſt euen at the heeles, being himſelfe by the commaundment of the great Sultan, with the young prince, the Eunuch, and fiftie others of the conſpirators, & ſuch as were conſenting vnto the conſpiracie, moſt cruelly ſtrangled, and the Sultaneſſe her ſelfe drowned. Howbeit ſome report this young prince to haue bin ſtrangled vpon ſuſpition of conſpiring againſt his father with the rebels of Asia: which after his death being found not to be ſo, the Baſſa, which put that ſuſpition into Mahomets head, to haue bin therefore worthily hanged. But with theſe contentments taken from the croſſes of

B our enemies, let vs againe returne into Hvngarie.

The laſt yeare ended with the great bruit of the comming of the Tartar Han with a great armie into Hvngarie, and now he had diſpatched his embaſſadors towards the king of Polonia, to demaund of him tribute, and paſſage through his countrie. Great and proud demaunds to be both at once required. But the king of Polonia requited him againe with the like, denying him both the one and the other, roughly anſwering of his threats. Which ſo reſolute and blunt a refuſall, cauſed the proud Tartar to change his intended courſe, and for feare of being defeated by the Polonians in paſſing through their countrie (as the Tartars had often beene) before he could come into Hvngarie, tooke another way, and turned with his armie toward Valachia. Of whoſe comming, Radul the Vayuod vnderſtanding,

The Polonian denieth the Tartars paſſage through his countrie into Hungarie.

C and that beſide the forraging of his countrie, they had a purpoſe to diſplace him, & to ſet vp another Vayuod in his ſtead; with great diligence gathered togither the greateſt power that he could, and ſo marched vnto the borders of his countrie, there to attend the comming of theſe Tartars, and to ſtay them from entring. Which in effect fell out according to his deſire: for the barbarous people being arriued, and attempting with all their force to haue entred, were by this little armie encountred, which comaunding the countrie, tooke all the aduantages of the ſtrait paſſages, and there notably repulſed the fierce enemie. Two of the firſt encounters fell out fortunatly vnto the Valachians, who therein ſlew about three thouſand of the Tartars, whoſe auantguard for all that ſtill came on, and at the third encounter ſo long maintained the fight, that their whole armie was now come in, and hardly charged the Va-

D lachians: whoſe fortune ſurcharged, began then to change, the hardie being conſtrained to bow vnder the multitude, & valour forced to yeeld vnto number. Which was not done without a long and cruell fight, both armies encountring with great courage and furie, the one for the defence of their countrie, and the other for an entrance vnto their conqueſts. Howbeit the ſtrong enemie at length preuailed, and entring into Valachia, brought in with it ruine, death, and deſtruction.

The Tartars hauing by force thus opened themſelues a way through Valachia, and grieuouſly ſpoiled the countrie, were come with their armie to Qvinqve Ecclesiæ, a towne in Hvngarie, to ioine their forces with Haſſan Baſſa, now after his mariage returned into this countrie with a great armie to continue his charge: Who cauſed the Tartars to bee muſtered in his preſence, and found them to be fortie thouſand ſtrong. E gainſt the weake, but meere cowards before the couragious: who in ſteed of aſſaulting the wals of any ſtrong towne, fell vpon the cottages of poore countrie villages, ranſacking and pilling the poore inhabitants, as well in the villages of the territories ſubiect vnto the Turks, as in the territories of the Chriſtians: conſtraining the poore people contrarie to their conſcience, and to the preiudice of their faith, to ſweare to ſerue the Turke: Beſides that, they enforced them to furniſh them with all warlike prouiſion and munition, which they put into Canisia, but a while after that our men had defeated the garriſon there. Neither were they ſo contented, all the neighbours thereabouts being ſubiect to this tempeſt. For they paſſed into Syria with their families, and ouerran a part of that prouince, ſpoiling it of men

From thence they went into the countrie of Shavarie, embruing themſelues with the bloud of the Chriſtians, rifling their villages, and after that burning them; carrying away with them a thouſand Chriſtian captiues into moſt miſerable bondage and ſlauerie. Which cruell outrages afterward thruſt the valiant Colonell Collonitz into the field againſt theſe barbarous people, to ſtay their incurſions, and to defeat them if he could. G

This worthie commaunder had but a few daies before been much troubled in appeaſing the French light horſmen in garriſon in the villages about ROQVESBVRG, riſen vp in mutinie for their pay: whoſe hote and moued ſpirits he by his wiſdome ſo calmed, as that they were content to be againe ſworne vnto the emperor, and ſo ioined themſelues vnto the armie of Collonitz, which was then 10000 good men ſtrong.
